START

Microfilmed By:

NORTHEAST DOCUMENT CONSERVATION CENTER
Andover, MA 01810

May 1994

Camera Operator:
John Sullivan

MASTER NEGATIVE NUMBER: BSO-56-029

MICROFILMED
August 1993 - April 1994

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA SCRAPBOOK MICROFILMING PROJECT

Funded in part by

THE NATIONAL ENDOWMENT FOR THE HUMANITIES

Grant No. PS-20709-93

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA MICROFILMING PROJECT

A Cooperative Project Between the Boston Symphony Orchestra Archives and the Boston Public Library (August 1993 - April 1994)

The Microfilming Project incorporates two collections of scrapbooks housed in two separate repositories. The first set of scrapbooks (80 volumes) resides within the Allen A. Brown Collection of the Boston Public Library (BPL) Music Department. Their call number is M.125.5. The second set of scrapbooks (132 volumes) resides within the Press Clippings collection of the Boston Symphony Orchestra (BSO) Archives. They have the designation Pres 56.

The BPL scrapbooks begin with the founding of the BSO in 1881 and continue, through 79 seasons, to 1960. Articles consist mainly of reviews and feature stories from Boston and New York newspapers. Occasionally, magazine articles and press releases are also included. The scrapbooks cover most aspects of the BSO.

The BSO scrapbooks run from 1889, the Orchestra's 9th season, to 1973. In addition to local reviews and features, the volumes contain articles culled from national and international publications. The scrapbooks document, in detail, all aspects of the BSO: The Symphony Orchestra (including subscription concerts, tours, and trips), the Boston Pops, the Tanglewood Festival, the Tanglewood Music Center, and Symphony Hall.

The two sets of scrapbooks have been filmed as two separate entities. Researchers wanting to look at specific seasons or subjects must examine both sets of films to ensure full coverage.

The scrapbooks do not represent the complete holdings of either location on the subject of the BSO.

Requests for positive microfilm copies of individual rolls, or of film sets, should be directed to the respective repository:

Music Department
Boston Public Library
Post Office Box 286
Boston, MA 02117

Boston Symphony Orchestra Archives
Symphony Hall
Boston, MA 02115

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA SCRAPBOOKS

1889 - 1973

132 VOLUMES

Source: Boston Symphony Orchestra Archives

FINDING AID

Boston Symphony Orchestra Scrapbooks (Series 56, Sub-Series 1)

Source: Press Office (Office of the Public Relations Director)

The BSO scrapbooks comprise part of one series in the BSO Archives. Series 56, Press Clippings, is divided by format into 3 sub-series: 1) Scrapbooks, 1889-1973 (132 volumes); 2) Loose Clippings, 1931-1991 (9 record cartons); and 3) Oversize Newspapers and Journals, 1919-1979 (1 oversize box). Each sub-series is arranged chronologically.

The scrapbooks contain concert notices and reviews, record reviews, and feature articles. Early scrapbooks may also contain programs, tickets, and subscription orders. Materials are organized by concert season into the following categories: BSO (including tours); Kneisel Quartet (and later Boston Symphony Chamber Players); Boston Pops (referred to in early years as Promenade concerts); and Tanglewood (including the Tanglewood Music Center, the Tanglewood Festival, Tanglewood-on-Parade, and the Fromm Festival of Contemporary Music).

Reviews and articles cover a wide range of subjects: Founder H.L. Higginson; BSO conductors, players, trustees, and other personnel; guest artists and composers; BSO and Pops performances and recordings; U.S. and overseas tours; BSO/Cecilia Society joint performances; open rehearsals; and special events connected to anniversary celebrations and fundraising.

Feature stories document changes in the size, composition, and location of the orchestra. Topics include the hiring of women and minorities; the unionization of players; controversies (such as the internment of conductor Karl Muck during World War II); the sale of the old Music Hall; and the construction of Symphony Hall and other structures (such as the Koussevitsky Music Shed at Tanglewood).

Reproductions of the materials in the collection may not be made without permission from the Boston Symphony Orchestra Archives.

GUIDE TO CONTENTS

Institution: BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Series Name: PRESS CLIPPINGS
Series Number: 56
Series Dates: 1889-1991

Sub-series Name: SCRAPBOOKS
Sub-series Number: 1
Sub-series Dates: 1889-1973

VOLUME LISTING

VOL	TITLE	DATES
1	BSO	1889-1890
2	BSO Kneisel Quartet	1890-1891
3	BSO	1891-1892
4	Promenade (Pops)	1892
5	BSO Kneisel Quartet	1892-1893
6	BSO Kneisel Quartet	1893-1894
7	BSO Kneisel Quartet	1894-1895
8	BSO	1895-1896
9	Promenade (Pops)	1895-1896
10	BSO	1896-1897
11	BSO	1897-1898
12	Promenade (Pops)	1897-1898
13	BSO	1898-1899
14	BSO	1899-1900
15	Pops	1899-1900
16	BSO	1900-1901
17	BSO	1901-1902
18	Pops	1901-1903
19	BSO	1902-1903
20	BSO	1903-1904
21	BSO	1904-1905
22	Pops	1904-1905
23	BSO	1905-1906
24	BSO	1906-1907
25	BSO	1907-1908
26	BSO	1908-1909
27	BSO Pops	1909-1910
28	BSO Pops	1910-1911
29	BSO Advertisements	1910-1911
30	BSO Pops	1911-1912
31	BSO Pops	1912-1913
32	BSO Pops	1913-1914
33	BSO Pops	1914-1915
34	BSO Pops	1915-1916
35	BSO Pops	1916-1917
36	BSO Pops	1917-1918
37	Karl Muck	1918
38	BSO Pops	1918-1919
39	BSO Pops	1919-1920
40	BSO Advertisements	1919-1920
41	BSO Pops	1920-1921
42	BSO Pops	1921-1922
43	BSO BSO Advertisements Pops Advertisements	1922-1923
44	BSO Pops	1922-1924
45	BSO Pops	1924
46	BSO BSO Advertisements Pops Advertisements	1924-1926
47	BSO Pops	1925-1926
48	BSO Advertisements Pops Advertisements	1926-1927
49	BSO Pops	1926-1928
50	BSO	1928
51	BSO Pops	1928-1929
52	BSO Pops U.S. Tour	1929-1930
53	BSO	1930-1931
54	BSO Pops	1931-1932
55	BSO Pops	1932-1933
56	BSO	1933-1934
57	BSO	1934-1935
58	BSO	1935-1936
59	BSO	1936-1937

VOL	TITLE	DATES
60	Pops
	Tanglewood	1936-1937
61	BSO	1937
62	BSO	1937-1938
63	Pops
	Tanglewood	1938
64	BSO	1938-1939
65	Pops
	Tanglewood	1939
66	BSO	1939-1940
67	Tanglewood	1939-1941
68	BSO
	Pops	1940
69	BSO	1940-1941
70	Tanglewood	1940-1944
71	BSO	1941-1942
72	BSO	1942-1943
73	BSO	1943-1944
74	BSO
	Pops
	Tanglewood	1944-1945
75	BSO
	Pops
	Tanglewood	1945-1946
76	BSO
	Pops
	Tanglewood	1946-1947
77	Tanglewood	1947-1948
78	BSO	1947-1949
79	Tanglewood	1949-1950
80	BSO	1949-1951
81	Tanglewood	1950-1951
82	BSO
	Pops	1951-1952
83	BSO
	Pops	1952-1953
84	Tanglewood	1952-1953
85	BSO	1953-1955
86	Tanglewood	1953-1954
87	Tanglewood	1954-1955
88	BSO
	Pops	1955-1956
89	Tanglewood	1955-1956
90	Tanglewood	1955-1956
91	European Tour	1956
92	European Tour	1956-1957
93	BSO
	Pops	1956-1957
94	Tanglewood	1957
95	BSO	1957-1958
96	BSO
	Pops	1958-1959
97	BSO	1958-1959
98	Tanglewood	1958-1959
99	Tanglewood	1959
100	BSO
	Pops	1959-1960
101	Tanglewood	1959-1960
102	Far Eastern Tour	1959-1960
103	BSO
	Pops	1960-1961
104	Tanglewood	1961
105	BSO
	Pops	1961-1962
106	Tanglewood	1962
107	BSO
	Pops	1962-1963
108	Tanglewood	1963
109	BSO
	Pops	1963-1964
110	Tanglewood	1963-1964
111	BSO
	Pops	1964-1966
112	Tanglewood	1965
113	BSO 85th Anniversary	1965
114	BSO
	Pops	1965-1966
115	Tanglewood	1966
116	BSO
	Pops	1966-1967
117	Tanglewood	1967
118	BSO
	Pops	1967-1968
119	Tanglewood	1968-1969
120	BSO
	Pops	1968-1969
121	Tanglewood	1969
122	BSO
	Pops	1969-1970
123	Tanglewood	1970
124	BSO
	Pops	1970-1971
125	Tanglewood	1971
126	BSO
	Pops	1971-1972
127	European Tour	1970-1971
128	European Tour	1971
129	Tanglewood	1972
130	BSO
	Pops	1972-1973
131	Tanglewood	1973
132	BSO
	Pops	1973-1974

MATERIALS NOT FILMED

SUB-SERIES NUMBER	SUB-SERIES NAME	SUB-SERIES DATES
2	Loose Clippings	1931-1991
3	Oversize Newspapers and Journals	1919-1979

COPYRIGHT STATEMENT

The copyright law of the Unites States - Title 17, United States Code - concerns the making of photocopies or other reproductions of copyrighted material.

Under certain conditions specified in the law, libraries and archives are authorized to furnish a photocopy or other reproduction. One of these specified conditions is that the photocopy or other reproduction is not to be "used for any purpose other than private study, scholar-ship, or research." If a user makes a request for, or later uses, a photocopy or reproduction for purposes in excess of "fair use," that user may be liable for copyright infringement.

This institution reserves the right to refuse to accept a copy order if, in its judgment, fulfillment of the order would involve violation of the copy-right law.

TECHNICAL DATA

IMAGE PLACEMENT: IA IB IIA IIB

REDUCTION RATIO: 14x

FILM STOCK:

REEL 29

Volumes 53

BSO

1930-1931

PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

200 mm

150 mm

100 mm

A3

A4

A5

1.0 mm

1.5 mm

2.0 mm

2.5 mm

1.0

1.1

1.25

1.4

1.6

1.8

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century

A&P

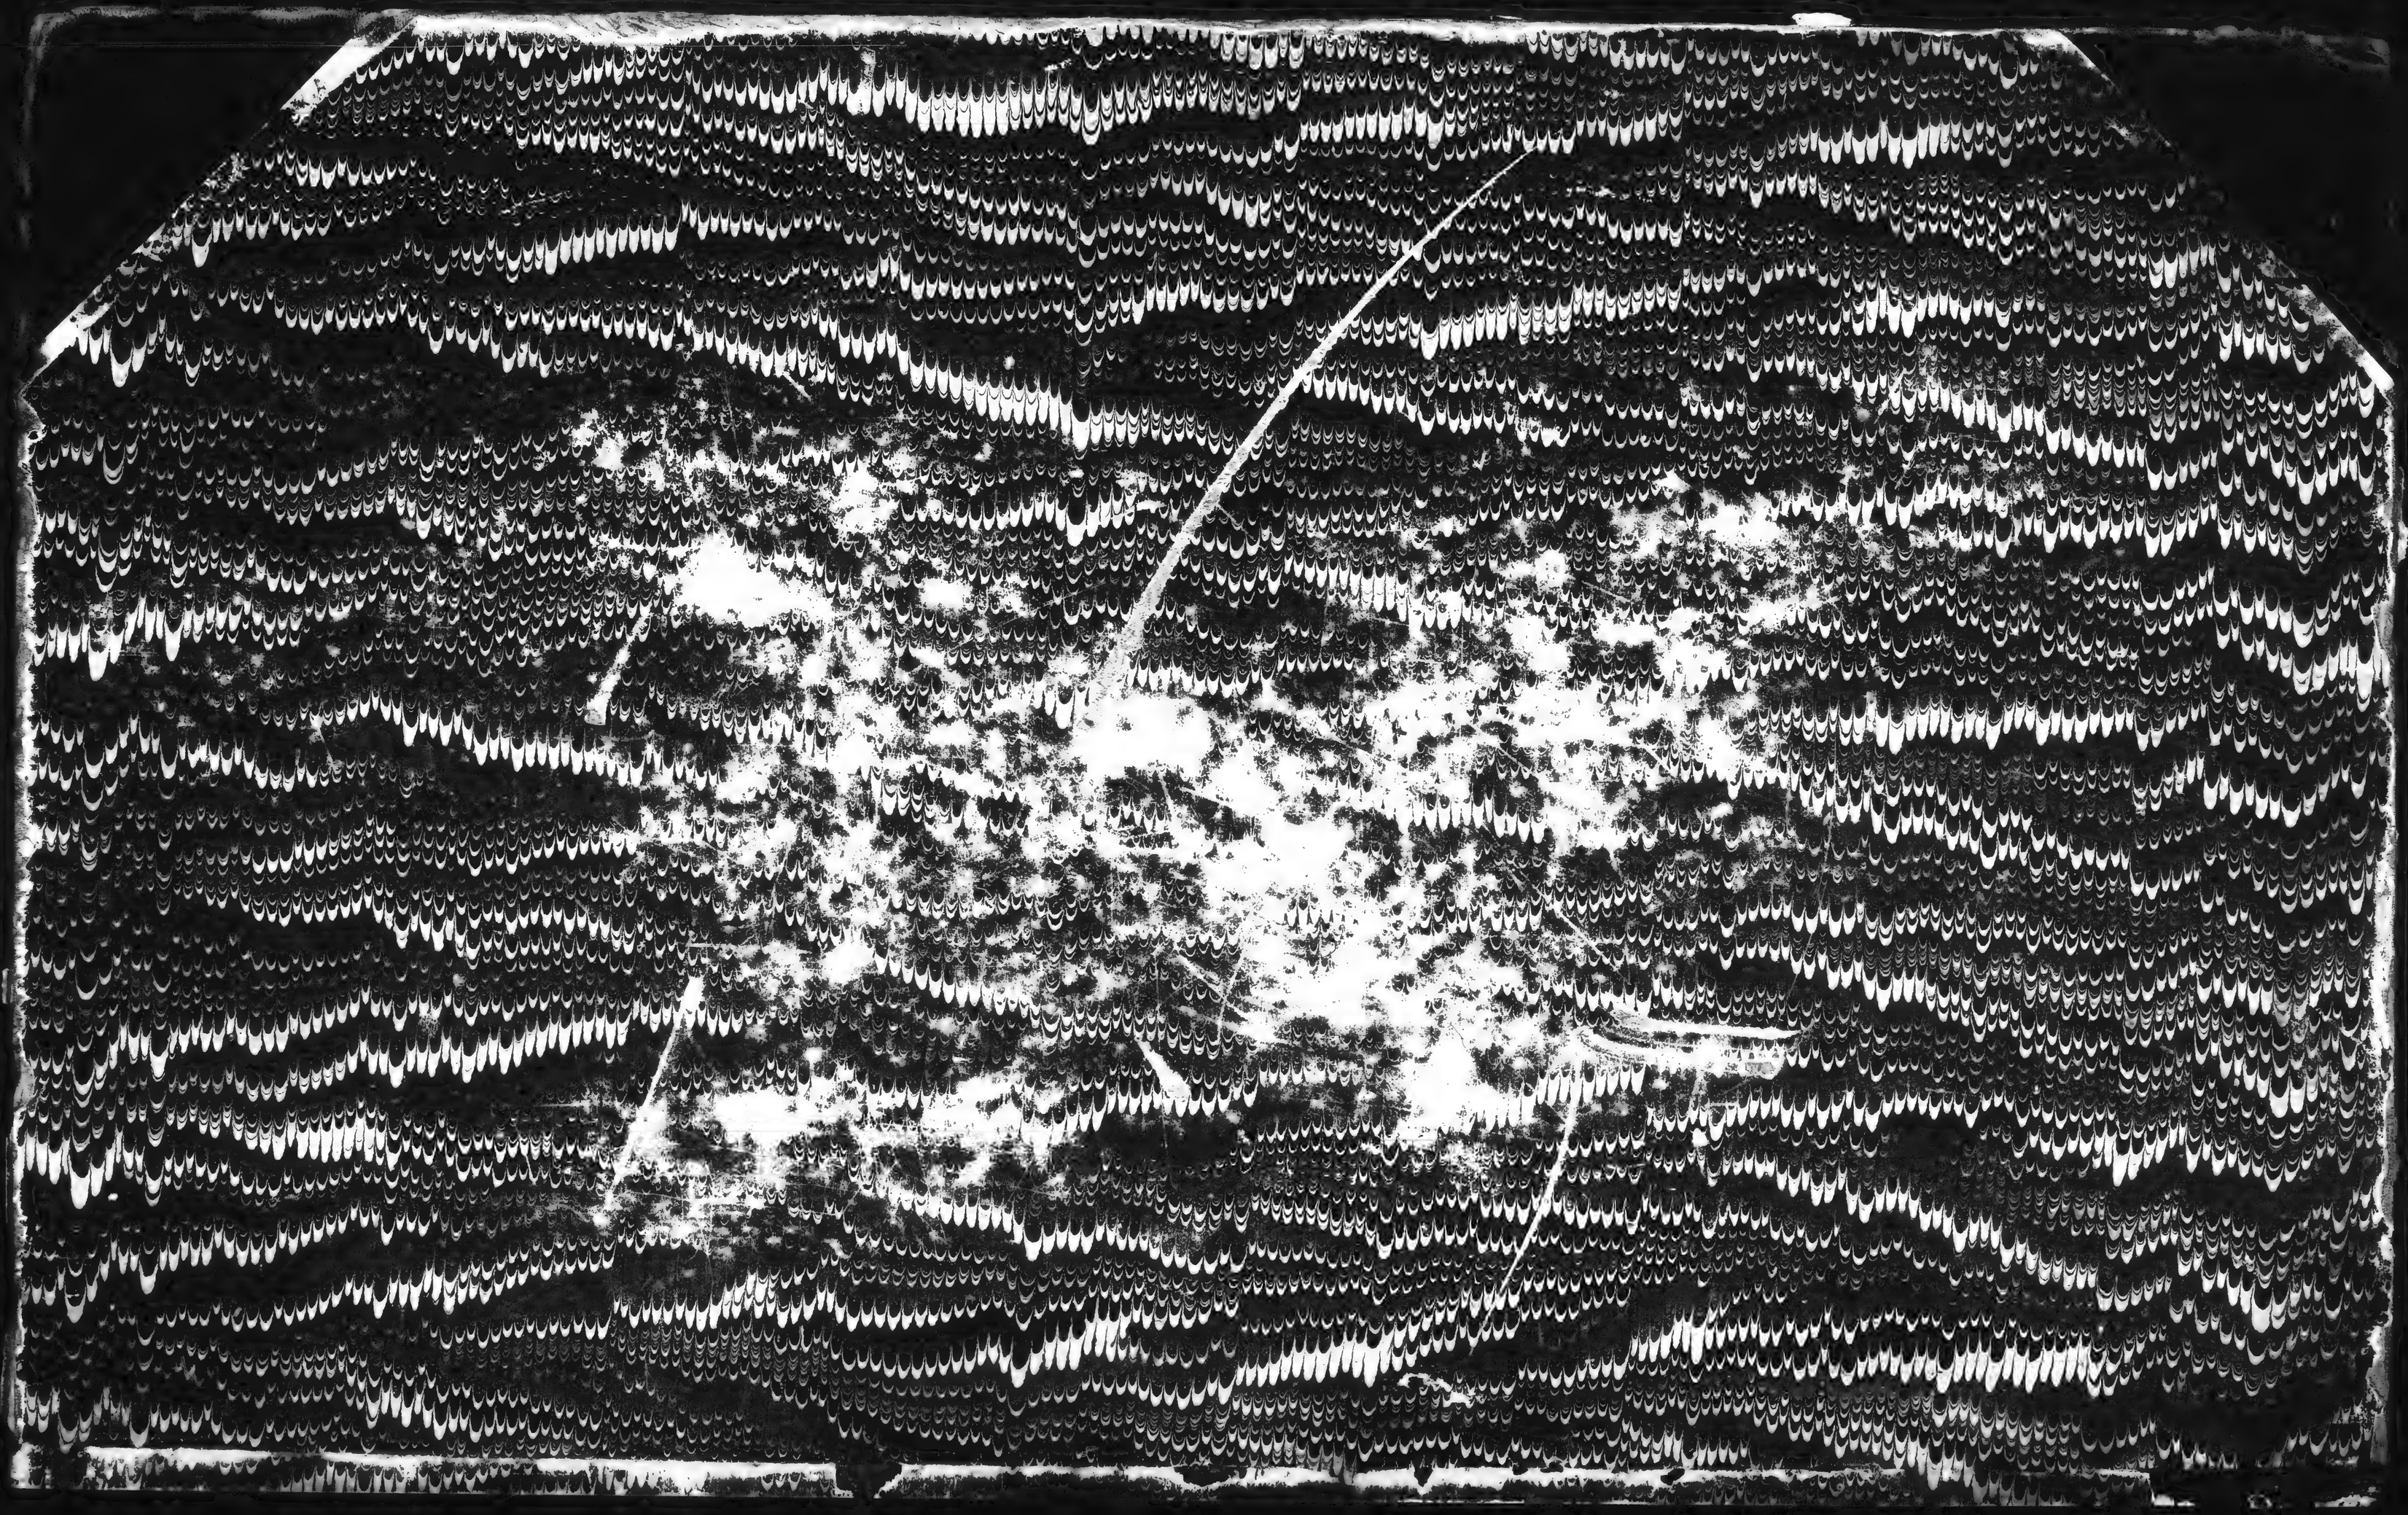
1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

MULTIPLE EXPOSURES DUE TO COLOR VARIATIONS AND OVERLAPPING MATERIAL

VOLUME 53

BSO

1930 - 1931



Up Strike Orchestras

(See front cover)

From one end of the land to the other, symphony orchestras last week tuned themselves for the opening of a new season. Manhattan, Philadelphia and Seattle actually began their concerts. Important bands in other cities busied themselves with rehearsals or announcing schedules.

In Boston. Most ambitious of the season's programs is that mapped out by the Boston Symphony. The occasion warrants it. Fifty years have passed since the late Major Henry Lee Higginson undertook to provide Bostonians with a permanent orchestra, brought over German George Henschel to take first command. Despite his 80 years, Henschel came back last week to inaugurate the jubilee season with a repetition of his original program. Conductor Sergei Alexandrovitch Koussevitzky anticipated the opening with a superb radio concert, planned his actual return for the season's second week. Scheduled for the winter are the premières of many contemporary works, a Beethoven Festival to be given in Washington through the first week in December, a Bach Festival in Boston in March.

To Sergei Koussevitzky is due 100% credit for the Boston Symphony's present excellence. Seven years ago it was in sorry state. Frenchmen Henri Rabaud and Pierre Monteux, successors to the maligned Karl Muck,* had proved incapable. The directors were appraising all the availables in Europe when they came upon a Russian exiled in Paris. They traced his history: at 12 he had been chef d'orchestre in the theatre of his native town (Tver in North Russia), composed whatever music was required for the plays and conducted the entr'actes. At 14 he went to Moscow to study, chose for his instrument the bull fiddle, toured Europe for ten years as a contrabass virtuoso. By 1919 he had achieved his ambition, become a conductor again. Koussevitzky concerts were soon famous in Moscow and Petrograd but that was not enough for its leader. He wanted to reach the great masses of Russians who had never heard a symphony concert. So for several summers he chartered a steamer, cruised the 2,300 mi. down the River Volga playing to the peasants who gathered on its banks. The Revolution made Russia impossible for most musicians. Koussevitzky left along with the rest, settled in Paris where in partnership with his wife he still conducts the profitable music-publishing house called Edition Russe.

The choice of Koussevitzky for Boston has proved singularly happy. He is an excellent musician, although it is said he cannot read a score, has to hire pianists to teach him new music before he in turn can transmit it to his men. He has the magnetism, the energy which were necessary to rejuvenate Boston's orchestra in 1924. He has an insatiable interest in new music and a talent for playing it. His programs are indisputably the best in the country. So is his understanding of Ravel and Debussy.

*On an hysterical, unproved charge of pro-Germanism, Muck lost his Boston post.

In Boston Koussevitzky has become completely at home. He has an establishment in Jamaica Plain, an entourage which includes his wealthy, matronly-looking wife Nathalie; a vivacious niece, Olga Naumoff, who is his secretary; Valet Ivan who prepares him occasional Russian dishes; Ivan's wife; and Droll, a lively Boston terrier. Often in the early morning the Maestro may be seen walking in the Rockwood Street section around Jamaica Pond. Even those who do not recognize him suspect him of being a great man. He pays no attention to traffic lights, busiest streets stopping mobiles with much the uses to get a pianis-n, is rightfully worked with well-pleased admires his dis- is faultlessly tai- to his music, the ner in which he zky's victory has oncert hall. Not onable but he has on Hill, been ac- other conductor lphia's Stokowski, s has been faintly ety, might well envy st great honor: election merset Club. (Arturo il to see any artistic

Wide World

CONDUCTOR KLEIBER

Toscanini's boots are big for anyone.

SERGEI ALEXANDROVITCH KOUSSEVITZKY

". . . he has won the battle of Beacon Hill."

(See MUSIC)

50 East 42nd Street, Chicago. (Reg. U. S. Pat. Off.) Editorial and Advertising Offices, 205 East 42nd

BOSTON CLOSE-UPS

Intimate Glimpses Into the Lives of the Great and Near-Great

By MASON HAM

Carnegie Steel and Benjamin Franklin are among the speakers who address the 15th annual meeting of the Associated Industries of Massachusetts this week. The former's name, to be more accurate, is F. F. Carnegie Steele, a technical adviser of the association, and the latter's, Col. Benjamin A. Franklin, president.

* * *

There is a young woman living in Brookline who has had her fortune told just once.

"I was informed," she says, "that twins lay in store for me, but no husband."

Her name is Miss Doris Peel, born in England in 1907. Her father is a newspaper man. She is inscribed in our very special book of fame for having written two novels though only 22. Her first was published when its author was 19 years old; her second, "Five on Parade," will come out within the next few weeks.

* * *

Half an hour or so before every Boston symphony orchestra, Sergei (Alexandrovitch) Koussevitzky in his own car, a five passenger sedan of medium price, leaves his home at 60 Rockwood street, Jamaica Plain. Seated with him on the back seat are his wife, Nathalie, and his niece and secretary, Olga Naumoff. In front are his chauffeur (Koussevitzky does not drive himself) and his valet, Ivan. Ivan carries his master's score and a change of clothing. At the end of every concert Koussevitzky is given a rub down by the faithful Ivan, and dons fresh garments.

Mme. Koussevitzky and Mlle. Naumoff rarely miss a concert. In Boston they sit on the right side of the first balcony in seats C19 and 20, traditionally reserved for the conductor's use, partly because of their easy access to his room. During intermissions Mme. Koussevitzky often leaves her seat to talk with her husband, but almost never does he receive anybody else. Once in a while he will admit a distinguished visiting musician.

Koussevitzky's rubdowns are a part of the strict health program which he observes throughout the symphony season. He takes a nap every afternoon before an evening concert. He walks regularly in the early morning; on tour he always walks before breakfast. This, and the exercise of 20 hours a week conducting, at concerts and rehearsals, keeps him fit.

He has never missed a concert and is very rarely late. One day about a year ago his chauffeur fell asleep and failed to appear on Rockwood street at the appointed time. Mistrusting taxis—for his home is hard to find—Koussevitzky telephoned Symphony Hall whence a car was sent at once. The conductor was about 10 minutes late. So firmly established is his reputation for punctuality that nearly all the audience blamed, not him, but Mme. Margaret Matzenauer, guest soloist, who had arrived on time.

On his annual trips to Paris where he has a house at 8 Rue de Conseiller Colignon, Koussevitzky is usually accompanied by his wife, his niece, his valet, his wife's maid and his Boston terrier, Droll, acquired when the conductor first moved to Boston. Mme. Koussevitzky often says that Droll is happier here than in Paris.

On their return to America this fall, the baggage of the entourage included 12 trunks, 14 pieces of hand baggage, and Koussevitzky's double bass.

There are many painting on the walls of Koussevitzky's Boston home. Among them is a portrait of Traffic Commissioner Joseph A. Conry, former Russian consul here and Koussevitzky's next door neighbor. The conductor's home is owned by Mr. Conry.

Incidentally, the old story that Koussevitzky cannot read a score is false. Koussevitzky can read a score. If you should ever happen to interrupt his solitude—at home or on the road—you would probably find a score in his lap and dozens of others scattered on chairs and tables in the room.

Up Strike Orchestras

(See front cover)

From one end of the land to the other, symphony orchestras last week tuned themselves for the opening of a new season. Manhattan, Philadelphia and Seattle actually began their concerts. Important bands in other cities busied themselves with rehearsals or announcing schedules.

In Boston. Most ambitious of the season's programs is that mapped out by the Boston Symphony. The occasion warrants it. Fifty years have passed since the late Major Henry Lee Higginson undertook to provide Bostonians with a permanent orchestra, brought over German George Henschel to take first command. Despite his 80 years, Henschel came back last week to inaugurate the jubilee season with a repetition of his original program. Conductor Sergei Alexandrovitch Koussevitzky anticipated the opening with a superb radio concert, planned his actual return for the season's second week. Scheduled for the winter are the premières of many contemporary works, a Beethoven Festival to be given in Washington through the first week in December, a Bach Festival in Boston in March.

To Sergei Koussevitzky is due 100% credit for the Boston Symphony's present excellence. Seven years ago it was in sorry state. Frenchmen Henri Rabaud and Pierre Monteux, successors to the maligned Karl Muck,* had proved incapable. The directors were appraising all the availables in Europe when they came upon a Russian exiled in Paris. They traced his history: at 12 he had been chef d'orchestre in the theatre of his native town (Tver in North Russia), composed whatever music was required for the plays and conducted the entr'actes. At 14 he went to Moscow to study, chose for his instrument the bull fiddle, toured Europe for ten years as a contrabass virtuoso. By 1919 he had achieved his ambition, become a conductor again. Koussevitzky concerts were soon famous in Moscow and Petrograd but that was not enough for its leader. He wanted to reach the great masses of Russians who had never heard a symphony concert. So for several summers he chartered a steamer, cruised the 2,300 mi. down the River Volga playing to the peasants who gathered on its banks. The Revolution made Russia impossible for most musicians. Koussevitzky left along with the rest, settled in Paris where in partnership with his wife he still conducts the profitable music-publishing house called Edition Russe.

The choice of Koussevitzky for Boston has proved singularly happy. He is an excellent musician, although it is said he cannot read a score, has to hire pianists to teach him new music before he in turn can transmit it to his men. He has the magnetism, the energy which were necessary to rejuvenate Boston's orchestra in 1924. He has an insatiable interest in new music and a talent for playing it. His programs are indisputably the best in the country. So is his understanding of Ravel and Debussy.

*On an hysterical, unproved charge of pro-Germanism, Muck lost his Boston post.

In Boston Koussevitzky has become completely at home. He has an establishment in Jamaica Plain, an entourage which includes his wealthy, matronly-looking wife Nathalie; a vivacious niece, Olga Naumoff, who is his secretary; Valet Ivan who prepares him occasional Russian dishes; Ivan's wife; and Droll, a lively Boston terrier. Often in the early morning the Maestro may be seen walking in the Rockwood Street section around Jamaica Pond. Even those who do not recognize him suspect him of being a great man. He pays no attention to traffic lights, busiest streets stopping mobiles with much the uses to get a pianis-n, is rightfully worked with ell-pleased dmires his dis- faultlessly tai- o his music, the her in which he zky's victory has oncert hall. Not nable but he has on Hill, been ac- other conductor rphia's Stokowski, s has been faintly ty, might well envy st great honor: election merset Club. (Arturo il to see any artistic

Wide World

CONDUCTOR KLEIBER

Toscanini's boots are big for anyone.

SERGEI ALEXANDROVITCH KOUSSEVITZKY

"... he has won the battle of Beacon Hill."

(See MUSIC)

BOSTON CLOSE-UPS

Intimate Glimpses Into the Lives of the Great and Near-Great

By MASON HAM

Carnegie Steel and Benjamin Franklin are among the speakers who address the 15th annual meeting of the Associated Industries of Massachusette this week. The former's name, to be more accurate, is P. H. Carnegie Steele, a technical adviser of the association, and the latter's, Col. Benjamin A. Franklin, president.

* * *

There is a young woman living in Brookline who had her fortune told just once.

"I was informed," she says, "that the twins lay in store for me, but no husband."

Her name is Miss Doris Peel, born in England in 1907. Her father is a newspaper man. She is inscribed in our very special book of fame for having written two novels though only 22. Her first was published when its author was 19 years old. Her second, "Five on Parade," will be out within the next few weeks.

* * *

Half an hour or so before every Boston symphony orchestra, Sergei (Alexandrovitch) Koussevitzky in his own car, a five passenger sedan of medium price, leaves his home at 60 Rockwood street, Jamaica Plain. Seated with him on the back seat are his wife, Nathalie, and his niece and secretary, Olga Naumoff. In front are his chauffeur (Koussevitzky does not drive himself) and his valet, Ivan. Ivan carries his master's score and a change of clothing. At the end of every concert Koussevitzky is given a rub down by the faithful Ivan, and dons fresh garments.

Mme. Koussevitzky and Mlle. Naumoff rarely miss a concert. In Boston they sit on the right side of the first balcony in seats C19 and 20, traditionally reserved for the conductor's use, partly because of their easy access to his room. During intermissions Mme. Koussevitzky often leaves her seat to talk with her husband, but almost never does he receive anybody else. Once in a while he will admit a distinguished visiting musician.

Koussevitzky's rubdowns are a part of the strict health program which he observes throughout the symphony season. He takes a nap every afternoon before an evening concert. He walks regularly in the early morning; on tour he always walks before breakfast. This, and the exercise of 20 hours a week conducting at concerts and rehearsals, keeps him fit.

He has never missed a concert and is very rarely late. One day about a year ago his chauffeur fell asleep and failed to appear on Rockwood street at the appointed time. Mistrusting taxis—for his home is hard to find—Koussevitzky telephoned Symphony Hall whence a car was sent at once. The conductor was about 10 minutes late. So firmly established is his reputation for punctuality that nearly all the audience blamed, not him, but Mme. Margaret Matzenauer, guest soloist, who had arrived on time.

On his annual trips to Paris where he has a house at 8 Rue de Conseiller Colignon, Koussevitzky is usually accompanied by his wife, his niece, his valet, his wife's maid and his Boston terrier, Droll, acquired when the conductor first moved to Boston. Mme. Koussevitzky often says that Droll is happier here than in Paris.

On their return to America this fall, the baggage of the entourage included 12 trunks, 14 pieces of hand baggage, and Koussevitzky's double bass.

There are many painting on the walls of Koussevitzky's Boston home. Among them is a portrait of Traffic Commissioner Joseph A. Conry, former Russian consul here and Koussevitzky's next door neighbor. The conductor's home is owned by Mr. Conry.

Incidentally, the old story that Koussevitzky cannot read a score is false. Koussevitzky can read a score. If you should ever happen to interrupt his solitude—at home or on the road—you would probably find a score in his lap and dozens of others scattered on chairs and tables in the room.

Summer Faces, Winter Pieces, Jubilee Plans

Transcript Oct 5

On his return to Boston, Tuesday evening, to begin work as conductor of the Symphony Orchestra through its fiftieth year, Dr. Koussevitzky handed to The Transcript a record, written by himself, of various impressions gained during his stay of five months in Europe last spring and summer. It is the more unusual because not all of them have to do with music. For Dr. Koussevitzky rightly believes that a conductor must live in the world, observe and judge it, as well as make music for it. At the end he adds a paragraph or two about plans for the new season, to which may be joined information picked up here and there in Europe about one or another of the novel numbers. First, however, to the conductor's impressions.

"After I returned to Paris, last spring, I eagerly devoted all my leisure time to music, as during the whole winter I had listened only to myself. I had a great desire to listen objectively to others; but, to my deep regret, each concert I heard in Paris was a great disappointment.

"At last, I attended the concert given by the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra, where the orchestra is, of course, on a much higher level than the Parisian ones. But, in spite of all, how far from the achievements of American orchestras! Is it, really, possible to compare the ensemble of the strings, the quality of the wood-winds? Only the brass are on the same level.

"Then I went to London on a business trip for the Boston Symphony, as I had to see George Henschel. I had not been in London for five years and my first impression was a very cheerful and pleasant one. But, little by little, I began to watch people and noticed the most striking difference to what they

Continued on Page Fourteen

GENERAL NOTICES

Full Saturday, Off the Water Across the Air

Beginnings at Symphony Hall, Sir George Henschel Comes, The Radio Concert

EARLY on Saturday afternoon, the conductor of the Symphony Orchestra, the president of the trustees, the managerial staff at Symphony Hall, went to meet the first guest of the Jubilee Year. With them was one of the surviving friends of his distant Bostonian day—Arthur Foote, the composer. The guest was Sir George Henschel, arriving at Commonwealth Pier from London and Liverpool, accompanied by his wife and their daughter. The greeters went cheerfully, inasmuch as Providence, a sound constitution and discreet living had preserved the conductor of the first pair of Symphony Concerts in the first season (1881-82) to return to that post, able and eager, for the first pair in the fiftieth (1930-31). They came back well content, having found Sir George less the man of eighty that the date-books will have him than the practising musician of sixty, alert in body and mind, still keen for fresh and crowning adventure.

Other friends were waiting to escort Sir George to the house where he will be guest during his fortnight in Boston. (Since 1905, when he conducted at a concert for the Pension Fund of the orchestra, he has not revisited the city.) This morning he begins rehearsals at Symphony Hall, to continue daily through Thursday; on Friday and Saturday come the appointed concerts. Not to overtax himself, he will make it a week of work. Next a week of social opportunity; the hearing of the orchestra under Dr. Koussevitzky in music of this immediate day; thereafter, leisurely return to London.

Air-Minded

Early on Saturday evening, in unusual circumstances, the preliminary concert of the new season. Long ago, the Symphony Orchestra promised a contribution to the Tercentenary rites. Last spring they had hardly begun before Dr. Koussevitzky departed to Paris. Now, they were nearly ended; but there was still com for a radio concert—the first ever undertaken by the orchestra for the air only. Originally, station WEEI was to broadcast it. Quickly the National Broadcasting Company proposed that it be relayed over its circuit—Southern cities, Middle-Western cities, cities in California and Oregon, twenty-nine in all.

Symphony Hall readily agreed. Through an hour and a half, on this first Saturday of the Jubilee Year, it would be the seat of a national orchestra. The program, however, kept Bostonian quality: the longer half to three resident and living composers—Foote of the Suite that at each repetition brings fresh pleasure; Hill of "Lilacs" (after Amy Lowell's like-named verses); Loeffler, with "Pagan Poem"; the shorter half to two modern classics—Debussy's "Afternoon of A Faun" and Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel." All five are in the "active repertory"; but they were as carefully prepared as though the subscribers of Boston and New York awaited them. Dr. Koussevitzky does not "condescend" to a "radio audience"

Visible and Invisible

The circumstances, however, were different. At first, there were to be no guests at Symphony Hall. By itself the orchestra was to play for its invisible hearers through two microphones, suspended a third of the way down the auditorium. A visible audience had uses in that long tunnel. It might, as they used to say in wartime, stimulate morale. The conductor suggested that the families of the players be invited, along with a few friends of the orchestra. All told, they might have made a hundred-odd, seated just back of the broad cross-aisle. Of course, they were bidden, more than once, not to applaud. They took the command so urgently that they were the stillest audience yet known to Symphony Hall. They stirred neither hand nor foot; they almost breathed short. Not a coat or a skirt rustled. Through an hour and a half no cough, suppressed or unsuppressed, disturbed the musical peace. It can be done.

The orchestra was in usual place, but clothed as the subscribing public never sees it. One and all wore the jackets of rehearsal; while summer gray was as permissible as autumn black. Nor—if the faithful reporter is to tell the whole truth—did they sit the chairs with quite the dignity proper to Friday afternoons and to Saturday or Monday evenings. To every man his congenial position. The old hands noted also that the piano of "Pagan Poem" was now set at the left and in front of the orchestra; the celesta of other numbers moved equally forward. "Radio transmission" doubtless. These old hands further observed that, conducting to an "invisible audience," Dr. Koussevitzky used the same gestures to which he has accustomed his watchful listeners. They lerisms nor are they made

They are the conductor's ssion of the music and him- orchestra. (Memorandum: ch pianists and violinists e the short jacket for ng coat is essential to the ine.") is no "visible audience," rchestra may tune its in- the stage—in these days ce in any concert-hall. mbers, two or three of ap- th, must be crowded into es—and not a moment over play virtually without o speeches, though of the not a second must be Announcer's foot was on e stage-microphone, as the the orchestra sounded. Dr. dropped his baton; spun ced it manuscript in hand le motion. Accustomed to easure of the court, Judge lood by the stage waiting f the Announcer. A rad but one in which th er did himself credit and the good taste of ntences. Neither the s works of the inexhaus el, nor the Vergilian Mr. Loeffler's tone-poe experiences"—as he cha n—of Mallarmé's and " tempted him to overd hands. All will pass into the possession of the Symphony Orchestra, to be deposited in the little museum, begun, a few years ago, with the Casadesus Collection of archaic instruments. Only Ravel makes reservations. His tireless and scrupulous craftsmanship must be satisfied before he hands in the aviation tone-poem. But he will do his best to have it ready during the Jubilee Year.

Calendar

The Beethoven Festival at Washington falls early in December. In the schedule of concerts it will replace the usual Western journey, in autumn, of the orchestra. The concerts will fill the larger part of a week. In it is a happy inspiration that Washington should be an occasional capital of the arts as well as a perpetual capital of politics. . . . The Bach Festival will follow in Boston toward the end of March. In the Mass in B-minor, Dr. Davison's and Mr. Woodworth's Harvard and Radcliffe Choirs will join the orchestra.

To Conclude

A sentence from Daniel Gregory Mason's article on "Our Musical Adolescence" in Harper's Magazine for October:

Genuine artistic feeling avoids spurious and hypocritical regard for mere age; and is enterprisingly contemporary.

H. T. P.

Speeches, But Brief

Said Dr. Koussevitzky for first interlude:

I am happy that my first speech on the radio is to welcome the Tercentenary of the State of Massachusetts. Today the Boston Symphony Orchestra takes part in your celebrations. We congratulate you on your great achievements during these three hundred years. Massachusetts possesses immense intellectual treasures: Harvard University, known as the most important center of culture and enlightenment; the Boston Symphony Orchestra, considered to be the leading orchestra of the whole musical world; a great number of first-class writers, painters, sculptors and composers of whom you may be proud—not only you people of Massachusetts but all the citizens of the United States.

Let me welcome you again, in the name of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and express our wish that the cultural life of Massachusetts always remains in the first rank, as it has been up to this day.

Said Judge Cabot when his moment came:

Fittingly, as part of the observance of Massachusetts's three hundredth anniversary, it is made possible for the people of Massachusetts and of our Nation to hear the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The early settlers set great store by the spoken word. They listened eagerly to exhortations expounding the ways of the spirit. Through their hearing, their imaginations were stirred. The first minister of Salem, the Reverened Francis Higginson, was a man of courage, patriotism and faith, giving all that he had to love of his people. It is well said that "he who dedicates his life to the beauty of holiness is not far from the sight of all beauty."

His direct descendant, Henry Lee Higginson, in the beginning of the last fifty-year period of the past 300 years, founded the Boston Symphony Orchestra, because, as he said, music was his inner world which he enjoyed in the depths of his soul as nothing else and he wished to make possible for others this great happiness. His characteristics, too, were courage, patriotism, friendship. He had faith that the great musical compositions could be produced by artists playing each year ever more perfectly under an interpreting master, so that the listeners would go forth rejoicing and live their lives refreshed.

What began thus in Boston has marvellously widened, extending today to countless numbers throughout the land. Yet the greatest happiness comes from listening in the presence of the artists themselves. Fittingly, therefore, in this fiftieth year of its assembly, this orchestra will hold a festival in the nation's capital and there in December, during four days, it will play the symphonies of Beethoven.

May each succeeding fifty years add to the orchestra's excellence and lasting significance in the life of Massachusetts and of the nation.

Reviewer's Epilogue

The purpose of this article is descriptive, not critical; but it would be at fault as record did it fail to note the quality of the orchestra. After three rehearsals it was unmistakably itself—in the vitalizing energy of its tone; the sensuous richness, the luminous texture, the instant plasticity. At call it gave back vigor or subtlety; its ear for euphony was unfailing; its technical prowess, the means to the musical end. For each composer and each music, it found the individualizing, intensifying voice. As for the chosen numbers, the 'radio ear" may be this, that or the other; but it must have caught something of the poetizing and jewelling Debussy; of the keen-witted and keen-voiced Strauss. The grace and the fancy of Mr. Foote's Suite could not have escaped it, though it may have missed the fineness of his composing fingers. It must have felt the spring air blowing through Mr. Hill's "Lilacs," the note of revery upon which it begins and ends—the New Englander musing over his own countryside. And which of us at first hearing, twenty-odd years ago, absorbed every spell of Mr. Loeffler's "Pagan Poem"? After all they have made and still make music in New England. Not yet is Euterpe chained "exclusively" in the market place of Manhattan.

As for the radio "up against" symphonic music from an orchestra of the first rank, the young Suzanne shall be spokeswoman. Her years are eleven, and she listened on Saturday to Foote, Hill and Loeffler in the concert hall; to Debussy and Strauss off a neighboring set. "But, father," she said, as the last measures of "The Afternoon of a Faun" sounded, "there's something between." There is—machinery.

H. T. P.

Summer Faces, Winter Pieces, Jubilee Plans

Continued from Page One

to five years ago—let alone, of course, the state of mind before the war.

"I noticed in nearly every gaze a shade of apathy together with an expression of anxiety and hopelessness. Its reason I ignore, as I am no psychologist; but, still, I believe that I later guessed the cause of this strange anxiety and intend soon to speak about it.

"At last, I met George Henschel and had an endless pleasure when I saw before me not a man of eighty, but a man who looked hardly sixty: Cheerful, gay, energetic, full of life. After a few minutes we chattered like old friends, expressing our sentences either in English, German or French. During that talk, it was decided that the first conductor of the Boston Symphony, who helped Major Higginson realize his great idea, would come to Boston and by doing so resuscitate in the memory of Bostonians the beginning of that organization.

"Being in London, I learned, to my great joy, that the New York Philharmonic Orchestra was also there and was to give its last two concerts. Of course, I immediately endeavored to secure seats and—though with great difficulty, but thanks to my London friend, Lionell Powell—I got the tickets. The first concert I attended was given in Albert Hall and I cannot say that this very concert made upon me a great impression, because of that dreadful hall, where everything is swallowed up by dreadful acoustics. Therefore, one has a false idea of the music performed. It was quite another thing at the last concert, in Queen's Hall. I felt the deepest joy, seeing on the stage an aristocratic orchestra, every sound of which was full of beauty.

"I had heard the New York Philharmonic more than once in New York, but never, must I say, did it make upon me such an admirable impression. The fact is they played perfectly well, in a perfect ensemble. In the United States, every good orchestra has to play well, and a first-rate performance does not seem, then, exceptional. As the best American orchestras are bound to give first-rate performances such concerts, therefore, do not seem to be miracles. But, in Europe, the concert given by the New York Philharmonic was, truly, a prodigy (in comparison with the European orchestras). And, for me, the greatest joy, as it was a wonderful experience for the European public and musicians.

"A few days later, I was in Vienna, then in Berlin. The musical season being at an end, I could attend no concerts; while the plays given then in the theaters were of no interest to me. I stayed very little in Vienna and in Berlin; but, nevertheless, brought back a very clear impression of the general state of minds. Here, too, I read in the people's countenances a worried hopelessness. As to Berlin itself, it is a half dying-out town.

The Faces and the Peril

"It is rather difficult for a musician to become a politician, discuss and analyze the inward state of a country; but my impressions of Europe made me observe more closely. For I greatly wished to learn the reason of the worried faces, of this strange hopelessness I met everywhere.

"I tried to see many people—to talk to them, to read books and, articles that would make clearer to me this state of mind and I came to a very sad conclusion. Allow me, a musician, to speak frankly: If Europe follows the path she has taken up to now, she will perish.

"The only country in Europe, where one can still live freely where still shines a golden ray where one can breathe freely, is France; because in France exist men who understand how to act in order to save Europe from peril.

"Therefore, one easily understands the longing for the United States of Europe and those against this idea of a genius can openly be called blind. It is the only issue through which Europe can come out alive, free of the danger, draw new forces, give again something to the world.

"But, should this not occur, the culture of Europe would entirely perish, as has perished the culture of Russia, invaded by barbarians who destroy all that is free and beautiful. I do not want to go into details; but on this point wish to stop a little longer and express my opinion about it:

"Europe does not understand that the Bolshevists, having lost their hope for a world-revolution by means of a simple political propaganda, have found the most Machiavellian issue and now make propaganda for a world-revolution through economical means. Thanks to the fact that they have at their disposition one hundred and twenty millions (120,000,000) of people whom they have changed into slaves and through an unheard violation obliged to work nearly for nothing, they have the possibility to put on the world-market goods for a price with which no nation can compete.

"And this Europe does not understand. She does not understand that want of work, financial collopse, strikes, all kind of disorder, the revolutionary state of mind, proceed from it. And in the future, a much greater peril: the world-revolution. If—may God preserve us from it—the Bolshevists succeed, Europe will perish. . . . This is what I read on the faces of European people: an unconscious feeling of anxiety and hopelessness. . . .

"How happy I am to be on the territory of the United States again! In the country of real respect for each other, in the country of true liberty!"

The Jubilee Year

"Now, I believe, we ought to return to music. For, surely, not many are interested in the views of a musician about politics. Every reader of my interview must be saying to himself: 'But when are we going to speak of music again?' You are, surely, interested to learn what novelties I have brought back with me and what I am going to give for the fiftieth anniversary of the Boston Symphony?

"I shall begin by telling you which composers have written works for us: Stravinsky, Ravel, Hindemith, Sibelius, Roussel, Paul Dukas, Prokofiev, Honegger, Respighi. From the American composers: Hill, Carpenter, Copland, Hansen. All these have written works especially for us, at our request. . . . Then there are many young composers, from Europe and America, who, of themselves, have taken the initiative to compose music in honor of this fiftieth anniversary. Besides, Hill has written an ode on a poem especially composed for the occasion by Robert Hillyer of Harvard University.

"In March, in memory of Major Higginson, a great festival of Bach's works will take place. All his most important compositions—the Mass in B-minor included—will be performed. Besides, we shall give a Beethoven Festival in Washington, as a symbol that this orchestra is a national, not a local, one. This is the central activity of our season.

"I do hope that the year 1930-1931 will be the climax of the work accomplished with the orchestra during these seven years. Nevertheless, we shall continue to work very hard and go still farther in our own improvement and in perfecting our public in the love and understanding of musical culture."

More Particularly

Now that Dr. Koussevitzky has ended, the miscellany of picked-up information. . . . Stravinsky's contribution to the fiftieth year of the orchestra is a symphony with choruses, of which those that have seen the score speak warmly. . . . Ravel's is a tone-poem with aviation as background and inspiration. It may even take title from the Wrights' first plane, popularly called the Kittyhawk. . . . Hindemith, who by temperament is averse to writing on commission, was finally persuaded. . . . Sibelius has sent forward a new tone-poem. Roussel submits a symphony of large dimensions—in the slow movement an unmistakable work of genius. As present plans stand, it will be played at the second pair of concerts (Oct. 17-18) in the presence of the composer, who is visiting the United States for the occasion and for Mrs. Coolidge's Festival of Chamber Music in Chicago. . . . Dukas, in such matters to be handled with gloves, has returned, after some years, to symphonic composition and written a tone-poem. . . . Honegger, for his part, is ready with a symphony.

For the Americans, Mr. Hill, as becomes a Bostonian and New Englander aware of an event, has not only set Mr. Hillyer's Ode for chorus and orchestra, but has finished a Second Symphony. The Ode will be heard at the second pair of concerts—the first at which Dr. Koussevitzky returns to the conductor's stand. . . . From Mr. Copland comes the symphony, written in young maturity, on which he was at work last winter and spring.

Among Dr. Koussevitzky's "young composers" are a new Russian, with a symphony produced last winter, now on its way across European concert-halls. From Lazár, whose Concerto Grosso made no small impression last spring at Symphony Hall, something may also be expected. . . . Most of these manuscripts are already in the conductor's

Summer Faces, Winter Pieces, Jubilee Plans

On his return to Boston, Tuesday evening, to begin work as conductor of the Symphony Orchestra through its fiftieth year, Dr. Koussevitzky handed to The Transcript a record, written by himself, of various impressions gained during his stay of five months in Europe last spring and summer. It is the more unusual because not all of them have to do with music. For Dr. Koussevitzky rightly believes that a conductor must live in the world, observe and judge it, as well as make music for it. At the end he adds a paragraph or two about plans for the new season, to which may be joined information picked up here and there in Europe about one or another of the novel numbers. First, however, to the conductor's impressions.

"After I returned to Paris, last spring, I eagerly devoted all my leisure time to music, as during the whole winter I had listened only to myself. I had a great desire to listen objectively to others; but, to my deep regret, each concert I heard in Paris was a great disappointment.

"At last, I attended the concert given by the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra, where the orchestra is, of course, on a much higher level than the Parisian ones. But, in spite of all, how far from the achievements of American orchestras! Is it, really, possible to compare the ensemble of the strings, the quality of the wood-winds? Only the brass are on the same level.

"Then I went to London on a business trip for the Boston Symphony, as I had to see George Henschel. I had not been in London for five years and my first impression was a very cheerful and pleasant one. But, little by little, I began to watch people and noticed the most striking difference to what they

Continued on Page Fourteen

GENERAL NOTICES

Summer Faces, Winter Pieces, Jubilee Plans

Continued from Page One

were five years ago—let alone, of course, the state of mind before the war.

"I noticed in nearly every gaze a shade of apathy together with an expression of anxiety and hopelessness. Its reason I ignore, as I am no psychologist; but, still, I believe that I later guessed the cause of this strange anxiety and intend soon to speak about it.

"At last, I met George Henschel and had an endless pleasure when I saw before me not a man of eighty, but a man who looked hardly sixty: Cheerful, gay, energetic, full of life. After a few minutes we chattered like old friends, expressing our sentences either in English, German or French. During that talk, it was decided that the first conductor of the Boston Symphony, who helped Major Higginson realize his great idea, would come to Boston and by doing so resuscitate in the memory of Bostonians the beginning of that organization.

"Being in London, I learned, to my great joy, that the New York Philharmonic Orchestra was also there and was to give its last two concerts. Of course, I immediately endeavored to secure seats and—though with great difficulty, but thanks to my London friend, Lionell Powell—I got the tickets. The first concert I attended was given in Albert Hall and I cannot say that this very concert made upon me a great impression, because of that dreadful hall, where everything is swallowed up by dreadful acoustics. Therefore, one has a false idea of the music performed. It was quite another thing at the last concert, in Queen's Hall. I felt the deepest joy, seeing on the stage an aristocratic orchestra, every sound of which was full of beauty.

"I had heard the New York Philharmonic more than once in New York, but never, must I say, did it make upon me such an admirable impression. The fact is they played perfectly well, in a perfect ensemble. In the United States, every good orchestra has to play well, and a first-rate performance does not seem, then, exceptional. As the best American orchestras are bound to give first-rate performances such concerts, therefore, do not seem to be miracles. But, in Europe, the concert given by the New York Philharmonic was, truly, a prodigy (in comparison with the European orchestras). And, for me, the greatest joy, as it was a wonderful experience for the European public and musicians.

"A few days later, I was in Vienna, then in Berlin. The musical season being at an end, I could attend no concerts; while the plays given then in the theaters were of no interest to me. I stayed very little in Vienna and in Berlin; but, nevertheless, brought back a very clear impression of the general state of minds. Here, too, I read in the people's countenances a worried hopelessness. As to Berlin itself, it is a half dying-out town.

The Faces and the Peril

"It is rather difficult for a musician to become a politician, discuss and analyze the inward state of a country; but my impressions of Europe made me observe more closely. For I greatly wished to learn the reason of the worried faces, of this strange hopelessness I met everywhere.

"I tried to see many people—to talk to them, to read books and, articles that would make clearer to me this state of mind and I came to a very sad conclusion. Allow me, a musician, to speak frankly: If Europe follows the path she has taken up to now, she will perish.

"The only country in Europe, where one can still live freely where still shines a golden ray where one can breathe freely, is France; because in France exist men who understand how to act in order to save Europe from peril.

"Therefore, one easily understands the longing for the United States of Europe and those against this idea of a genius can openly be called blind. It is the only issue through which Europe can come out alive, free of the danger, draw new forces, give again something to the world.

"But, should this not occur, the culture of Europe would entirely perish, as has perished the culture of Russia, invaded by barbarians who destroy all that is free and beautiful. I do not want to go into details; but on this point wish to stop a little longer and express my opinion about it:

"Europe does not understand that the Bolshevists, having lost their hope for a world-revolution by means of a simple political propaganda, have found the most Machiavellian issue and now make propaganda for a world-revolution through economical means. Thanks to the fact that they have at their disposition one hundred and twenty millions (120,000,000) of people whom they have changed into slaves and through an unheard violation obliged to work nearly for nothing, they have the possibility to put on the world-market goods for a price with which no nation can compete.

"And this Europe does not understand. She does not understand that want of work, financial collopse, strikes, all kind of disorder, the revolutionary state of mind, proceed from it. And in the future, a much greater peril: the world-revolution. If—may God preserve us from it—the Bolshevists succeed, Europe will perish. . . . This is what I read on the faces of European people: an unconscious feeling of anxiety and hopelessness. . . .

"How happy I am to be on the territory of the United States again! In the country of real respect for each other, in the country of true liberty!"

The Jubilee Year

"Now, I believe, we ought to return to music. For, surely, not many are interested in the views of a musician about politics. Every reader of my interview must be saying to himself: 'But when are we going to speak of music again?' You are, surely, interested to learn what novelties I have brought back with me and what I am going to give for the fiftieth anniversary of the Boston Symphony?

"I shall begin by telling you which composers have written works for us: Stravinsky, Ravel, Hindemith, Sibelius, Roussel, Paul Dukas, Prokofiev, Honegger, Respighi. From the American composers: Hill, Carpenter, Copland, Hansen. All these have written works especially for us, at our request. . . . Then there are many young composers, from Europe and America, who, of themselves, have taken the initiative to compose music in honor of this fiftieth anniversary. Besides, Hill has written an ode on a poem especially composed for the occasion by Robert Hillyer of Harvard University.

"In March, in memory of Major Higginson, a great festival of Bach's works will take place. All his most important compositions—the Mass in B-minor included—will be performed. Besides, we shall give a Beethoven Festival in Washington, as a symbol that this orchestra is a national, not a local, one. This is the central activity of our season.

"I do hope that the year 1930-1931 will be the climax of the work accomplished with the orchestra during these seven years. Nevertheless, we shall continue to work very hard and go still farther in our own improvement and in perfecting our public in the love and understanding of musical culture."

More Particularly

Now that Dr. Koussevitzky has ended, the miscellany of picked-up information. . . . Stravinsky's contribution to the fiftieth year of the orchestra is a symphony with choruses, of which those that have seen the score speak warmly. . . . Ravel's is a tone-poem with aviation as background and inspiration. It may even take title from the Wrights' first plane, popularly called the Kittyhawk. . . . Hindemith, who by temperament is averse to writing on commission, [illegible] enable the plane to land and take [illegible] in heavy weather off shore where [illegible] craft now in service have been una[illegible] to operate. Where present types ca[illegible] a pilot and observer, the new type [illegible] carry a crew of four and have space [illegible] rescued persons. It will have a ra[illegible] of 1000 miles and be equipped with w[illegible] less sets for code, direction finding [illegible] téléphonic communication.

To Resume Attempt at Glider "Refueling" T[illegible]

Elmira, N.Y., Oct. 1 (A.P.)—Wolf Hir[illegible] famous German glider expert, went a[illegible] here by means of a 800-foot high l[illegible] weighted with stones, attempted to lo[illegible] sandwiches to Jack O'Meara, Akron pi[illegible] The wing of O'Meara's sail plane, h[illegible] ever, cut the line as the sandwiches w[illegible] within an inch of his hand. The atten[illegible] will be repeated. O'Meara was a[illegible] seven hours. He landed after night[illegible] on a field illuminated by bonfires [illegible] automobile headlights.

Wallace Backus, New York city, w[illegible] up 8000 feet in his glider, and there established a new American altit[illegible] record. His barograph will be calibra[illegible] by the Department of Commerce a[illegible] preliminary to the recognition o[illegible] record by the National Aeronautical

Full Saturday, Off the Water Across the Air

Beginnings at Symphony Hall, Sir George Henschel Comes, The Radio Concert

EARLY on Saturday afternoon, the conductor of the Symphony Orchestra, the president of the trustees, the managerial staff at Symphony Hall, went to meet the first guest of the Jubilee Year. With them was one of the surviving friends of his distant Bostonian day—Arthur Foote, the composer. The guest was Sir George Henschel, arriving at Commonwealth Pier from London and Liverpool, accompanied by his wife and their daughter. The greeters went cheerfully, inasmuch as Providence, a sound constitution and discreet living had preserved the conductor of the first pair of Symphony Concerts in the first season (1881-82) to return to that post, able and eager, for the first pair in the fiftieth (1930-31). They came back well content, having found Sir George less the man of eighty that the date-books will have him than the practising musician of sixty, alert in body and mind, still keen for fresh and crowning adventure.

Other friends were waiting to escort Sir George to the house where he will be guest during his fortnight in Boston. (Since 1905, when he conducted at a concert for the Pension Fund of the orchestra, he has not revisited the city.) This morning he begins rehearsals at Symphony Hall, to continue daily through Thursday; on Friday and Saturday come the appointed concerts. Not to overtax himself, he will make it a week of work. Next a week of social opportunity; the hearing of the orchestra under Dr. Koussevitzky in music of this immediate day; thereafter, leisurely return to London.

Air-Minded

Early on Saturday evening, in unusual circumstances, the preliminary concert of the new season. Long ago, the Symphony Orchestra promised a contribution to the Tercentenary rites. Last spring they had hardly begun before Dr. Koussevitzky departed to Paris. Now, they were nearly ended; but there was still com for a radio concert—the first ever undertaken by the orchestra for the air only. Originally, station WEEI was to broadcast it. Quickly the National Broadcasting Company proposed that it be relayed over its circuit—Southern cities, Middle-Western cities, cities in California and Oregon, twenty-nine in all.

Symphony Hall readily agreed. Through an hour and a half, on this first Saturday of the Jubilee Year, it would be the seat of a national orchestra. The program, however, kept Bostonian quality: the longer half to three resident and living composers—Foote of the Suite that at each repetition brings fresh pleasure; Hill of "Lilacs" (after Amy Lowell's like-named verses); Loeffler, with "Pagan Poem"; the shorter half to two modern classics—Debussy's "Afternoon of A Faun" and Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel." All five are in the "active repertory"; but they were as carefully prepared as though the subscribers of Boston and New York awaited them. Dr. Koussevitzky does not "condescend" to a "radio audience"

Visible and Invisible

The circumstances, however, were different. At first, there were to be no guests at Symphony Hall. By itself the orchestra was to play for its invisible hearers through two microphones, suspended a third of the way down the auditorium. A visible audience had uses in that long tunnel. It might, as they used to say in wartime, stimulate morale. The conductor suggested that the families of the players be invited, along with a few friends of the orchestra. All told, they might have made a hundred-odd, seated just back of the broad cross-aisle. Of course, they were bidden, more than once, not to applaud. They took the command so urgently that they were the stillest audience yet known to Symphony Hall. They stirred neither hand nor foot; they almost breathed short. Not a coat or a skirt rustled. Through an hour and a half no cough, suppressed or unsuppressed, disturbed the musical peace. It can be done.

The orchestra was in usual place, but clothed as the subscribing public never sees it. One and all wore the jackets of rehearsal; while summer gray was as permissible as autumn black. Nor—if the faithful reporter is to tell the whole truth—did they sit the chairs with quite the dignity proper to Friday afternoons and to Saturday or Monday evenings. To every man his congenial position. The old hands noted also that the piano of "Pagan Poem" was now set at the left and in front of the orchestra; the celesta of other numbers moved equally forward. "Radio transmission" doubtless. These old hands further observed that, conducting to an "invisible audience," Dr. Koussevitzky used the same gestures to which he has accustomed his visible and watchful listeners. They are not mannerisms nor are they made "for effect." They are the conductor's natural expression of the music and himself upon the orchestra. (Memorandum: However much pianists and violinists may cultivate the short jacket for matinées, a long coat is essential to the conductor's "line.")

When there is no "visible audience," a symphony orchestra may tune its instruments on the stage—in these days a rare experience in any concert-hall. When five numbers, two or three of appreciable length, must be crowded into ninety minutes—and not a moment over—it must also play virtually without pause. Add two speeches, though of the briefest, and not a second must be wasted. The Announcer's foot was on the step to the stage-microphone, as the last phrase of the orchestra sounded. Dr. Koussevitzky dropped his baton; spun on his heel; faced it manuscript in hand—all in a single motion. Accustomed to signify the pleasure of the court, Judge Cabot now stood by the stage waiting the pleasure of the Announcer. A rad[illegible] world indeed; but one in which th[illegible] same Announcer did himself credit [illegible] the reticence and the good taste of [illegible] introductory sentences. Neither the sc[illegible] dalous life and works of the inexhaus[illegible] ble Eulenspiegel, nor the Vergilian l[illegible] logue behind Mr. Loeffler's tone-poe[illegible], nor even the "experiences"—as he cha[illegible] ly named them—of Mallarmé's and [illegible] bussy's "Faun" tempted him to overdo

Speeches, But Brief

Said Dr. Koussevitzky for first interlude:

I am happy that my first speech on the radio is to welcome the Tercentenary of the State of Massachusetts. Today the Boston Symphony Orchestra takes part in your celebrations. We congratulate you on your great achievements during these three hundred years. Massachusetts possesses immense intellectual treasures: Harvard University, known as the most important center of culture and enlightenment; the Boston Symphony Orchestra, considered to be the leading orchestra of the whole musical world; a great number of first-class writers, painters, sculptors and composers of whom you may be proud—not only you people of Massachusetts but all the citizens of the United States.

Let me welcome you again, in the name of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and express our wish that the cultural life of Massachusetts always remains in the first rank, as it has been up to this day.

Said Judge Cabot when his moment came:

Fittingly, as part of the observance of Massachusetts's three hundredth anniversary, it is made possible for the people of Massachusetts and of our Nation to hear the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The early settlers set great store by the spoken word. They listened eagerly to exhortations expounding the ways of the spirit. Through their hearing, their imaginations were stirred. The first minister of Salem, the Reverened Francis Higginson, was a man of courage, patriotism and faith, giving all that he had to love of his people. It is well said that "he who dedicates his life to the beauty of holiness is not far from the sight of all beauty."

His direct descendant, Henry Lee Higginson, in the beginning of the last fifty-year period of the past 300 years, founded the Boston Symphony Orchestra, because, as he said, music was his inner world which he enjoyed in the depths of his soul as nothing else and he wished to make possible for others this great happiness. His characteristics, too, were courage, patriotism, friendship. He had faith that the great musical compositions could be produced by artists playing each year ever more perfectly under an interpreting master, so that the listeners would go forth rejoicing and live their lives refreshed.

What began thus in Boston has marvellously widened, extending today to countless numbers throughout the land. Yet the greatest happiness comes from listening in the presence of the artists themselves. Fittingly, therefore, in this fiftieth year of its assembly, this orchestra will hold a festival in the nation's capital and there in December, during four days, it will play the symphonies of Beethoven.

May each succeeding fifty years add to the orchestra's excellence and lasting significance in the life of Massachusetts and of the nation.

Reviewer's Epilogue

The purpose of this article is descriptive, not critical; but it would be at fault as record did it fail to note the quality of the orchestra. After three rehearsals it was unmistakably itself—in the vitalizing energy of its tone; the sensuous richness, the luminous texture, the instant plasticity. At call it gave back vigor or subtlety; its ear for euphony was unfailing; its technical prowess, the means to the musical end. For each composer and each music, it found the individualizing, intensifying voice. As for the chosen numbers, the 'radio ear" may be this, that or the other; but it must have caught something of the poetizing and jewelling Debussy; of the keen-witted and keen-voiced Strauss. The grace and the fancy of Mr. Foote's Suite could not have escaped it, though it may have missed the fineness of his composing fingers. It must have felt the spring air blowing through Mr. Hill's "Lilacs," the note of revery upon which it begins and ends—the New Englander musing over his own countryside. And which of us at first hearing, twenty-odd years ago, absorbed every spell of Mr. Loeffler's "Pagan Poem"? After all they have made and still make music in New England. Not yet is Euterpe chained "exclusively" in the market place of Manhattan.

As for the radio "up against" symphonic music from an orchestra of the first rank, the young Suzanne shall be spokeswoman. Her years are eleven and she listened on Saturday to Foote, Hill and Loeffler in the concert hall; to Debussy and Strauss off a neighboring set. "But, father," she said, as the last measures of "The Afternoon of a Faun" sounded, "there's something between." There is—machinery.

H. T. P.

NOW IS THE DAY OF THE BATON'S GLORY

(Continued from Page 4)

since, when the barometer has registered stormy weather, this friend has gone home without a word and sent Toscanini, in an envelope with a 2-cent stamp upon it, one of the splinters! The process has more than once proved a peacemaker, especially since Toscanini is wholly capable of laughing at himself. They say that others of the fragments of the broken cabinet were picked up by Toscanini idolaters.

Toscanini's reputation as a conductor, until two seasons ago, was principally in Italy, South America and the United States. But the Summer of 1929 saw him with the opera company of La Scala giving Italian opera in Berlin and Vienna, and creating a perfect furor. This visit appealed in many ways to the German public, which has always been very susceptible to Italian opera—a form of opera which has had a special recrudescence in Germany since the war. But last Summer came greater triumphs. They began with the European tour of the New York Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra, which introduced him to all of Europe, and came to a climax with his appearance at Baireuth, stronghold of Wagnerism and Teutonism in music.

It will be seen that Toscanini's prestige has not diminished, but grown immensely in the past few months. That is rather regrettably valuable to a public figure in music or any other field. The public man may not stand still, or rest upon achievements or upon acknowledged worth. Mr. Toscanini, who abhors any approach to press-agentry, has involuntarily and solely through his devotion to his art, been his own press agent, and will return here with greater prestige than ever before in his history.

* * *

THERE are two other conductors in America whose international activities might have proved as eventful as Mr. Toscanini's—at least aside from Baireuth—if the directors of other American orchestras than the New York Philharmonic-Symphony had heeded their entreaties to be allowed to show the orchestras they conducted to Europe. These two are Stotowski and Sergei Koussevitzky of the Boston Symphony. Both Koussevitzky and Stokowski desired to take their bands across seas. They lacked a Clarence Mackay. If they had done so Europe would have realized that the superb orchestra of the Philharmonic-Symphony, never as great as when it plays under Toscanini, has rivals for beauty of tone and technical brilliancy in other American orchestras.

The appearances of Toscanini and Stokowski, who stand so prominently and in a sense sensationally before the orchestral public, who, also, have privately and publicly spoken in each other's praise, will probably prove to the public the most interesting single event of the Winter. It may be said here that only two of the established conductors of the Eastern seacoast have held their own against Toscanini in late seasons and built up increasing prestige and patronage in the face of Toscanini's phenomenal reputation. One of them, Stokowski, was born not only with the will and the passion to conduct an orchestra, but with the element of the personally picturesque and the inherent capacity to lead men and to impress himself as a figure upon audiences, which means so very much in any public career and perhaps especially in that of the conductor. His approach to an audience is famous and very effective. Nor can it be said that this is merely a stage trick. It is indicative of Stokowski's nature—the sudden emergence of the svelte and blond one from the wings, his quick advance to the platform, his masterful precipitation of the music. Why not something like that? Why not? Must a man, to avoid the charge of self-consciousness or theatricalism, trudge toward his job with that affectation of affectations, of not attaching importance and urgency to his rapidly approaching task? No!

There is really something of electricity and genius, something of flaming youth, when our friend from Philadelphia—who, by the way, seems to gravitate more and more nearly to the city of New York—steps on the rostrum, with something in his face and the set of the body which indicates what he is going to do. We will confess to an enormous thrill when Leopold Stokowski ascended the podium one night in this impetuous manner and, with a quick tap of the baton and a sweep of the stick, let loose that great theme which, like a bolt from Jove, opens the Brahms F major symphony. As we are not dealing here so much with musical as with other aspects of the modern conductor's career, we refrain from expatiating upon the musical glories of that reading. Stokowski, showmanry and all, with his erratic ways, his sudden speeches about this and that, his experiments with lights, instruments, and heaven knows whatever other bizarre combinations, is a man and conductor of genius, made up of force and temperament, born to step out before men, and women too, and stir and sway them.

* * *

AND Koussevitzky! How different all these men are, how amusing, how instructive, how full of the good variety and the rich inconsistencies, the lights and shades and inscrutable enigmas of character which make this strange and incomprehensible existence of ours possible, endurable, and even interesting. We saw him first conducting the last of one of his Paris series of concerts at the Opéra, just before he came to America in 1924. There was no question about it! This man would reach and command a public in America. He would, also, as obviously, help to release us from the interminable routine of the average conductor's programs. It was the sort of occasion when everybody who is anybody in Paris was there, and Koussevitzky reigned in his glory, under the flashing lights, the eyes of the boxes, the pens of Parisian journalists, the rows and partisanships and hair-splittings and digs in the back which are the occupation, preeminently, of the musicians and composers of the French capital.

There he stood, with a full arsenal of his own gestures—the arm that suddenly shoots forward, forefinger extended; the ensuing explosion of tone; the beat now suave and slim-waisted, now dramatically jerking the orchestra to some fresh and frenzied tonal trajectory; the ease and suppleness of Koussevitzky's style, born of the mind which is the most supple of any conductor's with whom we have talked.

All that was foreseen in Paris came true. Koussevitzky came, and, to the disgust of some people, conquered. His approach to an audience is decorum, dignity, polite self-possession and deference combined. And he, too, like the tigerish Leopold, knows how to tailor! Koussevitzky, that night in Paris, swept the musical and fashionable audience with him. There were enemies, of course. They whispered that he was good in modern music, "but wait till he comes to America, and you hear him do Beethoven's Fifth Symphony, or any of the classics. I assure you, my dear fellow, it will be a scandal." They said other things, but it did not happen so. Incidentally, there came the days when Koussevitzky played certain classics with a restraint, proportion and sheer beauty and innocence unbelievable from so subtle and complex a mind. An example of how unconsciousness, with growth, must graduate through the miserable stage of the ineptly self-conscious to the third period of a rock-bound sincerity built and fortified by experience.

But we must not indulge in pseudo-philosophy. With Koussevitzky's arrival in America the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which had already benefited by the admirable musicianship of Pierre Monteux before him, began to climb with increasing rapidity out of the decline which it had fallen into since the débâcle of Carl Muck and the various events attendant upon the catastrophe of the war. Koussevitzky discharged men with an iron hand. As suave, as genial as you please, when no work is in hand, he in turn proved no simple or easy master in rehearsal. There were groans and rebellious and slanderous attacks from front and rear. The man from Russia smiled amiably, but there was somewhere there an iron hand beneath a fashionable and soft-surfaced glove.

They tell an interesting story of Koussevitzky's gradual conquest of his orchestra and we use the word "conquest" advisedly, because the first impact of a conductor and orchestra is at once a trial of strength between the leader and the players. The players, being human in the first place, do not intend to submit to leadership unless it proves itself. The conductor will either control his orchestra or his orchestra will control him, and it is a very real test, this struggle of a man and men, and on its outcome the fortunes of the leader very largely depend. It should be added that many an orchestral player believes he could do as well or better than the conductor, if only he had the chance, and resents the apparent chain of circumstances by which the conductor, who cannot play, is permitted to impose his will on him who can.

* * *

THEY say that Koussevitzky was not wholly satisfied with the response of his orchestra, even though it consistently improved in technical virtuosity, tonal texture, and response to his interpretive wishes; that something lacked; that there was 90 but not 100 per cent response to his wishes. Ten per cent of the players' capacities in other words was held back from a leader who did not intend that this should be. And then the story goes, Koussevitzky, one of the three greatest double-bass players that the world has known, gave a private reception for the orchestra, and played for the men of the Boston Symphony Orchestra his double-bass. And the remaining 10 per cent that had been denied was rendered unto him! At any rate, there is no orchestra today in America which surpasses in all the qualities of fine orchestral performance the Boston Symphony. There are certain performances, given by this incomprehensible Koussevitzky, that are peaks in the memory. Other performances—the public applauds rapturously, the earnest-minded and pontifical commentator upon musical affairs raises his hands in the air and says, "Well, it's Koussevitzky." A lesser man might, and again might not, in the singularly suggestive phrase, "get away with it."

At another time other conductors than these four, who are the central figures of the present New York season, will be discussed. The subjects of this article are by no means the only distinguished and influential orchestral leaders whom New York will hear in the months before us. There will be other visiting conductors — Mr. Gabrilowitsch, with the Philadelphia Orchestra, the poet and aristocrat of musical interpretation, an artist of singular gifts, sincerity and nobleness of aim; Mr. Sokoloff, with the Cleveland Symphony, and others, in managerial parlance, "to be announced." Unfortunately Mr. Stock of Chicago has not conducted a Winter orchestral concert for many years in New York City, and other conductors, further afield, might be welcome and stimulating for us to hear. But the public loves a reputation, even when it is that of the conductor and his magic.

THIS CLIPPING FROM HARTFORD, CONN,
TIMES

Serge Koussevitzky is said to have admitted that a foreign tour of the Boston Symphony orchestra is contemplated at the close of the coming season. It is expected that many of the chief European cities will be visited.

THIS CLIPPING FROM FLINT, MICH.
JOURNAL

50TH ANNIVERSARY

The Boston Symphony orchestra will celebrate its fiftieth anniversary next year. According to announcement, Sir George Henschel, who was the orchestra's first conductor, has been invited to be present as guest conductor.

THIS CLIPPING FROM VARIETY

JUL 9 -

Popular "Bolero" as a Burn-Up

One of the best selling records of the winter season has been a recent composition for orchestras, Ravel's "Bolero," which attained a huge popularity after performed about six or seven times during the past season by the Philharmonic and later by the Boston Symphony.

Two sets of records out, one issued by Brunswick and imported from France, and the other by Victor. In the Brunswick disks Ravel conducts and takes four sides; in the Victor Koussevitsky conducts and gets it done on three sides.

Ravel is still burning because of the way Toscanini changed the tempo to suit himself.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SPRINGFIELD, MASS
REPUBLICAN

Igor Stravinsky is writing a choral symphony to be performed at the 50th anniversary of the Boston Symphony next season. The world premiere will be given at that time under the baton of Koussevitzky.

THIS CLIPPING FROM OMAHA, NEB.
HERALD

Dr. Hanson Is Writing a Symphony for Boston

Dr. Howard Hanson, formerly of Wahoo, Neb., and now director of the Eastman School of Music at Rochester, N. Y., is writing a new symphony, a commissioned work requested by the Boston Symphony orchestra for performance there this fall. Dr. Hanson's earlier work, "The Nordic Symphony," has been played here by the Omaha Symphony orchestra.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
STAR
AUG 3 - 1930

MUSIC

BY HELEN FETTER.

"BOSTON never meant beans to me," said Hans Kindler, the Dutch cellist, when in Washington last Spring. Mr. Kindler was not trying to be facetious. He did not know the slang interpretation for the name of the famous vegetable. He did know that baked beans and Boston are synonymous in many minds.

"I had never eaten baked beans," he continued in his soft and attractive accent, "but from my childhood, ever since I can remember, I had heard of the great symphony orchestra in Boston in the United States of America. It was because of this orchestra that Boston became a mecca in my eyes. All over Europe you will find that, not only among musicians, but with people generally of any culture in all the continental countries and England, the thought of Boston immediately calls forth mention of that city's famous orchestra. It is a dominating asset in the eyes of the world."

Mr. Kindler's comment has found wide corroboration. There is not one of the American cities that has a symphony orchestra which does not frankly acknowledge that such an organization is a very tangible asset to that city. Of them all, however, none is more distinguished than the orchestra of Boston. It is second oldest in the United States.

Elsewhere on this page is given some information about the Beethoven festival of four programs to be played by this orchestra in Washington in December. This festival is part of an elaborate plan for a special celebration of the 50 years that the orchestra has been in existence. For half a century it has grown into the very roots of life in Boston and the cultural considerations of the Nation itself. The festival in Washington is to be the expression in the Capital of the country of honor to one of the finest artistic products developed in the United States of America.

* * * *

IT was primarily because of the Boston Symphony Orchestra that Henry Lee Higginson became known as "Boston's first citizen." The American banker had received his general education at Harvard, his musical education abroad and served in the Federal Army during the Civil War, when he was brevetted lieutenant colonel. His benefactions were numerous and he did much practical social service work. It is the Boston Symphony Orchestra, however, that he painstakingly founded and built, which is his vital, ever-green memorial. No slightest inquiry into the history of this orchestra but brings out in capital importance the name—Henry Lee Higginson.

It was in 1881 that Mr. Higginson brought together the initial personnel. Mr. Higginson was not merely a lover of music, and thus a generous patron as far as finances were concerned. He was an intelligent musician himself. In addition, he had executive ability of high quality. These two last-mentioned things are quite as essential to a successful launching of a symphony orchestra as is the solid financial foundation such as he established and maintained for many seasons at his own individual expense.

There are many people who will give money toward fine musical endeavors, but very few who can and also will donate intelligent discrimination and ability to build such an organization. Too often socially prominent people are asked to lend their names and give a comparatively small amount of money toward such a project, and then these people seem to feel a right to assume responsibility toward the artistic development of the organization which they cannot possibly live up to, not being trained or natively gifted to handle such problems.

Mr. Higginson made no temporary hobby of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He went into the proposition with his eyes fully open to the long years of hard work and constructive thinking that he must personally contribute, as well as the very large sum of money that must be spent with no thought of a penny of it ever being returned to him. It meant real sacrifice, a sacrifice of mental energy and time that was as momentous in the artistic progress of the United States as was the sacrifice of pioneers who bore hardships and broke the more picturesque trails in learning the extent of the country and the possibilities of its material resources.

Mr. Higginson realized all this. He was no wealthy financier who simply had a lazy, amateur love of music. He stuck to his bargain year after year and brought the Boston Symphony Orchestra to a point where it became self-supportnig. He it was who outlined the plans and cleared away the obstacles toward this end. He encouraged the bringing of great guest conductors and the producing of scores, both American and foreign, for first performances in this country. He supervised the actual personnel in the orchestra and fostered many practical ideas. The Boston Symphony Orchestra was the first in the country to have a pension fund for its members.

And now, 50 years later, the Boston Symphony Orchestra is not only the most outstanding single product of Boston and the dominant factor in the life of that cultural town's citizens, but it also is an American tradition that is given world-wide recognition.

* * * *

A SYMPHONY orchestra would be a definite asset to the National Capital. Musical authorities generally agree that such an organization is the backbone of cultural development in any city. It is a civic asset when it gives jobs to nearly 100 citizens who otherwise would be out of work. It is a business asset when it keeps the money spent on entertainment by citizens circulating in the city where it is spent.

When a great organization such as the Metropolitan Grand Opera Co. comes from New York City and gives three opera performances in Washington, it leaves the city taking $60,000 of Washington citizens' money with it to another city to be circulated. More than one concert artist brought to Washington exacts $2,500 to $3,500 as the artist's fee to be paid and taken away for spending in New York or elsewhere, but certainly not in Washington. Chaliapin has asked as high as $4,200 a concert here.

This is all very well. Washington must have a certain amount of such outside expenditure. Any national capital certainly should have occasional performances of the greatest orchestras and artists in the country presented within its halls at one time or another.

On the other hand, there might well be developed a sense of proper proportion in such spending and also a thought for the city's own civic and musical development. If Washingtonians want to spend $60,000 for three operas by a visiting company given with a limited and constantly repeated group of that company's stars and necessarily limited repertoire and scenery because Washington has no opera house that makes it practicable to present greater variety of operas more advantageously and because several of the finest stars hasten abroad and never go on the tours—that is entirely up to Washingtonians. They have to pay the bills.

Looking at another side of the picture for a moment, we quote Mr. Kindler again when he said before a large musical group here:

"You people give $60,000 for three evenings of opera. If you would raise that same amount for a symphony orchestra in your own city you could have more than 40 concerts during a season at popular prices that you could well afford. Moreover, with the personnel of such an orchestra made up of your own citizens, you would be helping Washington musicians to make their living and support their families."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
STAR
AUG 3 - 1930

BEETHOVEN FESTIVAL PROGRAMS

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY.

FROM the Lido, Venice, comes the news of most of the numbers which are to be featured in Washington next December when Serge Koussevitzky leads the Boston Symphony Orchestra in four pretentious programs of the music master of Bonn in a Beethoven Festival.

Mrs. Katie Wilson-Greene, Washington manager, who is spending her "real vacation" resting at the Lido for six weeks, writes that she had an interesting visit with the Russian conductor in Paris and secured from him at that time the program which he has arranged for the festival here. Mrs. Greene adds that "on the second and third evenings we will have a well known pianist and violinist as soloists for the concertos, to be announced on my return."

Semi-Centennial Programs.

The programs are to include the following Beethoven works:

Tuesday evening, December 2—Symphony No. 1, Symphony No. 2, Symphony No. 3.

Wednesday evening, December 3—Overture to "Egmont," Piano Concerto No. 4 Symphony No. 5.

Friday evening, December 5—Overture to "Leonore," Violin Concerto No. 3, Symphony No. 7.

Saturday, December 6—Symphony No. 8, Symphony No. 9 (with soloists and chorus).

This is, of course, a particularly gala year for the Boston Symphony Orchestra. It was just 50 years ago this season that that great musical philanthropist, the late Henry L. Higginson, founded and for a considerable time was sole support financially of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. That first personnel, gathered together under his direction and excellent judgment in 1881, little realized the great importance that their organization was later to assume in American history. Under Mr. Higginson's guidance the orchestra grew to be self-supporting and its concerts became an integral part of the cultural life of the city itself. Many famous conductors have led the orchestra, which is the second oldest in the United States. It has been the medium of introducing for the first time many now famous compositions of both native and foreign composers. Also it has introduced many practical ideas, such as the pension fund for its members.

Sir George Henschel Conducts.

In Boston the initial program of the semi-centennial celebration will be conducted by the same famous leader who conducted the very first program ever given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Sir George Henschel, who is now more than 80 years of age, but an active musician still, will come from his home in Scotland especially to conduct the present orchestra in the identical program that was given on the first performance of all. This will be given early in October. Mr. Koussevitzky, in commenting upon this fact to Mrs. Greene, added that he will give a second half of the special opening program, when he "will play modern music." However, the great Russian, who is noted as a virtuoso on the double bass, as well as a conductor, is reported to have smiled as he made the remark, so perhaps the moderness of the music will not be too revolutionary and dissonant.

It is further reported that the Boston Symphony Orchestra canceled a midwestern tour in order to bring the Beethoven Festival to the National Capital during this semi-centennial year.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
HERALD
AUG 1 0

3

FOUR PROGRAMS IN BEETHOVEN FESTIVAL HERE

ANNOUNCEMENT OF the four programs to be given in Washington during the week of December 1, next, by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, in connection with the Beethoven festival, has just been made by Mrs. Wilson-Greene.

The first concert will be given on Tuesday evening, December 2, at 8:30 o'clock, and will consist of the first, second and third Beethoven symphonies. The second concert will be given the following evening, Wednesday, December 3, and the program will consist of the Overture to "Egmont," piano concerto No. 4, symphony No. 5.

No performance will be given on Thursday evening, December 4, but the festival will be resumed with the third concert on Friday evening, December 5, when the Overture to "Leonore," Violin Concerto No. 3 and Symphony No. 7 will be given.

The final performance of the festival will be given on Saturday matinee at 2:30 p. m., when Beethoven's Eighth and

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE COURIER
Rockland, Me.
AUG 16 1930

* * * *

News comes from an American traveller in Europe this summer that Sir George Henschel will come to Boston for the 50th anniversary celebration of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and conduct the same program he led at the first concert of the first season. The first conductor of the Boston Symphony is now a man of 80 years, but still active.

Wouldn't it be interesting to have all the former conductors who are still living appear at the 59th anniversary, if it were feasible? Nikisch and Gericke are dead. Fiedler, Muck, Rabaud and Monteux are active in Europe. Of Paur nothing has been heard in recent

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
POST
AUG 17 1930

BOSTON GROUP TO PLAY MUSIC OF BEETHOVEN

Definite announcement of the four programs to be given in Washington during the week of December 1 next by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, in connection with the Beethoven Festival that will mark the fiftieth anniversary of the founding of this famous orchestra, has been made by Mrs. Wilson-Greene, under whose local management the Beethoven Festival will be held.

Mrs. Wilson-Greene is vacationing in Europe at the present time, as is Dr. Koussevitzky. The vacation interval, however, has permitted Koussevitzky an opportunity to work out the programs he will give at these three evening and one matinee performances in Washington, and as announced by the famous conductor, the programs will be given as follows, all at Constitution Hall, at Eigtheenth and C streets northwest.

The first concert will be given on Tuesday evening, December 2, at 8:30 o'clock, and will consist of the First, Second and Third Beethoven Symphonies. The second concert will be given the following evening, Wednesday, December 3, and the program will consist of the overture to "Egmont," Piano Concerto No. 4 and Symphony No. 5.

No performance will be given on Thursday evening, December 4, but the festival will be resumed with the third concert on Friday evening, December 5, when the overture to "Leonore," Violin Concerto No. 3 and Symphony No. 7 will be given. The final performance of the festival will be given on Saturday, matinee, at 2:30 o'clock, when Beethoven's Eighth and Ninth Symphonies will be given. This matinee performance will probably be the most pretentious of the four concerts, as the Ninth Symphony will be given with soloists and a chorus of 250 voices.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
STAR
AUG 3 - 1930

MUSIC

BY HELEN FETTER.

"BOSTON never meant beans to me," said Hans Kindler, the Dutch cellist, when in Washington last Spring. Mr. Kindler was not trying to be facetious. He did not know the slang interpretation for the name of the famous vegetable. He did know that baked beans and Boston are synonymous in many minds.

"I had never eaten baked beans," he continued in his soft and attractive accent, "but from my childhood, ever since I can remember, I had heard of the great symphony orchestra in Boston in the United States of America. It was because of this orchestra that Boston became a mecca in my eyes. All over Europe you will find that, not only among musicians, but with people generally of any culture in all the continental countries and England, the thought of Boston immediately calls forth mention of that city's famous orchestra. It is a dominating asset in the eyes of the world."

Mr. Kindler's comment has found wide corroboration. There is not one of the American cities that has a symphony orchestra which does not frankly acknowledge that such an organization is a very tangible asset to that city. Of them all, however, none is more distinguished than the orchestra of Boston. It is second oldest in the United States.

Elsewhere on this page is given some information about the Beethoven festival of four programs to be played by this orchestra in Washington in December. This festival is part of an elaborate plan for a special celebration of the 50 years that the orchestra has been in existence. For half a century it has grown into the very roots of life in Boston and the cultural considerations of the Nation itself. The festival in Washington is to be the expression in the Capital of the country of honor to one of the finest artistic products developed in the United States of America.

* * * *

IT was primarily because of the Boston Symphony Orchestra that Henry Lee Higginson became known as "Boston's first citizen." The American banker had received his general education at Harvard, his musical education abroad and served in the Federal Army during the Civil War, when he was brevetted lieutenant colonel. His benefactions were numerous and he did much practical social service work. It is the Boston Symphony Orchestra, however, that he painstakingly founded and built, which is his vital, ever-green memorial. No slightest inquiry into the history of this orchestra but brings out in capital importance the name—Henry Lee Higginson.

It was in 1881 that Mr. Higginson brought together the initial personnel. Mr. Higginson was not merely a lover of music, and thus a generous patron as far as finances were concerned. He was an intelligent musician himself. In addition, he had executive ability of high quality. These two last-mentioned things are quite as essential to a successful launching of a symphony orchestra as is the solid financial foundation such as he established and maintained for many seasons at his own individual expense.

There are many people who will give money toward fine musical endeavors, but very few who can and also will donate intelligent discrimination and ability to build such an organization. Too often socially prominent people are asked to lend their names and give a comparatively small amount of money toward such a project, and then these people seem to feel a right to assume responsibility toward the artistic development of the organization which they cannot possibly live up to, not being trained or natively gifted to handle such problems.

Mr. Higginson made no temporary hobby of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He went into the proposition with his eyes fully open to the long years of hard work and constructive thinking that he must personally contribute, as well as the very large sum of money that must be spent with no thought of a penny of it ever being returned to him. It meant real sacrifice, a sacrifice of mental energy and time that was as momentous in the artistic progress of the United States as was the sacrifice of pioneers who bore hardships and broke the more picturesque trails in learning the extent of the country and the possibilities of its material resources.

Mr. Higginson realized all this. He was no wealthy financier who simply had a lazy, amateur love of music. He stuck to his bargain year after year and brought the Boston Symphony Orchestra to a point where it became self-supportnig. He it was who outlined the plans and cleared away the obstacles toward this end. He encouraged the bringing of great guest conductors and the producing of scores, both American and foreign, for first performances in this country. He supervised the actual personnel in the orchestra and fostered many practical ideas. The Boston Symphony Orchestra was the first in the country to have a pension fund for its members.

And now, 50 years later, the Boston Symphony Orchestra is not only the most outstanding single product of Boston and the dominant factor in the life of that cultural town's citizens, but it also is an American tradition that is given world-wide recognition.

* * * *

A SYMPHONY orchestra would be a definite asset to the National Capital. Musical authorities generally agree that such an organization is the backbone of cultural development in any city. It is a civic asset when it gives jobs to nearly 100 citizens who otherwise would be out of work. It is a business asset when it keeps the money spent on entertainment by citizens circulating in the city where it is spent.

When a great organization such as the Metropolitan Grand Opera Co. comes from New York City and gives three opera performances in Washington, it leaves the city taking $60,000 of Washington citizens' money with it to another city to be circulated. More than one concert artist brought to Washington exacts $2,500 to $3,500 as the artist's fee to be paid and taken away for spending in New York or elsewhere, but certainly not in Washington. Chaliapin has asked as high as $4,200 a concert here.

This is all very well. Washington must have a certain amount of such outside expenditure. Any national capital certainly should have occasional performances of the greatest orchestras and artists in the country presented within its halls at one time or another.

On the other hand, there might well be developed a sense of proper proportion in such spending and also a thought for the city's own civic and musical development. If Washingtonians want to spend $60,000 for three operas by a visiting company given with a limited and constantly repeated group of that company's stars and necessarily limited repertoire and scenery because Washington has no opera house that makes it practicable to present greater variety of operas more advantageously and because several of the finest stars hasten abroad and never go on the tours—that is entirely up to Washingtonians. They have to pay the bills.

Looking at another side of the picture for a moment, we quote Mr. Kindler again when he said before a large musical group here:

"You people give $60,000 for three evenings of opera. If you would raise that same amount for a symphony orchestra in your own city you could have more than 40 concerts during a season at popular prices that you could well afford. Moreover, with the personnel of such an orchestra made up of your own citizens, you would be helping Washington musicians to make their living and support their families."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
STAR
AUG 3 - 1930

BEETHOVEN FESTIVAL PROGRAMS

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY.

FROM the Lido, Venice, comes the news of most of the numbers which are to be featured in Washington next December when Serge Koussevitzky leads the Boston Symphony Orchestra in four pretentious programs of the music master of Bonn in a Beethoven Festival.

Mrs. Katie Wilson-Greene, Washington manager, who is spending her "real vacation" resting at the Lido for six weeks, writes that she had an interesting visit with the Russian conductor in Paris and secured from him at that time the program which he has arranged for the festival here. Mrs. Greene adds that "on the second and third evenings we will have a well known pianist and violinist as soloists for the concertos, to be announced on my return."

Semi-Centennial Programs.

The programs are to include the following Beethoven works:

Tuesday evening, December 2—Symphony No. 1, Symphony No. 2, Symphony No. 3.

Wednesday evening, December 3—Overture to "Egmont," Piano Concerto No. 4 Symphony No. 5.

Friday evening, December 5—Overture to "Leonore," Violin Concerto No. 3, Symphony No. 7.

Saturday, December 6—Symphony No. 8, Symphony No. 9 (with soloists and chorus).

This is, of course, a particularly gala year for the Boston Symphony Orchestra. It was just 50 years ago this season that that great musical philanthropist, the late Henry L. Higginson, founded and for a considerable time was sole support financially of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. That first personnel, gathered together under his direction and excellent judgment in 1881, little realized the great importance that their organization was later to assume in American history. Under Mr. Higginson's guidance the orchestra grew to be self-supporting and its concerts became an integral part of the cultural life of the city itself. Many famous conductors have led the orchestra, which is the second oldest in the United States. It has been the medium of introducing for the first time many now famous compositions of both native and foreign composers. Also it has introduced many practical ideas, such as the pension fund for its members.

Sir George Henschel Conducts.

In Boston the initial program of the semi-centennial celebration will be conducted by the same famous leader who conducted the very first program ever given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Sir George Henschel, who is now more than 80 years of age, but an active musician still, will come from his home in Scotland especially to conduct the present orchestra in the identical program that was given on the first performance of all. This will be given early in October. Mr. Koussevitzky, in commenting upon this fact to Mrs. Greene, added that he will give a second half of the special opening program, when he "will play modern music." However, the great Russian, who is noted as a virtuoso on the double bass, as well as a conductor, is reported to have smiled as he made the remark, so perhaps the moderness of the music will not be too revolutionary and dissonant.

It is further reported that the Boston Symphony Orchestra canceled a midwestern tour in order to bring the Beethoven Festival to the National Capital during this semi-centennial year.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
HERALD
AUG 1 0 [illegible]

3

FOUR PROGRAMS IN BEETHOVEN FESTIVAL HERE

ANNOUNCEMENT OF the four programs to be given in Washington during the week of December 1, next, by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, in connection with the Beethoven festival, has just been made by Mrs. Wilson-Greene.

The first concert will be given on Tuesday evening, December 2, at 8:30 o'clock, and will consist of the first, second and third Beethoven symphonies. The second concert will be given the following evening, Wednesday, December 3, and the program will consist of the Overture to "Egmont," piano concerto No. 4, symphony No. 5.

No performance will be given on Thursday evening, December 4, but the festival will be resumed with the third concert on Friday evening, December 5, when the Overture to "Leonore," Violin Concerto No. 3 and Symphony No. 7 will be given.

The final performance of the festival will be given on Saturday matinee at 2:30 p. m., when Beethoven's Eighth and Ninth symphonies will be given.

Seats are being reserved for the series at Mrs. Wilson-Greene's Concert Bureau, 1300 G St. N. W.

[illegible] The first conductor of the Boston Symphony is now a man of 80 years, but still active.

Wouldn't it be interesting to have all the former conductors who are still living appear at the 59th anniversary, if it were feasible? Nikisch and Gericke are dead. Fiedler, Muck, Rabaud and Monteux are active in Europe. Of Paur nothing has been heard in recent years. But in the case of Dr. Muck, the greatest conductor the orchestra has ever had, there are reasons not connected with music which would make his appearance there inexpedient, unless the trustees of the orchestra were prepared to reopen the case, so it is said. The evidence on which he was interned has never been made public.

[illegible] during the week of [illegible] by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, in connection with the Beethoven Festival that will mark the fiftieth anniversary of the founding of this famous orchestra, has been made by Mrs. Wilson-Greene, under whose local management the Beethoven Festival will be held.

Mrs. Wilson-Greene is vacationing in Europe at the present time, as is Dr. Koussevitzky. The vacation interval, however, has permitted Koussevitzky an opportunity to work out the programs he will give at these three evening and one matinee performances in Washington, and as announced by the famous conductor, the programs will be given as follows, all at Constitution Hall, at Eighteenth and C streets northwest.

The first concert will be given on Tuesday evening, December 2, at 8:30 o'clock, and will consist of the First, Second and Third Beethoven Symphonies. The second concert will be given the following evening, Wednesday, December 3, and the program will consist of the overture to "Egmont," Piano Concerto No. 4 and Symphony No. 5.

No performance will be given on Thursday evening, December 4, but the festival will be resumed with the third concert on Friday evening, December 5, when the overture to "Leonore," Violin Concerto No. 3 and Symphony No. 7 will be given. The final performance of the festival will be given on Saturday, matinee, at 2:30 o'clock, when Beethoven's Eighth and Ninth Symphonies will be given. This matinee performance will probably be the most pretentious of the four concerts, as the Ninth Symphony will be given with soloists and a chorus of 250 voices.

4

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
STAR
AUG 17 193

LEADER WHOSE CHORUS WAS CHOSEN BY KOUSSEVITZKY

DR. ALBERT W. HARNED.

A COMPLIMENT has been paid the National Capital Oratorio Association and its director, Dr. Albert W. Harned, in the announcement from Boston that the Washington director and his singers have been asked to supply the choral part of the immortal "Ninth Symphony" of Beethoven when it is produced here next December by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Serge Koussevitsky.

The selection of Dr. Harned to direct the vocal part of the Beethoven master work is the result of the showing the Washington director made in presenting the vocal portion of Bloch's "America" in 1929, when Koussevitsky and the Boston orchestra played it here for the first time.

The "Ninth Symphony," as most music lovers know, is rarely heard outside of the very largest musical centers, because it is wellnigh impossible for the orchestral director to obtain choral assistance that will measure up to the standard he sets for his orchestra. The chorus for this presentation will be limited to 200 voices, divided into 70 sopranos, 45 altos, 35 tenors and 50 basses. Malton Boyce, one of the best known pianists and musical authorities of the city, will be accompanist and assistant director.

Dr. Harned announces that registrations for membership in the chorus will begin Monday, August 25, and should be sent to his studio, 1317 New York avenue northwest.

Rehearsals will be held in Perkins' Hall of the New Universalist Church, Sixteenth and S streets, beginning the second week in September.

The organization and direction of the National Capital Oratorio Association is one of several distinctive achievements in the musical world of this city by Dr. Albert W. Harned. A few days ago Dr. Harned was announced as having been chosen unanimously by musicians and laymen to take charge of the fourth national radio audition in Washington under the sponsorship of the Atwater Kent Foundation. He has been an outstanding figure in Washington's musical life since 1913 through his chorus and church choir work. He has won distinction as an organist, and is a leading vocal teacher here. Dr. Harned received training in the elementary principles of choral leadership under such eminent directors as W. W. Gilchrest and Charles Schmidt, directors of the Philadelphia Choral Society. With the latter he also studied orchestration and orchestral direction with the Philadelphia Germania Orchestra. He conducted the Choral Society in Altoona, Pa. Later he was director of the May Festival Association production in Roanoke, Va.

In Washington the National Capital Choir, a mixed chorus of 30 voices, that has been heard in concert and by radio, attracted considerable attention and led Dr. Harned to the organization of the larger and more ambitious National Capital Oratorio Association, which distinguished itself and its director especially in productions of "The Redemption and "The Messiah" before the opportunity of Bloch's "America" brought the organization to the attention of Koussevitsky.

THEN it was that Dr. Harned's group was chosen to sing the choral finale in "America," the prize symphonic poem written by Ernest Bloch, at its first production in the Capital of the United States. Dr. Koussevitzky and his orchestra brought the work here.

It will be remembered that a loyal group of music lovers of this city got together under the general direction of Carl Engel and raised several hundred dollars to build the platform necessary for Dr. Harned's singers to stand on while participating in the Bloch work.

Also there are not a few who are keenly interested in musical matters here who recall equally vividly that Dr. Koussevitzky expressed himself in no uncertain terms as thoroughly delighted with the work of Dr. Harned's group of local singers. The distinguished Russian praised, to several music lovers, the immediate response of the chorus members to each gesture of his baton and the ensemble's admirable malleability to the slightest suggestion for change in expression made by him. He mentioned that only with the most experienced and seasoned choral groups had he ever had such complete and intelligent co-operation.

At that time Dr. Koussevitzky told Dr. Harned that he wanted this group to sing the choral symphony of Beethoven with his orchestra. That was some time ago—March 6, 1929. In the meantime, there have been other organizations that have sent word to Boston that they would gladly attempt the choral symphony—as soon as it was announced that this work was to be the feature of the coming festival. Dr. Koussevitzky has been in Europe all Summer. However, he told a friend who he knew was coming to Washington this month, on the occasion of a visit in Prague, to be sure to see Dr. Harned and tell him that he was pleasantly anticipating having his choral group, which had acquitted itself so admirably in the Bloch work, sing under his direction when the Boston Symphony Orchestra presents the Beethoven "Ninth" in Washington in December. And now, from Boston direct, has come official confirmation in the person of the orchestra's manager, W. H. Brennan, with the contract within the last few days.

This Washington group may feel all the more pride in its selection and put forth all the more energy to live up to this unusual opportunity, as it is known that Dr. Koussevitzky vetoed a suggestion that the New York chorus, which sings this symphony with the Boston orchestra in the metropolis this Winter, be brought to Washington. Dr. Koussevitzky has shown complete confidence in Dr. Harned's ability to prepare the local group for this occasion and faith in the singers' ability to cooperate to that end. Certainly there could be no higher or more definite praise than this.

* * * *

THE average person with a casual interest in musical affairs often makes the mistake of thinking that only the most finished singers or instrumentalists would be the best for ensemble work. On the contrary, practically the opposite of this opinion is true of good ensembles. There are a few exceptions. One does occasionally hear of a choral group built of established soloists that is really successful. In orchestras, only the Boston Symphony Orchestra offers definite announcement that it prides itself on the fact that practically every man in the orchestra is a finished artist. Moreover, it has taken half a century to build this orchestra to its present pre-eminent state.

The reason why a talented soloist is not often good material for ensemble work is obvious to those more familiar with the music world. Any soloist who develops an individual talent to virtuoso proportions naturally develops also mannerisms, independence of thought from any other direction than his or her own, and produces a tone, whether vocal or instrumental, that is purely characteristic of himself or herself. On the other hand, the finest results in ensemble work are secured by a leader who has the real conductor's ability to blend all individualities of the people working under him into perfect co-ordination and play upon a group of human musicmakers as he would upon a harp of many strings of different lengths and volume or a huge, many-voiced organ. Teamwork is the password of fine ensemble work. It will be recalled that in the most famous string quartets, such as the lately disbanded Flonzaley Quartet, or in a choral group of such distinction as the English Singers—even in so small a band of four or six participants, each individual was practically unknown as a soloist—yet each was a good musician and had considerable talent. It was always in association with the ensemble that the name of any of these artists was brought to mind.

* * * *

IN Washington, in addition to the many singers who are making several large choral groups successful in important productions, there also are many talented instrumentalists who appear in chamber music ensembles. This latter group has been increasing most noticeably during the past season. To many people these men have become familiar only as men in the motion picture orchestras. Unfortunately, perhaps, they have had to earn their livings in this very different type of work. But even these jobs are threatened with the advent of the "talkies," and the musicians who had enjoyed training for an occasional classical program, as well as doing the more routine theater overtures and popular melodies, are facing a definite problem of earning their living otherwise.

Last Winter 80 of these men proved, under the skillful direction of the Dutch musician, Hans Kindler, who has won fame all over the world as a violoncellist of great artistry and genius, that they were capable of developing prowess as symphony orchestra players. They have the caliber. Not a few of them have individual talent and many others have the ability to grasp the sense of artistry if it is given them by such a gifted leader as Mr. Kindler proved himself to be.

When, in addition, one recalls that Mr. Kindler said himself to the writer of this column—and also to others—that he would really like to bring his family from France to make their home in Washington, the Capital of the country that has given his own talent such warm recognition, and he would like to take the responsibility for developing a National Symphony Orchestra in the Capital of the only country in the civilized world that does not have such an organization already established—surely, with such offer of co-operation as was demonstrated by both the local musician's sacrifice of last Winter and Mr. Kindler's earnest endeavors, it would seem as though the people of Washington might come forth and lend a generous helping hand to lift this gift to their own doorstep.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
POST
AUG 17 193

CITY'S SINGERS JOIN BOSTON SYMPHONY

National Capital Oratoric Association Will Aid in Fall Program.

TO GATHER 200 VOICES

The National Capital Oratoric Association, directed by Dr. Albert W. Harned, has been selected to become part of the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Serge Koussevitsky, in presenting Beethoven's famous "Choral Symphony" here next fall. This number, seldom heard except in the largest musical centers, will be a part of the Beethoven festival in Washington next year. Announcement of the selection of the Capital singers was made yesterday from Boston.

Exacting vocal requirements ordinarily prohibit the presentation of this number, but Koussevitsky, after hearing Dr. Harned's chorus in the production here last May of Bloc's "American Symphony," at once began arrangements for giving Beethoven's difficult symphony.

Dr. Harned will begin August 25 to register singers for the chorus of 200 voices necessary to present the symphony. The group will include 70 sopranos, all capable of producing high tones of "first" soprano quality; 45 altos, 35 tenors and 50 bassos. The entire fourth movement of the symphony requires the entire chorus of 200, plus a group of soloists to the full strength of the orchestra.

Rehearsals will begin the second week in September in Perkins Hall at the new Universalist National Memorial Church, Sixteenth and S streets northwest. Dr. Harned, who will supervise these rehearsals, has been a notable figure in music circles of the Capital since 1913. He was recently named chairman of the District of Columbia committee of the Fourth National Radio Audition, which under Atwater Kent Foundation sponsorship will seek new talent among District singers.

Dr. Harned received his musical training in Philadelphia under W. W. Gilchrest and Charles Schmidt, of the Philadelphia Choral Society. Choruses under his direction have presented "The Messiah" and "Redemption," in addition to the work with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the production of Bloc's "American Symphony."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
HERALD
AUG 18 193

LARGE CHORUS TO SING HERE

The National Capital Oratorio Association, under the direction of Dr. Albert W. Harned, has been selected to become part of the Boston Symphony Orchestra when Beethoven's famous Ninth or Choral Symphony is conducted by Serge Koussevitsky during the Beethoven Festival in Washington next fall.

Registration for membership in the chorus will begin Monday, August 25, and rehearsals will start the second week in September, in Perkins Hall, at the new Universalist National Memorial Church, Sixteenth and S Sts. N. W.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
STAR
AUG 17 193

MUSIC

BY HELEN FETTER.

WASHINGTON has several wide-awake choral groups that are doing admirable work. One of them has been singled out by none other than Serge Koussevitzky, the great Russian leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, for special recognition. This chorus is the National Capital Oratorio Association. The organizer and leader is Dr. Albert W. Harned, who has been active in local musical endeavors for some time. Dr. Harned is generally respected for his thorough musicianship, his marked gift as a choral conductor and his high ideals in choice of material to be performed by his chorus.

The National Capital Oratorio Association has just signed the formal contract to appear in the outstanding event of the Beethoven Festival, which will be the most unusual feature of the coming music season. This chorus will sing in Beethoven's famous "Ninth Symphony," his only choral symphony, on the last day of the festival, December 6—when the Boston Symphony Orchestra will present both the eighth and ninth symphonies. It will be a Saturday afternoon performance.

Now that the contract has been signed and the music scores received through co-operation of the Library of Congress, Dr. Harned is calling his singers together for first rehearsal the last week in this month. In the meantime, he is taking a rambling, vagabondish vacation, a semi-aimless jaunt in his automobile all by himself. Dr. Harned was very ill from a cold that went into pneumonia after the strain of two big choral efforts two Winters ago, but seems to have recovered his health quite fully now and is filled with the dynamic energy and enthusiasm that are dominant characteristics of his personality.

It will be recalled that this chorus made its public debut in a production of Gounod's "Redemption" at the Washington Auditorium a couple of seasons ago. The next Fall, after an even more complete organization, the National Capital Choral Association presented Handel's "Messiah" in Central High School. On both occasions the excellent co-ordination of the chorus in varied ensemble effects was commented on by many who heard these performances.

* * * *

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK TIMES
SEP 7 -

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, will give a Beethoven Festival of four concerts in Washington next December, presenting representative compositions. These concerts will be given as part of the fiftieth anniversary celebration of the orchestra, and the programs will be much the same as those of the Beethoven Festival given in Boston in 1927. The dates of the concerts are announced as Dec. 2, 3, 5 and 6.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
STAR
SEP 7 - 193

Dr. Harned Announces First Ninth Symphony Rehearsal

DR. ALBERT W. HARNED announces that rehearsals on the chorus parts of the Beethoven Ninth Symphony, which is to be sung with the Boston Symphony December 6, will be started Tuesday of this week in Perkins Hall, Universalist National Memorial Church, Sixteenth and S streets, at 8 p.m.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TRENTON, N. J.
TIMES
SEP 7 1930

Boston Symphony in Beethoven Festival

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, will give a Beethoven Festival ext ve be er- ind me val of m-

THIS CLIPPING FROM
New York Herald Tribune
SEP 7 - 193

BOSTON SYMPHONY PLANS FOR FIFTIETH SEASON

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra, which is preparing to open its fiftieth season next month, will give its usual ten concerts in Manhattan, at Carnegie Hall, and five concerts at the Brooklyn Academy of Music during the coming season. In Carnegie Hall there will be five evening concerts, four of them on Thursdays, November 20, January 8, February 6 (Friday), March 5 and April 9, and five Saturday afternoon concerts, November 22, January 10, February 7, March 7 and April 11. The Brooklyn concerts will be on Friday evenings, November 21, January 9, February 5 (Thursday), March 6 and April 10.

As this season completes the first half century of the Boston Symphony's existence, special features are in preparation. Sir George Henschel, the orchestra's first conductor, will come to Boston to take part in the season's opening concerts at Symphony Hall, October 10 and 11. Henschel, who was born in 1850 at Breslau, Germany, where Walter Damrosch was born twelve years later, was best known as a barytone in 1881, when he aroused the interest of the late Major Henry L. Higginson, founder of the orchestra, by his conducting of his Concert Overture at a concert of the Harvard Musical Association.

The orchestra gave its first concert in the old Music Hall on October 22, 1881. Henschel was its conductor for the first three seasons, leaving in 1884 to continue his career as a singer and conductor in Europe. Soon after returning to Europe, he settled in London, where he has lived ever since. He was knighted in 1914. The Boston Symphony paid its first visit to New York on February 14, 1887, under its second conductor, Wilhelm Gericke.

Other features planned for this season include a Beethoven festival to be directed by Serge Koussevitzky in Washington from December 1 to 6, and a Bach festival to be held in Boston from March 22 to 28. The final arrangement of programs and other details await the return of Mr. Koussevitzky for his seventh season with this orchestra.

As before, Mr. Koussevitzky will be the only regular conductor; the appearance of guests will presumably again be limited to composer-conductors in programs featuring their works. The concerts in Symphony Hall will consist of the usual twenty-four pairs on Friday afternoons and Saturday evenings, and short series on Monday evenings and Tuesday afternoons. All seats have been sold except a few for the Tuesday series. There will also be four concerts for children.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
SEP 1 1 193

SIR GEORGE HENSCHEL TO LEAD BOSTON SYMPHONY

First Conductor of Orchestra to Open Season on Oct. 10.

Boston, Sept. 10.—(AP)—Sir George Henschel, first conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra in 1881-1884, will come here from England to open the 50th season of the orchestra on Oct. 10. On the following week Dr. Serge Koussevitsky will resume the conductorship, starting his seventh season.

Among the features planned for the year will be a Bach festival in March. A number of scores written by the foremost living composers especially for the orchestra's anniversary year will be presented through the course of the season.

THIS CLIPPING FROM WORCESTER, MASS.
GAZETTE
SEP 1 1 1930

FIRST CONDUCTOR TO LEAD ORCHESTRA

Henschel Will Return to Boston Symphony for Two Concerts

Special Dispatch to The Gazette

BOSTON, Sept. 11.—Sir George Henschel, the first conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, which he led from 1881 to 1884, will return to America for the first time in 46 years to lead this organization at Symphony hall, in the opening pair of concerts of its 50th season, Oct. 10 and 11. Serge Koussevitzsky, begining his seventh season with the Boston Symphony, will take charge the following week.

Sir George was born in Breslau, Germany (which is also the native city of Walter Damrosch) in 1850 and, when he came to Boston, was best known as a concert baritone. As a conductor, he came to the attention of the late Major Henry L. Higginson, founder of the orchestra, when he conducted his own concert overture at a concert of the Harvard Musical Association. Soon after returning to Europe, Henschel settled in London, became a naturalized British subject, and was knighted in 1914. Under Mr. Koussevitzsky, the orchestra will contribute to the Massachusetts Bay Colony tercentenary celebration with a radio concert, to be broadcast throughout the country on Saturday evening, October 4. In all, the Boston Symphony has had nine regular conductors: George Henschel, 1881-'84; Wilhelm Gericke, 1884-'89, 1898-1906; Arthur Nikisch, 1889-'93, Emil Paur, 1893-'97; Karl Muck, 1906-'08, 1912-'18; Max Fiedler 1908-'12; Henri Rabaud, 1918-'19, Pierre Monteux, 1919-'24, and Serge Koussevitzky. Until 1918 the organization was headed and supported by Major Higginson; subsequently, it has been controlled by a board of trustees and supported by contributions from Boston's musical public.

Henschel, 1881-84; Wilhelm Gericke, 1884-89, 1898-1906; Arthur Nikisch, 1889-93; Emil Paur, 1893-97; Karl Muck, 1906-08, 1912-18; Max Fiedler, 1908-12; Henri Rabaud, 1918-19; Pierre Monteux, 1919-24, and Serge Koussevitzky. Until 1918 the organization was headed and supported by Major Higginson; subsequently it has been controlled by a board of trustees and supported by contributions from Boston's musical public.

THIS CLIPPING FROM LYNN, MASS.
EVENING ITEM

Boston District Court.

BOSTON.—Sir George Henschel, first conductor of Boston Symphony orchestra, to come from England to open 50th season on Oct. 10.

THIS CLIPPING FROM WEBSTER, MASS.
EVE. TIMES
SEP 1 1 193

Boston Symphony 50 Years Old

BOSTON, Sept. 11.—The Boston Symphony Orchestra is about to celebrate with features of importance and interest the 50th season of its existence. Sir George Henschel, who was the first conductor of the orchestra in 1881-84, will come from Europe to open the season in Symphony hall on Oct. 10. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, resuming the conductorship on the following week, will begin his seventh season at its head.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
EAGLE
SEP 1 1 1930

BOSTON—Sir George Henschel, first conductor of Boston Symphony orchestra, to come from England to open 50th season on October 10.

THIS CLIPPING FROM BENNINGTON, VT.
BANNER

Boston—Sir George Henschel, first conductor of Boston Symphony orchestra, to come from England to open 50th season on October 10.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HOLYOKE, MASS.
Transcript Telegram
SEP 1 2 1930

Sir George Henschel, the first conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which he led from 1881 to 1884, will return to America for the first time in forty-six years to lead this organization at Symphony Hall, Boston, in the opening pair of concerts of its fiftieth season, October 10 and 11. Serge Koussevitzsky, beginning his seventh season with the Boston Symphony, will take charge the following week. Sir George was born in Breslau, Germany (which is also the native city of Walter Damrosch) in 1850 and when he came to Boston, was best known as a concert barytone. As a conductor, he came to the attention of the late Major Henry L. Higginson, founder of the orchestra, when he conducted his own concert overture at a concert of the Harvard Musical Association. Soon after returning to Europe, Henschel settled in London, became a naturalized British subject, and was knighted in 1914. Under Mr. Koussevitzsky, the orchestra will contribute to the Massachusetts Bay Colony tercentenary celebration with a radio concert, to be broadcast throughout the country on Saturday evening, October 4. In all, the Boston Symphony has had nine regular conductors: George Henschel, 1881-'84; Wilhelm Gericke, 1884-'89, 1898-1906; Arthur Nikisch, 1889-'93; Emil Paur, 1893-'97; Karl Muck, 1906-'08, 1912-'18; Max Fiedler 1908-'12; Henri Rabaud, 1918-'19; Pierre Monteux, 1919-'24, and Serge Koussevitzky. Until 1918 the organization was headed and supported by Major Higginson; subsequently, it has been controlled by a board of trustees and supported by contributions from Boston's musical public.

THIS CLIPPING FROM NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
MERCURY

Sir George Henschel, the first conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, which he led from 1881 to 1884, will return to America for the first time in 46 years to lead this organization at Symphony hall, Boston, in the opening pair of concerts of its 50th season, Oct. 10 and 11. Serge Koussevitzsky, beginning his seventh season with the Boston Symphony, will take charge the following week.

Sir George was born in Breslau, Germany (which is also the native city of Walter Damrosch) in 1850 and, when he came to Boston, was best known as a concert baritone. As a conductor, he came to the attention of the late Major Henry L. Higginson, founder of the orchestra, when he conducted his own concert overture at a concert of the Harvard Musical association. Soon after returning to Europe, Henschel settled in London, became a naturalized British subject, and was knighted in 1914.

Under Mr. Koussevitzky, the orchestra will contribute to the Massachusetts Bay Colony tercentenary celebration with a radio concert, to be broadcast throughout the country on Saturday evening, Oct. 4. Other features of the semi-centennial season include a Bach festival at Boston in March and the first performances of works written for this orchestra by prominent contemporary composers.

In all, the Boston Symphony has had nine regular conductors: George Henschel, 1881-1884; Wilhelm Gericke, 1884-1889, 1898-1906; Arthur Nikisch, 1889-1893; Emil Paur, 1893-1897; Karl Muck, 1906-1908, 1912-1918; Max Fiedler, 1908-1912; Henri Rabaud, 1918-1919; Pierre Monteux, 1919-1924, and Serge Koussevitzky. Until 1918 the organization was headed and supported by Major Higginson; subsequently, it has been controlled by a board of trustees and supported by contributions from Boston's musical public.

THIS CLIPPING FROM BRIDGEPORT, CONN.
TELEGRAM
1930

BOSTON—Sir George Henschel, first conductor of Boston symphony orchestra, to come from [illegible] session on Oct. 10.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE TELEGRAM
HOLYOKE, MASS.
SEP 1 2 1930

Sir George Henschel, the first conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which he led from 1881 to 1884, will return to America for the first time in forty-six years to lead this organization at Symphony Hall, Boston, in the opening pair of concerts of its fiftieth season, October 10 and 11. Serge Koussevitzsky, beginning his seventh season with the Boston Symphony, will take charge the following week. Sir George was born in Breslau, Germany (which is also the native city of Walter Damrosch) in 1850 and when he came to Boston, was best known as a concert barytone. As a conductor, he came to the attention of the late Major Henry L. Higginson, founder of the orchestra, when he conducted his own concert overture at a concert of the Harvard Musical Association. Soon after returning to Europe, Henschel settled in London, became a naturalized British subject, and was knighted in 1914. Under Mr. Koussevitzsky, the orchestra will contribute to the Massachusetts Bay Colony tercentenary celebration with a radio concert, to be broadcast throughout the country on Saturday evening, October 4. In all, the Boston Symphony has had nine regular conductors: George Henschel, 1881-'84; Wilhelm Gericke, 1884-'89, 1898-1906; Arthur Nikisch, 1889-'93; Emil Paur, 1893-'97; Karl Muck, 1906-'08, 1912-'18; Max Fiedler 1908-'12; Henri Rabaud, 1918-'19; Pierre Monteux, 1919-'24, and Serge Koussevitzky. Until 1918 the organization was headed and supported by Major Higginson; subsequently, it has been controlled by a board of trustees and supported by contributions from Boston's musical public.

THIS CLIPPING FROM NEWARK, N. J.
EVE. NEWS

* * *

The Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, of which Serge Koussevitzky is conductor, will observe its semicentennial this season. Its fiftieth annual series of concerts will open in Symphony Hall, Boston, Friday and Saturday, October 10 and 11, and the occasion will be notable for the reason that Sir George Henschel, the society's first conductor, will direct the performances.

Born in Breslau, Germany, eighty years ago, Sir George, who had earned high reputation as a lieder singer and was particularly appreciated in England, married Miss Lillian Bailey, an American soprano, in London March 9, 1881. Coming to Boston in that year, he was engaged by Major Henry L. Higginson, who had just founded the orchestra, as its conductor, and for three years he continued in that post. Since then he has made his home in England, of which he became a naturalized subject. In appreciation of his services in the cause of music there, he was knighted in 1914. The many song recitals given by him and his talented wife in Europe and this country were distinguished for intelligence and artistry and were largely responsible for the vogue of that form of entertainment in America.

Sir George's successors as conductor of the Boston Symphony have been William Gericke, Arthur Nikisch, Emil Paur, Karl Muck, Max Fiedler, Henri Rabaud, Pierre Monteux and Serge Koussevitzky.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. EVE. WORLD
SEP 1 3 193

Sir George Henschel, visiting America for the first time since he led the Boston Symphony Orchestra's first three seasons, 1881-1884, is to lead the opening concerts of that organization, Oct. 10-11, and will remain as a listener for the next two concerts under the baton of Serge Koussevitzky. For this anniversary season a number of living composers have written scores which will have their first performances during the season. Another feature of this fiftieth anniversary season will be a Bach festival in Boston in March. This is Mr. Koussevitzky's seventh season as conductor of the Boston Symphony, which will give the usual five pairs of concerts in Carnegie Hall this season.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
STAR

The Lily C

SOME of the stories that spring out of Hollywood during this wonderful machine age would hatch an egg if it were imperative that an egg be hatched abnormally. The movie doesn't stop at anything needed to prepare the way for its onward march. This has

WASHINGTON has several wide-awake choral groups that are doing admirable work. One of them has been singled out by none other than Serge Koussevitzky, the great Russian leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, for special recognition. This chorus is the National Capital Oratorio Association. The organizer and leader is Dr. Albert W. Harned, who has been active in local musical endeavors for some time. Dr. Harned is generally respected for his thorough musicianship, his marked gift as a choral conductor and his high ideals in choice of material to be performed by his chorus.

The National Capital Oratorio Association has just signed the formal contract to appear in the outstanding event of the Beethoven Festival, which will be the most unusual feature of the coming music season. This chorus will sing in Beethoven's famous "Ninth Symphony," his only choral symphony, on the last day of the festival, December 6—when the Boston Symphony Orchestra will present both the eighth and ninth symphonies. It will be a Saturday afternoon performance.

Now that the contract has been signed and the music scores received through co-operation of the Library of Congress, Dr. Harned is calling his singers together for first rehearsal the last week in this month. In the meantime, he is taking a rambling, vagabondish vacation, a semi-aimless jaunt in his automobile all by himself. Dr. Harned was very ill from a cold that went into pneumonia after the strain of two big choral efforts two Winters ago, but seems to have recovered his health quite fully now and is filled with the dynamic energy and enthusiasm that are dominant characteristics of his personality.

It will be recalled that this chorus made its public debut in a production of Gounod's "Redemption" at the Washington Auditorium a couple of seasons ago. The next Fall, after an even more complete organization, the National Capital Choral Association presented Handel's "Messiah" in Central High School. On both occasions the excellent co-ordination of the chorus in varied ensemble effects was commented on by many who heard these performances.

* * * *

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK TIMES

SEP 7 -

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, will give a Beethoven Festival of four concerts in Washington next December, presenting representative compositions. These concerts will be given as part of the fiftieth anniversary celebration of the orchestra, and the programs will be much the same as those of the Beethoven Festival given in Boston in 1927. The dates of the concerts are announced as Dec. 2, 3, 5 and 6.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
STAR

SEP 7 -

Dr. Harned Announces First Ninth Symphony Rehearsal

DR. ALBERT W. HARNED announces that rehearsals on the chorus parts of the Beethoven Ninth Symphony, which is to be sung with the Boston Symphony December 6, will be started Tuesday of this week in Perkins Hall, Universalist National Memorial Church, Sixteenth and S streets, at 8 p.m.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TRENTON, N. J.
TIMES

SEP 7 1930

Boston Symphony in Beethoven Festival

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, will give a Beethoven Festival of four concerts in Washington next December, presenting representative compositions. These concerts will be given as part of the fiftieth anniversary celebration of the orchestra, and the programs will be much the same as those of the Beethoven Festival given in Boston in 1927. The dates of the concerts are announced as December 2, 3, 5 and 6.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
New York Herald Tribune

SEP 7 - 1930

A NEW AR
IN TH

By CARLYL

On this page last spring there was discussed a very striking and beautiful painting by Giovanni Battista Tiepolo, which was then in the hands of the art dealer, Mr. A. S. Drey. This was the Italian painter's interpretation of the story of "Hagar and Ishmael," showing the apparition of the angel to the pair in the desert. The canvas shortly afterward was mentioned among sev-

As this season completes the first half century of the Boston Symphony's existence, special features are in preparation. Sir George Henschel, the orchestra's first conductor, will come to Boston to take part in the season's opening concerts at Symphony Hall, October 10 and 11. Henschel, who was born in 1850 at Breslau, Germany, where Walter Damrosch was born twelve years later, was best known as a barytone in 1881, when he aroused the interest of the late Major Henry L. Higginson, founder of the orchestra, by his conducting of his Concert Overture at a concert of the Harvard Musical Association.

The orchestra gave its first concert in the old Music Hall on October 22, 1881. Henschel was its conductor for the first three seasons, leaving in 1884 to continue his career as a singer and conductor in Europe. Soon after returning to Europe, he settled in London, where he has lived ever since. He was knighted in 1914. The Boston Symphony paid its first visit to New York on February 14, 1887, under its second conductor, Wilhelm Gericke.

Other features planned for this season include a Beethoven festival to be directed by Serge Koussevitzky in Washington from December 1 to 6, and a Bach festival to be held in Boston from March 22 to 28. The final arrangement of programs and other details await the return of Mr. Kussevitzky for his seventh season with this orchestra.

As before, Mr. Koussevitzky will be the only regular conductor; the appearance of guests will presumably again be limited to composer-conductors in programs featuring their works. The concerts in Symphony Hall will consist of the usual twenty-four pairs on Friday afternoons and Saturday evenings, and short series on Monday evenings and Tuesday afternoons. All seats have been sold except a few for the Tuesday series. There will also be four concerts for children.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

SEP 1 1

SIR GEORGE HENSCHEL TO LEAD BOSTON SYMPHONY

First Conductor of Orchestra to Open Season on Oct. 10.

Boston, Sept. 10.—(AP)—Sir George Henschel, first conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra in 1881-1884, will come here from England to open the 50th season of the orchestra on Oct. 10. On the following week Dr. Serge Koussevitsky will resume the conductorship, starting his seventh season.

Among the features planned for the year will be a Bach festival in March. A number of scores written by the foremost living composers especially for the orchestra's anniversary year will be presented through the course of the season.

THIS CLIPPING FROM WORCESTER, MASS.
GAZETTE

SEP 11 1930

FIRST CONDUCTOR TO LEAD ORCHESTRA

Henschel Will Return to Boston Symphony for Two Concerts

Special Dispatch to The Gazette

BOSTON, Sept. 11.—Sir George Henschel, the first conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, which he led from 1881 to 1884, will return to America for the first time in 46 years to lead this organization at Symphony hall, in the opening pair of concerts of its 50th season, Oct. 10 and 11. Serge Koussevitzsky, beginning his seventh season with the Boston Symphony, will take charge the following week.

Sir George was born in Breslau, Germany (which is also the native city of Walter Damrosch) in 1850 and, when he came to Boston, was best known as a concert baritone. As a conductor, he came to the attention of the late Maj. Henry L. Higginson, founder of the orchestra, when he conducted his own concert overture at a concert of the Harvard Musical Association. Soon after returning to Europe, Henschel settled in London, became a naturalized British subject, and was knighted in 1914.

Under Mr. Koussevitzky, the orchestra will contribute to the Massachusetts Bay Colony Tercentennary celebration with a radio concert to be broadcast throughout the country on Saturday evening, Oct. 4. Other features of the semi-centennial season include a Bach festival at Boston in March and the first performance of works written for this orchestra by prominent contemporary composers.

In all, the Boston Symphony has had nine regular conductors: George Henschel, 1881-84; Wilhelm Gericke, 1884-89, 1898-1906; Arthur Nikisch, 1889-93; Emil Paur, 1893-97; Karl Muck, 1906-08, 1912-18; Max Fiedler, 1908-12; Henri Rabaud, 1918-19; Pierre Monteux, 1919-24, and Serge Koussevitzky. Until 1918 the organization was headed and supported by Major Higginson; subsequently it has been controlled by a board of trustees and supported by contributions from Boston's musical public.

THIS CLIPPING FROM LYNN, MASS.
EVENING ITEM

Holyoke District court.

BOSTON.—Sir George Henschel, first conductor of Boston Symphony orchestra, to come from England to open 50th season on Oct. 10.

THIS CLIPPING FROM WEBSTER, MASS.
EVE. TIMES

SEP 11

Boston Symphony 50 Years Old

BOSTON, Sept. 11.—The Boston Symphony Orchestra is about to celebrate with features of importance and interest the 50th season of its existence. Sir George Henschel, who was the first conductor of the orchestra in 1881-84, will come from Europe to open the season in Symphony hall on Oct. 10. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, resuming the conductorship on the following week, will begin his seventh season at its head.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
EAGLE

SEP 11 1930

BOSTON—Sir George Henschel, first conductor of Boston symphony orchestra, to come from England to open 50th season on October 10.

THIS CLIPPING FROM BENNINGTON, VT.
BANNER

Boston—Sir George Henschel, first conductor of Boston Symphony orchestra, to come from England to open 50th season on October 10.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HOLYOKE, MASS.
Transcript Telegram

SEP 12 1930

Sir George Henschel, the first conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which he led from 1881 to 1884, will return to America for the first time in forty-six years to lead this organization at Symphony Hall, Boston, in the opening pair of concerts of its fiftieth season, October 10 and 11. Serge Koussevitzsky, beginning his seventh season with the Boston Symphony, will take charge the following week. Sir George was born in Breslau, Germany (which is also the native city of Walter Damrosch) in 1850 and when he came to Boston, was best known as a concert barytone. As a conductor, he came to the attention of the late Major Henry L. Higginson, founder of the orchestra, when he conducted his own concert overture at a concert of the Harvard Musical Association. Soon after returning to Europe, Henschel settled in London, became a naturalized British subject, and was knighted in 1914. Under Mr. Koussevitzsky, the orchestra will contribute to the Massachusetts Bay Colony tercentenary celebration with a radio concert, to be broadcast throughout the country on Saturday evening, October 4. In all, the Boston Symphony has had nine regular conductors: George Henschel, 1881-'84; Wilhelm Gericke, 1884-'89, 1898-1906; Arthur Nikisch, 1889-'93, Emil Paur, 1893-'97; Karl Muck, 1906-'08, 1912-'18; Max Fiedler 1908-'12; Henri Rabaud, 1918-'19, Pierre Monteux, 1919-'24, and Serge Koussevitzky. Until 1918 the organization was headed and supported by Major Higginson; subsequently, it has been controlled by a board of trusees and supported by contributions from Boston's musical public.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
MERCURY

Sir George Henschel, the first conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, which he led from 1881 to 1884, will return to America for the first time in 46 years to lead this organization at Symphony hall, Boston, in the opening pair of concerts of its 50th season, Oct. 10 and 11. Serge Koussevitzsky, beginning his seventh season with the Boston Symphony, will take charge the following week.

Sir George was born in Breslau, Germany (which is also the native city of Walter Damrosch) in 1850 and, when he came to Boston, was best known as a concert baritone. As a conductor, he came to the attention of the late Major Henry L. Higginson, founder of the orchestra, when he conducted his own concert overture at a concert of the Harvard Musical association. Soon after returning to Europe, Henschel settled in London, became a naturalized British subject, and was knighted in 1914.

Under Mr. Koussevitzky, the orchestra will contribute to the Massachusetts Bay Colony tercentenary celebration with a radio concert, to be broadcast throughout the country on Saturday evening, Oct. 4. Other features of the semi-centennial season include a Bach festival at Boston in March and the first performances of works written for this orchestra by prominent contemporary composers.

In all, the Boston Symphony has had nine regular conductors: George Henschel, 1881-1884; Wilhelm Gericke, 1884-1889, 1898-1906; Arthur Nikisch, 1889-1893; Emil Paur, 1893-1897; Karl Muck, 1906-1908, 1912-1918; Max Fiedler, 1908-1912; Henri Rabaud, 1918-1919; Pierre Monteux, 1919-1924, and Serge Koussevitzky. Until 1918 the organization was headed and supported by Major Higginson; subsequently, it has been controlled by a board of trustees and supported by contributions from Boston's musical public.

THIS CLIPPING FROM BRIDGEPORT, CONN.
TELEGRAM

1930

BOSTON—Sir George Henschel, first conductor of Boston symphony orchestra, to come from England to open session on Oct. 10.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE TELEGRAM
HOLYOKE, MASS.

SEP 12 1930

Sir George Henschel, the first conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which he led from 1881 to 1884, will return to America for the first time in forty-six years to lead this organization at Symphony Hall, Boston, in the opening pair of concerts of its fiftieth season, October 10 and 11. Serge Koussevitzsky, beginning his seventh season with the Boston Symphony, will take charge the following week. Sir George was born in Breslau, Germany (which is also the native city of Walter Damrosch) in 1850 and when he came to Boston, was best known as a concert barytone. As a conductor, he came to the attention of the late Major Henry L. Higginson, founder of the orchestra, when he conducted his own concert overture at a concert of the Harvard Musical Association. Soon after returning to Europe, Henschel settled in London, became a naturalized British subject, and was knighted in 1914. Under Mr. Koussevitzsky, the orchestra will contribute to the Massachusetts Bay Colony tercentenary celebration with a radio concert, to be broadcast throughout the country on Saturday evening, October 4. In all, the Boston Symphony has had nine regular conductors: George Henschel, 1881-'84; Wilhelm Gericke, 1884-'89, 1898-1906; Arthur Nikisch, 1889-'93, Emil Paur, 1893-'97; Karl Muck, 1906-'08, 1912-'18; Max Fiedler 1908-'12; Henri Rabaud, 1918-'19, Pierre Monteux, 1919-'24, and Serge Koussevitzky. Until 1918 the organization was headed and supported by Major Higginson; subsequently, it has been controlled by a board of trusees and supported by contributions from Boston's musical public.

THIS CLIPPING FROM NEWARK, N. J.
EVE. NEWS

* * *

The Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, of which Serge Koussevitzky is conductor, will observe its semicentennial this season. Its fiftieth annual series of concerts will open in Symphony Hall, Boston, Friday and Saturday, October 10 and 11, and the occasion will be notable for the reason that Sir George Henschel, the society's first conductor, will direct the performances.

Born in Breslau, Germany, eighty years ago, Sir George, who had earned a high reputation as a lieder singer and was particularly appreciated in England, married Miss Lillian Bailey, an American soprano, in London March 9, 1881. Coming to Boston in that year, he was engaged by Major Henry L. Higginson, who had just founded the orchestra, as its conductor, and for three years he continued in that post. Since then he has made his home in England, of which he became a naturalized subject. In appreciation of his services in the cause of music there, he was knighted in 1914. The many song recitals given by him and his talented wife in Europe and this country were distinguished for intelligence and artistry and were largely responsible for the vogue of that form of entertainment in America.

Sir George's successors as conductor of the Boston Symphony have been William Gericke, Arthur Nikisch, Emil Paur, Karl Muck, Max Fiedler, Henri Rabaud, Pierre Monteux and Serge Koussevitzky.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. EVE. WORLD

SEP 13

Sir George Henschel, visiting America for the first time since he led the Boston Symphony Orchestra's first three seasons, 1881-1884, is to lead the opening concerts of that organization, Oct. 10-11, and will remain as a listener for the next two concerts under the baton of Serge Koussevitzky. For this anniversary season a number of living composers have written scores which will have their first performances during the season. Another feature of this fiftieth anniversary season will be a Bach festival in Boston in March. This is Mr. Koussevitzky's seventh season as conductor of the Boston Symphony, which will give the usual five pairs of concerts in Carnegie Hall this season.

6

THIS CLIPPING FROM
New York Morn. World
SEP 14 1930

Boston Band Begins 50th Year

Orchestra's First Leader To Open Season October 10

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra will open in Symphony Hall, Boston, Oct. 10 and 11, its fiftieth season. Sir George Henschel, this orchestra's first conductor, will visit America for the first time since he led the orchestra's first three seasons, 1881-1884. He will lead the opening concerts in Boston and remain to attend the second pair of concerts, as a listener, when Serge Koussevitzky first takes the baton.

Another feature of the anniversary season will be a Bach Festival in Boston next March. A number of the foremost living composers have written new scores for this orchestra's anniversary year, and these will have their first performances in the course of the season. A special radio concert will be given Saturday evening Oct. 4, as the orchestra's contribution to the tercentenary program of the Massachusetts Bay Colonies. Serge Koussevitzky shortly will return from Europe to lead this concert.

The usual five pairs of concerts will be given in Carnegie Hall, Nov. 20 and 22, Jan. 8 and 10, Feb. 6 and 7, March 5 and 7, and April 9 and 11. The orchestra's schedule will also include, as usual, five concerts in the Academy of Music, Brooklyn, and five series of concerts in greater Boston. For these, as well as for the New York concerts, all seats are subscribed in advance.

The orchestra which Henschel led in 1881 was the life dream of Major Henry L. Higginson—to give America a permanent orchestra, the most beautiful that individual effort and expenditure could achieve. For thirty-seven years he devoted his best energies and his available income to perfecting his orchestra, sparing no pains to acquire the best musicians and the greatest conductors which the world afforded. The shaping of the ensemble by Wilhelm Gericke to its traditional perfection; the illustrious years of Artur Nikisch and those of Dr. Karl Muck, who carried Major Higginson's orchestra to its highest point of fame, are now familiar history. The line of Boston Symphony conductors is as follows:

Wilhelm Gericke	1884-1889
George Henschel	1881-1884
Arthur Nikisch	1889-1893
Emil Pauer	1893-1898
Wilhelm Gericke	1898-1906
Karl Muck	1906-1908
Max Fiedler	1908-1912
Karl Muck	1912-1918
Henri Rabaud	1918-1919
Pierre Monteux	1919-1924
Serge Koussevitzky	1924-

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
CITIZEN
SEP 14 193

Jubilee Celebration of The Boston Orchestra

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is about to celebrate the fiftieth season of its existence. Sir George Henschel, who was the first conductor of the orchestra in 1881-84, will come from Europe to open the season in Symphony Hall on Oct. 10. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, resuming the conductorship on the following week, will begin his seventh season at its head.

Other features will be a Bach Festival in Boston next March, and a number of scores written especially by the foremost living composers for this orchestra's anniversary year which will be included through the course of the season. A special radio concert will be given on Saturday evening, Oct. 4, as the orchestra's contribution to the Tercentenary Program of the Massachusetts Bay Colony. Serge Koussevitzky will shortly return from Europe to lead this concert, which will be broadcast over the entire nation.

220 WEST 15th ST., NEW YORK
Tel. Chelsea 8860

THIS CLIPPING FROM
New York Herald Tribune
SEP 14 1930

Henschel to Open Boston Symphony's Fiftieth Season

Orchestra's First Leader Will Return After 46 Years for First Concerts

The Boston Symphony Orchestra announces definitely that Sir George Henschel, its first conductor, who is now eighty years old, will conduct the opening concerts of its fiftieth season at Symphony Hall on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, October 10-11, and will remain in Boston to attend the second pair of concerts, October 17-18, under Serge Koussevitzky's direction. This will be Henschel's first visit to America since his Boston conductorship from 1881 to 1884.

The orchestra will make its contribution to the Massachusetts tercentenary program in the form of a radio concert under Mr. Koussevitzky's direction on Saturday evening, October 4, to be broadcast throughout the country by the National Broadcasting Company. Details of the season's novelties have not yet been given out, but it is announced that a number of the most prominent living composers have written works for the orchestra's semi-centennial year, which will have their first performances during the coming season. It is also announced that all seats have been subscribed in advance for the orchestra's five Boston series and its series in New York and Brooklyn.

Mr. Koussevitzky is the ninth conductor and the first Russian who has headed the Boston Symphony. The list of its regular conductors is: George Henschel, 1881-'84; Wilhelm Gericke, 1884-'89, 1898-1906; Arthur Nikisch, 1889-'93; Emil Paur, 1893-'98; Dr. Karl Muck, 1906-'08, 1912-'18; Max Fiedler, 1908-'12; Henri Rabaud, 1918-'19; Pierre Monteux, 1919-'24; Serge Koussevitzky, 1924.

THIS CLIPPING FROM PHILADELPHIA, PA.
RECORD
SEP 14 1930

BOSTON ORCHESTRA HAS 50TH BIRTHDAY

Henschel, Symphony's First Leader, to Return for Anniversary Concerts.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is about to celebrate with features of importance and interest the fiftieth season of its existence. Sir George Henschel, who was the first conductor of the orchestra in 1881-84, will come from Europe for the first time in 47 years to open the season in Symphony Hall on October 10. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, resuming the conductorship on the following week, will begin his seventh season at its head.

Other features will be a Bach Festival in Boston next March, and a number of scores written especially by the foremost living composers for this orchestra's anniversary year, which will be included through the course of the season. A special radio concert will be given on Saturday evening, October 4, as the orchestra's contribution to the tercentenary program of the Massachusetts Bay Colonies. Serge Koussevitzky will shortly return from Europe to lead this concert which will be broadcast over the entire nation.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra was the life dream of Henry L. Higginson—to give America a permanent orchestra, the finest that individual effort and expenditure could create. For 37 years this noted financier and patron of the arts devoted his best energies and the limit of his income to the orchestra.

George Henschel, having firmly established the orchestra, was followed as conductor by Wilhelm Gericke, who through 12 years drilled it into a fine flexibility of performance which made it one of the first in the world. Arthur Nikisch, the most illustrious conductor of his day, had a shorter term, as did Emil Paur and Max Fiedler. Dr. Karl Muck, from 1906, carried the orchestra, which was Major Higginson's, to its highest point of quality and fame.

In Major Higginson's seventy-ninth year, the orchestra's founder left it in the control of a board of trustees. Following the two French conductors, Henri Rabaud and Pierre Monteux, the gifted Russian, Serge Koussevitzky, began his term in 1924.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK TIMES
SEP 14 1930

BOSTON SYMPHONY ANN

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra opens in Symphony Hall, Boston, on Oct. 10-11, its fiftieth season. Sir George Henschel, this orchestra's first conductor, will visit America for the first time since he led the orchestra's first three seasons, 1881-1884. He will lead the opening concerts in Boston on Oct. 10-11 and remain to attend the second pair of concerts, as a listener, when Serge Koussevitzky takes the baton.

Another feature of the anniversary will be the Bach Festival to be given in Boston next March. A number of prominent living composers have written new scores for this orchestra's anniversary year, and these will have their first performance in the course of the season. A special radio concert will be given on Saturday, Oct. 4, as the orchestra's contribution to the tercentenary program of the Massachusetts Bay Colonies. Mr. Koussevitzky will shortly return from Europe to lead this concert. It will be broadcast by the National Broadcasting Company over a nation-wide hook-up.

The usual five pairs of concerts will be given in Carnegie Hall on Nov. 20-22, Jan. 8-10, Feb. 6-7 and April 9-11. The orchestra's schedule will also include, as usual, five concerts in the Academy of Music, Brooklyn, and five series of concerts in greater Boston. For these, as well as for the New York concerts, all seats are subscribed in advance.

The list of Boston Symphony conductors is as follows:

George Henschel	1881-1884
Wilhelm Gericke	1884-1889
Arthur Nikisch	1889-1893
Emil Paur	1893-1898
Wilhelm Gericke	1898-1906
Karl Muck	1906-1908
Max Fiedler	1908-1912
Karl Muck	1912-1918
Henri Rabaud	1918-1919
Pierre Monteux	1919-1924
Serge Koussevitzky	1924-

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's fiftieth year is therefore Serge Koussevitzky's seventh as its leader.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
SEP 14 1930

BOSTON SYMPHONY'S ANNIVERSARY SEASON

The Boston Symphony's 50th anniversary season is announced to open in Symphony Hall on Oct. 10, with Sir George Henschel, the orchestra's first conductor, in the stand. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, resuming the conductorship the following week, will begin his seventh season at its head.

Other features will be a Bach festival in Boston next March, and a number of scores written especially by the foremost living composers for this orchestra's anniversary year, which will be included through the course of the season. A special radio concert will be given on Saturday evening, Oct. 4, as the orchestra's contribution to the tercentenary program of the Massachusetts Bay Colony. Serge Koussevitzky will shortly return from Europe to lead this concert, which will be broadcast over the entire nation.

Sir George Henschel's pending trip to America will be his first since his conductorship of 47 years ago. He will come to an orchestra almost doubled in number which has meanwhile acquired a long standing reputation of the very highest in the world of musical performance.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra was the life dream of Henry L. Higginson—to give America a permanent orchestra, the very finest that individual effort and expenditure could create. For 37 years this noted financier and patron of the arts devoted his best energies and the limit of his income to perfecting his orches-

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
STAR
SEP 14 1930

Returns After 46 Years To Lead Two Concerts

ONE of the most important items of interest to the music world during the past week is the announcement that Sir George Henschel will return to the United States after an absence of 46 years.

Sir George was the first conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which he led from 1881 to 1884. His visit to this country will be something of an event, since he is coming over for the purpose of leading the orchestra which he first helped to incorporate. The first of this season's concerts by the Boston Symphony, to be held October 11 and 12, will thus see Sir George again at the helm.

Serge Koussevitzsky, beginning his seventh season with the orchestra, will take charge the following week.

THIS CLIPPING FROM PAWTUCKET, R. I.
TIMES

Boston Symphony to Celebrate Its Fiftieth Season—

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is about to celebrate with features of importance and interest the 50th season of its existence. Sir George Henschel, who was the first conductor of the orchestra in 1881-84, will come from Europe to open the season in Symphony Hall, Boston, on Oct. 10. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, resuming the conductorship on the following week, will begin his seventh season at its head.

Other features will be a Bach Festival in Boston next March, and a number of scores written especially by the foremost living composers for this orchestra's anniversary year, which will be included through the course of the season. A special radio programme will be given on Saturday evening, Oct. 4, as the orchestra's contribution to the tercentenary programme of the Massachusetts Bay Colony. Serge Koussevitzky will shortly return from Europe to lead this concert, which will be broadcast over the entire nation.

Sir George Henschel's pending trip to America will be his first since his conductorship of 7 years ago. He will come to an orchestra almost doubled in number, which has meanwhile acquired a long-standing reputation of the very highest in the world of musical performance.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra was the life dream of Henry L. Higginson—to give America a permanent orchestra, the very finest that individual effort and expenditure could create. For 37 years this noted financier and patron of the arts devoted his best energies and the limit of his income to perfecting his orchestra. He obtained the most skillful musicians of the time, and the greatest living conductors to shape them into an ensemble of ideal beauty.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
PAWTUCKET, R. I.
TIMES
SEP. 15 1930

o join the scouting fleet.

Boston Symphony to Celebrate Its Fiftieth Season

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is about to celebrate with features of importance and interest the 50th season of its existence. Sir George Henschel, who was the first conductor of the orchestra in 1881-84, will come from Europe to open the season in Symphony Hall, Boston, on Oct. 10. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, resuming the conductorship on the following week, will begin his seventh season at its head.

Other features will be a Bach Festival in Boston next March, and a number of scores written especially by the foremost living composers for this orchestra's anniversary year, which will be included through the course of the season. A special radio programme will be given on Saturday evening, Oct. 4, as the orchestra's contribution to the tercentenary programme of the Massachusetts Bay Colony. Serge Koussevitzky will shortly return from Europe to lead this concert, which will be broadcast over the entire nation.

Sir George Hens... trip to America will be... his conductorship of... will come to an o... doubled in number, w... while acquired a long... tation of the very... world of musical per...

The Boston Sympl... was the life dream of... ginson—to give Ameri... orchestra, the very fi... vidual effort and exp... create. For 37 years t... cier and patron of th... his best energies and the limit of his income to perfecting his orchestra. He obtained the most skillful musicians of the time, and the greatest living conductors to shape them into an ensemble of ideal beauty.

THIS CLIPPING FROM TORONTO, CANADA
MAIL & EMPIRE
SEP 15 1930

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, internationally recognized as one of America's greatest musical organizations, will offer its first concert planned exclusively for radio listeners, Saturday night, Oct. 4, the National Broadcasting Company announced. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the orchestra, will present a program especially constructed for the unseen audience. The radio concert antedates the regular symphony season in Boston by one week and rehearsals will be called in the immediate future to prepare the musicians for the microphone.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
NEWS & HERALD
NEWBURYPORT, MASS.
SEP 15 1930

We read with pleasure that a concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra is to be broadcast over a nation-wide hook-up on the evening of Saturday, Oct. 15. This special concert is being given in connection with Boston's tercentenary program. This will be the first time that the Boston orchestra has ever been broadcast on a nation-wide hook-up, although its concerts were put on the air from a Boston station several years ago. One of the features of this concert will be the presence of Carl Haenshel, its first director, who conducted the orchestra during the first years of its establishment, in the 80's. He will wield the baton at this first concert.

The history of the Boston orchestra, beginning with accounts of its predecessors, and telling of conditions which attended its establishment, is a most interesting story. It is contained in the life of Henry Lee Higginson, famous sponsor of the orchestra, which is on the shelves of our public library. In this beautifully written book there is a complete story of how the orchestra came into being and the successes of the various directors are summarized.

One of its famous conductors, who directed the orchestra for two separate periods of years, was Dr. Muck of Germany, a notable musician of all times. His career in Boston came to an unfortunate climax however, when he was accused of being in league with the German espionage system in a move to injure American property and institutions. Some difference of opinion was always expressed as to the extent of Dr. Muck's implication in the alleged "plots," but the American Secret Service made direct charges. Some musical enthusiasts resented what they considered an "insult" to the foreign conductor, but most of the people, fired by patriotic fervor, which was at a high pitch at the time, were up-in-arms over the matter and decided that they never wanted to hear any more German music. It was charged that Dr. Muck refused to have his orchestra play the national anthem during the war period, and such a gesture, during the period of war hysteria, was regarded as inexcusable and little short of atrocious. Probably the German musician was drawn into his actions against his will, for he was too sincere an artist to bother with such trivial matters as international intrigue.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE BANGOR, ME.
COMMERCIAL
SEP 8 - 1930

NATURAL REACTION

Dr. Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, has returned from a visit to Europe and expresses himself as somewhat concerned by conditions found. Himself a Russian, who is without sympathy for bolshevism, Dr. Koussevitzky sees a great danger to Europe because of soviet propaganda for a world revolution through economic means and visions industrial ruin for some of Russia's neighbors because of the soviet's new industrial program under which 120,000,000 Russians virtually are slaves to the government with labor producing at the expense only of bare subsistence.

The Symphony leader touches upon a problem that is causing much agitation in some of the European countries that already have been affected by the influx of cheaply-produced goods from Russia—a problem that very likely is lending much support to the proposal of M. Briand for a United States of Europe with plans for meeting the Russian situation. However, the conditions are such that they can be met without united action and will be met in the most available manner—by raising tariff barriers.

We expect that Russia's industrial campaign will soon encounter a very vigorous snubbing. Russia has the labor and is availing itself thereof, but it requires foreign capital and foreign purchase of its production. Today the Russian government is disposing of goods at prices that make competition in free countries impossible. And in protection of their own laborers, Russia's neighbors will establish tariffs on Russian goods at rates that will bring their coats to figures that can be met. Such is a natural result. A nation that proposes to elevate itself by flooding the markets of other countries must take into consideration the natural reaction of those other countries, something that the Soviet government apparently has not done.

6

THIS CLIPPING FROM
New York Morn. World
SEP 14 1930

Boston Band Begins 50th Year

Orchestra's First Leader To Open Season October 10

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra will open in Symphony Hall, Boston, Oct. 10 and 11, its fiftieth season. Sir George Henschel, this orchestra's first conductor, will visit America for the first time since he led the orchestra's first three seasons, 1881-1884. He will lead the opening concerts in Boston and remains to attend the second pair of concerts, as a listener, when Serge Koussevitzky first takes the baton.

Another feature of the anniversary season will be a Bach Festival in Boston next March. A number of the foremost living composers have written new scores for this orchestra's anniversary year, and these will have their first performances in the course of the season. A special radio concert will be given Saturday evening Oct. 4, as the orchestra's contribution to the tercentenary program of the Massachusetts Bay Colonies. Serge Koussevitzky shortly will return from Europe to lead this concert.

The usual five pairs of concerts will be given in Carnegie Hall, Nov. 20 and 22, Jan. 8 and 10, Feb. 6 and 7, March 5 and 7, and April 9 and 11. The orchestra's schedule will also include, as usual, five concerts in the Academy of Music, Brooklyn, and five series of concerts in greater Boston. For these, as well as for the New York concerts, all seats are subscribed in advance.

The orchestra which Henschel led in 1881 was the life dream of Major Henry L. Higginson—to give America a permanent orchestra, the most beautiful that individual effort and expenditure could achieve. For thirty-seven years he devoted his best energies and his available income to perfecting his orchestra, sparing no pains to acquire the best musicians and the greatest conductors which the world afforded. The shaping of the ensemble by Wilhelm Gericke to its traditional perfection; the illustrious years of Artur Nikisch and those of Dr. Karl Muck, who carried Major Higginson's orchestra to its highest point of fame, are now familiar history. The line of Boston Symphony conductors is as follows:

Wilhelm Gericke	1884-1889
George Henschel	1881-1834
Arthur Nikisch	1889-1893
Emil Paucr	1893-1898
Wilhelm Gericke	1898-1906
Karl Muck	1906-1908
Max Fiedler	1908-1912
Karl Muck	1912-1918
Henri Rabaud	1918-1919
Pierre Monteux	1919-1924
Serge Koussevitzky	1924-

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
CITIZEN
SEP 14 19[illegible]

Jubilee Celebration of The Boston Orchestra

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is about to celebrate the fiftieth season of its existence. Sir George Henschel, who was the first conductor of the orchestra in 1881-84, will come from Europe to open the season in Symphony Hall on Oct. 10. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, resuming the conductorship on the following week, will begin his seventh season at its head.

Other features will be a Bach Festival in Boston next March, and a number of scores written especially by the foremost living composers for this orchestra's anniversary year which will be included through the course of the season. A special radio concert will be given on Saturday evening, Oct. 4, as the orchestra's contribution to the Tercentenary Program of the Massachusetts Bay Colony. Serge Koussevitzky will shortly return from Europe to lead this concert, which will be broadcast over the entire nation.

220 WEST 19th ST., NEW YORK
Tel. Chelsea 8860
THIS CLIPPING FROM
New York Herald Tribune
SEP 14 1930

Henschel to Open Boston Symphony's Fiftieth Season

Orchestra's First Leader Will Return After 46 Years for First Concerts

The Boston Symphony Orchestra announces definitely that Sir George Henschel, its first conductor, who is now eighty years old, will conduct the opening concerts of its fiftieth season at Symphony Hall on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, October 10-11, and will remain in Boston to attend the second pair of concerts, October 17-18, under Serge Koussevitzky's direction. This will be Henschel's first visit to America since his Boston conductorship from 1881 to 1884.

The orchestra will make its contribution to the Massachusetts tercentenary program in the form of a radio concert under Mr. Koussevitzky's direction on Saturday evening, October 4, to be broadcast throughout the country by the National Broadcasting Company. Details of the season's novelties have not yet been given out, but it is announced that a number of the most prominent living composers have written works for the orchestra's semi-centennial year, which will have their first performances during the coming season. It is also announced that all seats have been subscribed in advance for the orchestra's five Boston series and its series in New York and Brooklyn.

Mr. Koussevitzky is the ninth conductor and the first Russian who has headed the Boston Symphony. The list of its regular conductors is: George Henschel, 1881-'84; Wilhelm Gericke, 1884-'89, 1898-1906; Arthur Nikisch, 1889-'93; Emil Paur, 1893-'98; Dr. Karl Muck, 1906-'08, 1912-'18; Max Fiedler, 1908-'12; Henri Rabaud, 1918-'19; Pierre Monteux, 1919-'24; Serge Koussevitzky, 1924.

SEP

BOSTON ORCHESTRA HAS 50TH BIRTHDAY

Henschel, Symphony's First Leader, to Return for Anniversary Concerts.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is about to celebrate with features of importance and interest the fiftieth season of its existence. Sir George Henschel, who was the first conductor of the orchestra in 1881-84, will come from Europe for the first time in 47 years to open the season in Symphony Hall on October 10. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, resuming the conductorship on the following week, will begin his seventh season at its head.

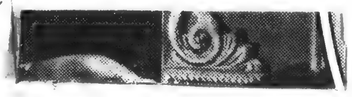
Other features will be a Bach Festival in Boston next March, and a number of scores written especially by the foremost living composers for this orchestra's anniversary year, which will be included through the course of the season. A special radio concert will be given on Saturday evening, October 4, as the orchestra's contribution to the tercentenary program of the Massachusetts Bay Colonies. Serge Koussevitzky will shortly return from Europe to lead this concert which will be broadcast over the entire nation.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra was the life dream of Henry L. Higginson—to give America a permanent orchestra, the finest that individual effort and expenditure could create. For 37 years this noted financier and patron of the arts devoted his best energies and the limit of his income to the orchestra.

George Henschel, having firmly established the orchestra, was followed as conductor by Wilhelm Gericke, who through 12 years drilled it into a fine flexibility of performance which made it one of the first in the world. Arthur Nikisch, the most illustrious conductor of his day, had a shorter term, as did Emil Paur and Max Fiedler. Dr. Karl Muck, from 1906, carried the orchestra, which was Major Higginson's, to its highest point of quality and fame.

In Major Higginson's seventy-ninth year, the orchestra's founder left it in the control of a board of trustees. Following the two French conductors, Henri Rabaud and Pierre Monteux, the gifted Russian, Serge Koussevitzky, began his term in 1924.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK TIMES
SEP 14 1930



THE Boston Symphony Orchestra opens in Symphony Hall, Boston, on Oct. 10-11, its fiftieth season. Sir George Henschel, this orchestra's first conductor, will visit America for the first time since he led the orchestra's first three seasons, 1881-1884. He will lead the opening concerts in Boston on Oct. 10-11 and remain to attend the second pair of concerts, as a listener, when Serge Koussevitzky takes the baton.

Another feature of the anniversary will be the Bach Festival to be given in Boston next March. A number of prominent living composers have written new scores for this orchestra's anniversary year, and these will have their first performance in the course of the season. A special radio concert will be given on Saturday, Oct. 4, as the orchestra's contribution to the tercentenary program of the Massachusetts Bay Colonies. Mr. Koussevitzky will shortly return from Europe to lead this concert. It will be broadcast by the National Broadcasting Company over a nation-wide hook-up.

The usual five pairs of concerts will be given in Carnegie Hall on Nov. 20-22, Jan. 8-10, Feb. 6-7 and April 9-11. The orchestra's schedule will also include, as usual, five concerts in the Academy of Music, Brooklyn, and five series of concerts in greater Boston. For these, as well as for the New York concerts, all seats are subscribed in advance.

The list of Boston Symphony conductors is as follows:

George Henschel	1881-1884
Wilhelm Gericke	1884-1889
Arthur Nikisch	1889-1893
Emil Paur	1893-1898
Wilhelm Gericke	1898-1906
Karl Muck	1906-1908
Max Fiedler	1908-1912
Karl Muck	1912-1918
Henri Rabaud	1918-1919
Pierre Monteux	1919-1924
Serge Koussevitzky	1924-

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's fiftieth year is therefore Serge Koussevitzky's seventh as its leader.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
SEP 14 [illegible]

BOSTON SYMPHONY'S ANNIVERSARY SEASON

The Boston Symphony's 50th anniversary season is announced to open in Symphony Hall on Oct. 10, with Sir George Henschel, the orchestra's first conductor, in the stand. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, resuming the conductorship the following week, will begin his seventh season at its head.

Other features will be a Bach festival in Boston next March, and a number of scores written especially by the foremost living composers for this orchestra's anniversary year, which will be included through the course of the season. A special radio concert will be given on Saturday evening, Oct. 4, as the orchestra's contribution to the tercentenary program of the Massachusetts Bay Colony. Serge Koussevitzky will shortly return from Europe to lead this concert, which will be broadcast over the entire nation.

Sir George Henschel's pending trip to America will be his first since his conductorship of 47 years ago. He will come to an orchestra almost doubled in number which has meanwhile acquired a long standing reputation of the very highest in the world of musical performance.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra was the life dream of Henry L. Higginson—to give America a permanent orchestra, the very finest that individual effort and expenditure could create. For 37 years this noted financier and patron of the arts devoted his best energies and the limit of his income to perfecting his orchestra. He obtained the most skillful musicians of the time and the greatest living conductors to shape them into an ensemble of ideal beauty.

Concerts

Most important items of interest to the music world during the past week is the announcement that Sir George Henschel will return to the United States after an absence of 46 years.

Sir George was the first conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which he led from 1881 to 1884. His visit to this country will be something of an event, since he is coming over for the purpose of leading the orchestra which he first helped to incorporate. The first of this season's concerts by the Boston Symphony, to be held October 11 and 12, will thus see Sir George again at the helm.

Serge Koussevitzky, beginning his seventh season with the orchestra, will take charge the following week.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PAWTUCKET, R. I.
TIMES
SEP 15 1930

Boston Symphony to Celebrate Its Fiftieth Season—

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is about to celebrate with features of importance and interest the 50th season of its existence. Sir George Henschel, who was the first conductor of the orchestra in 1881-84, will come from Europe to open the season in Symphony Hall, Boston, on Oct. 10. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, resuming the conductorship on the following week, will begin his seventh season at its head.

Other features will be a Bach Festival in Boston next March, and a number of scores written especially by the foremost living composers for this orchestra's anniversary year, which will be included through the course of the season. A special radio programme will be given on Saturday evening, Oct. 4, as the orchestra's contribution to the tercentenary programme of the Massachusetts Bay Colony. Serge Koussevitzky will shortly return from Europe to lead this concert, which will be broadcast over the entire nation.

Sir George Henschel's pending trip to America will be his first since his conductorship of 7 years ago. He will come to an orchestra almost doubled in number, which has meanwhile acquired a long-standing reputation of the very highest in the world of musical performance.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra was the life dream of Henry L. Higginson—to give America a permanent orchestra, the very finest that individual effort and expenditure could create. For 37 years this noted financier and patron of the arts devoted his best energies and the limit of his income to perfecting his orchestra. He obtained the most skillful musicians of the time, and the greatest living conductors to shape them into an ensemble of ideal beauty.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
PAWTUCKET, R. I.
TIMES
SEP 15 1930

o join the scouting fleet.

Boston Symphony to Celebrate Its Fiftieth Season

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is about to celebrate with features of importance and interest the 50th season of its existence. Sir George Henschel, who was the first conductor of the orchestra in 1881-84, will come from Europe to open the season in Symphony Hall, Boston, on Oct. 10. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, resuming the conductorship on the following week, will begin his seventh season at its head.

Other features will be a Bach Festival in Boston next March, and a number of scores written especially by the foremost living composers for this orchestra's anniversary year, which will be included through the course of the season. A special radio programme will be given on Saturday evening, Oct. 4, as the orchestra's contribution to the tercentenary programme of the Massachusetts Bay Colony. Serge Koussevitzky will shortly return from Europe to lead this concert, which will be broadcast over the entire nation.

Sir George Henschel's pending trip to America will be his first since his conductorship of 7 years ago. He will come to an orchestra almost doubled in number, which has meanwhile acquired a long-standing reputation of the very highest in the world of musical performance.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra was the life dream of Henry L. Higginson—to give America a permanent orchestra, the very finest that individual effort and expenditure could create. For 37 years this noted financier and patron of the arts devoted his best energies and the limit of his income to perfecting his orchestra. He obtained the most skillful musicians of the time, and the greatest living conductors to shape them into an ensemble of ideal beauty.

THIS CLIPPING FROM TORONTO, CANADA
MAIL & EMPIRE
SEP 15 [illegible]

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, internationally recognized as one of America's greatest musical organizations, will offer its first concert planned exclusively for radio listeners, Saturday night, Oct. 4, the National Broadcasting Company announced. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the orchestra, will present a program especially constructed for the unseen audience. The radio concert antedates the regular symphony season in Boston by one week and rehearsals will be called in the immediate future to prepare the musicians for the microphone.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
NEWS & HERALD
NEWBURYPORT, MASS.
SEP 15 1930

We read with pleasure that a concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra is to be broadcast over a nation-wide hook-up on the evening of Saturday, Oct. 15. This special concert is being given in connection with Boston's tercentenary program. This will be the first time that the Boston orchestra has ever been broadcast on a nation-wide hook-up, although its concerts were put on the air from a Boston station several years ago. One of the features of this concert will be the presence of Carl Haenshel, its first director, who conducted the orchestra during the first years of its establishment, in the 80's. He will wield the baton at this first concert.

The history of the Boston orchestra, beginning with accounts of its predecessors, and telling of conditions which attended its establishment, is a most interesting story. It is contained in the life of Henry Lee Higginson, famous sponsor of the orchestra, which is on the shelves of our public library. In this beautifully written book there is a complete story of how the orchestra came into being and the successes of the various directors are summarized.

One of its famous conductors, who directed the orchestra for two separate periods of years, was Dr. Muck of Germany, a notable musician of all times. His career in Boston came to an unfortunate climax however, when he was accused of being in league with the German espionage system in a move to injure American property and institutions. Some difference of opinion was always expressed as to the extent of Dr. Muck's implication in the alleged "plots," but the American Secret Service made direct charges. Some musical enthusiasts resented what they considered an "insult" to the foreign conductor, but most of the people, fired by patriotic fervor, which was at a high pitch at the time, were up-in-arms over the matter and decided that they never wanted to hear any more German music. It was charged that Dr. Muck refused to have his orchestra play the national anthem during the war period, and such a gesture, during the period of war hysteria, was regarded as inexcusable and little short of atrocious. Probably the German musician was drawn into his actions against his will, for he was too sincere an artist to bother with such trivial matters as international intrigue.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE BANGOR, ME.
COMMERCIAL
SEP 3 - 1930

NATURAL REACTION

Dr. Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, has returned from a visit to Europe and expresses himself as somewhat concerned by conditions found. Himself a Russian, who is without sympathy for bolshevism, Dr. Koussevitzky sees a great danger to Europe because of soviet propaganda for a world revolution through economic means and visions industrial ruin for some of the countries.

Speaking of causes of the present worldwide business depression and urging the Empire delegates to do something to alleviate the situation, he said, "There are people in Canada, Australia, New Zealand and South Africa who are suffering today and who are building up their hopes that something will emerge from this conference.

He said economic experts, bankers and business men have declared that overproduction is the cause of all the trouble. "We are forced," he added, "to say that people are hungry because there is too much wheat in the world; that people are going

THIS CLIPPING FROM
New York Telegram
SEP 19

N. Y. U. ESTABLISHES CONDUCTING CLASS

Orchestra of Professionals To Be Students' "Laboratory."

Possibly with an eye to making the path to the glory that is Arturo Toscanini easier for local aspirants, New York University has established a class in conducting to begin on Saturday, September 27. The work will be under the supervision of Philip James, composer and formerly director of the New Jersey Symphony Orchestra and the Brooklyn Orchestral Society. The "laboratory" will be an orchestra of professional players.

Sir George Henschel, who led the Boston Symphony Orchestra for its first three seasons in 1881-84, will return to America to conduct the first two concerts of that orchestra's fiftieth season on October 10 and 11 at Symphony Hall, Boston. He will remain there for the second pair of concerts as a listener, while Serge Koussevitzky takes up the baton. Mr. Koussevitzky, who is now in Europe, will return in time to contribute a radio concert with his orchestra to the Tercentenary program of the Massachusetts Bay Colonies on October 4.

The Boston Symphony which Sir George led in 1881 was the life dream of Major Henry L. Higginson—to give America a permanent orchestra. To it he dedicated thirty-seven years of his life, sparing neither pains nor money to acquire the best

THIS CLIPPING FROM LAWRENCE, MASS.
TRIBUNE

Boston Symphony's First Conductor to Lead 50th Anniversary Concert.

The Boston Symphony orchestra opens in Symphony hall, Boston, on Oct. 10 and 11, its 50th season. Sir George Henschel, this orchestra's first conductor, will visit America for the first time since he led the orchestra's first three esasons, 1881,-1884. He will lead the opening concerts in Boston on Oct. 10-11 and remain to attend the second pair of concerts as a listener, when Serge Koussevitzky takes the baton.

Another feature of the anniversary will be the Bach festival to be given in Boston next March. A number of prominent living composers have written new scores for this orchestra's anniversary year, and these will have their first performance in the course of the season. A special radio concert will be given on Saturday, Oct. 4, as the orchestra's contribution to the tencentenary program of the Massachusetts Bay Colonies. Mr. Koussevitzky will shortly return from Europe to lead this concert. It will be broadcast by the National Broadcasting company over a nation-wide hookup.

The usual New York concerts will be given in Carnegie hall on Nov. 20-22, Jan. 8-10, Feb. 6-7 and April 9-11. The orchestra's schedule will also include, as usual, five concerts in the Academy of Music, Brooklyn, and five series of concerts in Greater Boston. For these, as well as for the New York concerts, all seats are subscribed in advance.

The list of Boston Symphony conductors is as follows:

George Henschel	1881-1884
Wilhelm Gericke	1884-1889
Arthur Nikisch	1889-1893
Emil Paur	1893-1898
Wilhelm Gericke	1898-1906
Karl Muck	1906-1908
Max Fiedler	1908-1912
Karl Muck	1912-1918
Henri Rabaud	1918-1919
Pierre Monteux	1919-1924
Serge Koussevitzky	1924-

The Boston Symphony orchestra's 50th year is therefore Serge Kousse-

THIS CLIPPING FROM PHILADELPHIA, PA.
NEWS

BOSTON ORCHESTRA MAY TOUR EUROPE

BOSTON.—Boston Symphony Orchestra may make a tour of Europe if Serge Koussevitzky is able to carry out his plan. Koussevitzky is eager to show the people of Paris a properly rehearsed orchestra. Raising of funds is Serge's chief worry.

THIS CLIPPING FROM CHICAGO, ILL.
HERALD EXAMINER
SEP 21 1930

50 YEARS OF SYMPHONY

The Boston Symphony is to celebrate its fiftieth anniversary with a season long program that begins with a special overture in the form of a radio concert on October 4, the latter a part of the Tercentenary program of the Massachusetts Bay colony. Serge Kousevitzky will return shortly to conduct this concert, which will be broadcast over one of the national chains.

The Boston Symphony, happily, is able to recall for the opening concert of its regular season the celebrated musician who officiated as its first conductor. Sir George Henschel was imported by the late Henry L. Higginson to establish the orchestra now grown so famous. He served three years. Then Mr. Higginson imported in turn, Wilhelm Gericke, Arthur Nikisch, Emil Pauer, Max Fiedler and Dr. Karl Muck.

In his seventy-ninth year Mr. Higginson left the affairs of the orchestra which he founded to a board of trustees. They faithfully carried out his policy of importing all conductors, most of the players and soloists.

Foreign Conductors

The Boston Symphony can boast that it never has been conducted by an American in its regular concerts. It can also boast that relatively few Americans have been represented in its concerts, either as composers or as soloists.

In this respect the Boston Symphony and indeed the majority of American orchestras differ markedly from European symphonic bodies. A great German orchestra that had to sustain itself as a foreign body is quite unthinkable.

The Boston Symhpony, however, deems itself successful because of the brilliant quality of the performances. If it has not made Boston musical in a productive sense, at least it has proved that community appreciative of fine music if safely marked by some well known European label.

For the forthcoming half-century anniversary season a number of works are being especially written. How many of them will be by Americans, or even by Bostonians?

Musical Patriotism

A Chicagoan may be permitted to ask these questions. The Chicago symphony Orchestra, under the leadership of Frederick Stock, has manifested as much musical patriotism as the community, interpreted by the trustees of the Orchestral Association, would permit. It has represented all American composers who could measure up to the best symphonic standards.

There have been enough to prove the point. It has fostered native executive talent. It is nearly 100 per cent native American in its membership. Furthermore, it is just as fine an orchestra as the one Mr. Kousevitzky conducts in Boston, or the one Mr. Toscanini conducts in New

THIS CLIPPING FROM KANSAS CITY, MO.
POST
SEP 21

BOSTON ORCHESTRA WILL CELEBRATE

On October 10 and 11 the Boston Symphony orchestra will open its fiftieth season. Sir George Henschel, the orchestra's first conductor, will visit America for the first time since he led the organization's first three seasons, 1881-1884. He will conduct the opening concerts and remain to attend the second pair of concerts, as a listener, when Kousevitzky will take the baton.

Another feature of the anniversary celebration will be a Bach festival in March. A number of the foremost living composers have written new scores for this orchestra's anniversary year, and these will be performed in the course of the season.

This orchestra was the life dream of Maj. Henry L. Higginson, who, for thirty-seven years, devoted his energies and most of his income in building one of the finest orchestras that individual effort and expenditure could achieve.

The years of Artur Nikisch and those of Karl Much made history and carried this orchestra to its highest point of fame.

Besides Henschel, Nikisch and Much the list of conductors includes the names of Wilhelm Gericke, Emil Pauer, Max Fiedler, Henry Rabaud and Pierre Monteux. Serge Koussevitzky has been the regular conductor of this orchestra since 1924.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
HERALD TRIBUNE
SEP 21

Henschel's Return

Music Editor, New York Herald Tribune:

It would appear that the statement, on page 7, of today's issue, that the coming visit to this country of Sir George Henschel will be his "first since his conductorship from 1881 to 1884" is based upon incorrect information.

Some time in the nineties, Mr. and Mrs. Henschel charmed American audiences by their joint song recitals. I can see him, now, in my mind's eye, seated at the piano, pedaling with his left foot, so that he might face his audience as he sang, and at the same time, played his own and his wife's accompaniments, as well as those of their duets.

Very truly yours,
G. W. NEEDHAM.
Leonia, N. J., September 14, 1930.

Mr. Needham is correct in noting inaccuracy in the statement (based on a notice from the Boston Symphony office) which he cites from last Sunday's music page. The late Henry E. Krehbiel's scrapbooks of clippings from The New York Tribune include reviews of song recitals given here by the Henschels at Chickering Hall on March 14, 1889; March 19, 1892; March 30, 1896, and December 2, 1897. On April 24 and 25, 1896, Henschel conducted the Oratorio Society in his setting of the Stabat Mater, with his wife as soprano soloist.
F. D. P.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
POST
SEP 21 19

AMONG MUSICIANS

By ELISABETH E. POE.

WASHINGTON struggling to support its own National Symphony Orchestra sends congratulations to Boston celebrating the fiftieth anniversary of its far-famed Boston Symphony Orchestra. The difference is that the people of Boston really appreciate and support good music, in the National Capital it must take its chance with other less elevating forms of entertainment.

A notable feature of the Boston anniversary celebration is that Sur George Henschel, this orchestra's first conductor, will visit America for the first time since he led this veteran organization in its first three concerts in 1881-1884 to wield the baton at the opening concert of the orchestra on October 11 in Symphony Hall, Boston. Another feature of the celebration will be the Bach festival in March. Leading composers from all parts of the world have written new music in honor of the orchestra's anniversary and many of the special programs will be given nation-wide radio broadcasts.

October will see a resumption of practically all musical programs in the Capital, although the concerts with out-of-town artists and stars will not begin until early in November. The local impresarios, headed by Mrs. Wilson-Greene, have prepared impressive programs for the season and it promises to be a brilliant one in every respect.

West

THIS CLIPPING FROM SALT LAKE CITY, UTAH
TRIBUNE
SEP 1930

BOSTON SYMPHONY HALF CENTURY OLD

The Boston Symphony orchestra will open in Symphony Hall, Boston, October 10 and 11, its fiftieth season. Sir George Henschel, this orchestra's first conductor, will visit America for the first time since he led the orchestra's first three seasons, 1881-1884. He will lead the opening concerts in Boston and remain to attend the second pair of concerts as a listener, when Serge Koussevitzky first takes the baton.

Another feature of the anniversary season will be a Bach festival in Boston next March. A number of the foremost living composers have written new scores for this orchestra's anniversary year, and these will have their first performances in the course of the season.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
ROCHESTER, N. Y.
TIMES UNION
SEP 2 1930

Boston Symphony Begins Fiftieth Season Oct. 10

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra will begin its fiftieth season in Symphony Hall, Boston, on Oct. 10. The orchestra's first conductor, Sir George Henschel, who will lead the opening pair of concerts, has not been in America since he presided over the orchestra during its first three seasons—1881-1884. A feature of the anniversary celebration will be a Bach Festival, which will be given next March. The Boston band has had nine conductors in the course of its distinguished career—George Henschel, Wilhelm Gericke, Arthur Nikisch, Emil Paur, Karl Muck, Max Fiedler, Henri Rabaud, Pierre Monteux and Serge Koussevitzky. Gericke held the baton over two periods, 1884-1889 and 1898-1906, as did Muck, who presided from 1906 to 1908 and from 1912 to 1918.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SYRACUSE, N. Y.
HERALD

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, which is preparing to open its 50th season next month, will give its usual 10 concerts in Manhattan, at Carnegie Hall, and five concerts at the Brooklyn Academy of Music during the coming season. In Carnegie Hall there will be five evening concerts, four of them on Thursdays, Nov. 20, Jan. 8, Feb. 6 (Friday), March 5 and April 9, and five Saturday afternoon concerts, Nov. 22, Jan. 10, Feb. 7, March 7 and April 11. The Brooklyn concerts will be on Friday evenings, Nov. 21, Jan. 9, Feb. 5 (Thursday), March 6 and April 10.

As this season completes the first half century of the Boston Symphony's existence, special features are in preparation. Sir George Henschel, the orchestra's first conductor, will come to Boston to take part in the season's opening nel,

u.
:h st le

Henry L. Higginson, founder of the orchestra, by his conducting of his Concert Overture at a concert of the Harvard Musical Association.

THIS CLIPPING FROM BROOKLYN
STANDARD UNION

Fiftieth Jubilee

The programme with which Sir George Henschel inaugurated the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Oct. 22, 1881, will be repeated by him when this orchestra's first conductor opens its fiftieth anniversary season on Oct. 10 and 11. Sir George is now crossing the ocean from England to be the guest of honor in Boston.

The programme will include Beethoven's Overture, "Dedication of the House"; an air from Gluck's "Orpheus," Haydn's Symphony in B flat, ballet music from Schubert's "Rosamunde," scene from Bruch's "Odysseus," and the Prelude to Wagner's "Mastersinger." This programme differs from the orchestra's first only in

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK EVE. POST
SEP 27

THE program with which Sir George Henschel inaugurated the Boston Symphony Orchestra on October 22, 1881, will be repeated by him when this orchestra's first conductor opens its fiftieth anniversary season in Symphony Hall on October 10 and 11. Sir George is now crossing the ocean from England to be the guest of honor in Boston. The program will include Beethoven's Overture, "Dedication of the House"; an air from Gluck's "Orpheus," Haydn's Symphony in B flat (B. and H. No. 12); ballet music from Schubert's "Rosamunde," scene from Bruch's "Odysseus" and the prelude to Wagner's "Meistersinger." This program differs from the orchestra's first only in the closing overture, and the soloist, Miss Annie Louise Cary, now dead, will be replaced by Margaret Matzenauer.

Serge Koussevitzky will shortly arrive from Europe to conduct the first event of the anniversary season—a Boston Symphony concert to be given especially for the radio on Saturday evening, October 4. This concert is being presented by the orchestra as part of the tercentenary celebration in Massachusetts, and will appropriately open with three numbers by Massachusetts composers—Arthur Foote's Suite in E major, Edward Burlingame Hill's "Lilacs," and Charles Martin Loeffler's "A Pagan Poem." The program will also include Debussy's prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun" and Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel."

THIS CLIPPING FROM ALBANY, N. Y.
TIMES UNION
SEP

Group to Begin Its 50th Year

The Boston Symphony orchestra, internationally recognized as one of America's greatest musical organizations, will offer its first concert planned exclusively for radio listeners Saturday night.

Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the orchestra, will present a program especially constructed for the unseen audience. The ardio concert antedates the regular symphony season in Boston by one week.

The radio concert has been arranged as the orchestra's contribution to the tercentenary program of the Massachusetts Bay Colony. It also inaugurates the fiftieth season of the Boston Symphony. The concert will go on the air at 7:30 p. m. Saturday and will be heard through the NBS-WEAF network, including WGY.

Microphones have picked up concerts by the Boston Symphony during the regular season, but the concert in October is the first one to be arranged for radio listeners exclusively.

110 MUSICIANS.

The stage of Symphony hall in Boston will be used as the radio stu\o fnor the program. Engineers have begun tests of the acoutics of the hall, and Dr. Koussevitz(ky will work with them during the final tests and rehearsals.

The symphony includes 100 musicians, and is one of the the largest musical groups in the country.

The Boston Symphon ywas organized fifty years ago under the patronage of Major Henry L. Higginson, noted financier and music lover. The orchestra when grst organized included fifty musicians and was directed by George Henschel. Under Henschel's baton the symphony established an international reputation. His successors on the stand were William Gericke, Arthur Nikisch, Emil Paur, Max Fiedler, Dr. Karl Muck, Henry Dabaud and Pierre Monteux. In 1924 Dr. Koussevitzky became the conductor and has directed the orchestra ever season since.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE
SEP 28 1930

During the coming season, both in its native city and in New York, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will celebrate the fiftieth anniversary of its foundation. The opening concert of the Boston season, which will take place on Oct. 10, will be conducted by Sir George Henschel, under whose direction, half a century ago, the orchestra made its debut, and the program will be a replica of that with which the Boston Symphony was ushered into existence, including Beethoven's Overture, "Dedication of the House"; an air from Gluck's "Orpheus," Haydn's B-Flat Symphony (B. & H. 12), the ballet music from Schubert's "Rosamunde," a scene from Bruch's "Odysseus" and the prelude to "Die Meistersinger." The soloist will be Mme. Margaret Matzenauer.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra was the life dream of Henry L. Higginson—to give America a permanent orchestra, the very finest that individual effort and expenditure could create. For 37 years this noted financier and patron of the arts devoted his best energies and the limit of his income to perfecting his orchestra. He obtained the most skillful musicians of the time, and the greatest living conductors to shape them into an ensemble of ideal beauty.

George Henschel, having firmly established the orchestra, was followed by Wilhelm Gericke, who through 12 years drilled it into a subtlety of performance which made it one of the first in the world. Arthur Nikisch, the most illustrious conductor of his day, had a shorter term, as did also Emil Paur and Max Fiedler. Dr. Karl Muck, from 1906, carried the orchestra, which was Major Higginson's, to its highest point of perfection and fame. Serge Koussevitzky became conductor in 1924.

It cannot be too strongly emphasized

THIS CLIPPING FROM
New York Telegram
SEP 19

N. Y. U. ESTABLISHES CONDUCTING CLASS

Orchestra of Professionals To Be Students' "Laboratory."

Possibly with an eye to making the path to the glory that is Arturo Toscanini easier for local aspirants, New York University has established a class in conducting to begin on Saturday, September 27. The work will be under the supervision of Philip James, composer and formerly director of the New Jersey Symphony Orchestra and the Brooklyn Orchestral Society. The "laboratory" will be an orchestra of professional players.

Sir George Henschel, who led the Boston Symphony Orchestra for its first three seasons in 1881-84, will return to America to conduct the first two concerts of that orchestra's fiftieth season on October 10 and 11 at Symphony Hall, Boston. He will remain there for the second pair of concerts as a listener, while Serge Koussevitzky takes up the baton. Mr. Koussevitzky, who is now in Europe, will return in time to contribute a radio concert with his orchestra to the Tercentenary program of the Massachusetts Bay Colonies on October 4.

The Boston Symphony which Sir George led in 1881 was the life dream of Major Henry L. Higginson—to give America a permanent orchestra. To it he dedicated thirty-seven years of his life, sparing neither pains nor money to acquire the best musicians and the greatest conductors which the world offered. Now that the orchestra passes its fiftieth milestone it can look back on a conductorial dynasty including Henschel, Wilhelm Gericke, Arthur Nikisch, Emil Paur, Karl Muck, Max Fiedler, Henri Rabaud, Pierre Monteux and the present Serge Koussevitzky.

L. L. B.

THIS CLIPPING FROM CHICAGO, ILL.
HERALD EXAMINER
SEP 21 1930

50 YEARS OF SYMPHONY

The Boston Symphony is to celebrate its fiftieth anniversary with a season long program that begins with a special overture in the form of a radio concert on October 4, the latter a part of the Tercentenary program of the Massachusetts Bay colony. Serge Kousevitzky will return shortly to conduct this concert, which will be broadcast over one of the national chains.

The Boston Symphony, happily, is able to recall for the opening concert of its regular season the celebrated musician who officiated as its first conductor. Sir George Henschel was imported by the late Henry L. Higginson to establish the orchestra now grown so famous. He served three years. Then Mr. Higginson imported in turn, Wilhelm Gericke, Arthur Nikisch, Emil Pauer, Max Fiedler and Dr. Karl Muck.

In his seventy-ninth year Mr. Higginson left the affairs of the orchestra which he founded to a board of trustees. They faithfully carried out his policy of importing all conductors, most of the players and soloists.

Foreign Conductors

The Boston Symphony can boast that it never has been conducted by an American in its regular concerts. It can also boast that relatively few Americans have been represented in its concerts, either as composers or as soloists.

In this respect the Boston Symphony and indeed the majority of American orchestras differ markedly from European symphonic bodies. A great German orchestra that had to sustain itself as a foreign body is quite unthinkable.

The Boston Symhpony, however, deems itself successful because of the brilliant quality of the performances. If it has not made Boston musical in a productive sense, at least it has proved that community appreciative of fine music if safely marked by some well known European label.

For the forthcoming half-century anniversary season a number of works are being especially written. How many of them will be by Americans, or even by Bostonians?

Musical Patriotism

A Chicagoan may be permitted to ask these questions. The Chicago symphony Orchestra, under the leadership of Frederick Stock, has manifested as much musical patriotism as the community, interpreted by the trustees of the Orchestral Association, would permit. It has reprsented all American composers who could measure up to the best symphonic standards.

There have been enough to prove the point. It has fostered native executive talent. It is nearly 100 per cent native American in its membership. Furthermore, it is just as fine an orchestra as the one Mr. Kousevitzky conducts in Boston, or the one Mr. Toscanini conducts in New York.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
HERALD TRIBUNE
SEP 21

Henschel's Return

Music Editor, New York Herald Tribune:

It would appear that the statement, on page 7, of today's issue, that the coming visit to this country of Sir George Henschel will be his "first since his conductorship from 1881 to 1884" is based upon incorrect information.

Some time in the nineties, Mr. and Mrs. Henschel charmed American audiences by their joint song recitals. I can see him, now, in my mind's eye, seated at the piano, pedaling with his left foot, so that he might face his audience as he sang, and at the same time, played his own and his wife's accompaniments, as well as those of their duets.

Very truly yours,
G. W. NEEDHAM.
Leonia, N. J., September 14, 1930.

Mr. Needham is correct in noting inaccuracy in the statement (based on a notice from the Boston Symphony office) which he cites from last Sunday's music page. The late Henry E. Krehbiel's scrapbooks of clippings from The New York Tribune include reviews of song recitals given here by the Henschels at Chickering Hall on March 14, 1889; March 19, 1892; March 30, 1896, and December 2, 1897. On April 24 and 25, 1896, Henschel conducted the Oratorio Society in his setting of the Stabat Mater, with his wife as soprano soloist.

F. D. P.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
POST
SEP 21

World

By ELISABETH E. POE.

WASHINGTON struggling to support its own National Symphony Orchestra sends congratulations to Boston celebrating the fiftieth anniversary of its far-famed Boston Symphony Orchestra. The difference is that the people of Boston really appreciate and support good music, in the National Capital it must take its chance with other less elevating forms of entertainment.

A notable feature of the Boston anniversary celebration is that Sir George Henschel, this orchestra's first conductor, will visit America for the first time since he led this veteran organization in its first three concerts in 1881-1884 to wield the baton at the opening concert of the orchestra on October 11 in Symphony Hall, Boston. Another feature of the celebration will be the Bach festival in March. Leading composers from all parts of the world have written new music in honor of the orchestra's anniversary and many of the special programs will be given nation-wide radio broadcasts.

October will see a resumption of practically all musical programs in the Capital, although the concerts with out-of-town artists and stars will not begin until early in November. The local impresarios, headed by Mrs. Wilson-Greene, have prepared impressive programs for the season and it promises to be a brilliant one in every respect.

West

THIS CLIPPING FROM
ROCHESTER, N. Y.
TIMES UNION
SEP 2 4 1930

Boston Symphony Begins Fiftieth Season Oct. 10

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra will begin its fiftieth season in Symphony Hall, Boston, on Oct. 10. The orchestra's first conductor, Sir George Henschel, who will lead the opening pair of concerts, has not been in America since he presided over the orchestra during its first three seasons—1881-1884. A feature of the anniversary celebration will be a Bach Festival, which will be given next March. The Boston band has had nine conductors in the course of its distinguished career—George Henschel, Wilhelm Gericke, Arthur Nikisch, Emil Paur, Karl Muck, Max Fiedler, Henri Rabaud, Pierre Monteux and Serge Koussevitzky. Gericke held the baton over two periods, 1884-1889 and 1898-1906, as did Muck, who presided from 1906 to 1908 and from 1912 to 1918.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SYRACUSE, N. Y.
HERALD

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, which is preparing to open its 50th season next month, will give its usual 10 concerts in Manhattan, at Carnegie Hall, and five concerts at the Brooklyn Academy of Music during the coming season. In Carnegie Hall there will be five evening concerts, four of them on Thursdays, Nov. 20, Jan. 8, Feb. 6 (Friday), March 5 and April 9, and five Saturday afternoon concerts, Nov. 22, Jan. 10, Feb. 7, March 7 and April 11. The Brooklyn concerts will be on Friday evenings, Nov. 21, Jan. 9, Feb. 5 (Thursday), March 6 and April 10.

As this season completes the first half century of the Boston Symphony's existence, special features are in preparation. Sir George Henschel, the orchestra's first conductor, will come to Boston to take part in the season's opening concerts at Symphony Hall, Oct. 10 and 11. Henschel, who was born in 1850 at Breslau, Germany, where Walter Damrosch was born 12 years later, was best known as a baritone in 1881, when he aroused the interest of the late Major Henry L. Higginson, founder of the orchestra, by his conducting of his Concert Overture at a concert of the Harvard Musical Association.

THIS CLIPPING FROM BROOKLYN
STANDARD UNION

Fiftieth Jubilee

The programme with which Sir George Henschel inaugurated the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Oct. 22, 1881, will be repeated by him when this orchestra's first conductor opens its fiftieth anniversary season on Oct. 10 and 11. Sir George is now crossing the ocean from England to be the guest of honor in Boston.

The programme will include Beethoven's Overture, "Dedication of the House"; an air from Gluck's "Orpheus," Haydn's Symphony in B flat, ballet music from Schubert's "Rosamunde," scene from Bruch's "Odysseus," and the Prelude to Wagner's "Mastersinger." This programme differs from the orchestra's first only in the closing overture, and the soloist, the late Miss Annie Louise Cary, will be replaced by Margaret Matzenauer.

THIS CLIPPING FROM ALBANY, N. Y.
TIMES UNION
SEP

Group to Begin Its 50th Year

The Boston Symphony orchestra, internationally recognized as one of America's greatest musical organizations, will offer its first concert planned exclusively for radio listeners Saturday night.

Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the orchestra, will present a program especially constructed for the unseen audience. The ardio concert antedates the regular symphony season in Boston by one week.

The radio concert has been arranged as the orchestra's contribution to the tercentenary program of the Massachusetts Bay Colony. It also inaugurates the fiftieth season of the Boston Symphony. The concert will go on the air at 7:30 p. m. Saturday and will be heard through the NBS-WEAF network, including WGY.

Microphones have picked up concerts by the Boston Symphony during the regular season, but the concert in October is the first one to be arranged for radio listeners exclusively.

110 MUSICIANS.

The stage of Symphony hall in Boston will be used as the radio studio fnor the program. Engineers have begun tests of the acoutics of the hall, and Dr. Koussevitzky will work with them during the final tests and rehearsals.

The symphony includes 100 musicians, and is one of the the largest musical groups in the country.

The Boston Symphon ywas organized fifty years ago under the patronage of Major Henry L. Higginson, noted financier and music lover. The orchestra when grst organized included fifty musicians and was directed by George Henschel. Under Henschel's baton the symphony established an international reputation. His successors on the stand were William Gericke, Arthur Nikisch, Emil Paur, Max Fiedler, Dr. Karl Muck, Henry Dabaud and Pierre Monteux. In 1924 Dr. Koussevitzky became the conductor and has directed the orchestra ever season since.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE
SEP 28 1930

During the coming season, both in its native city and in New York, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will celebrate the fiftieth anniversary of its foundation. The opening concert of the Boston season, which will take place on Oct. 10, will be conducted by Sir George Henschel, under whose direction, half a century ago, the orchestra made its debut, and the program will be a replica of that with which the Boston Symphony was ushered into existence, including Beethoven's Overture, "Dedication of the House"; an air from Gluck's "Orpheus," Haydn's B-Flat Symphony (B. & H. 12), the ballet music from Schubert's "Rosamunde," a scene from Bruch's "Odysseus" and the prelude to "Die Meistersinger." The soloist will be Mme. Margaret Matzenauer.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra was the life dream of Henry L. Higginson—to give America a permanent orchestra, the very finest that individual effort and expenditure could create. For 37 years this noted financier and patron of the arts devoted his best energies and the limit of his income to perfecting his orchestra. He obtained the most skillful musicians of the time, and the greatest living conductors to shape them into an ensemble of ideal beauty.

George Henschel, having firmly established the orchestra, was followed by Wilhelm Gericke, who through 12 years drilled it into a subtlety of performance which made it one of the first in the world. Arthur Nikisch, the most illustrious conductor of his day, had a shorter term, as did also Emil Paur and Max Fiedler. Dr. Karl Muck, from 1906, carried the orchestra, which was Major Higginson's, to its highest point of perfection and fame. Serge Koussevitzky became conductor in 1924.

first time —
first three esasons, 1881,-1884, —
lead the opening concerts in Boston on Oct. 10-11 and remain to attend the second pair of concerts as a listener, when Serge Koussevitzky takes the baton.

Another feature of the anniversary will be the Bach festival to be given in Boston next March. A number of prominent living composers have written new scores for this orchestra's anniversary year, and these will have their first performance in the course of the season. A special radio concert will be given on Saturday, Oct. 4, as the orchestra's contribution to the tencentenary program of the Massachusetts Bay Colonies. Mr. Koussevitzky will shortly return from Europe to lead this concert. It will be broadcast by the National Broadcasting company over a nation-wide hookup.

The usual New York concerts will be given in Carnegie hall on Nov. 20-22, Jan. 8-10, Feb. 6-7 and April 9-11. The orchestra's schedule will also include, as usual, five concerts in the Academy of Music, Brooklyn, and five series of concerts in Greater Boston. For these, as well as for the New York concerts, all seats are subscribed in advance.

The list of Boston Symphony conductors is as follows:

George Henschel	1881-1884
Wilhelm Gericke	1884-1889
Arthur Nikisch	1889-1893
Emil Paur	1893-1898
Wilhelm Gericke	1898-1906
Karl Muck	1906-1908
Max Fiedler	1908-1912
Karl Muck	1912-1918
Henri Rabaud	1918-1919
Pierre Monteux	1919-1924
Serge Koussevitzky	1924-

The Boston Symphony orchestra's 50th year is therefore Serge Koussevitzky's seventh at its leader.

it cannot be too strongly emphasized

THIS CLIPPING FROM KANSAS CITY, MO.
POST
SEP 21

BOSTON ORCHESTRA WILL CELEBRATE

On October 10 and 11 the Boston Symphony orchestra will open its fiftieth season. Sir George Henschel, the orchestra's first conductor, will visit America for the first time since he led the organization's first three seasons, 1881-1884. He will conduct the opening concerts and remain to attend the second pair of concerts, as a listener, when Kousevitzky will take the baton.

Another feature of the anniversary celebration will be a Bach festival in March. A number of the foremost living composers have written new scores for this orchestra's anniversary year, and these will be performed in the course of the season.

This orchestra was the life dream of Maj. Henry L. Higginson, who, for thirty-seven years, devoted his energies and most of his income in building one of the finest orchestras that individual effort and expenditure could achieve.

The years of Artur Nikisch and those of Karl Much made history and carried this orchestra to its highest point of fame.

Besides Henschel, Nikisch and Much the list of conductors includes the names of Wilhelm Gericke, Emil Pauer, Max Fiedler, Henry Rabaud and Pierre Monteux. Serge Koussevitzky has been the regular conductor of this orchestra since 1924.

MAY TOUR EUROPE

BOSTON.—Boston Symphony Orchestra may make a tour of Europe if Serge Koussevitzky is able to carry out his plan. Koussevitzky is eager to show the people of Paris a properly rehearsed orchestra. Raising of funds is Serge's chief worry.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SALT LAKE CITY, UTAH
TRIBUNE
30

BOSTON SYMPHONY HALF CENTURY OLD

The Boston Symphony orchestra will open in Symphony Hall, Boston, October 10 and 11, its fiftieth season. Sir George Henschel, this orchestra's first conductor, will visit America for the first time since he led the orchestra's first three seasons, 1881-1884. He will lead the opening concerts in Boston and remain to attend the second pair of concerts as a listener, when Serge Koussevitzky first takes the baton.

Another feature of the anniversary season will be a Bach festival in Boston next March. A number of the foremost living composers have written new scores for this orchestra's anniversary year, and these will have their first performances in the course of the season.

Hall on October 10 and 11. Sir George is now crossing the ocean from England to be the guest of honor in Boston. The program will include Beethoven's Overture, "Dedication of the House"; an air from Gluck's "Orpheus," Haydn's Symphony in B flat (B. and H. No. 12); ballet music from Schubert's "Rosamunde," scene from Bruch's "Odysseus" and the prelude to Wagner's "Meistersinger." This program differs from the orchestra's first only in the closing overture, and the soloist, Miss Annie Louise Cary, now dead, will be replaced by Margaret Matzenauer.

Serge Koussevitzky will shortly arrive from Europe to conduct the first event of the anniversary season—a Boston Symphony concert to be given especially for the radio on Saturday evening, October 4. This concert is being presented by the orchestra as part of the tercentenary celebration in Massachusetts, and will appropriately open with three numbers by Massachusetts composers—Arthur Foote's Suite in E major, Edward Burlingame Hill's "Lilacs," and Charles Martin Loeffler's "A Pagan Poem." The program will also include Debussy's prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun" and Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
New York Telegram
SEP 19

N. Y. U. ESTABLISHES CONDUCTING CLASS

Orchestra of Professionals To Be Students' "Laboratory."

Possibly with an eye to making the path to the glory that is Arturo Toscanini easier for local aspirants, New York University has established a class in conducting to begin on Saturday, September 27. The work will be under the supervision of Philip James, composer and formerly director of the New Jersey Symphony Orchestra and the Brooklyn Orchestral Society. The "laboratory" will be an orchestra of professional players.

Sir George Henschel, who led the Boston Symphony Orchestra for its first three seasons in 1881-84, will return to America to conduct the first two concerts of that orchestra's fiftieth season on October 10 and 11 at Symphony Hall, Boston. He will remain there for the second pair of concerts as a listener, while Serge Koussevitzky takes up the baton. Mr. Koussevitzky, who is now in Europe, will return in time to contribute a radio concert with his orchestra to the Tercentenary program of the Massachusetts Bay Colonies on October 4.

The Boston Symphony which Sir George led in 1881 was the life dream of Major Henry L. Higginson—to give America a permanent orchestra. To it he dedicated thirty-seven years of his life, sparing neither pains nor money to acquire the best musicians and the greatest conductors which the world offered. Now that the orchestra passes its fiftieth milestone it can look back on a conductorial dynasty including Henschel, Wilhelm Gericke, Arthur Nikisch, Emil Paur, Karl Muck, Max Fiedler, Henri Rabaud, Pierre Monteux and the present Serge Koussevitzky.

L. L. B.

THIS CLIPPING FROM CHICAGO, ILL.
HERALD EXAMINER
SEP 21 1930

50 YEARS OF SYMPHONY

The Boston Symphony is to celebrate its fiftieth anniversary with a season long program that begins with a special overture in the form of a radio concert on October 4, the latter a part of the Tercentenary program of the Massachusetts Bay colony. Serge Kousevitzky will return shortly to conduct this concert, which will be broadcast over one of the national chains.

The Boston Symphony, happily, is able to recall for the opening concert of its regular season the celebrated musician who officiated as its first conductor. Sir George Henschel was imported by the late Henry L. Higginson to establish the orchestra now grown so famous. He served three years. Then Mr. Higginson imported in turn, Wilhelm Gericke, Arthur Nikisch, Emil Pauer, Max Fiedler and Dr. Karl Muck.

In his seventy-ninth year Mr. Higginson left the affairs of the orchestra which he founded to a board of trustees. They faithfully carried out his policy of importing all conductors, most of the players and soloists.

Foreign Conductors

The Boston Symphony can boast that it never has been conducted by an American in its regular concerts. It can also boast that relatively few Americans have been represented in its concerts, either as composers or as soloists.

In this respect the Boston Symphony and indeed the majority of American orchestras differ markedly from European symphonic bodies. A great German orchestra that had to sustain itself as a foreign body is quite unthinkable.

The Boston Symhpony, however, deems itself successful because of the brilliant quality of the performances. If it has not made Boston musical in a productive sense, at least it has proved that community appreciative of fine music if safely marked by some well known European label.

For the forthcoming half-century anniversary season a number of works are being especially written. How many of them will be by Americans, or even by Bostonians?

Musical Patriotism

A Chicagoan may be permitted to ask these questions. The Chicago symphony Orchestra, under the leadership of Frederick Stock, has manifested as much musical patriotism as the community, interpreted by the trustees of the Orchestral Association, would permit. It has reprsented all American composers who could measure up to the best symphonic standards.

There have been enough to prove the point. It has fostered native executive talent. It is nearly 100 per cent native American in its membership. Furthermore, it is just as fine an orchestra as the one Mr. Kousevitzky conducts in Boston, or the one Mr. Toscanini conducts in New York, or the one that Mr. Stokowsky, Mr. Toscanini and Mr. Gabrilowitsch jointly lead in Philadelphia.

first time ...
first three esasons, 1881,-1884,
lead the opening concerts in Boston on Oct. 10-11 and remain to attend the second pair of concerts as a listener, when Serge Koussevitzky takes the baton.

Another feature of the anniversary will be the Bach festival to be given in Boston next March. A number of prominent living composers have written new scores for this orchestra's anniversary year, and these will have their first performance in the course of the season. A special radio concert will be given on Saturday, Oct. 4, as the orchestra's contribution to the tencentenary program of the Massachusetts Bay Colonies. Mr. Koussevitzky will shortly return from Europe to lead this concert. It will be broadcast by the National Broadcasting company over a nation-wide hookup.

The usual New York concerts will be given in Carnegie hall on Nov. 20-22, Jan. 8-10, Feb. 6-7 and April 9-11. The orchestra's schedule will also include, as usual, five concerts in the Academy of Music, Brooklyn, and five series of concerts in Greater Boston. For these, as well as for the New York concerts, all seats are subscribed in advance.

The list of Boston Symphony conductors is as follows:

George Henschel	1881-1884
Wilhelm Gericke	1884-1889
Arthur Nikisch	1889-1893
Emil Paur	1893-1898
Wilhelm Gericke	1898-1906
Karl Muck	1906-1908
Max Fiedler	1908-1912
Karl Muck	1912-1918
Henri Rabaud	1918-1919
Pierre Monteux	1919-1924
Serge Koussevitzky	1924-

The Boston Symphony orchestra's 50th year is therefore Serge Koussevitzky's seventh at its leader.

"I want to make it clear, because it cannot be too strongly emphasized

MAY TOUR EUROPE

BOSTON.—Boston Symphony Orchestra may make a tour of Europe if Serge Koussevitzky is able to carry out his plan. Koussevitzky is eager to show the people of Paris a properly rehearsed orchestra. Raising of funds is Serge's chief worry.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
HERALD TRIBUNE
SEP 21 1930

Henschel's Return

Music Editor, New York Herald Tribune:

It would appear that the statement, on page 7, of today's issue, that the coming visit to this country of Sir George Henschel will be his "first since his conductorship from 1881 to 1884" is based upon incorrect information.

Some time in the nineties, Mr. and Mrs. Henschel charmed American audiences by their joint song recitals. I can see him, now, in my mind's eye, seated at the piano, pedaling with his left foot, so that he might face his audience as he sang, and at the same time, played his own and his wife's accompaniments, as well as those of their duets.

Very truly yours,
G. W. NEEDHAM.
Leonia, N. J., September 14, 1930.

Mr. Needham is correct in noting inaccuracy in the statement (based on a notice from the Boston Symphony office) which he cites from last Sunday's music page. The late Henry E. Krehbiel's scrapbooks of clippings from The New York Tribune include reviews of song recitals given here by the Henschels at Chickering Hall on March 14, 1889; March 19, 1892; March 30, 1896, and December 2, 1897. On April 24 and 25, 1896, Henschel conducted the Oratorio Society in his setting of the Stabat Mater, with his wife as soprano soloist.

F. D. P.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
POST
SEP 21

World

By ELISABETH E. POE.

WASHINGTON struggling to support its own National Symphony Orchestra sends congratulations to Boston celebrating the fiftieth anniversary of its far-famed Boston Symphony Orchestra. The difference is that the people of Boston really appreciate and support good music, in the National Capital it must take its chance with other less elevating forms of entertainment.

A notable feature of the Boston anniversary celebration is that Sur George Henschel, this orchestra's first conductor, will visit America for the first time since he led this veteran organization in its first three concerts in 1881-1884 to wield the baton at the opening concert of the orchestra on October 11 in Symphony Hall, Boston. Another feature of the celebration will be the Bach festival in March. Leading composers from all parts of the world have written new music in honor of the orchestra's anniversary and many of the special programs will be given nation-wide radio broadcasts.

October will see a resumption of practically all musical programs in the Capital, although the concerts with out-of-town artists and stars will not begin until early in November. The local impresarios, headed by Mrs. Wilson-Greene, have prepared impressive programs for the season and it promises to be a brilliant one in every respect.

West

THIS CLIPPING FROM SALT LAKE CITY, UTAH
TRIBUNE
... 1930

BOSTON SYMPHONY HALF CENTURY OLD

The Boston Symphony orchestra will open in Symphony Hall, Boston, October 10 and 11, its fiftieth season. Sir George Henschel, this orchestra's first conductor, will visit America for the first time since he led the orchestra's first three seasons, 1881-1884. He will lead the opening concerts in Boston and remain to attend the second pair of concerts as a listener, when Serge Koussevitzky first takes the baton.

Another feature of the anniversary season will be a Bach festival in Boston next March. A number of the foremost living composers have written new scores for this orchestra's anniversary year, and these will have their first performances in the course of the season.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
ROCHESTER, N. Y.
TIMES UNION
SEP 2 1930

Boston Symphony Begins Fiftieth Season Oct. 10

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra will begin its fiftieth season in Symphony Hall, Boston, on Oct. 10. The orchestra's first conductor, Sir George Henschel, who will lead the opening pair of concerts, has not been in America since he presided over the orchestra during its first three seasons—1881-1884. A feature of the anniversary celebration will be a Bach Festival, which will be given next March. The Boston band has had nine conductors in the course of its distinguished career—George Henschel, Wilhelm Gericke, Arthur Nikisch, Emil Paur, Karl Muck, Max Fiedler, Henri Rabaud, Pierre Monteux and Serge Koussevitzky. Gericke held the baton over two periods, 1884-1889 and 1898-1906, as did Muck, who presided from 1906 to 1908 and from 1912 to 1918.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SYRACUSE, N. Y.
HERALD

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, which is preparing to open its 50th season next month, will give its usual 10 concerts in Manhattan, at Carnegie Hall, and five concerts at the Brooklyn Academy of Music during the coming season. In Carnegie Hall there will be five evening concerts, four of them on Thursdays, Nov. 20, Jan. 8, Feb. 6 (Friday), March 5 and April 9, and five Saturday afternoon concerts, Nov. 22, Jan. 10, Feb. 7, March 7 and April 11. The Brooklyn concerts will be on Friday evenings, Nov. 21, Jan. 9, Feb. 5 (Thursday), March 6 and April 10.

As this season completes the first half century of the Boston Symphony's existence, special features are in preparation. Sir George Henschel, the orchestra's first conductor, will come to Boston to take part in the season's opening concerts at Symphony Hall, Oct. 10 and 11. Henschel, who was born in 1850 at Breslau, Germany, where Walter Damrosch was born 12 years later, was best known as a baritone in 1881, when he aroused the interest of the late Major Henry L. Higginson, founder of the orchestra, by his conducting of his Concert Overture at a concert of the Harvard Musical Association.

THIS CLIPPING FROM BROOKLYN STANDARD UNION

Fiftieth Jubilee

The programme with which Sir George Henschel inaugurated the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Oct. 22, 1881, will be repeated by him when this orchestra's first conductor opens its fiftieth anniversary season on Oct. 10 and 11. Sir George is now crossing the ocean from England to be the guest of honor in Boston.

The programme will include Beethoven's Overture, "Dedication of the House"; an air from Gluck's "Orpheus," Haydn's Symphony in B flat, ballet music from Schubert's "Rosamunde," scene from Bruch's "Odysseus," and the Prelude to Wagner's "Mastersinger." This programme differs from the orchestra's first only in the closing overture, and the soloist, the late Miss Annie Louise Cary, will be replaced by Margaret Matzenauer.

Hall on October 10 and 11. Sir George is now crossing the ocean from England to be the guest of honor in Boston. The program will include Beethoven's Overture, "Dedication of the House"; an air from Gluck's "Orpheus," Haydn's Symphony in B flat (B. and H. No. 12); ballet music from Schubert's "Rosamunde," scene from Bruch's "Odysseus" and the prelude to Wagner's "Meistersinger." This program differs from the orchestra's first only in the closing overture, and the soloist, Miss Annie Louise Cary, now dead, will be replaced by Margaret Matzenauer.

Serge Koussevitzky will shortly arrive from Europe to conduct the first event of the anniversary season—a Boston Symphony concert to be given especially for the radio on Saturday evening, October 4. This concert is being presented by the orchestra as part of the tercentenary celebration in Massachusetts, and will appropriately open with three numbers by Massachusetts composers—Arthur Foote's Suite in E major, Edward Burlingame Hill's "Lilacs," and Charles Martin Loeffler's "A Pagan Poem." The program will also include Debussy's prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun" and Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel."

THIS CLIPPING FROM ALBANY, N. Y.
TIMES UNION
SEP ... 1930

Group to Begin Its 50th Year

The Boston Symphony orchestra, internationally recognized as one of America's greatest musical organizations, will offer its first concert planned exclusively for radio listeners Saturday night.

Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the orchestra, will present a program especially constructed for the unseen audience. The ardio concert antedates the regular symphony season in Boston by one week.

The radio concert has been arranged as the orchestra's contribution to the tercentenary program of the Massachusetts Bay Colony. It also inaugurates the fiftieth season of the Boston Symphony. The concert will go on the air at 7:30 p. m. Saturday and will be heard through the NBS-WEAF network, including WGY.

Microphones have picked up concerts by the Boston Symphony during the regular season, but the concert in October is the first one to be arranged for radio listeners exclusively.

110 MUSICIANS.

The stage of Symphony hall in Boston will be used as the radio studio for the program. Engineers have begun tests of the acoutics of the hall, and Dr. Koussevitzky will work with them during the final tests and rehearsals.

The symphony includes 100 musicians, and is one of the the largest musical groups in the country.

The Boston Symphon ywas organized fifty years ago under the patronage of Major Henry L. Higginson, noted financier and music lover. The orchestra when grst organized included fifty musicians and was directed by George Henschel. Under Henschel's baton the symphony established an international reputation. His successors on the stand were William Gericke, Arthur Nikisch, Emil Paur, Max Fiedler, Dr. Karl Muck, Henry Dabaud and Pierre Monteux. In 1924 Dr. Koussevitzky became the conductor and has directed the orchestra ever season since.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE
SEP 28 1930

During the coming season, both in its native city and in New York, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will celebrate the fiftieth anniversary of its foundation. The opening concert of the Boston season, which will take place on Oct. 10, will be conducted by Sir George Henschel, under whose direction, half a century ago, the orchestra made its debut, and the program will be a replica of that with which the Boston Symphony was ushered into existence, including Beethoven's Overture, "Dedication of the House"; an air from Gluck's "Orpheus," Haydn's B-Flat Symphony (B. & H. 12), the ballet music from Schubert's "Rosamunde," a scene from Bruch's "Odysseus" and the prelude to "Die Meistersinger." The soloist will be Mme. Margaret Matzenauer.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra was the life dream of Henry L. Higginson—to give America a permanent orchestra, the very finest that individual effort and expenditure could create. For 37 years this noted financier and patron of the arts devoted his best energies and the limit of his income to perfecting his orchestra. He obtained the most skillful musicians of the time, and the greatest living conductors to shape them into an ensemble of ideal beauty.

George Henschel, having firmly established the orchestra, was followed by Wilhelm Gericke, who through 12 years drilled it into a subtlety of performance which made it one of the first in the world. Arthur Nikisch, the most illustrious conductor of his day, had a shorter term, as did also Emil Paur and Max Fiedler. Dr. Karl Muck, from 1906, carried the orchestra, which was Major Higginson's, to its highest point of perfection and fame. Serge Koussevitzky became conductor in 1924.

THIS CLIPPING FROM PORTLAND, ORE.
OREGONIAN

SEP 28 1930

Boston Symphony Orchestra to Open Fiftieth Season.

Sir George Henschel Will Wield Baton in First Concerts.

BOSTON, Mass., Sept. 27.—Commencing its 50th season, the Boston Symphony orchestra, with Sir George Henschel as conductor, will appear in its first concert in Symphony hall October 10-11. Sir George was this orchestra's first conductor. He plans to lead the opening concerts in this city and will be a listener at the second pair of concerts, when the conductor will be Serge Koussevitzky, who is esteemed as one of the most inspiring conductors in America, of the younger school of orchestral wonder music workers.

A special feature of the present anniversary season will be a Bach festival in March, 1931, when a number of the foremost living composers will be among the list of those who will hear their music played under such distinguished auspices. A radio concert is scheduled October 4 as the contribution of the orchestra to the tercentenary program of the Massachusetts bay colonies.

Five pairs of concerts will be given in Carnegie hall November 20 and 22, January 8 and 10, February 6 and 7, March 5 and 7, and April 9 and 11. The orchestra's schedule will also include five concerts in the Academy of Music, Brooklyn, and five series of concerts in greater Boston.

No mention of the Boston Symphony orchestra would be complete did it not contain a mention of Major Henry L. Higginson of Boston, a capitalist and idealist who for 33 years gave money and all sorts of help to perfect this orchestra. He spared neither trouble nor financial resources to get the best musicians and the best conductors the world over.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
CITIZEN

SEP 28 1930

Fiftieth Season of The Boston Orchestra

The program with which Sir George Henschel inaugurated the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Oct. 22, 1881, will be repeated by him when this orchestra's first conductor opens its fiftieth anniversary season in Symphony Hall on Oct. 10 and 11. Sir George is now crossing the ocean from England to be the guest of honor in Boston. The program will include Beethoven's Overture, "Dedication of the House;" an air from Gluck's "Orpheuse;" Haydn's Symphony in B-flat (B. & H. No. 12); Ballet Music from Schubert's "Rosamunde;" Scene from Bruch's "Odysseus;" and the Prelude to Wagner's "Mastersingers of Nuremberg." This program differs from the orchestra's first only in the closing overture, and the soloist—Miss Annie Louise Cary, now dead, will be replaced by Margaret Matzenauer.

Serge Koussevitzky will shortly arrive from Europe to conduct the first event of the anniversary season—a Boston Symphony concert to be given especially for the radio on Saturday evening, Oct. 4. This concert is being presented by the orchestra as part of the Tercentenary celebration in Massachusetts, and will open with three numbers by Massachusetts composers—Arthur Foote's Suite in E major; Edward Burlingame Hill's "Lilacs;" and Charles Martin Loeffler's "A Pagan Poem." The program will also include Debussy's Prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun," and Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks."

THIS CLIPPING FROM NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
TIMES

SEP 30 1930

NOTABLES ARRIVE ON OCEAN LINERS

NEW YORK, Sept. 20. (INS)—The liners Ile De France, Olympic and New Amsterdam were to arrive today with 3000 passengers.

General Henri J. A. Gouraud, military governor of Paris and one-armed French war hero, is arriving to attend the American Legion convention in Boston. Two naval destroyers will escort the Ile De France, on which the general is a passenger, into New York harbor.

Paul Claudel, French ambassador to the United States, is also arriving today. Other arrivals are Serge Koussevitszky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and Dr. S. Parkes Cadman.

BOSTON POST
OCT. 1 1930
BOST

KOUSSEVITZKY BACK IN TOWN

Has Many New Works for Symphony's Jubilee Year

As the first bluebird heralds the spring so does the arrival of Dr. Koussevitzky presage the approach of a new musical season. At 5:55 yesterday afternoon the conductor of the Symphony Orchestra stepped off the "Knickerbocker" at the Back Bay station. The expansive smile, the sartorial splendor were again in evidence. Yesterday morning his favorite steamship, the Ile de France, brought Dr. Koussevitzky to New York. Upon reaching Boston he went immediately to the house in Brookline that was his home last year.

Next month the Symphony Orchestra enters upon its fiftieth season and Dr. Koussevitzky has persuaded several of the outstanding composers of the day, and others less known to fame, to compose works especially for this jubilee year. There will be symphonies from the hands of Stravinsky, Honegger, Roussell, Prokofiev and Hill and symphonies by Ferroud, Nabokov and Trebinsky. There will be symphonic poems by Ravel, Dukas, Sibelius, Hindemith, Carpenter and Lazar. There will be a piano concerta by Bax, symphonic ode by Copeland. And at the first concerts that Dr. Koussevitzky will conduct, those of Oct. 17 and 18, there will be performed an ode by Edward Burlingame Hill, the poem by Robert Hillyer. The Harvard Glee Club will be responsible for the choral portion.

Other features of what promises to be a banner year will be a radio concert next Saturday evening, the reappearance of Sir George Henschel, first conductor of the orchestra, as leader of the opening concerts, Oct. 10 and 11, a Beethoven Festival in Washington, D. C during the first week of December, and a Bach Festival in Symphony Hall next spring.

During the summer just past, Dr. Koussevitzky was in London, where he heard the New York Philharmonic Symphony under Toscanini, and at Bayreuth for the Wagner Festival. For 10 weeks he took his ease at Plombieres in the neighborhood of the Vosges Mountains where the abundant Roman remains had for him an especial interest.

MUSIC NOTES.

Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, arrived yesterday on the Ile de France. He was met by W. H. Brennan, manager of the Boston orchestra, and left immediately for his home in Boston.

Hand Oct 1 THI

BACH FESTIVAL SYMPHONY PLAN

Orchestra Will Give It as Tribute to the Late Maj. Higginson

KOUSSEVITZKY BACK FROM TRIP ABROAD

A great Bach festival to honor a great music lover and benefactor of Boston, the late Maj. Henry Lee Higginson, will be the tribute of the Boston Symphony orchestra to the memory of the man who conceived and made it possible. The festival will be a feature of the celebration of the 50th anniversary of the founding of the orchestra.

The announcement was made last night by Serge Koussevitzky at his Jamaica Plain home, on his return from four months in Europe.

Koussevitzky this season has been an onlooker, rather than a leader, in musical activities, and for the first time in many years foreswore the baton while on the continent, devoting himself to the study of new compositions, new composers, new artists and rest. That he benefited greatly and that Boston audiences this winter will reap the harvest of his summer, were evidenced in the renewed vigor and health which he has gained and the trunkfuls of manuscript and completed scores he has brought with him.

Sir Georg Henschl, now 80 years old and the first conductor of the orchestra, is crossing from Scotland to open the anniversary season. He will conduct the Symphony in his original opening program, played here in 1881, at the first concerts, Oct. 10 and 11.

For new artists will join the organization shortly, the first of whom is Prof. Victor Polatchak of Vienna, glowingly described by Koussevitzky as the greatest clarinetist in Europe, who will play first clarinet. Younger artists are Theo Grundy, trumpet; Panenka, bassoon, and George Pigasson, double bass.

Landing at New York from the Ile de France yesterday morning, Koussevitzky, accompanied by his wife and niece, Mlle. Olga Namoff, a charming young Russian, who is acting as his personal secretary, came directly to Boston where he was greeted by enthusiastic young musicians who nearly swept him off his feet in their excitement.

Oct 1
NING AMERICAN—La

[N OWN

SYMPHONY SET FOR JUBILEE FEASTS

Leader of Boston Orchestra Arrives in City, Gives Plans for Coming Season

By MOSES SMITH

The prospect of the most remarkable season in the history of the world-famous Boston Symphony Orchestra is forecast in plans released by Serge Koussevitzky, conductor for the last six years, who arrived in Boston last night, after having stepped off the Ile de France earlier in the day in New York.

Looking forward eagerly to the 50th season of the orchestra's existence, the conductor made it plain that this season is to be a bigger and better one. He has obtained from the world's foremost composers a number of scores written especially for the orchestra for this season, and dedicated to it. All will receive their first performance here at the regular subscription concerts, and will subsequently remain property of the orchestra.

MANY CONTRIBUTE

At the second pair of concerts, on October 17 and 18, an "Ode," music by Edward Burlingame Hill, words by Robert Hillyer, will be performed by the orchestra, the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society.

The present announcement tops off previous commitments from Symphony Hall on this epoch-making season. The opening pair of concerts on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, October 10 and 11, will be an almost exact duplicate of the original program of 50 years ago, with the same conductor, Sir George Henschel, on the stand. Sir George is coming to Boston from England especially for this occasion, and is expected here Sunday.

ON AIR SATURDAY

At the pre-opening of the season, on Saturday night of this week, when Mr. Koussevitzky will lead the orchestra in a program to be broadcast over the radio, both the conductor and Judge Frederick P. Cabot, president of the trustees, will address the great "air" audience. A huge hookup has been arranged for this concert, the first the Symphony Orchestra has ever given especially for radio performance.

BRINGS NEW MUSIC, TRIBUTE TO SYMPHONY

Colo Oct

Koussevitzky Has Fresh Works by Eminent Men

Orchestra Will Give Broad Program for Its 50th Anniversary Year

That Dr Serge Koussevitzky has brought to Boston with him a number of scores specially composed by eminent musicians of different countries of Europe to be produced by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, of which he is conductor, in this 50th anniversary year of the orchestra's existence, was revealed by him last evening on his arrival after a five months' vacation in Europe.

The famous conductor with Mrs Koussevitzky, his niece and private secretary, Mlle Olga Namoff, as well as a maid and valet, came over on the Isle de France and arrived in Boston at 5:55 last evening.

Mr Koussevitzky said, in his home at 50 Rockwood st, Jamaica Plain, last evening, that his orchestra will next Saturday on the radio give full symphony concerts lasting one hour, beginning at 10 a m and again at 6:45 p m. Judge Frederick P. Cabot, for the directors, and Dr Koussevitzky will deliver short radio addresses following the concerts.

The Russian leader brought in his trunk a number of manuscript scores. The following new pieces will thus have their first performance: Hill, "Ode," for orchestra and chorus (to be performed Oct 17-18) to a poem of Robert Hillyer, written for the orchestra; Stravinsky, "Symphonie de Psaumes"; Roussel, "Symphony in G"; Dukas and Ravel, symphonic poems; Honegger, "Symphony"; Prokofieff, "Symphony"; Hindemith "Symphonic Poem"; Cibelius, "Symphonic Poem"; Bax, "Concerto for Piano and Orchestra"; Copland, "Symphonic Ode"; Carpenter, "Symphonic Poem."

There will also be compositions by two young Russians now living in Paris, Nabokoff and Trebinsky.

Another feature of this anniversary year, the conductor said, will be a Bach festival of five successive nights in March next, beginning on a Sunday, commemorative of Maj Henry L. Higginson, who founded the orchestra in 1881.

Rehearsals begin next Friday. The first concert is Oct 10.

Dr Koussevitzky engaged in Europe for his orchestra this season Victor Polatschek of Vienna, said to be the finest clarinet artist in Europe; Theo Grundey, an extraordinary player on the trumpet; Georges Pigasson, bass clarinetist, and a bassoon player named Panenka.

THIS CLIPPING FROM WEBSTER, MASS.
EVE. TIMES

OCT 1 - 1930

Koussevitzky is Back

BOSTON, Oct. 1 (UP)—Dr. Koussevitzky, director of the Boston Symphony orchestra, arrived here yesterday from Europe. The orchestra begins its 50th year next month.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK TIMES

OCT 1 - 1930

MUSIC NOTES.

Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, arrived yesterday on the Ile de France. He was met by W. H. Brennan, manager of the Boston orchestra, and left immediately for his home in Boston.

The Temple Music Choral Society is beginning its third year. The first of the weekly rehearsals was held yesterday at the Temple Israel Community Centre, 210 West Ninety-first Street.

THIS CLIPPING FROM PORTLAND, ORE.
OREGONIAN

Boston Symphony Orchestra to Open Fiftieth Season.

Sir George Henschel Will Wield Baton in First Concerts.

BOSTON, Mass., Sept. 27.—Commencing its 50th season, the Boston Symphony orchestra, with Sir George Henschel as conductor, will appear in its first concert in Symphony hall October 10-11. Sir George was this orchestra's first conductor. He plans to lead the opening concerts in this city and will be a listener at the second pair of concerts, when the conductor will be Serge Koussevitzky, who is esteemed as one of the most inspiring conductors in America, of the younger school of orchestral wonder music workers.

A special feature of the present anniversary season will be a Bach festival in March, 1931, when a number of the foremost living composers will be among the list of those who will hear their music played under such distinguished auspices. A radio concert is scheduled October 4 as the contribution of the orchestra to the tercentenary program of the Massachusetts bay colonies.

Five pairs of concerts will be given in Carnegie hall November 20 and 22, January 8 and 10, February 6 and 7, March 5 and 7, and April 9 and 11. The orchestra's schedule will also include five concerts in the Academy of Music, Brooklyn, and five series of concerts in greater Boston.

No mention of the Boston Symphony orchestra would be complete did it not contain a mention of Major Henry L. Higginson of Boston, a capitalist and idealist who for 33 years gave money and all sorts of help to perfect this orchestra. He spared neither trouble nor financial resources to get the best musicians and the best conductors the world over.

Those who have served as conductors of this orchestra include these noted ones:

Wilhelm Gericke	1884-1889
George Henschel	1881-1884
Arthur Nikisch	1889-1893
Emil Pauer	1893-1898
Wilhelm Gericke	1898-1906
Karl Muck	1906-1908
Max Fiedler	1908-1912
Karl Mu[illegible]	1912-1918
Henri [illegible]	1918-1919
Pie[illegible]	1919-1924
S[illegible]	1924-

include Beethoven's Overture, "Dedication of the House;" an air from Gluck's "Orpheuse;" Haydn's Symphony in B-flat (B. & H. No. 12); Ballet Music from Schubert's "Rosamunde;" Scene from Bruch's "Odysseus;" and the Prelude to Wagner's "Mastersingers of Nuremberg." This program differs from the orchestra's first only in the closing overture, and the soloist—Miss Annie Louise Cary, now dead, will be replaced by Margaret Matzenauer.

Serge Koussevitzky will shortly arrive from Europe to conduct the first event of the anniversary season—a Boston Symphony concert to be given especially for the radio on Saturday evening, Oct. 4. This concert is being presented by the orchestra as part of the Tercentenary celebration in Massachusetts, and will open with three numbers by Massachusetts composers—Arthur Foote's Suite in E major; Edward Burlingame Hill's "Lilacs;" and Charles Martin Loeffler's "A Pagan Poem." The program will also include Debussy's Prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun," and Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks."

THIS CLIPPING FROM NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
TIMES
SEP 30 1930

NOTABLES ARRIVE ON OCEAN LINERS

NEW YORK, Sept. 20. (INS)—The liners Ile De France, Olympic and New Amsterdam were to arrive today with 3000 passengers.

General Henri J. A. Gouraud, military governor of Paris and one-armed French war hero, is arriving to attend the American Legion convention in Boston. Two naval destroyers will escort the Ile De France, on which the general is a passenger, into New York harbor.

Paul Claudel, French ambassador to the United States, is also arriving today. Other arrivals are Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and Dr. S. Parkes Cadman.

BOSTON POST
OCT. 1—1930
BOST

KOUSSEVITZKY BACK IN TOWN

Has Many New Works for Symphony's Jubilee Year

As the first bluebird heralds the spring so does the arrival of Dr. Koussevitzky presage the approach of a new musical season. At 5:55 yesterday afternoon the conductor of the Symphony Orchestra stepped off the "Knickerbocker" at the Back Bay station. The expansive smile, the sartorial splendor were again in evidence. Yesterday morning his favorite steamship, the Ile de France, brought Dr. Koussevitzky to New York. Upon reaching Boston he went immediately to the house in Brookline that was his home last year.

Next month the Symphony Orchestra enters upon its fiftieth season and Dr. Koussevitzky has persuaded several of the outstanding composers of the day, and others less known to fame, to compose works especially for this jubilee year. There will be symphonies from the hands of Stravinsky, Honegger, Roussell, Prokofiev and Hill and symphonies by Ferroud, Nabokov and Trebinsky. There will be symphonic poems by Ravel, Dukas, Sibelius, Hindemith, Carpenter and Lazar. There will be a piano concerta by Bax, symphonic ode by Copeland. And at the first concerts that Dr. Koussevitzky will conduct, those of Oct. 17 and 18, there will be performed an ode by Edward Burlingame Hill, the poem by Robert Hillyer. The Harvard Glee Club will be responsible for the choral portion.

Other features of what promises to be a banner year will be a radio concert next Saturday evening, the reappearance of Sir George Henschel, first conductor of the orchestra, as leader of the opening concerts, Oct. 10 and 11, a Beethoven Festival in Washington, D. C during the first week of December, and a Bach Festival in Symphony Hall next spring.

During the summer just past, Dr. Koussevitzky was in London, where he heard the New York Philharmonic Symphony under Toscanini, and at Bayreuth for the Wagner Festival. For 10 weeks he took his ease at Plombieres in the neighborhood of the Vosges Mountains where the abundant Roman remains had for him an especial interest.

MUSIC NOTES.

Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, arrived yesterday on the Ile de France. He was met by W. H. Brennan, manager of the Boston orchestra, and left immediately for his home in Boston.

The Temple Music Choral Society is beginning its third year. The first of the weekly rehearsals was held yesterday at the Temple Israel Community Centre, 210 West Ninety-first Street.

BRINGS NEW MUSIC, TRIBUTE TO SYMPHONY

Oct 1

Koussevitzky Has Fresh Works by Eminent Men

Orchestra Will Give Broad Program for Its 50th Anniversary Year

That Dr Serge Koussevitzky has brought to Boston with him a number of scores specially composed by eminent musicians of different countries of Europe to be produced by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, of which he is conductor, in this 50th anniversary year of the orchestra's existence, was revealed by him last evening on his arrival after a five months' vacation in Europe.

The famous conductor with Mrs Koussevitzky, his niece and private secretary, Mlle Olga Namoff, as well as a maid and valet, came over on the Isle de France and arrived in Boston at 5:55 last evening.

Mr Koussevitzky said, in his home at 50 Rockwood st, Jamaica Plain, last evening, that his orchestra will next Saturday on the radio give full symphony concerts lasting one hour, beginning at 10 a m and again at 6:45 p m. Judge Frederick P. Cabot, for the directors, and Dr Koussevitzky will deliver short radio addresses following the concerts.

The Russian leader brought in his trunk a number of manuscript scores.

The following new pieces will thus have their first performance: Hill, "Ode," for orchestra and chorus (to be performed Oct 17-18) to a poem of Robert Hillyer, written for the orchestra; Stravinsky, "Symphonie de Psaumes"; Roussel, "Symphony in G"; Dukas and Ravel, symphonic poems; Honegger, "Symphony"; Prokofieff, "Symphony"; Hindemith "Symphonic Poem"; Cibelius, "Symphonic Poem"; Bax, "Concerto for Piano and Orchestra"; Copland, "Symphonic Ode"; Carpenter, "Symphonic Poem."

There will also be compositions by two young Russians now living in Paris, Nabokoff and Trebinsky.

Another feature of this anniversary year, the conductor said, will be a Bach festival of five successive nights in March next, beginning on a Sunday, commemorative of Maj Henry L. Higginson, who founded the orchestra in 1881.

Rehearsals begin next Friday. The first concert is Oct 10.

Dr Koussevitzky engaged in Europe for his orchestra this season Victor Polatschek of Vienna, said to be the finest clarinet artist in Europe; Theo Crundey, an extraordinary player on the trumpet; Georges Pigasson, bass clarinetist, and a bassoon player named Panenka.

THIS CLIPPING FROM WEBSTER, MASS.
EVE. TIMES
OCT 1 - 1930

Koussevitzky is Back

BOSTON, Oct. 1 (UP)—Dr. Koussevitzky, director of the Boston Symphony orchestra, arrived here yesterday from Europe. The orchestra begins its 50th year next month.

Herald Oct 1

THI

BACH FESTIVAL SYMPHONY PLAN

Orchestra Will Give It as Tribute to the Late Maj. Higginson

KOUSSEVITZKY BACK FROM TRIP ABROAD

A great Bach festival to honor a great music lover and benefactor of Boston, the late Maj. Henry Lee Higginson, will be the tribute of the Boston Symphony orchestra to the memory of the man who conceived and made it possible. The festival will be a feature of the celebration of the 50th anniversary of the founding of the orchestra.

The announcement was made last night by Serge Koussevitzky at his Jamaica Plain home, on his return from four months in Europe.

Koussevitzky this season has been an onlooker, rather than a leader, in musical activities, and for the first time in many years foreswore the baton while on the continent, devoting himself to the study of new compositions, new composers, new artists and rest. That he benefited greatly and that Boston audiences this winter will reap the harvest of his summer, were evidenced in the renewed vigor and health which he has gained and the trunkfuls of manuscript and completed scores he has brought with him.

Sir Georg Henschl, now 80 years old and the first conductor of the orchestra, is crossing from Scotland to open the anniversary season. He will conduct the Symphony in his original opening program, played here in 1881, at the first concerts, Oct. 10 and 11.

For new artists will join the organization shortly, the first of whom is Prof. Victor Polatchak of Vienna, glowingly described by Koussevitzky as the greatest clarinetist in Europe, who will play first clarinet. Younger artists are Theo Grundy, trumpet; Panenka, bassoon, and George Pigasson, double bass.

Landing at New York from the Ile de France yesterday morning, Koussevitzky, accompanied by his wife and niece, Mlle. Olga Namoff, a charming young Russian, who is acting as his personal secretary, came directly to Boston where he was greeted by enthusiastic young musicians who nearly swept him off his feet in their excitement.

Oct 1

NING AMERICAN——Le

[N OWN

SYMPHONY SET FOR JUBILEE FEASTS

Leader of Boston Orchestra Arrives in City, Gives Plans for Coming Season

By MOSES SMITH

The prospect of the most remarkable season in the history of the world-famous Boston Symphony Orchestra is forecast in plans released by Serge Koussevitzky, conductor for the last six years, who arrived in Boston last night, after having stepped off the Ile de France earlier in the day in New York.

Looking forward eagerly to the 50th season of the orchestra's existence, the conductor made it plain that this season is to be a bigger and better one. He has obtained from the world's foremost composers a number of scores written especially for the orchestra for this season, and dedicated to it. All will receive their first performance here at the regular subscription concerts, and will subsequently remain property of the orchestra.

MANY CONTRIBUTE

At the second pair of concerts, on October 17 and 18, an "Ode," music by Edward Burlingame Hill, words by Robert Hillyer, will be performed by the orchestra, the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society.

The present announcement tops off previous commitments from Symphony Hall on this epoch-making season. The opening pair of concerts on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, October 10 and 11, will be an almost exact duplicate of the original program of 50 years ago, with the same conductor, Sir George Henschel, on the stand. Sir George is coming to Boston from England especially for this occasion, and is expected here Sunday.

ON AIR SATURDAY

At the pre-opening of the season, on Saturday night of this week, when Mr. Koussevitzky will lead the orchestra in a program to be broadcast over the radio, both the conductor and Judge Frederick P. Cabot, president of the trustees, will address the great "air" audience. A huge hookup has been arranged for this concert, the first the Symphony Orchestra has ever given especially for radio performance.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK TIMES
OCT

MUSIC NOTES.

Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, arrived yesterday on the Ile de France. He was met by W. H. Brennan, manager of the Boston orchestra, and left immediately for his home in Boston.

The Temple Music Choral Society is beginning its third year. The first of the weekly rehearsals was held yesterday at the Temple Israel Community Centre, 210 West Ninety-first Street.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
HERALD TRIBUNE
OCT 1 1930

Koussevitzky Back to Start Boston Symphony Season

Roland Hayes, Tenor, Also Returns on Ile de France

Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, arrived here yesterday morning aboard the Ile de France to begin the orchestra's semi-centennial season, which will be his seventh season with this organization.

Before leaving for Boston Mr. Koussevitzky listed some of the works specially commissioned for this season by the Boston Symphony, which will be performed under his direction: A symphony for chorus and orchestra by Igor Stravinsky; a symphonic poem by Arthur Honegger; the fourth symphony of Serge Prokofieff; symphonic poems by Paul Dukas, Maurice Ravel, Paul Hindemith and Arnold Bax, and a work by Albert Roussel, which the conductor was carrying in his pocket on his arrival. Mr. Roussel will pay his first visit to this country this season, beginning with Mrs. F. S. Coolidge's chamber music festival this month in Chicago. Mr. Koussevitzky also will introduce a chestra by the Russian composer Arthur Lourie.

Roland Hayes also arrived on the Ile de France and left for Boston. The Negro tenor, who passed the summer in Europe in preparation for this season's programs, said that his first 1930-'31 appearance here would be Saturday night, November 8, in the Columbia University Institute's series at the McMillin Academic Theater.

The Ile de France also brought two violinists, Erika Morini and Paul Kochanski. Miss Morini, who came here from Hungary in 1921, when fifteen years old, and made a notable impression in her New York debut, will make her first American appearance since 1924 next Sunday night in Carnegie Hall. Mr. Kochanski brought with him a violin by Jean Baptiste Guadagnini, dated 1771, which had been owned for thirty-five years by the Polish violinist Barcewicz, and bought by Mr. Kochanski this summer.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
EVE. UNION
OCT 1 1930

KOUSSEVITZKY HAS NEW WORKS FOR ORCHESTRA

Boston Symphony Conductor Returns With Impressive List of Modern Composers.

BOSTON, Oct. 1—As the first bluebird heralds the spring so does the arrival of Dr. Koussevitzky presage the approach of a new musical season. At 5.55 yesterday afternoon the conductor of the Symphony Orchestra stepped off the "Knickerbocker" at the Back Bay station. The expansive smile, the sartorial splendor were again in evidence. Yesterday morning his favorite steamship, the Ile de France, brought Dr. Koussevitzky to New York. Upon reaching Boston, he went immediately to the house in Brookline that was his home last year.

Fiftieth Season.

Next month the Symphony Orchestra enters upon its 50th season and Dr. Koussevitzky has persuaded several of the outstanding composers of the day, and others less known to fame, to compose works especially for this jubilee year. There will be symphonies from the hands of Stravinsky, Honegger, Roussell, Prokofiev and Hill and symphonies by Ferroud, Nabokov and Trebinsky. There will be symphonic poems by Ravel, Dukas, Sibelius, Hindemith, Carpenter and Lazar. There will be a piano concerto by Bax, a symphonic ode by Copeland. And at the first concerts that Dr. Koussevitzky will conduct, those of Oct. 17 and 18, there will be performed an ode by Edward Burlingame Hill, the poem by Robert Hillyer. The Harvard Glee Club will be responsible for the choral portion.

Other features of what promises to be a banner year will be a radio concert next Saturday evening, the reappearance of Sir George Henschel, first conductor of the orchestra, as leader of the opening concerts, Oct. 10 and 11, a Beethoven Festival in Washington, D. C., during the first week of December, and a Bach Festival in Symphony Hall next spring.

During the summer just past, Dr. Koussevitzky was in London, where he heard the New York Philharmonic Symphony under Toscanini, and at Bayreuth for the Wagner Festival. For 10 weeks he took his ease at Plombieres in the neighborhood of the Vosges Mountains, where the abundant Roman remains had for him an especial interest.

THIS CLIPPING FROM LEWISTON, ME.
SUN
OCT 2 - 1930

SUNDAY MORNING, OCTOBER 2, 1930

Musical Notes

BOSTON SYMPHONY OPENS SEASON OCT. 10

The Boston Symphony orchestra will open in Symphony Hall, Boston, Oct. 10 and 11, its fiftieth season. Sir George Henschel, this orchestra's first conductor, will visit America for the first time since he led the orchestra's first three seasons, 1881-1884. He will lead the opening concerts in Boston and remain to attend the second pair of concerts, as a listener, whn Serge Koussevitzky first takes the baton.

Another feature of the anniversary season will be a Bach Festival in Boston next March. A number of the foremost living composers have written new scores for this orchestra's anniversary year, and these will have their first performances in the course of the season. A special radio concert will be given Saturday evening, Oct. 4, as the orchestra's contribution to the tercentenary program of the Massachusetts Bay Colonies. Serge Koussevitzky shortly will return from Europe to lead this concert.

The usual five pairs of concerts will be given in Carnegie Hall, Nov. 20 and 22, Jan. 8 and 10, Feb. 6 and 7, March 5 and 7, and April 9 and 11. The orchestra's schelule will also include, as usual, five concerts in the Academy of Music, Brooklyn, and five series of concerts in greater Boston. For these, as well as for the New York concerts, all seats are subscribed in advance.

The orchestra which Henschel led in 1881 was the life dream of Major Henry L. Higginson—to give America a permanent orchestra, the most beautiful that individual effort and expenditure could achieve. For 37 years he devoted his best energies and his available income to perfecting his orchestra, sparing no pains to acquire the best musicians and the greatest conductors which the world afforded.

The shaping of the ensemble by Wilhelm Gericke to its traditional perfection; the illustrious years of Artur Nikisch and those of Dr. Karl Muck, who carried Major Higginson's orchestra to its highest point of fame, are now familiar history. The line of Boston Symphony conductors is as follows:

Wilhelm Gericke, 1884-1889; George Henschel, 1881-1884; Arthur Nikisch, 1889-1893; Emil Pauer, 1893-1898; Wilhelm Gericke, 1898-1906; Karl Muck, 1906-1908; Max Fiedler, 1908-1912; Karl Muck, 1912-1918; Henri Rabaud, 1918-1919; Pierre Monteux, 1919-1924; Serge Koussevitzky, 1924-

THIS CLIPPING FROM LEWISTON, ME.
SUN
OCT 3 1930

FRIDAY MORNING, OCTOBER 3, 1930

Musical Notes

MUSIC IN BOSTON

Sir George Henschel, first conductor of the Symphony Orchestra, who is returning to Boston to lead the opening pair of concerts of the fiftieth anniversary season, on Oct. 10 and 11, will appropriately repeat the program of the concert with which the orchestra began on Oct. 22, 1881. It lists Beethoven's overture, "Dedication of the House"; an air from Gluck's "Orpheus"; Haydn's Symphony in B-flat; ballet music from Schubert's "Rosamunde"; scene from Bruch's "Odysseus"; and the prelude to Wagner's "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg." The program differs from the original one only in the closing overture and in the presence of Margaret Matzenauer as soloist in place of Miss Annie Louise Cary, who is now dead.

Programs in Prospect

At Symphony Hall the first of the Sunday afternoon concerts will be given on Oct. 19 by Fritz Kreisler. On the following Tuesday evening, Oct. 21, La Argentina will give a program of dances new and old. On Sunday afternoon, Winifred Christie, the Scotch pianist, returns after an absence of a number of years with a double-keyboard piano the invention of the Hungarian composer, Emanuel Moor. The special course of Sunday afternoon concerts begins on Nov. 23 with the first program by Jascha Heifetz.

At Jordan hall there will be a piano recital on Saturday afternoon, Oct. 18, by Winifred MacBride. In addition to the classics her program will include a group of works by Prokofieff, E. J. Moeran, Theodore Otterstrom, Roy E. Agnew and Ravel. On Thursday evening, Oct. 30, Angna Enters will give her "Episodes and Compositions in Dance Form," with promise of several numbers that have not previously been done in Boston.

Jan Smeterlin, Polish pianist, who is making his first visit to America, will be at the Repertory Theater on Sunday evening, Nov. 2.

On Wednesday evening, Oct. 29, Sybil Webb, pianist, will give a recital at Jordan hall, assisted by the Trio Instrumental de Paris—George Laurent flute; Bernard Zighera, harp; Alfredo Zighera, viola de Gamba.

Jose Iturbi will return to Boston on Monday afternoon, Nov. 10, with a recital at the Hotel Statler.

CONDUCTOR WILL COACH PRO SINGERS

Eugene Plotnikoff, eminent symphonic and operatic conductor, has joined the staff of Guido Di Napoli's studio at 56 West 55th street; here he will act as coach to advanced professional singers and teachers.

Mr. Plotnikoff has directed many famous artists in symphonies, operas and concerts. At times, Pavlowa, Isadora Duncan and Fokine have danced under his baton. While engaged in concert work, Mr. Plotnikoff has conducted for Rachmaninoff, Heifetz and Zimbalist. A couple seasons ago Mr. Plotnikoff toured the principal cities of the United States as conductor for Feodor Chaliapin and that artists' production of "The Barber of Seville."

Guido Di Napoli's coming to America and starting a Studio for the Voice was undertaken at the insistence of Mr. Plotnikoff. Di Napoli has long been known as one of the foremost European teachers. Di Napoli specializes in voice production.

World's Largest Carillon

The Rockefeller Baptist church in New York has the world's largest carillon—72 bells—which was shipped in June from London on the American Trader.

Cast by Gillett & Johnston of Croydon, the total weight is over 100 tons, the large Bourdon bell being nearly 20 tons. The C bell is the largest tuned bell ever manufactured in this country.

Maurice Chevalier Will Sing in London

Maurice Chevalier, popular screen artist, who once sang in Paris cafes for a few francs per night, will appear in London at the Dominion Theater (two performances daily) two weeks in December, receiving at least $20,000 a week, it is announced, from London.

Chevalier's approaching London engagement is due to the efforts of Clifford Whitley, one of the founders of the famous Co-Optimists and an old friend of the French star. The two men discussed arrangements when they met recently at Deauville. Actually a guarantee was offered him of $20,000 a week, but as the basis of the contract is 50 per cent. of the gross receipts at the Dominion Theatre, his earnings may reach $25,000 or more, which is believed to be a record figure for London.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
OCT 3 - 1930

SYMPHONY SUBSCRIPTIONS

Subscriptions to the Boston Symphony Orchestra series in this city must be paid by Oct. 15, according to notices sent out yesterday from Symphony Hall by the orchestra's manager, W. H. Brennan. The series includes four Tuesday evening concerts at the Albee Theatre. Tickets will be forwarded about the first of November.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN

SYMPHONY SUBSCRIPTIONS

Subscriptions to the Boston Symphony Orchestra series in this city must be paid by Oct. 15, according to notices sent out yesterday from Symphony Hall by the orchestra's manager, W. H. Brennan. The series includes four Tuesday evening concerts at the Albee Theatre. Tickets will be forwarded about the first of November.

Jam Oct 3

THE HAPPY RUSSIANS

To the Editor of the Transcript:

Dr. Koussevitzky's comment in tonight's issue of the Transcript on the apathetic European face is very close to the mark, although I should not call the French face hopeful; rather, complacent. France is prosperous and employed.

But the distinguished musician's observations on Russia must have been made from a distance. In a two-months' tour of Europe this summer, it was in Moscow, Leningrad and villages adjacent that I saw the only hopeful faces in the Old World. Surely if the Russians are "slaves . . . obliged to work nearly for nothing" they do not look the part. I spent nearly three weeks in the Soviet Union and discovered a people who were happy because they were going somewhere, knew what they wanted and how to obtain it. The animated face of the Russian people—especially the youth of Russia—is a phenomenon worth study. The slow Slav is on fire. He is a modern miracle. REV. WILLIAM WALLACE ROSE

Lynn, Oct. 1.

THE DRIVER IS RIGHT

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
HERALD TRIBUNE
OCT 1 1930

Koussevitzky Back to Start Boston Symphony Season

Roland Hayes, Tenor, Also Returns on Ile de France

Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, arrived here yesterday morning aboard the Ile de France to begin the orchestra's semi-centennial season, which will be his seventh season with this organization.

Before leaving for Boston Mr. Koussevitzky listed some of the works specially commissioned for this season by the Boston Symphony, which will be performed under his direction: A symphony for chorus and orchestra by Igor Stravinsky; a symphonic poem by Arthur Honegger; the fourth symphony of Serge Prokofieff; symphonic poems by Paul Dukas, Maurice Ravel, Paul Hindemith and Arnold Bax, and a work by Albert Roussel, which the conductor was carrying in his pocket on his arrival. Mr. Roussel will pay his first visit to this country this season, beginning with Mrs. F. S. Coolidge's chamber music festival this month in Chicago. Mr. Koussevitzky also will introduce a chestra by the Russian composer Arthur Lourié.

Roland Hayes also arrived on the Ile de France and left for Boston. The Negro tenor, who passed the summer in Europe in preparation for this season's programs, said that his first 1930-'31 appearance here would be Saturday night, November 8, in the Columbia University Institute's series at the McMillin Academic Theater.

The Ile de France also brought two violinists, Erika Morini and Paul Kochanski. Miss Morini, who came here from Hungary in 1921, when fifteen years old, and made a notable impression in her New York debut, will make her first American appearance since 1924 next Sunday night in Carnegie Hall. Mr. Kochanski brought with him a violin by Jean Baptiste Guadagnini, dated 1771, which had been owned for thirty-five years by the Polish violinist Barcewicz, and bought by Mr. Kochanski this summer.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
EVE. UNION
OCT 1 1930

KOUSSEVITZKY HAS NEW WORKS FOR ORCHESTRA

Boston Symphony Conductor Returns With Impressive List of Modern Composers.

BOSTON, Oct. 1—As the first bluebird heralds the spring so does the arrival of Dr. Koussevitzky presage the approach of a new musical season. At 5.55 yesterday afternoon the conductor of the Symphony Orchestra stepped off the "Knickerbocker" at the Back Bay station. The expansive smile, the sartorial splendor were again in evidence. Yesterday morning his favorite steamship, the Ile de France, brought Dr. Koussevitzky to New York. Upon reaching Boston, he went immediately to the house in Brookline that was his home last year.

Fiftieth Season.

Next month the Symphony Orchestra enters upon its 50th season and Dr. Koussevitzky has persuaded several of the outstanding composers of the day, and others less known to fame, to compose works especially for this jubilee year. There will be symphonies from the hands of Stravinsky, Honegger, Roussell, Prokofiev and Hill and symphonies by Ferroud, Nabokov and Trebinsky. There will be symphonic poems by Ravel, Dukas, Sibelius, Hindemith, Carpenter and Lazar. There will be a piano concerto by Bax, a symphonic ode by Copeland. And at the first concerts that Dr. Koussevitzky will conduct, those of Oct. 17 and 18, there will be performed an ode by Edward Burlingame Hill, the poem by Robert Hillyer. The Harvard Glee Club will be responsible for the choral portion.

Other features of what promises to be a banner year will be a radio concert next Saturday evening, the reappearance of Sir George Henschel, first conductor of the orchestra, as leader of the opening concerts, Oct. 10 and 11, a Beethoven Festival in Washington, D. C., during the first week of December, and a Bach Festival in Symphony Hall next spring.

During the summer just past, Dr. Koussevitzky was in London, where he heard the New York Philharmonic Symphony under Toscanini, and at Bayreuth for the Wagner Festival. For 10 weeks he took his ease at Plombieres in the neighborhood of the Vosges Mountains, where the abundant Roman remains had for him an especial interest.

THIS CLIPPING FROM LEWISTON, ME.
SUN
OCT 2 - 1930

SUNDAY MORNING, OCTOBER 2, 1930

Musical Notes

BOSTON SYMPHONY OPENS SEASON OCT. 10

The Boston Symphony orchestra will open in Symphony Hall, Boston, Oct. 10 and 11, its fiftieth season. Sir George Henschel, this orchestra's first conductor, will visit America for the first time since he led the orchestra's first three seasons, 1881-1884. He will lead the opening concerts in Boston and remain to attend the second pair of concerts, as a listener, when Serge Koussevitzky first takes the baton.

Another feature of the anniversary season will be a Bach Festival in Boston next March. A number of the foremost living composers have written new scores for this orchestra's anniversary year, and these will have their first performances in the course of the season. A special radio concert will be given Saturday evening, Oct. 4, as the orchestra's contribution to the tercentenary program of the Massachusetts Bay Colonies. Serge Koussevitzky shortly will return from Europe to lead this concert.

The usual five pairs of concerts will be given in Carnegie Hall, Nov. 20 and 22, Jan. 8 and 10, Feb. 6 and 7, March 5 and 7, and April 9 and 11. The orchestra's schelule will also include, as usual, five concerts in the Academy of Music, Brooklyn, and five series of concerts in greater Boston. For these, as well as for the New York concerts, all seats are subscribed in advance.

The orchestra which Henschel led in 1881 was the life dream of Major Henry L. Higginson—to give America a permanent orchestra, the most beautiful that individual effort and expenditure could achieve. For 37 years he devoted his best energies and his available income to perfecting his orchestra, sparing no pains to acquire the best musicians and the greatest conductors which the world afforded.

The shaping of the ensemble by Wilhelm Gericke to its traditional perfection; the illustrious years of Artur Nikisch and those of Dr. Karl Muck, who carried Major Higginson's orchestra to its highest point of fame, are now familiar history. The line of Boston Symphony conductors is as follows:

Wilhelm Gericke, 1884-1889; George Henschel, 1881-1884; Arthur Nikisch, 1889-1893; Emil Pauer, 1893-1898; Wilhelm Gericke, 1898-1906; Karl Muck, 1906-1908; Max Fiedler, 1908-1912; Karl Muck, 1912-1918; Henri Rabaud, 1918-1919; Pierre Monteux, 1919-1924; Serge Koussevitzky, 1924-

THIS CLIPPING FROM LEWISTON, ME.
SUN
OCT 3 1930

FRIDAY MORNING, OCTOBER 3, 1930

Musical Notes

MUSIC IN BOSTON

Sir George Henschel, first conductor of the Symphony Orchestra, who is returning to Boston to lead the opening pair of concerts of the fiftieth anniversary season, on Oct. 10 and 11, will appropriately repeat the program of the concert with which the orchestra began on Oct. 22, 1881. It lists Beethoven's overture, "Dedication of the House"; an air from Gluck's "Orpheus"; Haydn's Symphony in B-flat; ballet music from Schubert's "Rosamunde"; scene from Bruch's "Odysseus"; and the prelude to Wagner's "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg." The program differs from the original one only in the closing overture and in the presence of Margaret Matzenauer as soloist in place of Miss Annie Louise Cary, who is now dead.

Programs in Prospect

At Symphony Hall the first of the Sunday afternoon concerts will be given on Oct. 19 by Fritz Kreisler. On the following Tuesday evening, Oct. 21, La Argentina will give a program of dances new and old. On Sunday afternoon, Winifred Christie, the Scotch pianist, returns after an absence of a number of years with a double-keyboard piano, the invention of the Hungarian composer, Emanuel Moor. The special course of Sunday afternoon concerts begins on Nov. 23 with the first program by Jascha Heifetz.

At Jordan hall there will be a piano recital on Saturday afternoon, Oct. 18, by Winifred MacBride. In addition to the classics her program will include a group of works by Prokofieff, E. J. Moeran, Theodore Otterstrom, Roy E. Agnew and Ravel. On Thursday evening, Oct. 30, Angna Enters will give her "Episodes and Compositions in Dance Form," with promise of several numbers that have not previously been done in Boston.

Jan Smeterlin, Polish pianist, who is making his first visit to America, will be at the Repertory Theater on Sunday evening, Nov. 2.

On Wednesday evening, Oct. 29, Sybil Webb, pianist, will give a recital at Jordan hall, assisted by the Trio Instrumental de Paris—George Laurent flute; Bernard Zighera, harp; Alfredo Zighera, viola de Gamba.

Jose Iturbi will return to Boston on Monday afternoon, Nov. 10, with a recital at the Hotel Statler.

CONDUCTOR WILL COACH PRO SINGERS

Eugene Plotnikoff, eminent symphonic and operatic conductor, has joined the staff of Guido Di Napoli's studio at 56 West 55th street; here he will act as coach to advanced professional singers and teachers.

Mr. Plotnikoff has directed many famous artists in symphonies, operas and concerts. At times, Pavlowa, Isadora Duncan and Fokine have danced under his baton. While engaged in concert work, Mr. Plotnikoff has conducted for Rachmaninoff, Heifetz and Zimbalist. A couple seasons ago Mr. Plotnikoff toured the principal cities of the United States as conductor for Feodor Chaliapin and that artists' production of "The Barber of Seville."

Guido Di Napoli's coming to America and starting a Studio for the Voice was undertaken at the insistence of Mr. Plotnikoff. Di Napoli has long been known as one of the foremost European teachers. Di Napoli specializes in voice production.

World's Largest Carillon

The Rockefeller Baptist church in New York has the world's largest carillon—72 bells—which was shipped in June from London on the American Trader.

Cast by Gillett & Johnston of Croydon, the total weight is over 100 tons, the large Bourdon bell being nearly 20 tons. The C bell is the largest tuned bell ever manufactured in this country.

Maurice Chevalier Will Sing in London

Maurice Chevalier, popular screen artist, who once sang in Paris cafes for a few francs per night, will appear in London at the Dominion Theater (two performances daily) two weeks in December, receiving at least $29,000 a week, it is announced, from London.

Chevalier's approaching London engagement is due to the efforts of Clifford Whitley, one of the founders of the famous Co-Optimists and an old friend of the French star. The two men discussed arrangements when they met recently at Deauville. Actually a guarantee was offered him of $20,000 a week, but as the basis of the contract is 50 per cent. of the gross receipts at the Dominion Theatre, his earnings may reach $25,000 or more, which is believed to be a record figure for London.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
OCT 3 - 1930

SYMPHONY SUBSCRIPTIONS

Subscriptions to the Boston Symphony Orchestra series in this city must be paid by Oct. 15, according to notices sent out yesterday from Symphony Hall by the orchestra's manager, W. H. Brennan. The series includes four Tuesday evening concerts at the Albee Theatre. Tickets will be forwarded about the first of November.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN

SYMPHONY SUBSCRIPTIONS

Subscriptions to the Boston Symphony Orchestra series in this city must be paid by Oct. 15, according to notices sent out yesterday from Symphony Hall by the orchestra's manager, W. H. Brennan. The series includes four Tuesday evening concerts at the Albee Theatre. Tickets will be forwarded about the first of November.

Jan Oct 3

THE HAPPY RUSSIANS

To the Editor of the Transcript:

Dr. Koussevitzky's comment in tonight's issue of the Transcript on the apathetic European face is very close to the mark, although I should not call the French face hopeful; rather, complacent. France is prosperous and employed.

But the distinguished musician's observations on Russia must have been made from a distance. In a two-months' tour of Europe this summer, it was in Moscow, Leningrad and villages adjacent that I saw the only hopeful faces in the Old World. Surely if the Russians are "slaves . . . obliged to work nearly for nothing" they do not look the part. I spent nearly three weeks in the Soviet Union and discovered a people who were happy because they were going somewhere, knew what they wanted and how to obtain it. The animated face of the Russian people—especially the youth of Russia—is a phenomenon worth study. The slow Slav is on fire. He is a modern miracle. REV. WILLIAM WALLACE ROSE

Lynn, Oct. 1.

THE DRIVER IS RIGHT

REDUCTION

RATIO

16x

2.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

2.0 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

200 mm

150 mm

100 mm

A5

A4

A3

1.0

1.1

1.25

1.4

1.6

1.0 mm

1.5 mm

2.0 mm

2.5 mm

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century

A&P

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

4.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

3.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

3.0 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

The First Conductor, Who Divided the Town

William F. Apthorp Recalls and Judges The Beginnings of George Henschel And the Symphony Orchestra

THURSDAY, March 3, 1881, is a memorable date in Boston musical annals, although it may be doubted whether more than one person suspected it at the time. On the afternoon of that day came the eighth, and last, of the sixteenth season of symphony concerts given in the Music Hall by the Harvard Musical Association, an affair which surely no one in those days —with the possible exception of John Sullivan Dwight—regarded as an "event." The fifth number on the program was:

Henschel: Concert Overture (MS. 1870), first time

This was conducted by the composer in person; and hereby hangs the tale.

The Harvard Musical Association's symphony concerts, begun in December, 1865, and immensely successful at first, had been for some years dragging out a rather neglected and financially feeble existence; and there seemed little chance of anything turning up to check their decline. Most people who cared to think about the matter at all thought our local musical conditions in a discouragingly bad way; for very few knew that for several years, there had been a man in Boston with a whole new scheme of symphony concerts fully matured in his head and ready to subsidize them out of his own pocket; and, of these few, only one or two had any inkling of who the man was. But he was there, waiting patiently for but one thing to enable him to make his scheme a fact. This man, as all Boston soon found out, was Henry L. Higginson. The whole plan was his conception, and like Colonel Sellers, he was only waiting for a "missing ingredient" for an orchestral conductor in whom he should have sufficient confidence to warrant his taking the first practical step. And it was the H. M. A. symphony concert of March 3, 1881, that at last brought this "missing ingredient" to his appreciative notice.

Miss Lillian Bailey, the admirable young soprano, had recently returned from Europe for a concert tour in this country, bringing in her train her London teacher, Mr. George Henschel, the baritone, who soon afterwards married her. Both sang at the concert in question, which billed a quite unusual array of solo performers; for, beside the two artists already named singing solos and a duet, Dr. Louis Maas played a pianoforte concerto of his own. There were only three purely orchestral numbers on the program, one of which was Mr. Henschel's overture; and the H. M. A. concert-committee had willingly granted his request to be allowed to conduct it himself. The result was an overwhelming "Veni, vidi, vinci" success. It may even be said that the quality of the composition itself was well-nigh lost sight of in the general enthusiasm for the vigor, power and effectiveness of the performance. Here seemed to be a man who held an orchestra in the very hollow of his hand, and could make it do what he list! Mr. Higginson, who was in the audience, may be fancied as breathing a soft, but heartfelt, "Eureka!"

Whether his mind was made up on the spot, or he first consulted some of the professional friends whose opinion he was accustomed to value, the present writer knoweth not. [Naturally, Mr. Henschel did know and the shade of Mr. Apthorp may pardon one of his successors for intercalating a page from the conductor's "Memoirs and Musings."]

"It was at the house of Mrs. George D. Howe," it says, "that, a few days after that concert of the Harvard Musical Society, Major Higginson asked me to meet him, and there, in a few words, as was his wont, he revealed to me his plan for establisting in Boston, on a firm, financial basis, an annual series of orchestral concerts on a large scale, and asked me if, eventually, I would undertake to form the new orchestra and be its first conductor. There would be no committee. I would be my own master as regards the making of the programs, number of rehearsals, indeed in every respect. He also hinted at a very substantial salary, being, as he remarked, sensible of the fact that such a position would naturally not leave me as free to earn as much by my singing as would otherwise be the case.

"The offer was a very tempting one, especially since the regular conducting of a big symphony orchestra had for a long time been one of my ambitions, but it was the question of casting myself perhaps for good—adrift from so much that was dear to me in Europe, and I decided to be allowed to think the matter over.

Two days after my marriage, it was in Washington, where part of our honeymoon was spent, I received a telegram from Major Higginson, followed by a letter, in which he definitely offered me the post. And since we had already in our first interview agreed that it would be better for us not to bind ourselves for more than a year, thus giving, after the expiration of it, each of us the option of either renewing or discontinuing the agreement, I accepted. All details were settled upon after my return to Boston. I engaged the members of the orchestra, selecting them, at Mr. Higginson's very wise suggestion, as nearly as possible from those of the old Harvard Society, and among other local players, so as not to arouse too much opposition." [To resume with Mr. Apthorp.] The opening concert was given in the following fall, in the Music Hall, on Saturday evening, Oct. 22, 1881. [There had been a "public rehearsal" on Friday afternoon.]

And Mr. Henschel? Well, the Sunday and Monday papers were of various opinions about his conducting; there was certainly no unanimous praise. A good deal of fault was found, in some quarters, with his manner, which was undeniably and even somewhat robustiously dramatic. Still his conducting did, in some ways, seem to warrant Mr. Higginson's high expectations of him. His command of the orchestra seemed as sure, and, as the phrase goes, "magnetic" as at the H. M. A. concert of the preceding spring; the performance was throughout vigorous, fiery, and exciting; in Haydn's symphony even rather excessively strenuous. It was, however, a disappointment to find Mr. Henschel's command over the orchestra decidedly more secure than his command over himself; he hurried rapid tempi inordinately, and the playing of the symphony smacked more of Berlioz, or Verdi, than of good Papa Haydn. But this might well have been the effect of the natural nervousness attending a first official appearance. There seemed to be no cause for discouragement, for the "magnetic" quality was still clearly there.

But the second concert made us stare! What had happened in the interval? I, for one, have never been able to answer this question fully to my own satisfaction. If what was adverse in the criticism of his conducting at the first concert had affected Mr. Henschel, one could not but wonder at a man of so pronounced a personality being so thin-skinned and flinching. But somehow he did seem cowed; not only had he quite put off his robustious manner, but, with it, all his mastery. What the real reason was is, as I have said, problematical; the fact remains that, after the opening concert, Mr. Henschel lost his grip—and never regained it! Of course a man of his talent, genius, and musicianship could not go on conducting an orchestra for three years (this was the term of his engagements) without learning something of his trade; but the old magic of his conducting, which he had twice brilliantly displayed, was irrevocably gone.

The truth is—and at this distance of time we can, as the Germans say, pour pure wine over it—that the choice of Mr. Henschel as conductor was made without due circumspection. For not only is a composer's conducting of his own composition, in general, a ticklish criterion of his ability in that line, but it was perfectly well known that Mr. Henschel was very nearly a complete tyro in the art. He may have conducted a thing or two in his life before coming to America, but he had never held a position as orchestral conductor anywhere. Betting on his technical skill was, to say the least, risky. And Mr. Higginson could not have been long in realizing that, instead of putting his finger upon the conductor whose coming he had so long awaited, he was (in plain English) paying Mr. Henschel a high salary, in those days, for learning his trade in public. No doubt, on the other hand, Mr. Henschel had no easy time of it, with the critical hornet's nest he raised about his ears; but then, ha! could he expect?

[Again, with apology to Mr. Apthorp beyond The Styx, the successor risks another intercalation—from an article written for The Transcript in September, 1911, by H. E. Krehbiel of the New York Tribune, recounting the early fortunes in that city of the orchestra. In the course of it is a paragraph in which Mr. Henschel confesses to an apprenticeship.]

"What the orchestra was in its first lustrum," wrote Mr. Krehbiel, "New York was not permitted to learn, and the activities of Mr. Henschel do not come legitimately into this desultory review. But perhaps I may contribute a mite to the history of that early period. In the early summer of 1884 or 1885 I spent an afternoon with Mr. Henschel at the home of one of his friends in a beautiful old house overlooking the Hudson. We talked of music, of course, and I asked questions concerning Major Higginson's undertaking. Mr. Henschel was enthusiastic in praise, but laid stress not on what he had done for the orchestra, but what the orchestra had done for him. 'I had little or no experience in conducting when I took the appointment,' he said, 'and shall never forget what it did for me. I learned more in six months in Boston than I could have learned in as many years in Germany.'"

Twenty concerts and twenty public rehearsals made up the first season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, (1881-82). The younger generation of today (1911) should know that the organization, in its first few years, was by no means what it grew to be afterwards. Its material, derived largely from the old orchestra of the Harvard Musical Association, was not entirely of the best; for the quality of that older band has been pretty accurately indicated by a talented visiting French violinist, Ovide Musin, when he spoke of it as "a fortuitous aggregation of heterogeneous elements," That H. M. A. Orchestra was, in the full sense of the term, a "scratch team"; and most of its material was taken into the new organization. Still it should not be forgotten that the new orchestra was considerably larger than its predecessor, and the added material was, for the most part, of better quality, in some cases extremely good.

Thus the Boston Symphony Orchestra had, from the first, some elements of superiority over its predecessor of the Harvard Musical Association. First and foremost of these was its being really a fixed and definite organization, the players having (or being supposed to have) nothing to do but rehearse and play under one conductor, without frittering away their energies, or losing their esprit de corps, by filling haphazard engagements outside. Other good items were the greater time it could spend on rehearsals, its superior numerical force, and at least a sprinkling of better material. That its playing still left a good deal to be desired, judged by a high standard, need hardly be said. Yet it may be doubted how much acrimonious criticism its shortcomings would have called forth, from press or public, had the playing of the old H.M.A. orchestra been all we had to compare it with; but, fortunately or unfortunately, this was not the case.

For some years previous, the flying visits of Theodore Thomas's New York Orchestra, unquestionably one of the finest in the world at the time, had given us striking practical examples of absolutely superb orchestral performance; and, considering the expectations raised by the founding of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, it was not unnatural that people should compare it with Thomas's, instead of with its older resident forerunner. Neither was it unnatural, though not entirely just, that most of this adverse criticism, should fall to the lot of Mr. Henschel himself. His conductorship was no bed of roses.

The material success of the Symphony Concerts, in the way of drawing large audiences, was, however, indisputable from the first and it has never waned since. In the second season (1882-83) the number of concerts and public rehearsal was raised to twenty-six each; it was not until the third season that the number was permanently fixed at twenty-four. And, looking back upon the matter from a distance of thirty years, I think one can say quite distinctly that this material success of the enterprise was in the beginning and for some time after, the most noteworthy item in the whole business. One very striking new element, directly connected therewith, was not long in making itself felt—the enormous swath the Symphony Concerts cut, the unprecedentedly large place they filled in the musical life of the city. This was to be recognized as the beginning of essentially new conditions. Indeed, the founding of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has often been accepted as the transition from the old to the new musical Boston; and this is, to a certain extent correct. Barring occasional visits from Theodore Thomas, we had theretofore relied wholly upon our own resources in the matters of conductor and orchestra, but now an era of importation began. Mr. Henschel was the first of a long line of imported conductors. And the importing system, once begun, flourished wonderously.

I have spoken of the swath the Symphony Concerts cut. Good earnest of this is the fact that, with the exception of the choral clubs—the Apollo, the Cecilia and the Boylston Club, which could hardly be called concert-giving organizations for the general public, as their audiences were made up exclusively of subscribing members, and no tickets to their concerts were publicly sold—everything else of the musical sort in the city suffered. The Harvard Musical Association gave only one more season of concerts (in the Boston Museum, ending on March 9, 1882); but this was natural enough. Resident artists who had for years been giving successful recitals or chamber-concerts suddenly found their audiences dwindling away; neither did distinguished visiting singers or players have a very good time of it.

Probably the most notable instance of all was the Handel and Haydn Society. This organization, in addition to its regular performances of oratorios, had, for some time past, been giving triennial festivals, of a week's duration; it had been in the habit of applying to rich music-lovers in the city to subscribe to a "guaranty fund" for each festival, but had been so successful financially as never to have had to draw upon it; the triennial festivals had paid their own way and even made money. But, for the one given shortly after the establishment

Continued on Page Six

The Kindling Presence

(Berner)

George Henschel

As the Audiences at the Symphony Concerts in the Old Music Hall Saw Him Fifty Years Ago

Concert-Crier

Next Week

Orchestral—Friday afternoon and Saturday evening in Symphony Hall, first concerts of the fiftieth year of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conductor. At both the program (with one exception) of the inaugural concerts, Oct. 21-22, 1881, will be repeated, viz.: Beethoven's Overture, "Dedication of The House"; Air, "Che faró" from Gluck's "Orpheus"; Haydn's Symphony in B-flat (No. 12); Schubert's Dances from the Incidental Music to the Play, "Rosamünde"; Scena from Bruch's forgotten "Odysseus"; Prelude to Wagner's "Die Meistersinger," substituted for Weber's "Jubilee Overture," too cheap and dull for risk upon audiences of 1930. Annie Louise Cary, long since dead, was the singer in '81; Mme. Matzenauer succeeds her. Finally, Sir George Henschel, conductor of the orchestra at the first concerts of its first year, is on his way from London to be conductor at the first concerts of its fiftieth. Is there a parallel instance in modern musical history?

Further On

Week, Oct. 12-18—Wednesday evening, Jordan Hall; Edward MacHugh, baritone of radio and records; assisting, Marie Murray, contralto, Einar Hansen, violinist. . . . Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Symphony Hall; second pair of Symphony Concerts, Serge Koussevitzky conductor. (New symphony by Rousel; Jubilee Ode, poem by Robert Hillyer, setting by Professor Hill) . . . Saturda afternoon, Jordan Hall, Winifred MacBride, pianist via London (Prokofiev Ravel, Moéran).

Week, Oct. 19-25—Sunday afternoon, Symphony Hall; Fritz Kreisler, violinist, as his public expects him and flocks to him. . . . Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Symphony Hall; third pair of Symphony Concerts, Serge Koussevitzky conductor.

Week Oct. 26-Nov. 1—Sunday afternoon, Symphony Hall; Winifred Christie, mature and adept pianist, playing upon the double-keyboard piano invented by Emanuel Moór, built by Messrs. Bechstein. . . . Sunday afternoon, hall not specified; Giovanni Cerullo, light tenor, and Raffaele Martino's Concert Orchestra in light numbers. . . . Wednesday evening, Jordan Hall; Sybil Webb, soprano, singing songs by Jacques Pillois of the Symphony Orchestra assisting, the Parisian Instrumental Trio (Laurent flute, B. Zighera harp, A. Zighera, viola da gamba. . . . Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Symphony Hall; fourth pair of Symphony Concerts, Serge Koussevitzky conductor.

The First Conductor, As He Also Remembered

Sir George Henschel's Good-Humored Recollections Put to Print Thirty Years Later

THE simple and straightforward announcement made by Mr. Higginson in the Boston papers at the end of March, 1881, headed "In the Interest of Good Music," plainly stating the accomplished fact of the establishment of the new orchestra and giving my name as that of its first conductor, came as a great surprise to the general public, not wholly agreeable, I fear, to some musicians, and evidently a positive shock to most critics, one of whom promptly delivered himself of the following declaration: "Some protest is certainly needed to stem his tide of adulation that rises and breaks at the feet of Mr. Henschel. We have had conductors in Boston, and good ones. It is a mistaken idea of Mr. Henschel's friends—if not of his own—that we have waited here, all unconscious of our own poverty and great needs, for this musical trinity combined in the person of Mr. Henschel —oratorio exponent, composer and orchestral conductor. We are not, and have not been, half as ignorant as they suppose."

Others followed suit in similar terms, though apparently with little effect on public opinion, for when, early in September, the sale of tickets for the first season commenced, both Mr. Higginson and I were greatly astonished and gratified at the demand for them. As early as six o'clock on the morning of the sale people commenced getting into line before the doors of the old Music Hall, one paper even asserting this to have taken place in the afternoon of the previous day. The Transcript, Boston's premier evening paper, asked in bewilderment: "Where does all the audience come from? Where have all the symphony-goers been during the last ten years that they have hidden themselves so completely from public view?" This was encouraging. I was by that time rehearsing industriously and enthusiastically with the orchestra, with all the members of which I stood on the most friendly footing, and to whom, previous to the announcement of rehearsal, I had issued this letter:

"To the members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra:

"Gentlemen—I beg leave to say a few words to you now, in order to avoid waste of time after our work has once begun.

"Wherever a body of men are working together for one and the same end, as you and I, the utmost of unity and mutual understanding is required in order to achieve anything that is great or good.

"Everyone of us, engaged for the concerts we are on the point of beginning, has been engaged because his powers, his talents have been considered valuable for the purpose. Every one of us, therefore, should have a like interest as well as a like share in the success of our work, and it is in this regard that I address you now, calling your attention to the following points with which I urgently beg of you to acquaint yourselves thoroughly:

"Let us be punctual. Better ten minutes before than one behind the time appointed.

"Tuning will cease the moment the conductor gives the sign for doing so.

"No member of the orchestra, even if his presence be not needed for the moment, will leave the hall during the time of the rehearsals and concerts without the consent of the conductor.

"The folios containing the parts will be closed after each rehearsal and concert.

"Inasmuch as we are engaged for musical purposes we will not talk of private matters during rehearsals and concerts.

"Hoping that, thus working together with perfect understanding, our labors will be crowned with success, I am, gentlemen, your obedient servant. G. H."

Being absolutely my own master as regards the orchestra and its work, I tried several experiments in the way of the placing of the orchestra, dividing, for instance, the strings into equal halves on my right and left with the object of enabling the listeners on either side of the hall to have the full effect of the whole string-quintet. Those experiments I submitted in letters, illustrated by diagrams, to Brahms, who most kindly, in his answers, commented upon their practicability or otherwise. "But," he writes on one occasion, "by far the best feature in all your arrangements of the orchestra, is the fact that no committee will be sitting in front of it. There is not a Kapellmeister on the whole of our continent who would not envy you that!"

In making of the programs I endeavored to be guided by the principles laid down by the famous German writer, Gustav Freytag, whose book, "The Technique of the Drama," I had studied in my Leipzig days, principles which he had evolved from the study of the great dramatists from Sophocles to Shakspeare. In that book Freytag maintains that a drama should have an uneven number of acts, either three or five. The interest should steadily ascend during the first two—or, in the case of a five-act play—during the first three, acts. Here should be the climax, after which, in the last act—or, in the case of a five-act play, in the last two—the interest should gently descend until, at the end, it has reached the level of the outset.

Accordingly, with hardly an exception, I arranged my programs so that commencing with an overture, after which there came a solo, either instrumental or vocal, the climax, viz. the symphony, stood at the end of the first part which generally took up, as regards the length of the concert, two-thirds of the whole. The second part then was a gentle "letting-down" from the more or less acute mental effort claimed by the first part. The scheme semed to meet with the approval even of the critics. Anyhow, at all the concerts, which took place every Saturday evening for twenty-four succe sive weeks, the hall was crowded, and as to the public rehearsals on the Friday afternoons, for which—no tickets being sold beforehand—one paid twenty-five cents at the door to every part of the house, there was many an afternoon when people had to be turned away.

I shall never forget the public rehearsal for the last concert of the season, when Beethoven's Ninth Symphony—the preceding eight had all been given in the course of the series—was on the program. I had left my house in Otis Place for old Music Hall—the magnificent Symphony Hall of the present day did not exist then—and was crossing the Common. In the distance I observed, fully three or four minutes' walk to the hall yet, a huge gathering of people. "What a pity," I said to myself, thinking some accident had happened, "this should occur just today, when it will interfere with the progress of people wanting to go to the rehearsal!" Imagine my surprise and, needless to add, my gratification when, on coming nearer, I found that the crowd was slowly moving towards Music Hall—they were the very people trying to get admission to the rehearsal! I had to beg and elbow my way to the hall, and even there—men and women sitting on the steps leading to the platform—encountered some difficulty in my endeavor to reach the conductor's place in time. As far, therefore, as regards the public, there was nothing to complain of.

But—the critics! It was after the unquestionable success of the very first concerts that the seemingly organized newspaper attacks commenced. Nothing was good. My tempi, my "untraditional" way of conducting, even the seating of the orchestra furnished abundant reasons for adverse criticism, the growth of which in violence appeared to keep pace with that of the favor the concerts found with the public from week to week. I was, by one critic, considered "a veritable Brahmin" in my passion for Brahms. "There are more dissonances in Music Hall in a week now," he wrote, "than there used to be in a year." Ridicule, sarcasm, venom, wit—not always free from vulgarity—were called upon to serve the purpose of defeating Mr. Higginson's scheme. At one of the concerts I was announced to play a manuscript Pianoforte Concerto of my own—which soon afterwards, in spite of its momentary success, shared the fate of that significant Concert-Overture—and this afforded the critics a welcome opportunity for the activity of all the above requisites of warfare—a warfare which, however, was of a decidedly one-sided kind, as neither Mr. Higginson nor I ever took the slightest public notice of these attacks. Here is a little sample:

Mr. Henschel will appear as pianist, composer, and conductor, and he has already appeared as a singer in the series. That is a good deal for one man to do. But he will do it with all satisfaction to the public, which seems to be entirely captivated by him. The only thing he cannot do is to appear as a string quartet or sing duets with himself.

That some people minded this sort of thing more than I did, was shown by a letter which appeared in the Boston Herald, headed "Mr. Henschel's Critics Criticized," and signed "Pro bono publico." It began thus:

"Let me ask, is it fair, just, honorable, or even descent for the managers of these papers"—quoting the Saturday Evening Gazette, the Advertiser, and the Transcript—"to permit such critics to vilify, malign, abuse and ridicule a gentleman of Mr. Henschel's abilities, a born musician, a simple, earnest, devoted worker for the highest and best in music at all times?" and ended: "If the gentlemen of the press desire to organize a clamor against Mr. Henschel, they will find his friends quite ready to meet them. The fact has been established that Mr. Henschel is a success as a conductor. He has had serious difficulties to overcome on account of the indifferent and demoralized condition of his men. He has not been able yet to prevent some of the old fiddlers from doubling their backs like cobblers and drawing their bows as they would so many waxends; but he has, nevertheless, added new blood, and imparted much of his own enthusiasm, ardor, and life into the mechanical old stagers, so that the result has been an agreeable surprise to all of us, and which has never been seen under the baton of any other conductor. As a whole,

Continued on Page Six

Eighty—but Still Keen

Sir George Henschel

From a Photograph Privately Taken at His Country House, Ait-na-Criche in the Scottish Highlands

Rounding It Out

Arthur Foote to Contribute to the Henschel Renaissance

ONE of the few survivors of George Henschel's years as first conductor at the Symphony Concerts is Arthur Foote, the composer. Through half a century he has frequented them, and still frequents them with receptive faculties little dulled. To this day he remembers clearly, but shuns the pitfalls of an elderly raconteur.

The other day the Public Library asked him to assemble his recollections of these fifty symphonic years for an audience in its Lecture Hall. He agreed to do so next Thursday afternoon at a quarter-past five. First come, first seated—from four o'clock.

"Sober, Simple and Demure"

Boston Music Hall.

SEASON 1881-82.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. GEORG HENSCHEL, Conductor.

I. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 22D, AT 8, P. M.

PROGRAMME.

OVERTURE, Op. 124, "Dedication of the House."	BEETHOVEN.
AIR. (Orpheus.)	GLUCK.
SYMPHONY in B flat. (No. 12 of Breitkopf's edition.)	HAYDN.
BALLET MUSIC. (Rosamunde.)	SCHUBERT.
SCENA. (Odysseus.)	MAX BRUCH.
FESTIVAL OVERTURE.	WEBER.

SOLOIST.

MISS ANNIE LOUISE CARY.

Program Leaf

Of the First Concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Reproduced from Howe's Historical Sketch

Dance Calendar

La Argentina—Symphony Hall, Tuesday evening, Oct. 21; the Spanish dancer, now established with her American public, returning, unlessened, in familiar and unfamiliar numbers.

Angna Enters—Jordan Hall, Thursday evening, Oct. 30; the inventive and witty spirit of "Episodes and Compositions in Dance Form," bringing a freshened program to new and favorable surroundings.

REDUCTION

RATIO

14x

PM-MGP 13"x18"
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

200 mm

150 mm

100 mm

A3

A4

A5

1.0 mm

1.5 mm

2.0 mm

2.5 mm

1.0

1.1

1.25

1.4

1.6

1.8

2.0

2.2

2.5

2.8

3.2

3.6

4.0

4.5

5.0

5.6

6.3

7.1

8.0

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ

The First Conductor, Who Divided the Town

William F. Apthorp Recalls and Judges The Beginnings of George Henschel And the Symphony Orchestra

THURSDAY, March 3, 1881, is a memorable date in Boston musical annals, although it may be doubted whether more than one person suspected it at the time. On the afternoon of that day came the eighth, and last, of the sixteenth season of symphony concerts given in the Music Hall by the Harvard Musical Association, an affair which surely no one in those days —with the possible exception of John Sullivan Dwight—regarded as an "event." The fifth number on the program was:

Henschel: Concert Overture (MS. 1870), first time

This was conducted by the composer in person; and hereby hangs the tale.

The Harvard Musical Association's symphony concerts, begun in December, 1865, and immensely successful at first, had been for some years dragging out a rather neglected and financially feeble existence; and there seemed little chance of anything turning up to check their decline. Most people who cared to think about the matter at all thought our local musical conditions in a discouragingly bad way; for very few knew that, for several years, there had been a man in Boston with a whole new scheme of symphony concerts fully matured in his head and ready to subsidize them out of his own pocket; and, of these few, only one or two had any inkling of who the man was. But he was there, waiting patiently for but one thing to enable him to make his scheme a fact. This man, as all Boston soon found out, was Henry L. Higginson. The whole plan was his conception, and like Colonel Sellers, he was only waiting for a "missing ingredient" for an orchestral conductor in whom he should have sufficient confidence to warrant his taking the first practical step. And it was the H. M. A. symphony concert of March 3, 1881, that at last brought this "missing ingredient" to his appreciative notice.

Miss Lillian Bailey, the admirable young soprano, had recently returned from Europe for a concert tour in this country, bringing in her train her London teacher, Mr. George Henschel, the baritone, who soon afterwards married her. Both sang at the concert in question, which billed a quite unusual array of solo performers; for, beside the two artists already named singing solos and a duet, Dr. Louis Maas played a pianoforte concerto of his own. There were only three purely orchestral numbers on the program, one of which was Mr. Henschel's overture; and the H. M. A. concert-committee had willingly granted his request to be allowed to conduct it himself. The result was an overwhelming "Veni, vidi, vinci" success. It may even be said that the quality of the composition itself was well-nigh lost sight of in the general enthusiasm for the vigor, power and effectiveness of the performance. Here seemed to be a man who held an orchestra in the very hollow of his hand, and could make it do what he list! Mr. Higginson, who was in the audience, may be fancied as breathing a soft, but heartfelt, "Eureka!"

Whether his mind was made up on the spot, or he first consulted some of the professional friends whose opinion he was accustomed to value, the present writer knoweth not. [Naturally, Mr. Henschel did know and the shade of Mr. Apthorp may pardon one of his successors for intercalating a page from the conductor's "Memoirs and Musings."]

"It was at the house of Mrs. George D. Howe," it says, "that, a few days after that concert of the Harvard Musical Society, Major Higginson asked me to meet him, and there, in a few words, as was his wont, he revealed to me his plan for establisting in Boston, on a firm, financial basis, an annual series of orchestral concerts on a large scale, and asked me if, eventually, I would undertake to form the new orchestra and be its first conductor. There would be no committee. I would be my own master as regards the making of the programs, number of rehearsals, indeed in every respect. He also hinted at a very substantial salary, being, as he remarked, sensible of the fact that such a position would naturally not leave me as free to earn as much by my singing as would otherwise be the case.

"The offer was a very tempting one, especially since the regular conducting of a big symphony orchestra had for a time been one of my ambitions, but it was the question of casting myself perhaps for good—adrift from so much was dear to me in Europe, and I ed to be allowed to think the matter

Two days after my marriage, it was in Washington, where part of our honeymoon was spent, I received a telegram from Major Higginson, followed by a letter, in which he definitely offered me the post. And since we had already in our first interview agreed that it would be better for us not to bind ourselves for more than a year, thus giving, after the expiration of it, each of us the option of either renewing or discontinuing the agreement, I accepted. All details were settled upon after my return to Boston. I engaged the members of the orchestra, selecting them, at Mr. Higginson's very wise suggestion, as nearly as possible from those of the old Harvard Society, and among other local players, so as not to arouse too much opposition." [To resume with Mr. Apthorp.] The opening concert was given in the following fall, in the Music Hall, on Saturday evening, Oct. 22, 1881. [There had been a "public rehearsal" on Friday afternoon.]

And Mr. Henschel? Well, the Sunday and Monday papers were of various opinions about his conducting; there was certainly no unanimous praise. A good deal of fault was found, in some quarters, with his manner, which was undeniably and even somewhat robustiously dramatic. Still his conducting did, in some way, seem to warrant Mr. Higginson's high expectations of him. His command of the orchestra seemed as sure, and, as the phrase goes, "magnetic" as at the H. M. A. concert of the preceding spring; the performance was throughout vigorous, fiery, and exciting; in Haydn's symphony even rather excessively strenuous. It was, however, a disappointment to find Mr. Henschel's command over the orchestra decidedly more secure than his command over himself; he hurried rapid tempi inordinately, and the playing of the symphony smacked more of Berlioz, or Verdi, than of good Papa Haydn. But this might well have been the effect of the natural nervousness attending a first official appearance. There seemed to be no cause for discouragement, for the "magnetic" quality was still clearly there.

But the second concert made us stare! What had happened in the interval? I, for one, have never been able to answer this question fully to my own satisfaction. If what was adverse in the criticism of his conducting at the first concert had affected Mr. Henschel, one could not but wonder at a man of so pronounced a personality being so thin-skinned and flinching. But somehow he did seem cowed; not only had he quite put off his robustious manner, but, with it, all his mastery. What the real reason was is, as I have said, problematical; the fact remains that, after the opening concert, Mr. Henschel lost his grip—and never regained it! Of course a man of his talent, genius, and musicianship could not go on conducting an orchestra for three years (this was the term of his engagements) without learning something of his trade; but the old magic of his conducting, which he had twice brilliantly displayed, was irrevocably gone.

The truth is—and at this distance of time we can, as the Germans say, pour pure wine over it—that the choice of Mr. Henschel as conductor was made without due circumspection. For not only is a composer's conducting of his own composition, in general, a ticklish criterion of his ability in that line, but it was perfectly well known that Mr. Henschel was very nearly a complete tyro in the art. He may have conducted a thing or two in his life before coming to America, but he had never held a position as orchestral conductor anywhere. Betting on his technical skill was, to say the least, risky. And Mr. Higginson could not have been long in realizing that, instead of putting his finger upon the conductor whose coming he had so long awaited, he was (in plain English) paying Mr. Henschel a high salary, in those days, for learning his trade in public. No doubt, on the other hand, Mr. Henschel had no easy time of it, with the critical hornet's nest he raised about his ears; but then, what could he expect?

[Again, with apology to Mr. Apthorp beyond The Styx, the successor risks another intercalation—from an article written for The Transcript in September, 1911, by H. E. Krehbiel of the New York Tribune, recounting the early fortunes in that city of the orchestra. In the course of it is a paragraph in which Mr. Henschel confesses to an apprenticeship.]

"What the orchestra was in its first lustrum," wrote Mr. Krehbiel, "New York was not permitted to learn, and the activities of Mr. Henschel do not come legitimately into this desultory review. But perhaps I may contribute a mite to the history of that early period. In the early summer of 1884 or 1885 I spent an afternoon with Mr. Henschel at the home of one of his friends in a beautiful old house overlooking the Hudson. We talked of music, of course, and I asked questions concerning Major Higginson's undertaking. Mr. Henschel was enthusiastic in praise, but laid stress not on what he had done for the orchestra, but what the orchestra had done for him. 'I had little or no experience in conducting when I took the appointment,' he said, 'and shall never forget what it did for me. I learned more in six months in Boston than I could have learned in as many years in Germany.'"

Twenty concerts and twenty public rehearsals made up the first season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra (1881-82). The younger generation of today (1911) should know that the organization, in its first few years, was by no means what it grew to be afterwards. Its material, derived largely from the old orchestra of the Harvard Musical Association, was not entirely of the best; for the quality of that older band has been pretty accurately indicated by a talented visiting French violinist, Ovide Musin, when he spoke of it as "a fortuitous aggregation of heterogeneous elements." That H. M. A. Orchestra was, in the full sense of the term, a "scratch team"; and most of its material was taken into the new organization. Still it should not be forgotten that the new orchestra was considerably larger than its predecessor, and the added material was, for the most part, of better quality, in some cases extremely good.

Thus the Boston Symphony Orchestra had, from the first, some elements of superiority over its predecessor of the Harvard Musical Association. First and foremost of these was its being really a fixed and definite organization, the players having (or being supposed to have) nothing to do but rehearse and play under one conductor, without frittering away their energies, or losing their esprit de corps, by filling haphazard engagements outside. Other good items were the greater time it could spend on rehearsals, its superior numerical force, and at least a sprinkling of better material. That its playing still left a good deal to be desired, judged by a high standard, need hardly be said. Yet it may be doubted how much acrimonious criticism its shortcomings would have called forth, from press or public, had the playing of the old H.M.A. orchestra been all we had to compare it with; but, fortunately or unfortunately, this was not the case.

For some years previous, the flying visits of Theodore Thomas's New York Orchestra, unquestionably one of the finest in the world at the time, had given us striking practical examples of absolutely superb orchestral performance; and, considering the expectations raised by the founding of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, it was not unnatural that people should compare it with Thomas's, instead of with its older resident forerunner. Neither was it unnatural, though not entirely just, that most of this adverse criticism, should fall to the lot of Mr. Henschel himself. His conductorship was no bed of roses.

The material success of the Symphony Concerts, in the way of drawing large audiences, was, however, indisputable from the first and it has never waned since. In the second season (1882-83) the number of concerts and public rehearsals was raised to twenty-six each; it was not until the third season that the number was permanently fixed at twenty-four. And, looking back upon the matter from a distance of thirty years, I think one can say quite distinctly that this material success of the enterprise was in the beginning and for some time after, the most noteworthy item in the whole business. One very striking new element, directly connected therewith, was not long in making itself felt—the enormous swath the Symphony Concerts cut, the unprecedentedly large place they filled in the musical life of the city. This was to be recognized as the beginning of essentially new conditions. Indeed, the founding of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has often been accepted as the transition from the old to the new musical Boston; and this is, to a certain extent correct. Barring occasional visits from Theodore Thomas, we had theretofore relied wholly upon our own resources in the matters of conductor and orchestra, but now an era of importation began. Mr. Henschel was the first of a long line of imported conductors. And the importing system, once begun, flourished wonderously.

I have spoken of the swath the Symphony Concerts cut. Good earnest of this is the fact that, with the exception of the choral clubs—the Apollo, the Cecilia and the Boylston Club, which could hardly be called concert-giving organizations for the general public, as their audiences were made up exclusively of subscribing members, and no tickets to their concerts were publicly sold—everything else of the musical sort in the city suffered. The Harvard Musical Association gave only one more season of concerts (in the Boston Museum, ending on March 9, 1882); but this was natural enough. Resident artists who had for years been giving successful recitals or chamberconcerts suddenly found their audiences dwindling away; neither did distinguished visiting singers or players have a very good time of it.

Probably the most notable instance of all was the Handel and Haydn Society. This organization, in addition to its regular performances of oratorios, had, for some time past, been giving triennial festivals, of a week's duration; it had been in the habit of applying to rich music-lovers in the city to subscribe to a "guaranty fund" for each festival, but had been so successful financially as never to have had to draw upon it; the triennial festivals had paid their own way and even made money. But, for the one given shortly after the establishment

Continued on Page Six

The Kindling Presence

George Henschel (Horner)

As the Audiences at the Symphony Concerts in the Old Music Hall Saw Him Fifty Years Ago

Concert-Crier

Next Week

Orchestral—Friday afternoon and Saturday evening in Symphony Hall, first concerts of the fiftieth year of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conductor. At both the program (with one exception) of the inaugural concerts, Oct. 21-22, 1881, will be repeated, viz.: Beethoven's Overture, "Dedication of The House"; Air, "Che faró" from Gluck's "Orpheus"; Haydn's Symphony in B-flat (No. 12); Schubert's Dances from the Incidental Music to the Play, "Rosamünde"; Scena from Bruch's forgotten "Odysseus"; Prelude to Wagner's "Die Meistersinger," substituted for Weber's "Jubilee Overture," too cheap and dull for risk upon audiences of 1930. Annie Louise Cary, long since dead, was the singer in '81; Mme. Matzenauer succeeds her. Finally, Sir George Henschel, conductor of the orchestra at the first concerts of its first year, is on his way from London to be conductor at the first concerts of its fiftieth. Is there a parallel instance in modern musical history?

Further On

Week, Oct. 12-18—Wednesday evening, Jordan Hall; Edward MacHugh, baritone of radio and records; assisting, Marie Murray, contralto, Einar Hansen, violinist. . . . Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Symphony Hall; second pair of Symphony Concerts, Serge Koussevitzky conductor. (New symphony by Rousse!; Jubilee Ode, poem by Robert Hillyer, setting by Professor Hill) . . . Saturda afternoon, Jordan Hall, Winifred MacBride, pianist via London (Prokofiev Ravel, Moeran).

Week, Oct. 19-25—Sunday afternoon, Symphony Hall; Fritz Kreisler, violinist, as his public expects him and flocks to him. . . . Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Symphony Hall; third pair of Symphony Concerts, Serge Koussevitzky conductor.

Week Oct. 26-Nov. 1—Sunday afternoon, Symphony Hall; Winifred Christie, mature and adept pianist, playing upon the double-keyboard piano invented by Emanuel Moór, built by Messrs. Bechstein. . . . Sunday afternoon, hall not specified; Giovanni Cerullo, light tenor, and Raffaele Martino's Concert Orchestra in light numbers. . . . Wednesday evening, Jordan Hall; Sybil Webb, soprano, singing songs by Jacques Pillois of the Symphony Orchestra assisting, the Parisian Instrumental Trio (Laurent flute, B. Zighera harp, A. Zighera, viola da gamba. . . . Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Symphony Hall; fourth pair of Symphony Concerts, Serge Koussevitzky conductor.

Eighty—but Still Keen

Sir George Henschel

From a Photograph Privately Taken at His Country House, Alt-na-Criche in the Scottish Highlands

Rounding It Out

Arthur Foote to Contribute to the Henschel Renaissance

ONE of the few survivors of George Henschel's years as first conductor at the Symphony Concerts is Arthur Foote, the composer. Through half a century he has frequented them, and still frequents them with receptive faculties little dulled. To this day he remembers clearly, but shuns the pitfalls of an elderly raconteur.

The other day the Public Library asked him to assemble his recollections of these fifty symphonic years for an audience in its Lecture Hall. He agreed to do so next Thursday afternoon at a quarter-past five. First come, first seated—from four o'clock.

"Sober, Simple and Demure"

Boston Music Hall.

SEASON 1881-82.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. GEORG HENSCHEL, Conductor.

I. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 22D, AT 8, P. M.

PROGRAMME.

OVERTURE, Op. 124, "Dedication of the House."	BEETHOVEN.
AIR. (Orpheus.)	GLUCK.
SYMPHONY in B flat. (No. 12 of Breitkopf's edition.)	HAYDN.
BALLET MUSIC. (Rosamunde.)	SCHUBERT.
SCENA. (Odysseus.)	MAX BRUCH.
FESTIVAL OVERTURE.	WEBER.

SOLOIST:

MISS ANNIE LOUISE CARY.

Program Leaf

Of the First Concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Reproduced from Howe's Historical Sketch

The First Conductor, As He Also Remembe

Sir George Henschel's Good-Hum Recollections Put to Print Thirty Years Later

THE simple and straightforward announcement made by Mr. Higginson in the Boston papers at the end of March, 1881, headed "In the Interest of Good Music," plainly stating the accomplished fact of the establishment of the new orchestra and giving my name as that of its first conductor, came as a great surprise to the general public, not wholly agreeable, I fear, to some musicians, and evidently a positive shock to most critics, one of whom promptly delivered himself of the following declaration: "Some protest is certainly needed to stem his tide of adulation that rises and breaks at the feet of Mr. Henschel. We have had conductors in Boston, and good ones. It is a mistaken idea of Mr. Henschel's friends—if not of his own—that we have waited here, all unconscious of our own poverty and great needs, for this musical trinity combined in the person of Mr. Henschel —oratorio exponent, composer and orchestral conductor. We are not, and have not been, half as ignorant as they suppose."

Others followed suit in similar terms, though apparently with little effect on public opinion, for when, early in September, the sale of tickets for the first season commenced, both Mr. Higginson and I were greatly astonished and gratified at the demand for them. As early as six o'clock on the morning of the sale people commenced getting into line before the doors of the old Music Hall, one paper even asserting this to have taken place in the afternoon of the previous day. The Transcript, Boston's premier evening paper, asked in bewilderment: "Where does all the audience come from? Where have all the symphony-goers been during the last ten years that they have hidden themselves so completely from public view?" This was encouraging. I was by that time rehearsing industriously and enthusiastically with the orchestra, with all the members of which I stood on the most friendly footing, and to whom, previous to the announcement of rehearsal, I had issued this letter:

"To the members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra:

"Gentlemen—I beg leave to say a few words to you now, in order to avoid waste of time after our work has once begun. Wherever a body of men are working together for one and the same end, as you and I, the utmost of unity and mutual understanding is required in order to achieve anything that is great or good.

"Everyone of us, engaged for the concerts we are on the point of beginning, has been engaged because his powers, his talents have been considered valuable for the purpose. Every one of us, therefore, should have a like interest as well as a like share in the success of our work, and it is in this regard that I address you now, calling your attention to the following points with which I urgently beg of you to acquaint yourselves thoroughly:

"Let us be punctual. Better ten minutes before than one behind the time appointed.

"Tuning will cease the moment the conductor gives the sign for doing so.

"No member of the orchestra, even if his presence be not needed for the moment, will leave the hall during the time of the rehearsals and concerts without the consent of the conductor.

"The folios containing the parts will be closed after each rehearsal and concert.

"Inasmuch as we are engaged for musical purposes we will not talk of private matters during rehearsals and concerts.

"Hoping that, thus working together with perfect understanding, our labors will be crowned with success, I am, gentlemen, your obedient servant. G. H."

Being absolutely my own master as regards the orchestra and its work, I tried several experiments in the way of the placing of the orchestra, dividing, for instance, the strings into equal halves on my right and left with the object of enabling the listeners on either side of the hall to have the full effect of the whole string-quintet. Those experiments I submitted in letters, illustrated by diagrams, to Brahms, who most kindly, in his answers, commented upon their practicability or otherw he writes on one occasion, best feature in all your ar of the orchestra, is the fact t mittee will be sitting in front is not a Kapellmeister on th our continent who would no that!"

In making of the progr deavored to be guided by th laid down by the famous Ger Gustav Freytag, whose book, nique of the Drama," I had my Leipzig days, principles had evolved from the study dramatists from Sophocles to In that book Freytag maint drama should have an une of acts, either three or five. should steadily ascend durin two—or, in the case of a fiv during the first three, acts. be the climax, after which, act—or, in the case of a five the last two—the interest sh descend until, at the end, it the level of the outset.

Accordingly, with hardly an arranged my programs so th ing with an overture, after came a solo, either instrumen the climax, viz. the symphony end of the first part which ge up, as regards the length of two-thirds of the whole. The then was a gentle "letting-dow more or less acute mental e by the first part. The sche meet with the approval even Anyhow, at all the concerts place every Saturday evening four successive weeks, the ha ed, and as to the public rehe Friday afternoons, for which being sold beforehand—one five cents at the door to ever house, there was many an aft people had to be turned awa

I shall never forget the pub for the last concert of the Beethoven's Ninth Symphony ing eight had all been given of the series—was on the had left my house in Otis Music Hall—the magnificen Hall of the present day did n —and was crossing the Com distance I observed, fully t minutes' walk to the hall yet, ering of people. "What a pi myself, thinking some accid pened, "this should occur just it will interfere with the people wanting to go to th Imagine my surprise and, ne my gratification when, on co I found that the crowd was s towards Music Hall—they w people trying to get admiss hearsal! I had to beg and el to the hall, and even the women sitting on the steps l platform—encountered some my endeavor to reach the place in time. As far, ther gards the public, there was complain of.

But—the critics! It was questionable success of th concerts that the seeming newspaper attacks commen was good. My tempi, my "u way of conducting, even th the orchestra furnished ab sons for adverse criticism, of which in violence appea pace with that of the fau certs found with the public to week. I was, by one criti "a veritable Brahmin" in for Brahms. "There are ances in Music Hall in a he wrote, "than there used year." Ridicule, sarcasm, not always free from vul called upon to serve the pu feating Mr. Higginson's sch of the concerts I was annou a manuscript Pianoforte Co own—which soon afterwar of its momentary success, fate of that significant ture—and this afforded the come opportunity for the a the above requisites of war fare which, however, was o one-sided kind, as neither son nor I ever took the sli notice of these attacks. He sample:

Mr. Henschel will appea ist, composer, and conduct has already appeared as the series. That is a goo one man to do. But he with all satisfaction to which seems to be enti vated by him. The only cannot do is to appear a quartet or sing duets wit

That some people minded thing more than I did, was letter which appeared in Herald, headed "Mr. Hensc Criticized," and signed publico." It began thus:

"Let me ask, is it fair, able, or even descent for agers of these papers"—q Saturday Evening Gazett vertiser, and the Tran permit such critics to vili abuse and ridicule a ger Mr. Henschel's abilities musician, a simple, earne worker for the highest a music at all times?" and the gentlemen of the pres organize a clamor against schel, they will find his fr ready to meet them. Th been established that Mr is a success as a conducto had serious difficulties to on account of the indiffere moralized condition of his has not been able yet to pr of the old fiddlers from dou backs like cobblers and dra bows as they would so ends; but he has, neverthe new blood, and imparted his own enthusiasm, ardo into the mechanical old that the result has been ar surprise to all of us, and never been seen under th any other conductor. As

Continued on Page

Dance Calend

La Argentina—Symphony day evening, Oct. 21; the Spa now established with her Ar lic, returning, unlessened, and unfamiliar numbers.

Angna Enters—Jordan Ha evening, Oct. 30; the inventiv spirit of "Episodes and Com Dance Form," bringing a fr gram to new and favorabl ings.

rst Conductor, o Divided the Town

F. Apthorp Recalls and Judges ginnings of George Henschel the Symphony Orchestra

March 3, 1881, is a ate in Boston musi- although it may be ther more than one t the time. On the y came the eighth, enth season of sym- in the Music Hall sical Association, an o one in those days exception of John arded as an "event." the program was: re (MS. 1870), first time by the composer in ngs the tale. usical Association's begun in December, successful at first, years dragging out a d financially feeble seemed little chance up to check their who cared to think all thought our local in a discouragingly few knew that, for had been a man in new scheme of sym- matured in his head dize them out of his these few, only one ling of who the man here, waiting patient- ng to enable him to fact. This man, as d out, was Henry L. hole plan was his Colonel Sellers, he or a "missing ingre- hestral conductor in sufficient confidence ng the first practical H. M. A. symphony 1881, that at last ng ingredient" to his

, the admirable young y returned from Eu- tour in this country. n her London teach- nschel, the baritone, s married her. Both in question, which al array of solo per- the two artis's al- g solos and a duet, ved a pianoforte con- There were only three umbers on the pro- was Mr. Henschel's I. M. A. concert-com- granted his request nduct it himself. The helming "Veni, vidi, may even be said the composition itself ght of in the general vigor, power and performance. Here who held an orches- low of his hand, and at he list! Mr. Hig- the audience, may ing a soft, but heart-was made up on the nsulted some of the whose opinion he value, the present ot. [Naturally, Mr. and the shade of pardon one of his suc- ting a page from the s and Musings."] ouse of Mrs. George "that, a few days t of the Harvard ajor Higginson asked , and there, in a his wont, he revealed stablisting in Boston, al basis, an annual concerts on a large me if, eventually, I form the new orches- conductor. There ttee. I would be my ds the making of the of rehearsals, indeed He also hinted at a ary, being, as he re- the fact that such a rally not leave me as ch by my singing as the case. very tempting one, regular conducting orchestra had for a of my ambitions, but on reflecting myself -adrift from so much ne in Europe, and I to think the matter my marriage, it was e part of our honey- received a telegram on, followed by a let- nitely offered me the e had already in our ed that it would be to bind ourselves for thus giving, after the h of us the option of r discontinuing the ted. All details were my return to Boston. bers of the orchestra, Mr. Higginson's very s nearly as possible old Harvard Society, ocal players, so as not opposition." [To re- orp.] The opening con- the following fall, in Saturday evening, Oct. had been a "public re- afternoon.]

el? Well, the Sunday were of various opin- onducting; there was mous praise. A good ound, in some quarters, which was undeniably at robustiously dram- nducting did, in some rrant Mr. Higginson's of him. His command ing It Out

n Contribute to the Renaissance few survivors of enschel's years as at the Symphony Arthur Foote, the hrough half a cen- equented them, and them with receptive dulled. To this day clearly, but shuns an elderly raconday the Public Li- him to assemble his of these fifty sym- for an audience in Hall. He agreed to ursday afternoon at five. First come, rom four o'clock.

of the orchestra seemed as sure, and, as the phrase goes, "magnetic" as at the H. M. A. concert of the preceding spring; the performance was throughout vigorous, fiery, and exciting; in Haydn's symphony even rather excessively strenuous. It was, however, a disappointment to find Mr. Henschel's command over the orchestra decidedly more secure than his command over himself; he hurried rapid tempi inordinately, and the playing of the symphony smacked more of Berlioz, or Verdi, than of good Papa Haydn. But this might well have been the effect of the natural nervousness attending a first official appearance. There seemed to be no cause for discouragement, for the "magnetic" quality was still clearly there.

But the second concert made us stare! What had happened in the interval? I, for one, have never been able to answer this question fully to my own satisfaction. If what was adverse in the criticism of his conducting at the first concert had affected Mr. Henschel, one could not but wonder at a man of so pronounced a personality being so thin-skinned and flinching. But somehow he did seem cowed; not only had he quite put off his robustious manner, but, with it, all his mastery. What the real reason was is, as I have said, problematical; the fact remains that, after the opening concert, Mr. Henschel lost his grip—and never regained it! Of course a man of his talent, genius, and musicianship could not go on conducting an orchestra for three years (this was the term of his engagements) without learning something of his trade; but the old magic of his conducting, which he had twice brilliantly displayed, was irrevocably gone.

The truth is—and at this distance of time we can, as the Germans say, pour pure wine over it—that the choice of Mr. Henschel as conductor was made without due circumspection. For not only is a composer's conducting of his own composition, in general, a ticklish criterion of his ability in that line, but it was perfectly well known that Mr. Henschel was very nearly a complete tyro in the art. He may have conducted a thing or two in his life before coming to America, but he had never held a position as orchestral conductor anywhere. Betting on his technical skill was, to say the least, risky. And Mr. Higginson could not have been long in realizing that, instead of putting his finger upon the conductor whose coming he had so long awaited, he was (in plain English) paying Mr. Henschel a high salary, in those days, for learning his trade in public. No doubt, on the other hand, Mr. Henschel had no easy time of it, with the critical hornet's nest he raised about his ears; but then, what could he expect?

[Again, with apology to Mr. Apthrop beyond The Styx, the successor risks another intercalation—from an article written for The Transcript in September, 1911, by H. E. Krehbiel of the New York Tribune, recounting the early fortunes in that city of the orchestra. In the course of it is a paragraph in which Mr. Henschel confesses to an apprenticeship.]

"What the orchestra was in its first lustrum," wrote Mr. Krehbiel, "New York was not permitted to learn, and the activities of Mr. Henschel do not come legitimately into this desultory review. But perhaps I may contribute a mite to the history of that early period. In the early summer of 1884 or 1885 I spent an afternoon with Mr. Henschel at the home of one of his friends in a beautiful old house overlooking the Hudson. We talked of music, of course, and I asked questions concerning Major Higginson's undertaking. Mr. Henschel was enthusiastic in praise, but laid stress not on what he had done for the orchestra, but what the orchestra had done for him. 'I had little or no experience in conducting when I took the appointment,' he said, 'and shall never forget what it did for me. I learned more in six months in Boston than I could have learned in as many years in Germany.'"

Twenty concerts and twenty public rehearsals made up the first season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra (1881-82). The younger generation of today (1911) should know that the organization, in its first few years, was by no means what it grew to be afterwards. Its material, derived largely from the old orchestra of the Harvard Musical Association, was not entirely of the best; for the quality of that older band has been pretty accurately indicated by a talented visiting French violinist, Ovide Musin, when he spoke of it as "a fortuitous aggregation of heterogeneous elements," That H. M. A. Orchestra was, in the full sense of the term, a "scratch team"; and most of its material was taken into the new organization. Still it should not be forgotten that the new orchestra was considerably larger than its predecessor, and the added material was, for the most part, of better quality, in some cases extremely good.

Thus the Boston Symphony Orchestra had, from the first, some elements of superiority over its predecessor of the Harvard Musical Association. First and foremost of these was its being really a fixed and definite organization, the players having (or being supposed to have) nothing to do but rehearse and play under one conductor, without frittering away their energies, or losing their esprit de corps, by filling haphazard engagements outside. Other good items were the greater time it could spend on rehearsals, its superior numerical force, and at least a sprinkling of better material. That its playing still left a good deal to be desired, judged by a high standard, need hardly be said. Yet it may be doubted how much acrimonious criticism its shortcomings would have called forth, from press or public, had the playing of the old H.M.A. orchestra been all we had to compare it with; but, fortunately or unfortunately, this was not the case.

For some years previous, the flying visits of Theodore Thomas's New York Orchestra, unquestionably one of the finest in the world at the time, had given us striking practical examples of absolutely superb orchestral performance; and, considering the expectations raised by the founding of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, it was not unnatural that people should compare it with Thomas's, instead of with its older resident forerunner. Neither was it unnatural, though not entirely just, that most of this adverse criticism, should fall to the lot of Mr. Henschel himself. His conductorship was no bed of roses.

The material success of the Symphony Concerts, in the way of drawing large audiences, was, however, indisputable from the first and it has never waned since. In the second season (1882-83) the number of concerts and public rehearsal was raised to twenty-six each; it was not until the third season that the number was permanently fixed at twenty-four. And, looking back upon the matter from a distance of thirty years, I think one can say quite distinctly that this material success of the enterprise was in the beginning and for some time after, the most noteworthy item in the whole business. One very striking new element, directly connected therewith, was not long in making itself felt—the enormous swath the Symphony Concerts cut, the unprecedentedly large place they filled in the musical life of the city. This was to be recognized as the beginning of essentially new conditions. Indeed, the founding of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has often been accepted as the transition from the old to the new musical Boston; and this is, to a certain extent correct. Barring occasional visits from Theodore Thomas, we had theretofore relied wholly upon our own resources in the matters of conductor and orchestra, but now an era of importation began. Mr. Henschel was the first of a long line of imported conductors. And the importing system, once begun, flourished wonderously.

I have spoken of the swath the Symphony Concerts cut. Good earnest of this is the fact that, with the exception of the choral clubs—the Apollo, the Cecilia and the Boylston Club, which could hardly be called concert-giving organizations for the general public, as their audiences were made up exclusively of subscribing members, and no tickets to their concerts were publicly sold—everything else of the musical sort in the city suffered. The Harvard Musical Association gave only one more season of concerts (in the Boston Museum, ending on March 9, 1882); but this was natural enough. Resident artists who had for years been giving successful recitals or chamber-concerts suddenly found their audiences dwindling away; neither did distinguished visiting singers or players have a very good time of it.

Probably the most notable instance of all was the Handel and Haydn Society. This organization, in addition to its regular performances of oratorios, had, for some time past, been giving triennial festivals, of a week's duration; it had been in the habit of applying to rich music-lovers in the city to subscribe to a "guaranty fund" for each festival, but had been so successful financially as never to have had to draw upon it; the triennial festivals had paid their own way and even made money. But, for the one given shortly after the establishment

Continued on Page Six

The Kindling Presence

George Henschel (Horner)

As the Audiences at the Symphony Concerts in the Old Music Hall Saw Him Fifty Years Ago

The First Conductor, As He Also Remembered

Sir George Henschel's Good-Humored Recollections Put to Print Thirty Years Later

THE simple and straightforward announcement made by Mr. Higginson in the Boston papers at the end of March, 1881, headed "In the Interest of Good Music," plainly stating the accomplished fact of the establishment of the new orchestra and giving my name as that of its first conductor, came as a great surprise to the general public, not wholly agreeable, I fear, to some musicians, and evidently a positive shock to most critics, one of whom promptly delivered himself of the following declaration: "Some protest is certainly needed to stem his tide of adulation that rises and breaks at the feet of Mr. Henschel. We have had conductors in Boston, and good ones. It is a mistaken idea of Mr. Henschel's friends—if not of his own—that we have waited here, all unconscious of our own poverty and great needs, for this musical trinity combined in the person of Mr. Henschel—oratorio exponent, composer and orchestral conductor. We are not, and have not been, half as ignorant as they suppose."

Others followed suit in similar terms, though apparently with little effect on public opinion, for when, early in September, the sale of tickets for the first season commenced, both Mr. Higginson and I were greatly astonished and gratified at the demand for them. As early as six o'clock on the morning of the sale people commenced getting into line before the doors of the old Music Hall, one paper even asserting this to have taken place in the afternoon of the previous day. The Transcript, Boston's premier evening paper, asked in bewilderment: "Where does all the audience come from? Where have all the symphony-goers been during the last ten years that they have hidden themselves so completely from public view?" This was encouraging. I was by that time rehearsing industriously and enthusiastically with the orchestra, with all the members of which I stood on the most friendly footing, and to whom, previous to the announcement of rehearsal, I had issued this letter:

"To the members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra:

"Gentlemen—I beg leave to say a few words to you now, in order to avoid waste of time after our work has once begun. Wherever a body of men are working together for one and the same end, as you and I, the utmost of unity and mutual understanding is required in order to achieve anything that is great or good.

"Everyone of us, engaged for the concerts we are on the point of beginning, has been engaged because his powers, his talents have been considered valuable for the purpose. Every one of us, therefore, should have a like interest as well as a like share in the success of our work, and it is in this regard that I address you now, calling your attention to the following points with which I urgently beg of you to acquaint yourselves thoroughly:

"Let us be punctual. Better ten minutes before than one behind the time appointed.

"Tuning will cease the moment the conductor gives the sign for doing so.

"No member of the orchestra, even if his presence be not needed for the moment, will leave the hall during the time of the rehearsals and concerts without the consent of the conductor.

"The folios containing the parts will be closed after each rehearsal and concert.

"Inasmuch as we are engaged for musical purposes we will not talk of private matters during rehearsals and concerts.

"Hoping that, thus working together with perfect understanding, our labors will be crowned with success, I am, gentlemen, your obedient servant. G. H."

Being absolutely my own master as regards the orchestra and its work, I tried several experiments in the way of the placing of the orchestra, dividing, for instance, the strings into equal halves on my right and left with the object of enabling the listeners on either side of the hall to have the full effect of the whole string-quintet. Those experiments I submitted in letters, illustrated by diagrams, to Brahms, who most kindly, in his answers, commented upon their practicability or otherwise. "But," he writes on one occasion, "by far the best feature in all your arrangements of the orchestra, is the fact that no committee will be sitting in front of it. There is not a Kapellmeister on the whole of our continent who would not envy you that!"

In making of the programs I endeavored to be guided by the principles laid down by the famous German writer, Gustav Freytag, whose book, "The Technique of the Drama," I had studied in my Leipzig days, principles which he had evolved from the study of the great dramatists from Sophocles to Shakspeare. In that book Freytag maintains that a drama should have an uneven number of acts, either three or five. The interest should steadily ascend during the first two—or, in the case of a five-act play—during the first three, acts. Here should be the climax, after which, in the last act—or, in the case of a five-act play, in the last two—the interest should gently descend until, at the end, it has reached the level of the outset.

Accordingly, with hardly an exception, I arranged my programs so that commencing with an overture, after which there came a solo, either instrumental or vocal, the climax, viz. the symphony, stood at the end of the first part which generally took up, as regards the length of the concert, two-thirds of the whole. The second part then was a gentle "letting-down" from the more or less acute mental effort claimed by the first part. The scheme semed to meet with the approval even of the critics. Anyhow, at all the concerts, which took place every Saturday evening for twenty-four successive weeks, the hall was crowded, and as to the public rehearsals on the Friday afternoons, for which—no tickets being sold beforehand—one paid twenty-five cents at the door to every part of the house, there was many an afternoon when people had to be turned away.

I shall never forget the public rehearsal for the last concert of the season; when Beethoven's Ninth Symphony—the preceding eight had all been given in the course of the series—was on the program. I had left my house in Otis Place for old Music Hall—the magnificent Symphony Hall of the present day did not exist then—and was crossing the Common. In the distance I observed, fully three or four minutes' walk to the hall yet, a huge gathering of people. "What a pity," I said to myself, thinking some accident had happened, "this should occur just today, when it will interfere with the progress of people wanting to go to the rehearsal!" Imagine my surprise and, needless to add, my gratification when, on coming nearer, I found that the crowd was slowly moving towards Music Hall—they were the very people trying to get admission to the rehearsal! I had to beg and elbow my way to the hall, and even there—men and women sitting on the steps leading to the platform—encountered some difficulty in my endeavor to reach the conductor's place in time. As far, therefore, as regards the public, there was nothing to complain of.

But—the critics! It was after the unquestionable success of the very first concerts that the seemingly organized newspaper attacks commenced. Nothing was good. My tempi, my "untraditional" way of conducting, even the seating of the orchestra furnished abundant reasons for adverse criticism, the growth of which in violence appeared to keep pace with that of the favor the concerts found with the public from week to week. I was, by one critic, considered "a veritable Brahmin" in my passion for Brahms. "There are more dissonances in Music Hall in a week now," he wrote, "than there used to be in a year." Ridicule, sarcasm, venom, wit—not always free from vulgarity—were called upon to serve the purpose of defeating Mr. Higginson's scheme. At one of the concerts I was announced to play a manuscript Pianoforte Concerto of my own—which soon afterwards, in spite of its momentary success, shared the fate of that significant Concert-Overture—and this afforded the critics a welcome opportunity for the activity of all the above requisites of warfare—a warfare which, however, was of a decidedly one-sided kind, as neither Mr. Higginson nor I ever took the slightest public notice of these attacks. Here is a little sample:

Mr. Henschel will appear as pianist, composer, and conductor, and he has already appeared as a singer in the series. That is a good deal for one man to do. But he will do it with all satisfaction to the public, which seems to be entirely captivated by him. The only thing he cannot do is to appear as a string quartet or sing duets with himself.

That some people minded this sort of thing more than I did, was shown by a letter which appeared in the Boston Herald, headed "Mr. Henschel's Critics Criticized," and signed "Pro bono publico." It began thus:

"Let me ask, is it fair, just, honorable, or even descent for the managers of these papers"—quoting the Saturday Evening Gazette, the Advertiser, and the Transcript—"to permit such critics to vilify, malign, abuse and ridicule a gentleman of Mr. Henschel's abilities, a born musician, a simple, earnest, devoted worker for the highest and best in music at all times?" and ended: "If the gentlemen of the press desire to organize a clamor against Mr. Henschel, they will find his friends quite ready to meet them. The fact has been established that Mr. Henschel is a success as a conductor. He has had serious difficulties to overcome on account of the indifferent and demoralized condition of his men. He has not been able yet to prevent some of the old fiddlers from doubling their backs like cobblers and drawing their bows as they would so many waxends; but he has, nevertheless, added new blood, and imparted much of his own enthusiasm, ardor, and life into the mechanical old stagers, so that the result has been an agreeable surprise to all of us, and which has never been seen under the baton of any other conductor. As a whole,

Continued on Page Six

Concert-Crier

Next Week

Orchestral—Friday afternoon and Saturday evening in Symphony Hall, first concerts of the fiftieth year of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conductor. At both the program (with one exception) of the inaugural concerts, Oct. 21-22, 1881, will be repeated, viz.: Beethoven's Overture, "Dedication of The House"; Air, "Che faró" from Gluck's "Orpheus"; Haydn's Symphony in B-flat (No. 12); Schubert's Dances from the Incidental Music to the Play, "Rosamünde"; Scena from Bruch's forgotten "Odysseus"; Prelude to Wagner's "Die Meistersinger," substituted for Weber's "Jubilee Overture," too cheap and dull for risk upon audiences of 1930. Annie Louise Cary, long since dead, was the singer in '81; Mme. Matzenauer succeeds her. Finally, Sir George Henschel, conductor of the orchestra at the first concerts of its first year, is on his way from London to be conductor at the first concerts of its fiftieth. Is there a parallel instance in modern musical history?

Further On

Week, Oct. 12-18—Wednesday evening, Jordan Hall; Edward MacHugh, baritone of radio and records; assisting, Marie Murray, contralto, Einar Hansen, violinist. . . . Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Symphony Hall; second pair of Symphony Concerts, Serge Koussevitzky conductor. (New symphony by Roussel; Jubilee Ode, poem by Robert Hillyer, setting by Professor Hill) . . . Saturda afternoon, Jordan Hall, Winifred MacBride, pianist via London (Prokofiev Ravel, Moeran).

Week, Oct. 19-25—Sunday afternoon, Symphony Hall; Fritz Kreisler, violinist, as his public expects him and flocks to him. . . . Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Symphony Hall; third pair of Symphony Concerts, Serge Koussevitzky conductor.

Week Oct. 26-Nov. 1—Sunday afternoon, Symphony Hall; Winifred Christie, mature and adept pianist, playing upon the double-keyboard piano invented by Emanuel Moór, built by Messrs. Bechstein. . . . Sunday afternoon, hall not specified; Giovanni Cerullo, light tenor, and Raffaele Martino's Concert Orchestra in light numbers. . . . Wednesday evening, Jordan Hall; Sybil Webb, soprano, singing songs by Jacques Pillois of the Symphony Orchestra assisting, the Parisian Instrumental Trio (Laurent flute, B. Zighera harp, A. Zighera, viola da gamba. . . . Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Symphony Hall; fourth pair of Symphony Concerts, Serge Koussevitzky conductor.

Eighty—but Still Keen

Sir George Henschel

From a Photograph Privately Taken at His Country House, Alt-na-Criche in the Scottish Highlands

"Sober, Simple and Demure"

Boston Music Hall.

SEASON 1881-82.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. GEORG HENSCHEL, Conductor.

I. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 22D, AT 8, P. M.

PROGRAMME.

OVERTURE, Op. 124, "Dedication of the House."	BEETHOVEN.
AIR. (Orpheus.)	GLUCK.
SYMPHONY in B flat.	HAYDN.
(No. 12 of Breitkopf's edition.)
BALLET MUSIC. (Rosamunde.)	SCHUBERT.
SCENA. (Odysseus.)	MAX BRUCH.
FESTIVAL OVERTURE.	WEBER.

SOLOIST:

MISS ANNIE LOUISE CARY.

Program Leaf

Of the First Concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Reproduced from Howe's Historical Sketch

Dance Calendar

La Argentina—Symphony Hall, Tuesday evening, Oct. 21; the Spanish dancer, now established with her American public, returning, unlessened, in familiar and unfamiliar numbers.

Angna Enters—Jordan Hall, Thursday evening, Oct. 30; the inventive and witty spirit of "Episodes and Compositions in Dance Form," bringing a freshened program to new and favorable surroundings.

As Henschel Recalls

Continued from Page Four

the orchestra is certainly equal to any ever heard in Boston, and, if it is not already, by the end of the season I doubt not it will be the best one of its class in America.

This was very pleasant reading for a change, although it had very little effect on the critics. The public, however, continued to flock to the concerts in ever-increasing numbers, and the members of the orchestra showed their goodwill to me by the gift of a silver salad set, which was presented to me at one of the concerts in February, '82, happening to fall on my birthday, in full sight of, and with the evident warm approval of, the audience.

Neither Mr. Higginson nor I heeded these things, and the second season commenced "as advertised." I was greatly amused on reading in The Transcript on the day after the first concert: "Either Mr. Henschel has converted the critics, or the critics have converted Mr. Henschel. Which is it?" And actually, after this, there seemed to prevail a more conciliatory tone in the utterings of the critics, with now and then a flickering of the old spirit, as will presently be seen. The program of the concert for Saturday, Feb. 17, 1883, had in the usual way been announced on the last page of the preceding one, but while rehearsing it on the morning of Tuesday the 13th, the news of Wagner's death at the Palazzo Vendramini in Venice was brought into the hall, whereupon I immediately decided to abandon the advertised program and substitute for it one entirely consisting of works from the pen of the dead master. This was the list:

Prelude to "Tristan and Isolde"
Lohengrin's Legend and Farewell
(Singer, Charles R. Adams)
Siegfried Idyll
Elisabeth's Greeting from "Tannhäuser"
(Singer, Gabrielle Boema)
Prelude to "The Mastersingers"
Pogner's Address from "The Mastersingers"
(Singer, Mr. Henschel; Conductor, Mr. Listemann)
Prelude to "Parsifal"
Death March from "Götterdämmerung"

The "Parsifal" prelude I had introduced to Boston earlier in the season, playing it both at the beginning and at the end of the same concert, a proceeding which, much to my gratification, had found considerable favor with the musicians as well as the public. This Wagner-Memorial Concert was thus criticized by the Gazette:

> A tribute of respect to the dead composer crowded the front of the first gallery, and consisted of some mourning drapery decorated with laurel and a portrait of Wagner. The orchestra wore black instead of the customary white neckties. The program was gloomy enough in all conscience, and the necessity for its performance gave one more cause for regret at the composer's death. The whole concert was an elegaic nightmare. We doubt if ever Music Hall echoed to a longer stretch of cacophonous dreariness within the same length of time. Incredible!

A year later, on the anniversary of Wagner's death, the program contained, in memory of the event, three of his compositions. This time one of the critics, and a very clever one, Mr. Louis C. Elson, who has, among other meritorious work, done some excellent English versions of a great number of German songs, blossomed into poetry:

Oh, Henschel, cease thy higher flight,
And give the public something light!
Let no more Wagner themes thy bill enchance
And give the native workers just one chance.
Don't give the Dvorák symphony again;
If you would give us joy, oh, give us Paine!

The last line is really quite witty, for Mr. John K. Paine, Professor of Music at Harvard University, and a composer of considerable skill and erudition, had written a "Spring Symphony" which was "not half bad," and which I brought to a hearing during the series.

From the reference to Dvorák it will be seen that the task I had set myself, of introducing the works of living composers new to Boston, was not a very grateful one. It does seem almost as incredible now as the "cacophonous dreariness of Wagner" to have, for instance, the Adagio from Brahms's Serenade in D likened by one of the critics, as it was, to "the sapient musings of some brilliant idiot"! "We are told," that gentleman continued, "by an eminent musician of the orchestra, that thirty years will make a wondrous change in our views concerning Brahms's idiosyncrasies. Let us not run so unwelcome a risk. Let us die in peace, with none of the abortive transition to plague our life away, that might be expected by some of the so-called future school of music. . . ."

During the second year of my conducting the Boston Symphony Orchestra my heart was occasionally made heavy by letters from Europe, expressing disappointment at my remaining over there so long. Mme. Clara Schumann wrote: "Do you want to forsake Europe altogether? You can imagine how the news of your having accepted for a second year astonishes me, and how much I, and doubtless many with me, deplore it. What will Brahms say to it? . . ." And Brahms, from Ischl, in June 1882, writes: "That you have undertaken to conduct another series of twenty-five concerts in Boston is a very nice thing in itself, only not exactly to us a cause for rejoicing. . . ."

Still, I had grown so fond of my orchestra, to work with which under such uniquely advantageous and gratifying conditions was a source of constant delight to me, that I accepted Mr. Higginson's offer of a continuation of my services for a third term, during which the scheme of giving concerts in places outside of Boston was inaugurated—confined, however, for the time, to towns in New England. But when at the end of the third season Mr. Higginson, now assured of the stability of the institution, submitted to me a contract, the acceptance of which would practcially have meant settling in the States for good, I felt that the ties which bound me to the old country were too strong for me, prosperous and happy and profitable in every sense as these three years had been, and I decided to return to Europe.

As I write this I see before my mind's eye the crowded Boston Music Hall on the evening of the last concert of the season '83-'84. The first number on the program was Schumann's overture to "Manfred," which opens with an impetuous forte phrase, syncopated, quick, and requiring a very decided, strong down-beat. I had raised my baton to attention and—except the garland of flowers which friendly hands had wound around my desk nothing seemed to indicate an unusual state of things—was just on the point of letting it come down with a will, when—shall I ever forget the peculiar sensation it gave me?—I saw, as in a dream, the leader and, with him, the whole orchestra rise to their feet, and before I could realize what was happening, the familiar, affecting strains of "Auld Lang Syne" filled the vast hall, played by those dear fellows of the orchestra and sung by the audience, which I noticed, in turning round bewildered and embarrassed, had risen too. I was touched to a degree, far too much so for thinking of speaking. At a subsequent semi-public farewell gathering of friends I found on my table the following apostrophe, in a neat hand, on a nice, old-fashioned sheet of paper with embossed edges:

Henschel! Henschel!
Women and men shall
Sit at thy feet and list to thy song.
Henschel! Henschel!
Ah, where and when shall
Such rapture once more to us belong?
Henschel! Henschel!
Never again shall
Leader or Singer be half so dear.
Henschel! Henschel!
Sing thou and then shall Earth be forgotten and Heaven draw near!

If whoever wrote this be still among the living and happening to read this book, I should be very grateful for a revelation of his or her identity. Surely it was not easy for me to tear myself from so much kindness and affection!

Abridged from Chapters XX and XXI of Sir George Henschel's "Musings and Memories of a Musician," published in London (1918) by Messrs. Macmillan and still on library shelves.

In the Beginning

Continued from Page Four

of the Symphony Orchestra, the Han and Haydn found itself forced to dr upon nearly the whole of its guara fund. It never gave another triennia

Of course this aspect of the Symph Orchestra's success called forth no li grumbling; people were not wanting w called the new organization "our musi dog in the manger." Proverbial expr sions, like "Live and let live," we worked pretty hard. But this all-abso ing quality was really part and parc of those new conditions at which I hav already hinted. Some well-qualified judge thought these conditions intrinsicall regrettable; for they certainly put a end to the musical autonomy of Bosto to our relying upon our own resource alone. I think, however, that it is quit idle to discuss this point; for I can n but hold these conditions, whether goo or bad, to have been practically inevi table, and their growth fully in accord ance with the nature of things. . . .

This is quite enough to indicate my line of argument. To cut short a long and tedious discussion, let me ask two simple questions: Where would Boston now be in the general musical race if she had continued to rely on her own resources ever since 1911? And how many of us would be satisfied with her position? Moreover, if some of us be still inclined to lament our loss of musical autonomy, let us reflect that Boston does not by any means stand alone in this respect, but that her situation is that of every other prominent musical city in the world—New York at the head of them! Boston has grown to be a great and recognized musical center; and no musical center nowadays relies exclusively upon its own resources, not even Paris—though Paris comes nearest to doing it. What a city cannot do for and by itself, it has to pay others to do for it. My friends, we must swim with the current; stemming it is out of the question. Furthermore, an old-fashioned naphtha launch cannot race with a modern motor boat.

But to return: with and in spite of all that has been said of Mr. Henschel, it should not be forgotten that he was an exceedingly cultivated musician and a man of genius. Such a man must needs, in one way or another, exert a good influence. As a program-maker, Boston has seldom seen his equal; he had quite peculiar tact and insight in this matter. The programs for the three years of his conductorship may not look very enticing now; but ah! if there is anything that makes an old stager feelingly aware of the flight of time it is the perusal of programs from the past. It seems now as if the years from 1881 to 1884 could hardly have come within a very brilliant period of musical production; for, of the twenty novelties of the important sort brought out ("first time") by Henschel, barely two or three remain on the active list today. Cowen's "Scandinavian" Symphony (given on Jan. 27, 1883) may still be played occasionally in England, but hardly elsewhere. What do we now know of Volkmann's Second Symphony in B-flat major (Dec. 22, 1883), or Raff's "Winter" Symphony, No. 11, in A (Jan. 19, 1884)? Joachim Raff was a much-discussed man then, and a new work of his was looked forward to with interest. Eheu, fugaces! If I mention Brahms's "Tragic Overture," George W. Chadwick's "Thalia," Bizet's "Roma," and the Prelude to Wagner's "Parsifal," I think I give all of Mr. Henschel's "novelties" that have held their own down to our time. Yet I have still to speak of the most thrilling of all (most thrilling then!) Dvorák's first Symphony, in D. major (Oct. 27, 1883). The work is dead as a door-nail now, but made our hearts beat when we first heard it! The opening phrase may still be acknowledged as one of the most superb in all orchestral writing; but, as one got to know the symphony better, one began to see that that lordly phrase was about all there was in it. And one phrase cannot keep a whole symphony alive.

One element in Mr. Henschel's programes was very welcome to audiences at the time, though it has lapsed almost completely from the "serious" concert repertory since; light French and German overtures—to Herold's "Zampa," Nicolai's "Merry Wives of Windsor," Auber's "Lac des Feés," and several others. Such things have quite naturally fallen out of line, for I doubt if anybody but a few of us older ones would enjoy them today; they have even stopped getting more than prefunctory applause at The Pops. Tempus edax rerum has swallowed few of his children more thoroughly than the old French Opéra-Comique and German Singspiel repertories!

On Sept. 30, 1911, Mr. W. F. Apthorp, then revisiting the city which had known him as reviewer and man of letters, host and bon vivant, contributed to The Transcript an article about the early days of the Symphony Orchestra under Henschel and Gericke. It was printed to mark the beginning of the orchestra's thirtieth year. With minor omissions, so much as related to Mr. Henschel's term, reappears above.

121

OCT 4

Music of the World—Theatri

Henschel—Fifty Years After

By ERIC BLOM

London

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA patrons who remember the opening concert given by that institution, Oct. 22, 1881, will not be unduly astonished to hear that its first conductor, Sir George Henschel, whom they will see again at the concerts of Oct. 10 and 11, is in his eighty-first year. What is likely to gladden them, however, will be the appearance of a man in the full vigor of his musicianship. Not much more than a year ago we in England heard Sir George singing Schubert at the piano in his inimitable way at a public concert—and the conductor's art of course is usually less handicapped by the passage of years than is the singer's.

Boston has every reason today to be proud of its world-famed symphony orchestra. It was a gracious thought that led to the invitation, after a consistently progressive career of 50 years, of its original conductor in order to let him take his due share of the glory of the occasion. For it is well to remember that whereas nowadays conductor and orchestra in Boston are worthy of each other, the balance of excellence was at first distinctly on the former's side. The generous founder and supporter of this symphony orchestra, the late Col. Henry Lee Higginson, at once aimed high in his choice of a chief for a band from which he knew well enough that perfection could not at once be expected, as the following announcement made by him in the Boston papers would seem to indicate: "The orchestra is to number 60 selected musicians; their time, so far as required for careful training and for a given number of concerts, to be engaged in advance." The words "careful training" are significant, and nobody need be told nowadays that they were acted upon. But no doubt comparatively few people remember that it was Henschel who first took the orchestra in hand, and that he must have done more uphill work with it than any of the eminent conductors who followed in his footsteps, starting with Wilhelm Gericke and ending thus far with Koussevitzky, with Nikisch, Paur, Muck, Fiedler, Rabaud and Monteux coming between.

A Fiftieth Crossing

The figure 50, it is curious to note, plays its part in the career of Sir George Henschel, as well as in the Boston orchestra's annals this year. He has so far crossed the Atlantic 49 times. The difficulty at first was to avoid arousing bad feeling among the local musicians, Sir George told me just before he left for his fiftieth crossing. It seemed advisable to draw the orchestra entirely from players resident in the city, and though some young and talented people were available, a number of instruments could be manned only by superannuated and none too efficient performers. However, Colonel Higginson's scheme was on a more than sufficiently munificent basis to allow for unlimited rehearsals, and thus many technical deficiencies could be made good by practice.

The first season was a decided success, and held out definite promise of even better things to come. But it was hard work, Sir George went on to say, training instrumentalists, some of whom were more willing than accomplished, and at the end of the first season he went to Europe to find a number of good wind soloists and string players. After the second season he did some more weeding out and replanting, so that by the end of the third season Colonel Higginson's artistic tillage had blossomed gloriously and yielded good fruit. Henschel, however, whom many ties bound to Europe, did not renew his contract. Perhaps his career as a singer was even dearer to him than his activity as a conductor, and it is possible, too, that he wished to find leisure for composition in accustomed surroundings and to be near musical friends, among whom were many of the great figures of the day.

Crowning Joy of Career

Be that as it may, Sir George told me he was looking forward with keenest delight to his visit to Boston and declared that the prospect of conducting this wonderful orchestra was the crowning joy of his career. What pleases him greatly, he said, is the happy thought on the part of the trustees to ask him to give the program with which he opened the first season.

"I am going to comply with this request save in one particular," he added. "The concert will open with Beethoven's 'Consecration of the House' Overture and go on to Haydn's Symphony in B flat (B. & H. No. 12) and the Ballet music from Schubert's 'Rosamunde.' The original program concluded with Weber's 'Jubilee' Overture, but I feel I ought to give at least one work in which the whole orchestra as now constituted may take part. I am therefore going to substitute the 'Meistersinger' Prelude for Weber's overture, though the Wagner item could not have figured in the opening concert, at which the music had been confined to less fully scored works, according to the available instrumental resources."

It must be an especial pleasure for the first conductor of the Boston Symphony Orcestra to be able to renew his personal connection with the founder's family. Mrs. M. G. Haughton, he says, niece of Colonel Higginson's widow—who by the way is 93 years of age—has with the most warm-hearted hospitality placed her town residence in Boston at his disposal during his visit, herself retiring to her country seat at Prides Crossing the while. He must be immensely relieved to be able to avoid hotels which, invaded as they are by jazz bands these days, offer more exasperation than comfort to musicians of his stamp.

SIR GEORGE HENSCHEL

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
TIMES

BOSTON SYMPHONY TO GIVE CONCERTS HERE

The world-famous Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will celebrate its fiftieth anniversary with a Beethoven Festival at Constitution Hall on December 1, 2, 5 and 6 under the local management of Mrs. Wilson-Greene, will formally open its 1930-31 season tonight with a nation-wide broadcast which, it is reported, will net the coffers of the symphony no less than $15,000 for the one radio appearance.

Serge Koussevitzky, who arrived in New York last Monday night on the "Ile de France" from Paris, will conduct tonight's concert which will be one of the features of the Massachusetts Tercentenary celebration. Three numbers by Massachusetts composers are tentatively listed for tonight's program—Arthur Foote's Suite in E major, Edward Burlingame Hill's "Lilacs," and Charles Martin Loeffler's "A Pagan Poem." The program will also include Debussy's Prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun" and Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks."

SERGE KOUSSEVITZSKY.

The first regular concert in Symphony Hall will be played next Friday and Saturday October 10 and 11, with Sir George Henschel, the orchestra's first conductor, handling the baton. Sir George has made the trip to Boston from England specially for this pair of concerts and appropriately enough, he will play, with one exception, the same program he played when the orchestra first made its bow to the Boston public October 22 1881.

This program will include Beethoven's overture, "Dedication of the House;" an air from Gluck's "Orpheus," Haydn's Symphony, in B flat, the ballet music from Schubert's "Rosamunde," a scene from Bruch's "Odysseus," and the prelude to Wagner's "Mastersingers of Nuremberg." Margaret Matzenauer is programmed as soloist.

It is understood that arrangements are being completed to add two world-famous artists to the program of the Beethoven festival here at Constitution Hall in December. One of these will be a pianist of the first rank who will play Beethoven's piano concerto while a violinist of international renown will appear on another program, playing Beethoven's violin concerto with orchestra.

Details have not been completed as to the program, but it is definitely announced that the Beethoven Festival, with Koussevitzky conducting, will be given on Tuesday, Wednesday and Friday evenings, December 2, 3 and 5, and on Saturday Saturday afternoon, December 6. On this latter occasion, Beethoven's magnificent Ninth Symphony will be given, with a chorus of 250 prominent Washington singers.

The Beethoven Festival will be under the management of Mrs. Wilson-Greene.

THIS CLIPPING FROM COLUMBUS, O.
CITIZEN

MARY GARDEN TO SING NEW OPERAS IN COMING SEASON

Tiny Soprano, Fresh From Summer of Sea Massages In Riviera Sunlight, Sails Today for U. S.

By United Press.

PARIS, Oct. 4.—Mary Garden, her school girl figure trim from a summer at sea-massaging, motored to Cherbourg where she will embark today on the Bremen for New York.

Miss Garden said she intended to sing many new operas for Chicago's pleasure this winter.

"I know that you wanted to know that," she commented. "And I can authorize you to say further that I am not married and may even never marry."

"I shall sing 'Camilla' in Chicago and also 'La Navarraise,' and 'Le Jongleur De NotreDame' by Massenet; 'Resurrection' by Alfano, and 'Pelleas Et Melisande' by Debussy," she said.

"I shall also give two recitals with the pianist Giessinking," she added.

"I have promised to sing Debussy's 'La Damoiselle Elue,' with the Boston Symphony, and in February I hope to come back to the Riviera to sing at Monte Carlo."

Miss Garden was particularly happy over the fact that her favorite number, 11, hit its winning stride at the green tables during the summer's end.

A nice run of luck on No. 11 at Monte Carlo took her roulette account out of the red ink.

PLAN FREEDOM FETE

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
Saturday Theatre Review

MUSICAL NOTABLES ARRIVE ON ILE DE FRANCE FROM EUROPE

Serge Koussevitzky, Paul Kochanski and Erika Morini Among Them

Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, arrived here Tuesday morning aboard the Ile de France to begin the orchestra's semi-centennial season, which will be his seventh season with this organization.

Before leaving for Boston Mr. Koussevitzky listed some of the works specially commissioned for this season by the Boston Symphony, which will be performed under his direction: A symphony for chorus and orchestra by Igor Stravinsky; a symphonic poem by Arthur Honegger; the fourth symphony of Serge Prokofieff; symphonic poems by Paul Dukas, Maurice Ravel, Paul Hindemith and Arnold Bax, and a work by Albert Roussel, which the conductor was carrying in his pocket on his arrival. Mr. Roussel will pay his first visit to this country this season, beginning with Mrs. F. S. Coolidge's chamber music festival this month in Chicago. Mr. Koussevitzky also will introduce a new composition for orchestra by the Russian composer Arthur Lourie.

Roland Hayes also arrived on the Ile de France and left for Boston. The Negro tenor, who passed the summer in Europe in preparation for this season's programs, said that his first 1930-'31 appearance here would be Saturday night, November 8; in the Columbia University Institute's series at the McMillin Academic Theatre.

The Ile de France also brought two violinists, Erika Morini and Paul Kochanski. Miss Morini, who came here from Hungary in 1921, when fifteen years old, and made a notable impression in her New York debut, will make her first American appearance since 1924 next Sunday night in Carnegie Hall. Mr. Kochanski brought with him a violin by Jean Baptiste Guadagnini, dated 1771, which had been owned for thirty-five years by the Polish violinist Barcewicz, and bought by Mr. Kochanski this summer.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HANOVER, PA.
SUN
OCT

Sir George Henschel, visiting America for the first time since he led the Boston Symphony Orchestra's first three seasons, 1881-1884, is to lead the opening concerts of that organization, Oct. 10-11, and will remain as a listener for the next two concerts under the baton of Serge Koussevitzky. For this anniversary season a number of living composers have written scores which will have their first performances during the season. Another feature of this fiftieth anniversary season will be a Bach festival in Boston in March. This is Mr. Koussevitzky's seventh season as conductor of the Boston Symphony, which will give the usual concert in Baltimore, Feb. 4.

* * *

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE MADISON, WIS.
CAPITAL TIMES
OCT 4 - 1930

BOSTON SYMPHONY

A program consisting almost in its entirety of works by Massachusetts composers will be presented by the Boston Symphony orchestra, one of America's greatest musical organizations, over an NBC network tonight at 6:30. This will be the first concert ever presented by the symphony, and arranged exclusively for radio broadcasting. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the orchestra, has prepared a program especially for the unseen audience. The radio concert has been arranged as the orchestra's contribution to the Tercentenary program of the Massachusetts Bay Colony. It also inaugurates the fiftieth season of the Boston Symphony.

THIS CLIPPING FROM JACKSONVILLE, ILL.
JOURNAL

WILL BROADCAST SPORTS EVENTS

New York Oct. 3.—(AP)—The third game of the world series, a number of football broadcasts and a concert by the Boston symphony orchestra are included in tomorrow's radio offerings.

Both the National and the Columbia chains will continue the setup used for the first two series games in giving details of the third contest between the Athletics and St. Louis from St. Louis. The broadcast starts at 2 p. m. (E. S. T.)

While no chain broadcast of football are planned, individual stations have made arrangements to describe a number of games, insofar as they do not conflict with the world series.

Among these are:

Tulane vs. Northwestern by KYW and WBBM Chicago.

Vanderbilt vs. Minnesota by KSTP, St. Paul.

Indiana vs. Ohio State by WTAM Cleveland.

14

Oct 5 Herald

THE Concerts

By PHILIP HALE

The 50th season of the Boston Symphony orchestra will open next Friday afternoon, when the concert will have a sentimental interest. Sir George Henschel, the first conductor of the orchestra, will then present the program, with one exception, that he prepared for the first concert on Oct. 22, 1881: Beethoven, "Consecration of the House"; Gluck, "Che faro senza Eurydice" from "Orfeo ed Eurydice"; Haydn, Symphony, B flat (B. & H. No. 12); Schubert, ballet music from "Rosamunde"; Bruch, Penelope's Lament; but instead of Weber's festival overture, Sir George, for some unknown reason, will conduct the prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg"; Annie Louise Cary was the singer at the first concert; Mme. Matzenauer will sing next Friday.

In the late seventies Mr. H. L. Higginson was planning the establishment of a permanent orchestra. The time of the players for "careful training" and for the 20 concerts each season was to be engaged in advance. But who was to be the conductor?

Isidor Georg Henschel, born at Breslau on Feb. 18, 1850, came with his betrothed, Lillian Bailey, to Boston in 1880 for a concert tour in the United States. He was then known and applauded in Europe as a singer. He had sung in England with Miss Bailey, having been one of her teachers. Their first appearance in Boston was at a concert in the Old Bay State Course on Nov. 1, 1880.

On March 3, 1881, an Overture (ms.) by Mr. Henschel was performed for the first time at a concert of the Harvard Musical Association. Mr. Henschel was invited to conduct his overture. Mr. Higginson was in the audience, which was pleased by the vigor of the performance. The newspapers of Boston in April, 1881, published his plan for the new concerts. He then named Mr. Henschel as the conductor. Now Mr. Henschel had had no experience in Europe in training an orchestra or in the interpretation of orchestral works.

Any one can learn by consulting the newspapers published during the three years of Mr. Henschel's conductorship that the concerts were often bitterly criticised; that criticism of the conductor was often savage. Mr. Henschel had no easy time of it. Even his friend Mr. Apthorp, writing to the Evening Transcript in 1911, about the early years, said that the choice of the conductor was made "without due circumspection"; that Mr. Higginson was "in plain English paying Mr. Henschel a high salary for those days, for learning his trade in public." It should not be forgotten that there were "unfortunate elements" in the orchestra. Bernhard Listemann, the concert master, a remarkable violinist in certain ways, and a sound musician, was a nervous, high-strung man, constitutionally unfit for the position. He was wont to hurry the tempo; he insisted on playing the music in his own way; without the intention of usurping the conductor's throne, he could not follow any conductor. Then there were intrigues against Mr. Henschel in the orchestra and out of it.

Mr. Henschel's programs were generally well arranged and interesting—in those years. How many of the "novelties" in 1882-84 are heard today? Who is now familiar with Cowen's "Scandinavian" symphony, Volkmann's symphony No. 2, Raff's "Winter" symphony, Dvorak's symphony No. 1? The

Sir George remained for three seasons, enthusiastically building the foundation for that magnificent organization we now have. His task was not an easy one. The public responded to his efforts admirably; but the critics, as he bemusedly relates in his delightful autobiography, were out to sting him. One of the gentry, so Sir George tells us, called him a "Brahmin" on account of his devotion to Brahms whose compositions were to the critic "the incoherencies of a brilliant idiot."

He was accused—how natural it sounds!—of a tendency toward egotism in his interpretations. But such attacks he smiled at—and kept his mind fixed on his work with the result that at the end of three years the orchestra was hailed as the finest in the country.

Even though the Americans of 1881 knew little of Sir George Henschel, he had an excellent reputation in Europe. There he had been called "one of the greatest living singers." He had appeared as soloist in oratorios of Verdi, choral works of Brahms, and an opera of Anton Rubenstein's under the direction of the composers themselves.

Noted Names

Among the names of his intimate friends of that time, we find the outstanding musical names. He had spent a memorable two weeks with Brahms of which he kept a record that is reproduced in his autobiography. He tells of a young composer bringing a manuscript to Brahms during that time and timidly playing it to him. Brahms listened patiently. At its conclusion the great composer idly fingered the music and said:

"Tell me, my young friend, where do you get your beautiful manuscript paper?"

A more pleasing anecdote is the one which Sir George tells concerning Liszt. Henschel and a group of Liszt's admirers were gathered in the composer's home at Weimar. Liszt entered and, carelessly pointed to a package lying on a chair. "A present," he told them, "for you." On opening it, they found it to be a manuscript of Wagner's "Die Walkuere." Breathlessly, the young people drew around Liszt's piano as the grand, leonine figure took the music and, for the first time, played that glorious scene in which Wotan bids farewell to his beloved daughter Brunnhilde.

And so we might continue to pluck one experience after another out of Henschel's crowded life. But to our way of thinking none of them has the charm of Sir George's return this week as a distinguished father to a child that he left a lusty infant but whom he will now find a full-grown, superb stalwart of the world.

Oct. 5 Advertiser

America First—BOSTO

Notable Beginning for 50th Season of Boston's Symphony

By Morris Hastings

TRUMPETS have already ushered the new music season into the lists where it must staunchly meet the vagaries of public opinions and affairs.

Last evening the Boston Symphony, under the direction of Dr. Koussevitzky, broadcast a splendid program especially prepared for the radio. Next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening the same orchestra gives the first visible—as well as audible—performances of the year.

Dr. Koussevitzky fairly bursts with plans for this— the orchestra's fiftieth anniversary year. He has obtained new scores from such prominent composers as Stravinsky, Prokofieff, Ravel, Sibelius and Hindemith which he will perform during the course of the season. He also intends to introduce several new composers — Lourie, Ferroud and Prebinsky—to this country in his programs.

But of all the glowing events promised, none is more affecting than the reappearance of Sir George Henschel next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening wielding his baton over the orchestra—of which he was the very first conductor a half century ago—in a repetition of the same program with which the Boston Symphony made its bow to the world.

When Sir George ascended the conductor's stand in old Music Hall on October 22, 1881, his name was little known to the then musically immature Americans. He had given a few song recitals in the larger cities of this country, and he had, the year previous, conducted a concert of the ageing Harvard Musical Society. The latter proved so satisfying a performance that Major Higginson selected him as the man to organize and lead his cherished ideal—a fine and permanent symphony orchestra in Boston.

Carping Critics

Sir George remained for three seasons, enthusiastically building the foundation for that magnificent organization we now have. His task was not an easy one. The public responded to his efforts admirably; but the critics, as he bemusedly relates in his delightful autobiography, were out to sting him. One of the gentry, so Sir George tells us, called him a "Brahmin" on account of his devotion to Brahms whose compositions were to the critic "the incoherencies of a brilliant idiot."

He was accused—how natural it sounds!—of a tendency toward egotism in his interpretations. But such attacks he smiled at—and kept his mind fixed on his work with the result that at the end of three years the orchestra was hailed as the finest in the country.

Even though the Americans of 1881 knew little of Sir George Henschel, he had an excellent reputation in Europe. There he had been called "one of the greatest living singers." He had appeared as soloist in oratorios of Verdi, choral works of Brahms, and an opera of Anton Rubenstein's under the direction of the composers themselves.

Noted Names

Among the names of his intimate friends of that time, we find the outstanding musical names. He had spent a memorable two weeks with Brahms of which he kept a record that is reproduced in his autobiography. He tells of a young composer bringing a manuscript to Brahms during that time and timidly playing it to him. Brahms listened patiently. At its conclusion the great composer idly fingered the music and said:

"Tell me, my young friend, where do you get your beautiful manuscript paper?"

A more pleasing anecdote is the one which Sir George tells concerning Liszt. Henschel and a group of Liszt's admirers were gathered in the composer's home at Weimar. Liszt entered and, carelessly pointed to a package lying on a chair. "A present," he told them, "for you." On opening it, they found it to be a manuscript of Wagner's "Die Walkuere." Breathlessly, the young people drew around Liszt's piano as the grand, leonine figure took the music and, for the first time, played that glorious scene in which Wotan bids farewell to his beloved daughter Brunnhilde.

And so we might continue to pluck one experience after another out of Henschel's crowded life. But to our way of thinking none of them has the charm of Sir George's return this week as a distinguished father to a child that he left a lusty infant but whom he will now find a full-grown, superb stalwart of the world.

Oct 5

Boston Symphony Orchestra

The 50th season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra begins this week. Sir George Henschel will conduct Friday afternoon and Saturday evening almost the exact program he conducted at the first Boston Symphony concert ever given. He is arriving from England, where he has long resided, today, accompanied by his wife and daughter.

To mark the anniversary year Dr Koussevitsky and the trustees have secured an impressive list of new scores by the foremost living composers, written especially for the Boston Symphony. Some of these seem likely to prove masterpieces which will secure for the present anniversary mention in all future histories of music.

A "Symphonie des Psaumes," by Stravinsky, symphonies by Honegger, Prokofieff, and Roussel, shorter pieces by Ravel, Dukas, Hindemith, and Sibelius, a piano concerto by Bax represent well-known living Europeans. America is represented by a new symphony and a commemorative ode by E. B. Hill, and a symphonic ode by Aaron Copland.

These new pieces will be performed during the regular subscription series. They will give unusual musical distinction to the programs, since the first performance here will in each case presumably be the first in the world.

A Bach festival next March will honor the memory of Maj Henry L. Higginson, founder and for 26 years sole sustainer of the Boston Symphony. To his vision, his generosity, his courage not merely this city but all America is indebted. He was the first to believe that it was possible to establish in this country a symphony orchestra which need fear no comparison with the best in Europe. Steadfastly through many doubts and difficulties he sought to found such an orchestra. He lived to see the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Dr Karl Muck, universally recognized as the finest that had ever existed.

Again Unsurpassed

Then came a tragic approach to collapse, and Maj Higginson, too old to rebuild an institution half shattered as an indirect result of the world war, withdrew, turning the orchestra over to other hands. Since 1918 the orchestra has gradually been rebuilt, until today it is unsurpassed by any other, with a future again full of promise of great achievement.

The success of the Boston Symphony proved that it was possible as well as desirable to establish orchestras with first claim on the time and labor of their members. No such orchestra had previously existed outside of Germany and Austria. No such orchestra is to be found today in either London or Paris. But now, thanks to Maj Higginson, the Boston Symphony has been imitated by similar institutions in Philadelphia, Chicago, New York, Los Angeles, Detroit, Cleveland, San Francisco, Minneapolis and other American cities.

Technically some of these are older than the Boston Symphony, but until after the Boston Symphony was firmly established the New York Philharmonic, for example, which dates from 1842, was a loosely organized group which gave an occasional symphony concert when its members could find no more remunerative work to do. All the American orchestras of any note now try to live up to Maj Higginson's ideal.

We in Boston usually take the orchestra for granted. We are proud of the Boston Symphony. It has for many of us been a lifelong source of joy and solace. But we do not realize how great, how triumphant an institution it really is. We do not some of us yet realize, for instance, that the Boston Symphony is a far nobler and finer thing than the Metropolitan or Chicago Operas, with a higher standard of program and performance, an incomparably greater artistic achievement.

Music Notes and Comment

Prof E. B. Hill of Harvard has composed a commemorative ode to words by Prof Robert Hillyer for the 50th anniversary of the Boston Symphony. Dr Koussevitzky will conduct it at the second pair of Symphony concerts, Oct 17 and 18, and a chorus from the Harvard Glee Club will assist.

Henschel Again to Lead Famous Orchestra He First Waved Into Being---Interesting Musical Notes

Pix Oct 5

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Sir George Henschel, first conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is due in Boston today, and next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening he will once more stand before the band that, in a sense, was his creation to start it upon the 50th year of its existence. It was a happy thought to invite the distinguished musician to cross the ocean for this purpose. It is fortunate that, despite his 80 years (which are said to weigh but lightly upon him), he has been able to come.

* * * *

It was a happy thought, too, whosever it was, to make the impending programme a replica of the original programme of Oct. 22, 1882. Some, on the grounds of sentiment, will resent the altering of the final number, in other words, the substitution of Wagner's "Meistersinger" Prelude for the "Jubel" Overture of Weber. Otherwise the first list stands unchanged. And thus it runs: Beethoven, Overture, "The Dedication of the House"; Haydn, Symphony in B-flat; Gluck, Air from "Orpheus"; Schubert, Ballet Music from "Rosamunde"; Bruch, Scene from "Odysseus." The singer will be Margaret Matzenauer.

* * * *

At the concerts of Oct. 17 and 18, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will assume command of the orchestra that he has recreated.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
STAR

15

DISTINGUISHED SOLOISTS TO PLAY HERE WITH BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

JOSEF HOFMANN-Pianist

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY-Conductor

EFREM ZIMBALIST-Violinist

TWO artists of world fame, Josef Hofmann and Efrem Zimbalist, will appear here during the week of December 1, 1930, as soloists with the Boston Symphony Orchestra during the celebration at Constitution Hall, on December 2, 3, 5 and 6, of the fiftieth anniversary of the founding of this noted musical organization.

Announcement of this was made yesterday by Mrs. Wilson-Greene, following the receipt of advices from W. H. Brennan, manager of the orchestra, who made a flying trip from Boston to New York during the past week to welcome Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the orchestra, back from Europe.

Hofmann, it was stated, will play Beethoven's piano concerto as soloist with the orchestra, while Zimbalist will play the Beethoven violin concerto on another program of the Beethoven festival. Final arrangements are still incomplete, and the dates on which each artist will play have not been determined, but it is understood the Beethoven Festival will be given on Tuesday, Wednesday and Friday evenings, December 2, 3 and 5, and on Saturday afternoon, December 6.

The arrangement whereby Hofmann and Zimbalist will be presented as soloists still leaves the Saturday afternoon performance of Beethoven's "Ninth Symphony," with chorus of 250 voices, as the probable high light of the series of four performances, but it is expected that the appearance of these two famous virtuosi as soloists will greatly increase an already widespread interest in the Boston Symphony's celebration of its fiftieth anniversary.

Incidentally, the Boston Symphony's fiftieth season was formally opened last night with a Nation-wide broadcast of the orchestra, with Koussevitzky conducting, as one of the features of Massachusetts' tercentenary celebration. The first regular concert of the anniversary season will be given in Symphony Hall, Boston, next Friday evening, and will be repeated the following day.

The concerts of October 10 and 11 at Symphony Hall in Boston will be conducted by Sir George Henschel, the first conductor the Boston Symphony ever had and the man who conducted the first concert of that famous organization, on October 22, 1881. Sir George has come to America from England especially for this occasion and will conduct the same program he conducted at the first concert. It will include Beethoven's overture, "Dedication of the House"; an air from Gluck's "Orpheus," Haydn's "Symphony in B Flat," the ballet music from Schubert's "Rosamunde," a scene from Buch's "Odysseus" and the prelude to Wagner's "Mastersingers of Nuremberg."

This program differs from the first program only in the closing overture. It was hoped that Miss Annie Louise Cary, the soloist at the opening concert years ago, might be present, but since that is not possible, Margaret Matzenauer will be the soloist.

THIS CLIPPING FROM NEW YORK
WORLD
OCT 5 1930

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
HERALD

THIS CLIPPING FROM COLUMBIA, S. C.
STATE
OCT 5 - 1930

Boston Symphony Orchestra winter musical features

The Philharmonic orchestra inaugurates its 89th season this month with a new German conductor, Erich Kleiber. This will be the 2,548th concert in the history of the organization.

Toscanini does not come until February. It has been rumored that the sensational Italian would accept the general direction of the Bayreuth theaters, but it seems that the Wagner tradition is to stay in the Wagner hands. The general direction will be undertaken by the daughter of Siegfried Wagner, Winifred Wagner, but it is understood that Toscanini will conduct there again next summer.

Boston is to have Sir George Henschel this fall repeating the program with which this conductor opened the Boston Symphony 50 years ago.

SYMPHONY TO REPEAT

INAUGURAL CONCERT.

The program with which Sir George Henschel inaugurated the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Oct. 22, 1881, will be repeated by him when this orchestra's first conductor opens its 50th anniversary season in Symphony Hall next Friday afternoon and Saturday night. The program will include Beethoven's Overture, "Dedication of the House," an air from Gluck's "Orpheus," Haydn's Symphony in B-flat, Ballet Music from Schubert's "Rosamunde," scene from Bruch's "Odysseus," and the Prelude to Wagner's "Mastersingers of Nuremberg." This program differs from the orchestra's first only in the closing overture. The soloist will be Margaret Matzenauer.

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will first appear at the concerts on Oct. 17 and 18, then conducting an "Ode for Orchestra and Chorus," written especially for the orchestra's anniversary by Edward Burlingame Hill to the text of Robert Hillyer. This will be the first of an impressive list of new scores which have been especially composed for the orchestra's jubilee year by the foremost living composers. They include a "Symphonie de Psaumes," by Stravinsky, also symphonies by Roussel, Honegger, Prokofieff and Hill. There will be a "Symphonic Ode" by Copland; shorter pieces by Ravel, Dukas, Hindemith and Sibelius; and a piano concerto by Bax. The Russian composers, Lourie, Nabokoff and Trebinsky, and the French composer, Ferroud, will be introduced to America. This music will be performed in the course of the regular concerts.

Other features of the season will be a Beethoven festival to be given in Washington, D. C., through the first week of December, and a Bach Festival to be given in Boston next March in memory of Henry L. Higginson, the orchestra's founder and sole sustainer for many years.

Festival Soloists Selected

Josef Hofmann, world-famous pianist, and the equally famous violinist, Efrem Zimbalist, will appear at Constitution Hall as soloists with the Boston Symphony Orchestra during the celebration at Constitution Hall on December 2, 3, 5 and 6 of the fiftieth anniversary of the founding of this great musical organization.

Mrs. Wilson-Greene, well-known Washington impresario, who will manage the forthcoming appearance here of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, made this announcement yesterday, following word from W. H. Brennan, manager of the orchestra, who went to New York last week to welcome Serge Koussevitzky back from Europe.

Hofmann will play Beethoven's piano concerto as soloist with the orchestra, while Zimbalist will play the Beethoven violin concerto on another program of the festival. Final arrangements are still incomplete, but it is understood the festival will be given on Tuesday, Wednesday and Friday evenings, December 2, 3 and 5, and on Saturday afternoon, December 6.

Beethoven's Ninth Symphony with chorus of 250 voices is the probable highlight of the series of four performances.

Incidentally, the Boston Symphony's fiftieth season was formally opened last night (Saturday, October 4) with a nation-wide broadcast of the orchestra, with Koussevitzky conducting, as one of the features of Massachusett's Tercentenary celebration. The first regular concert of the anniversary season will be given in Symphony Hall, Boston, next Friday evening and will be repeated the following day.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
POST
OCT 5 - 1930

NOTED ARTISTS TO PLAY WITH KOUSSEVITZKY

Josef Hofmann, world-famous pianist, and the equally famous violinist, Efrem Zimbalist, will appear here at Constitution Hall during the week of December 1, 1930, as soloists with the Boston Symphony Orchestra during the celebration at Constitution Hall on December 2, 3, 5 and 6 of the fiftieth anniversary of the founding of this great musical organization.

Mrs. Wilson-Greene, well-known Washington impresario, who will manage the forthcoming appearance here of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, made this announcement yesterday, following the receipt of advices from W. H. Brennan, manager of the orchestra, who made a flying trip from Boston to New York during the past week to welcome back from Europe, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the orchestra.

Hofmann, it was stated, will play Beethoven's piano concerto as soloist with the orchestra while Zimbalist will play the Beethoven violin concerto on another program of the Beethoven festival. Final arrangements are still incomplete and the dates on which each artist will play have not been determined, but it understood the Beethoven Festival will be given on Tuesday, Wednesday and Friday evenings, December 2, 3 and 5, and on Saturday afternoon, December 6.

The arrangements whereby Hofmann and Zimbalist will be presented as soloists still leaves the Saturday afternoon performance of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony with chorus of 250 voices as the probable highlight of the series of four performances but it is expected that the appearance of these two famous virtuosi as soloists will greatly increase an already widespread interest in the Boston Symphony's celebration of its fiftieth anniversary.

Incidentally, the Boston Symphony's fiftieth season was formally opened last night (Saturday, October 4) with a nation-wide broadcast of the orchestra, with Koussevitzky conducting, as one of the features of Massachusett's Tercentenary celebration. The first regular concert of the anniversary season will be given in Symphony Hall, Boston, next Friday evening and will be repeated the following day.

These concerts of October 10 and 11, at Symphony Hall in Boston, will be conducted by Sir George Henschel, the first conductor the Boston Symphony ever had and the man who conducted the first concert of that famous organization on October 22, 1881. Sir George has come to America from England especially for this occasion and will conduct the same program he conducted at the first concert. It will include Beethoven's overture, "Dedication of the House;" an air from Gluck's "Orpheus," Haydn's Symphony in B flat, the ballet music from Schubert's "Rosamunde," a scene from Buch's "Odysseus" and the prelude to Wagner's "Mastersingers of Nuremberg."

This program differs from the first program only in the closing overture. It was hoped that Miss Annie Louise Cary, the soloist at the opening concert years ago, might be present, but that is not possible and Margaret Matzenauer will be the soloist.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK TIMES

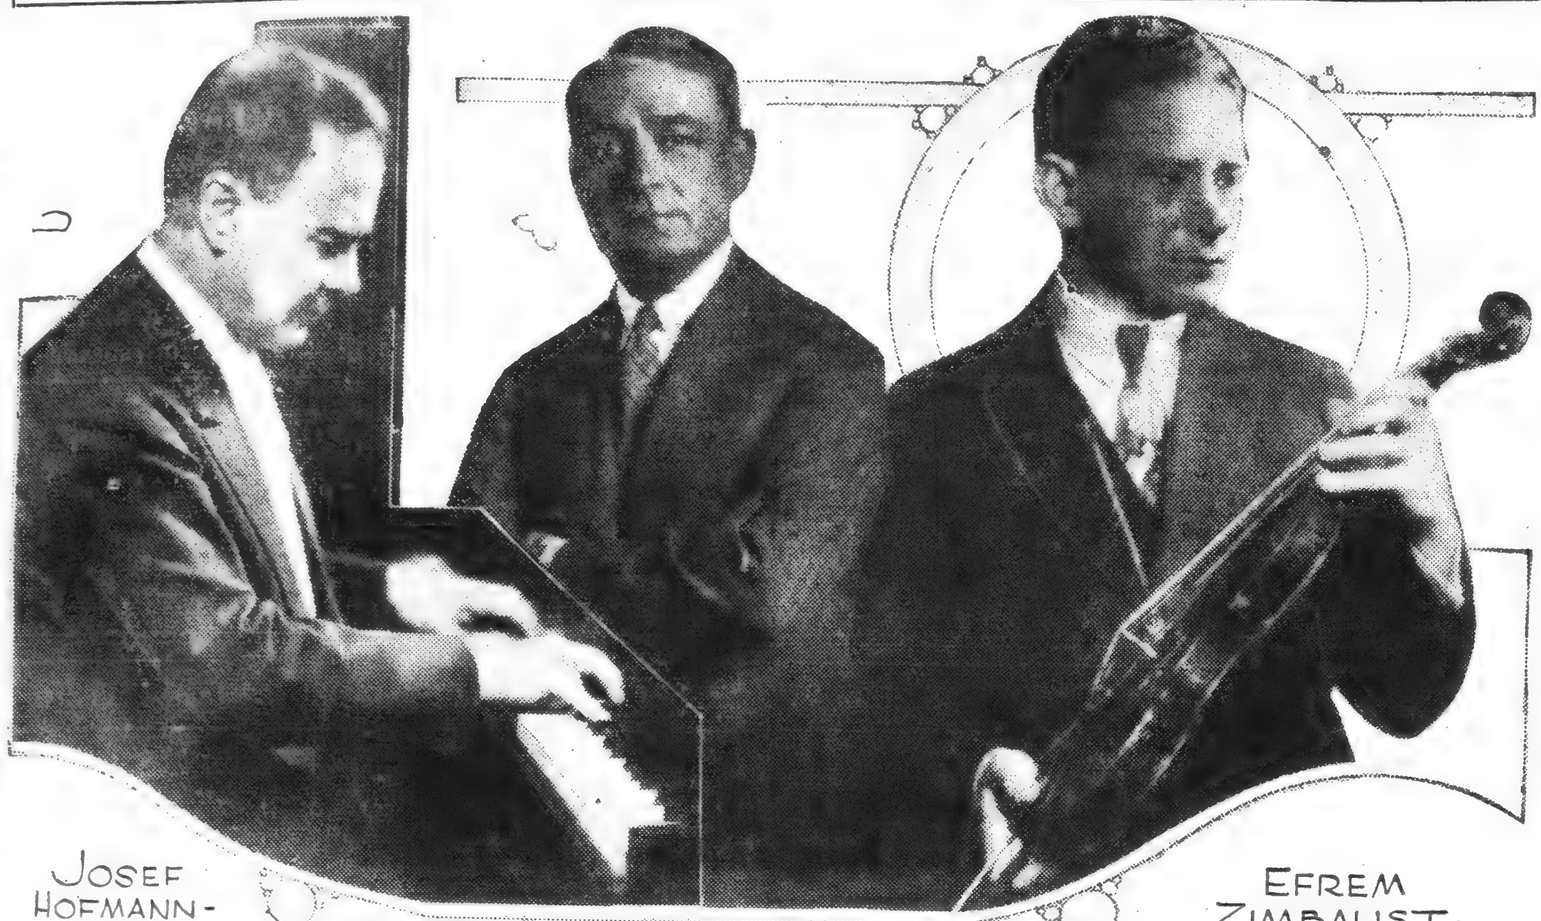
NEW WORKS IN BOSTON.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will play a number of new works this season, according to Serge Koussevitzky, its conductor, who returned from Europe last week. Among them will be a symphony for chorus and orchestra by Stravinsky, a symphonic poem by Honegger, the Fourth symphony of Prokofieff, symphonic poems by Dukas, Ravel, Paul Hindemith and Arnold Bax, and new works by Albert Roussel.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
STAR

15

DISTINGUISHED SOLOISTS TO PLAY HERE WITH BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA



JOSEF HOFMANN-Pianist

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY-Conductor

EFREM ZIMBALIST-Violinist

TWO artists of world fame, Josef Hofmann and Efrem Zimbalist, will appear here during the week of December 1, 1930, as soloists with the Boston Symphony Orchestra during the celebration at Constitution Hall, on December 2, 3, 5 and 6, of the fiftieth anniversary of the founding of this noted musical organization.

Announcement of this was made yesterday by Mrs. Wilson-Greene, following the receipt of advices from W. H. Brennan, manager of the orchestra, who made a flying trip from Boston to New York during the past week to welcome Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the orchestra, back from Europe.

Hofmann, it was stated, will play Beethoven's piano concerto as soloist with the orchestra, while Zimbalist will play the Beethoven violin concerto on another program of the Beethoven festival. Final arrangements are still incomplete, and the dates on which each artist will play have not been determined, but it is understood the Beethoven Festival will be given on Tuesday, Wednesday and Friday evenings, December 2, 3 and 5, and on Saturday afternoon, December 6.

The arrangement whereby Hofmann and Zimbalist will be presented as soloists still leaves the Saturday afternoon performance of Beethoven's "Ninth Symphony," with chorus of 250 voices, as the probable high light of the series of four performances, but it is expected that the appearance of these two famous virtuosi as soloists will greatly increase an already widespread interest in the Boston Symphony's celebration of its fiftieth anniversary.

Incidentally, the Boston Symphony's fiftieth season was formally opened last night with a Nation-wide broadcast of the orchestra, with Koussevitzky conducting, as one of the features of Massachusetts' tercentenary celebration. The first regular concert of the anniversary season will be given in Symphony Hall, Boston, next Friday evening, and will be repeated the following day.

The concerts of October 10 and 11 at Symphony Hall in Boston will be conducted by Sir George Henschel, the first conductor the Boston Symphony ever had and the man who conducted the first concert of that famous organization, on October 22, 1881. Sir George has come to America from England especially for this occasion and will conduct the same program he conducted at the first concert. It will include Beethoven's overture, "Dedication of the House"; an air from Gluck's "Orpheus," Haydn's "Symphony in B Flat," the ballet music from Schubert's "Rosamunde," a scene from Buch's "Odysseus" and the prelude to Wagner's "Mastersingers of Nuremberg."

This program differs from the first program only in the closing overture. It was hoped that Miss Annie Louise Cary, the soloist at the opening concert years ago, might be present, but since that is not possible, Margaret Matzenauer will be the soloist.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
POST
OCT 5 - 1930

NOTED ARTISTS TO PLAY WITH KOUSSEVITZKY

Josef Hofmann, world-famous pianist, and the equally famous violinist, Efrem Zimbalist, will appear here at Constitution Hall during the week of December 1, 1930, as soloists with the Boston Symphony Orchestra during the celebration at Constitution Hall on December 2, 3, 5 and 6 of the fiftieth anniversary of the founding of this great musical organization.

Mrs. Wilson-Greene, well-known Washington impresario, who will manage the forthcoming appearance here of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, made this announcement yesterday, following the receipt of advices from W. H. Brennan, manager of the orchestra, who made a flying trip from Boston to New York during the past week to welcome back from Europe, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the orchestra.

Hofmann, it was stated, will play Beethoven's piano concerto as soloist with the orchestra while Zimbalist will play the Beethoven violin concerto on another program of the Beethoven festival. Final arrangements are still incomplete and the dates on which each artist will play have not been determined, but it understood the Beethoven Festival will be given on Tuesday, Wednesday and Friday evenings, December 2, 3 and 5, and on Saturday afternoon, December 6.

The arrangements whereby Hofmann and Zimbalist will be presented as soloists still leaves the Saturday afternoon performance of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony with chorus of 250 voices as the probable highlight of the series of four performances but it is expected that the appearance of these two famous virtuosi as soloists will greatly increase an already widespread interest in the Boston Symphony's celebration of its fiftieth anniversary.

Incidentally, the Boston Symphony's fiftieth season was formally opened last night (Saturday, October 4) with a nation-wide broadcast of the orchestra, with Koussevitzky conducting, as one of the features of Massachusett's Tercentenary celebration. The first regular concert of the anniversary season will be given in Symphony Hall, Boston, next Friday evening and will be repeated the following day.

These concerts of October 10 and 11, at Symphony Hall in Boston, will be conducted by Sir George Henschel, the first conductor the Boston Symphony ever had and the man who conducted the first concert of that famous organization on October 22, 1881. Sir George has come to America from England especially for this occasion and will conduct the same program he conducted at the first concert. It will include Beethoven's overture, "Dedication of the House;" an air from Gluck's "Orpheus," Haydn's Symphony in B flat, the ballet music from Schubert's "Rosamunde," a scene from Buch's "Odysseus" and the prelude to Wagner's "Mastersingers of Nuremberg."

This program differs from the first program only in the closing overture. It was hoped that Miss Annie Louise Cary, the soloist at the opening concert years ago, might be present, but that is not possible and Margaret Matzenauer will be the soloist.

THIS CLIPPING FROM NEW YORK
WORLD
OCT 5 1930

Sergei Koussevitzky, whose Boston Symphony Orchestra will be one of WEAF's winter musical features

* *

...es its 89th season this month with a ... This will be the 2,548th concert in the ...

...y. It has been rumored that the sen... ...al direction of the Bayreuth theater, ...is to stay in the Wagner hands. The ..., the daughter of Siegfried Wagner, ...at Toscanini will conduct there again next summer.

Boston is to have Sir George Henschel this fall repeating the program with which this conductor opened the Boston Symphony 50 years ago.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

SYMPHONY TO REPEAT

INAUGURAL CONCERT.

The program with which Sir George Henschel inaugurated the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Oct. 22, 1881, will be repeated by him when this orchestra's first conductor opens its 50th anniversary season in Symphony Hall next Friday afternoon and Saturday night. The program will include Beethoven's Overture, "Dedication of the House," an air from Gluck's "Orpheus," Haydn's Symphony in B-flat, Ballet Music from Schubert's "Rosamunde," scene from Bruch's "Odysseus," and the Prelude to Wagner's "Mastersingers of Nuremberg." This program differs from the orchestra's first only in the closing overture. The soloist will be Margaret Matzenauer.

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will first appear at the concerts on Oct. 17 and 18, then conducting an "Ode for Orchestra and Chorus," written especially for the orchestra's anniversary by Edward Burlingame Hill to the text of Robert Hillyer. This will be the first of an impressive list of new scores which have been especially composed for the orchestra's jubilee year by the foremost living composers. They include a "Symphonie de Psaumes," by Stravinsky, also symphonies by Roussel, Honegger, Prokofieff and Hill. There will be a "Symphonic Ode" by Copland; shorter pieces by Ravel, Dukas, Hindemith and Sibelius; and a piano concerto by Bax. The Russian composers, Lourie, Nabokoff and Trebinsky, and the French composer, Ferroud, will be introduced to America. This music will be performed in the course of the regular concerts.

Other features of the season will be a Beethoven festival to be given in Washington, D. C., through the first week of December, and a Bach Festival to be given in Boston next March in memory of Henry L. Higginson, the orchestra's founder and sole sustainer for many years.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
HERALD

Festival Soloists Selected

Josef Hofmann, world-famous pianist, and the equally famous violinist, Efrem Zimbalist, will appear at Constitution Hall as soloists with the Boston Symphony Orchestra during the celebration at Constitution Hall on December 2, 3, 5 and 6 of the fiftieth anniversary of the founding of this great musical organization.

Mrs. Wilson-Greene, well-known Washington impresario, who will manage the forthcoming appearance here of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, made this announcement yesterday, following word from W. H. Brennan, manager of the orchestra, who went to New York last week to welcome Serge Koussevitzky back from Europe.

Hofmann will play Beethoven's piano concerto as soloist with the orchestra, while Zimbalist will play the Beethoven violin concerto on another program of the festival. Final arrangements are still incomplete, but it is understood the festival will be given on Tuesday, Wednesday and Friday evenings, December 2, 3 and 5, and on Saturday afternoon, December 6.

Beethoven's Ninth Symphony with chorus of 250 voices is the probable highlight of the series of four performances.

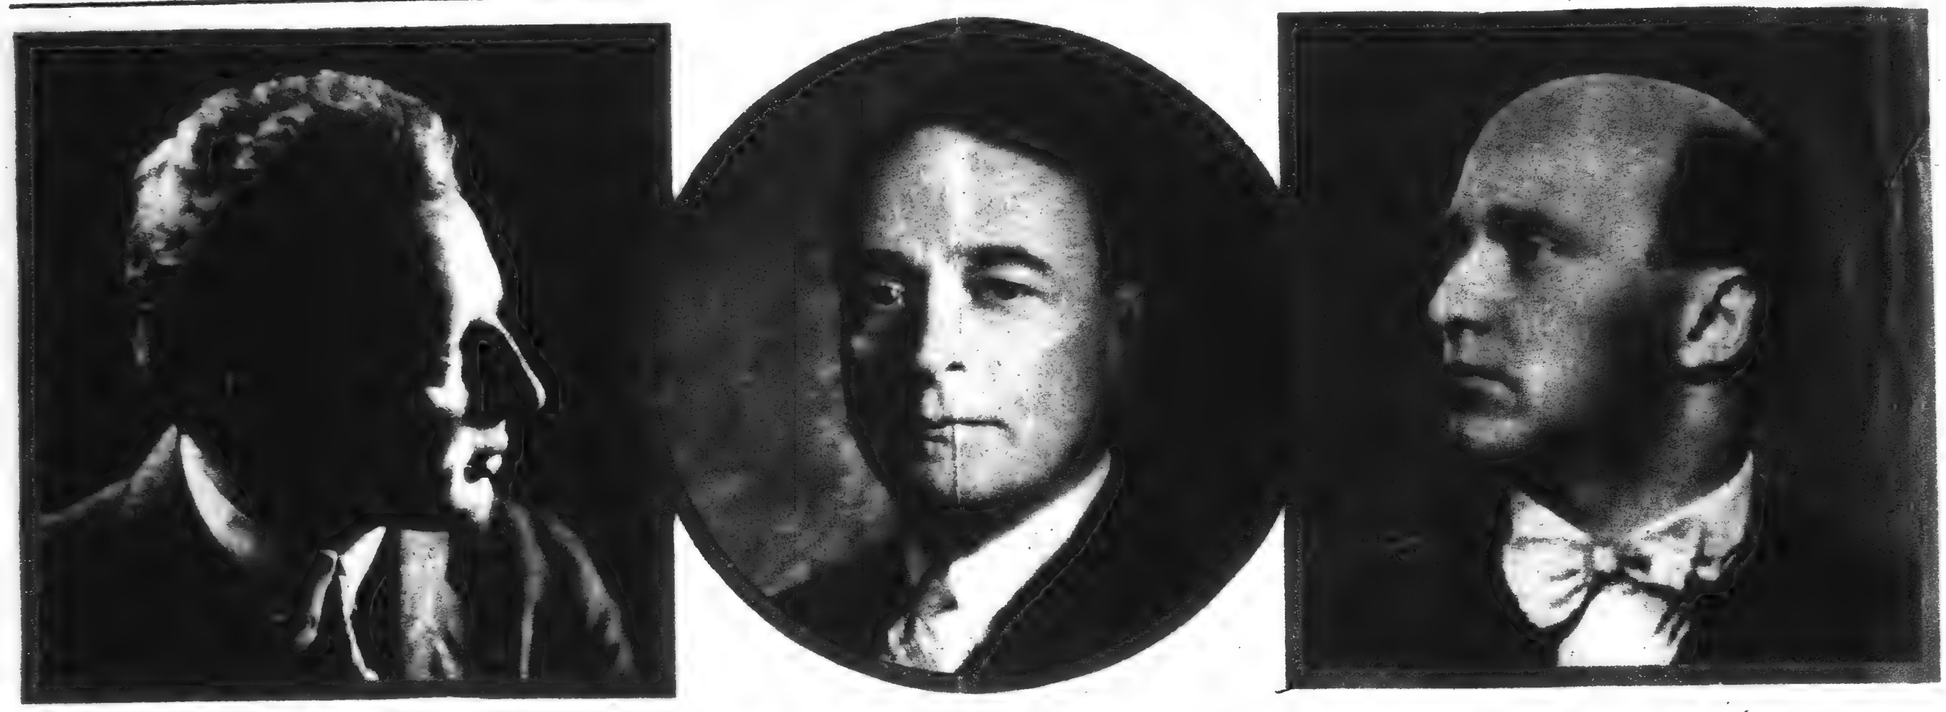
Incidentally, the Boston Symphony's fiftieth season was formally opened last night (Saturday, October 4) with a nation-wide broadcast of the orchestra, with Koussevitzky conducting, as one of the features of Massachusett's Tercentenary celebration. The first regular concert of the anniversary season will be given in Symphony Hall, Boston, next Friday evening and will be repeated the following day.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK TIMES

NEW WORKS IN BOSTON.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will play a number of new works this season, according to Serge Koussevitzky, its conductor, who returned from Europe last week. Among them will be a symphony for chorus and orchestra by Stravinsky, a symphonic poem by Honegger, the Fourth symphony of Prokofieff, symphonic poems by Dukas, Ravel, Paul Hindemith and Arnold Bax, and new works by Albert Roussel.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK TIMES
OCT



"Stokowski Was Born With the Will and the Passion to Lead an Orchestra." "Koussevitzky Has an Iron Hand Beneath a Fashionable and Soft-Surfaced Glove." "Kleiber Gives the Impression of Energy, Enterprise and Enthusiasm."

Photograph by A. B. C. News Service.

NOW IS THE DAY OF THE BATON'S GLORY

With the Opening of the Music Season in New York, Our Attention Is Focused on Four Orchestra Leaders

By OLIN DOWNES

ONE day in the late nineteenth century the violinist Pablo Sarasate commented bitterly upon the triumph, inexplicable to him, of an orchestral conductor. "And what do you think," he said to the former violinist and present conductor Enrique Fernandez Arbos, "they don't play at all. They just go round with a little stick and wave it in the air, like this and this, over the orchestra, and they get paid for it. Some day they will do that without any orchestra at all, and then we'll see what happens!"

The last-named contingency is still remote, but the day that troubled Sarasate and his virtuoso's vanity is fairly upon us—the day of the orchestral conductor. Musically speaking, he is the man of the hour.

It was not always so. Time was when the conductor was a stick-waver, as Sarasate believed, who held together a band of players too numerous for the men to keep in time and rhythm with each other without some central signal station. The conductor, then the merest factotum, rehearsed the band and beat time. He was the most negligible person on the stage, so far as "personality," so much vaunted today, was concerned, and as an interpretive force he had no importance.

Later on, in fact till the end of the nineteenth century, an orchestral concert without some star performer to appear as soloist was not a sound box-office attraction. Celebrated conductors were deemed modest entertainment unless a singer or virtuoso of reputation seasoned the feast.

Well, we have changed that, and changed it, on the whole, for the better. The great conductor is the greatest single asset that an orchestra or opera house can have. The announcement of his appearance is likely to mean a house sold out before the concert begins. His is the power and the glory, and he is the greatest single force in the world of musical executants. The days when a great musical event meant a famous soloist, or opera with an all-star cast, are gone. Some give as a reason the fact that great solo performers are fewer today than in previous periods. Some aver that interest in the person or the tailor or the picturesque gesticulations of a star conductor is no more exalting to musical taste than the former fuss and furor over a fiddler or a tenor—that we have merely a new form of musical sensationalism.

But that is a little pessimistic. The conductor who has won the allegiance of the great public by a superb demonstration of insight, authority and interpretive power has earned it. The music which the conductor can offer his audience is grander in form and richer in color than the music that any solo voice or instrument can convey. The conductor draws our attention to this great music, and the public is coming to like it for its own sake—showing an interest advancing by leaps and bounds in America. The very large orchestral public is becoming aware that there is no one instrument or voice comparable for marvel with the modern orchestra, as it is becoming aware of the really marvelous capacities which are brought into play when a conductor of the first rank steps on the stand. Therefore it is that the 1930-1931 music season of New York opened, officially, symbolically, with the American début of a conductor of European reputation new to these shores.

* * *

He is Erich Kleiber, "Generalmusikdirektor" of the Berlin Staats-Opera and guest conductor for six weeks of the New York Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra, in a city which has been called the graveyard of conductors' reputations, and which, particularly since the war, can confer immense prestige on a conductor that it favors.

Kleiber's career has been a series of rapid promotions, although he has his outspoken critics among the German public and press. A young man, as conductors go, he had studied the violin and was contemplating a professor's career when he decided to conduct. In 1911 he was assistant conductor at the Landestheatre in Prague. He remained there six months, then shot forward from position to position in different German opera houses until he occupied in 1923 the post that he now holds at the Berlin Staats-Opera. He has held that position against older men and all comers. Two years ago he declined the invitation to conduct German opera at the Metropolitan. He has given as a reason for this his desire to make his first appearance in America as a conductor of symphonic rather than operatic music. Symphonic music is the preference of most conductors, though operatic training is exeremely important and in a majority of cases has been a part of the great conductor's experience. Stokowski is an exception to this rule. Nikisch, Muck, Toscanini are conductors who had much of their experience in opera houses.

Kleiber is 40, alert-eyed, under medium height. A head that is not all hair belies his years. The general impression he gives is of energy, enterprise, enthusiasm. As a musician he is grounded in the classics and speaks of the "three F's—'Figaro,' 'Fidelio' and 'Freischutz'" as his lucky scores. Nevertheless he has brought with him new music to introduce in this city.

He has also a sense of humor. Thus, when an orchestral player remarked to him that the orchestra knew its business, and did not require endless rehearsals just for a conductor's benefit, Kleiber replied. "Of course. I'm perfectly sure the orchestra doesn't need rehearsals. And I don't need them myself. It's the work, my dear fellow, the work, that needs them!"

* * *

Mr. Toscanini follows Mr. Kleiber in the Philharmonic season, of which he assumes the major responsibility. What need now to describe the little man who in some way looms tremendous when he steps on the platform?—the electrical poise of the figure, the flash of the eyes that see so poorly, yet compel the players to creative performance; the Italian clarity and intellect of the upper part of the face, the jaw which is prodigious under a suavity of line suggestive of the face of a child. Other conductors have a certain manner of the platform, a certain mechanism for defense or offense before orchestra and public. Toscanini has no manner, and his way of conducting is often illustrative of the principle voiced by a noted literary light, when he said that "the best style is no style." Toscanini's beat is unorthodox, wholly personal, dictated by an infallibly musical nature, never stiff or heavy, and quite outside of a conductor's routine technic. And how many readers of this article have sat in a front row in Carnegie Hall, or listened to a Philharmonic-Symphony concert, Toscanini conducting, over the radio? Over the radio or from the front row he can often be heard singing, singing furiously with his crow's voice, with the orchestra! When the tune goes too high he drops an octave, and goes up again! This is not done by well-behaved conductors, or those with an eye on their dignity, and let us hope that other conductors will not assume this to be the secret of a Toscanini triumph. But actually this involuntary action of Toscanini's has to do with his innate lyricism, and the quality of the glowing song which he obtains from the instruments.

The Toscanini legends are already legion, and no doubt many of them are only legends, but his royal rage when ineptitude or the sheer physical limitations of human beings impair the effect he had planned, and the beatific smile which recompenses weary and discouraged players when he is utterly satisfied with a result, are not legends, as those players well know. His temper has more than once left its trail behind it, as witness the smashed cabinet which has been removed from the corridor in Carnegie Hall after an outburst of last season

It happened that the last composition on the Toscanini program, on that occasion, had not been played as the conductor felt that it should have been, and certain precise instructions of his had not been fully carried out by the orchestra. Nevertheless salvos of applause followed the performance. This made Toscanini more furious than ever. White with rage he went to his dressing room and did not return to take his bow. A friend, going to the dressing room, found him removing his collar. "Put on your collar and go down there and bow," advised the kind and brave friend. Toscanini did so, but as he returned, his patience, if such it could be called, deserted him. He passed a cabinet, rather lightly made, with thin doors, and as he did so, let fly both fists, and smashed the wood to splinters.

The friend, who has, like Kleiber, a sense of humor as well as a veneration for the musician, stopped, gathered up some splinters of the cabinet, and took them home. Ever

(Continued on Page 22)

"Toscanina's Beat Is Unorthodox and Wholly Personal."

Photograph Copyright by Freiherr von Gudenberg.

TURN BACK TO PAGE 21

Full Saturday, Off the Water Across the Air

Beginnings at Symphony Hall, Sir George Henschel Comes, The Radio Concert

EARLY on Saturday afternoon, the conductor of the Symphony Orchestra, the president of the trustees, the managerial staff at Symphony Hall, went to meet the first guest of the Jubilee Year. With them was one of the surviving friends of his distant Bostonian day—Arthur Foote, the composer. The guest was Sir George Henschel, arriving at Commonwealth Pier from London and Liverpool, accompanied by his wife and their daughter. The greeters went cheerfully, inasmuch as Providence, a sound constitution and discreet living had preserved the conductor of the first pair of Symphony Concerts in the first season (1881-82) to return to that post, able and eager, for the first pair in the fiftieth (1930-31). They came back well content, having found Sir George less the man of eighty that the date-books will have him than the practising musician of sixty, alert in body and mind, still keen for fresh and crowning adventure.

Other friends were waiting to escort Sir George to the house where he will be guest during his fortnight in Boston. (Since 1905, when he conducted at a concert for the Pension Fund of the orchestra, he has not revisited the city.) This morning he begins rehearsals at Symphony Hall, to continue daily through Thursday; on Friday and Saturday come the appointed concerts. Not to overtax himself, he will make it a week of work. Next a week of social opportunity; the hearing of the orchestra under Dr. Koussevitzky in music of this immediate day; thereafter, leisurely return to London.

Air-Minded

Early on Saturday evening, in unusual circumstances, the preliminary concert of the new season. Long ago, the Symphony Orchestra promised a contribution to the Tercentenary rites. Last spring, they had hardly begun before Dr. Koussevitzky departed to Paris. Now, they were nearly ended; but there was still com for a radio concert—the first ever undertaken by the orchestra for the air only. Originally, station WEEI was to broadcast it. Quickly the National Broadcasting Company proposed that it be relayed over its circuit—Southern cities, Middle-Western cities, cities in California and Oregon, twenty-nine in all.

Symphony Hall readily agreed. Through an hour and a half, on this first Saturday of the Jubilee Year, it would be the seat of a national orchestra. The program, however, kept Bostonian quality: the longer half to three resident and living composers—Foote of the Suite that at each repetition brings fresh pleasure; Hill of "Lilacs" (after Amy Lowell's like-named verses); Loeffler, with "Pagan Poem"; the shorter half to two modern classics—Debussy's "Afternoon of A Faun" and Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel." All five are in the "active repertory"; but they were as carefully prepared as though the subscribers of Boston and New York awaited them. Dr. Koussevitzky does not "condescend" to a "radio audience"

Visible and Invisible

The circumstances, however, were different. At first, there were to be no guests at Symphony Hall. By itself the orchestra was to play for its invisible hearers through two microphones, suspended a third of the way down the auditorium. A visible audience had uses in that long tunnel. It might, as they used to say in wartime, stimulate morale. The conductor suggested that the families of the players be invited, along with a few friends of the orchestra. All told, they might have made a hundred-odd, seated just back of the broad cross-aisle. Of course, they were bidden, more than once, not to applaud. They took the command so urgently that they were the stillest audience yet known to Symphony Hall. They stirred neither hand nor foot; they almost breathed short. Not a coat or a skirt rustled. Through an hour and a half no cough, suppressed or unsuppressed, disturbed the musical peace. It can be done.

The orchestra was in usual place, but clothed as the subscribing public never sees it. One and all wore the jackets of rehearsal; while summer gray was as permissible as autumn black. Nor—if the faithful reporter is to tell the whole truth—did they sit the chairs with quite the dignity proper to Friday afternoons and to Saturday or Monday evenings. To every man his congenial position. The old hands noted also that the piano of "Pagan Poem" was now set at the left and in front of the orchestra; the celesta of other numbers moved equally forward. "Radio transmission" doubtless. These old hands further observed that, conducting to an "invisible audience," Dr. Koussevitzky used the same gestures to which he has accustomed his visible and watchful listeners. They are not mannerisms nor are they made "for effect." They are the conductor's natural expression of the music and himself upon the orchestra. (Memorandum: However much pianists and violinists may cultivate the short jacket for matinées, a long coat is essential to the conductor's "line.") chestra, and express our wish that the cultural life of Massachusetts always remains in the first rank, as it has been up to this day.

Said Judge Cabot when his moment came:

Fittingly, as part of the observance of Massachusetts's three hundredth anniversary, it is made possible for the people of Massachusetts and of our Nation to hear the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The early settlers set great store by the spoken word. They listened eagerly to exhortations expounding the ways of the spirit. Through their hearing, their imaginations were stirred. The first minister of Salem, the Reverened Francis Higginson, was a man of courage, patriotism and faith, giving all that he had to love of his people. It is well said that "he who dedicates his life to the beauty of holiness is not far from the sight of all beauty."

His direct descendant, Henry Lee Higginson, in the beginning of the last fifty-year period of the past 300 years, founded the Boston Symphony Orchestra, because, as he said, music was his inner world which he enjoyed in the depths of his soul as nothing else and he wished to make possible for others this great happiness. His characteristics, too, were courage, patriotism, friendship. He had faith that the great musical compositions could be produced by artists playing each year ever more perfectly under an interpreting master, so that the listeners would go forth rejoicing and live their lives refreshed.

What began thus in Boston has marvellously widened, extending today to countless numbers throughout the land. Yet the greatest happiness comes from listening in the presence of the artists themselves. Fittingly, therefore, in this fiftieth year of its assembly, this orchestra will hold a festival in the nation's capital and there in December, during four days, it will play the symphonies of Beethoven.

May each succeeding fifty years add to the orchestra's excellence and lasting significance in the life of Massachusetts and of the nation.

Reviewer's Epilogue

The purpose of this article is descriptive, not critical; but it would be at fault as record did it fail to note the quality of the orchestra. After three rehearsals it was unmistakably itself—in the vitalizing energy of its tone; the sensuous richness, the luminous texture, the instant plasticity. At call it gave back vigor or subtlety; its ear for euphony was unfailing; its technical prowess, the means to the musical end. For each composer and each music, it found the individualizing, intensifying voice. As for the chosen numbers, the 'radio ear" may be this, that or the other; but it must have caught something of the poetizing and jewelling Debussy; of the keen-witted and keen-voiced Strauss. The grace and the fancy of Mr. Foote's Suite could not have escaped it, though it may have missed the fineness of his composing fingers. It must have felt the spring air blowing through Mr. Hill's "Lilacs," the note of revery upon which it begins and ends—the New Englander musing over his own countryside. And which of us at first hearing, twenty-odd years ago, absorbed every spell of Mr. Loeffler's "Pagan Poem"? After all they have made and still make music in New England. Not yet is Euterpe chained "exclusively" in the market place of Manhattan.

As for the radio "up against" symphonic music from an orchestra of the first rank, the young Suzanne shall be spokeswoman. Her years are eleven and she listened on Saturday to Foote, Hill and Loeffler in the concert hall; to Debussy and Strauss off a neighboring set. "But, father," she said, as the last measures of "The Afternoon of a Faun" sounded, "there's something between." There is—machinery. H. T. P.

When there is no "visible audience," a symphony orchestra may tune its instruments on the stage—in these days rare experience in any concert-hall. When five numbers, two or three of appreciable length, must be crowded into ninety minutes—and not a moment over—it must also play virtually without pause. Add two speeches, though of the briefest, and not a second must be wasted. The Announcer's foot was on the step to the stage-microphone, as the last phrase of the orchestra sounded. Dr. Koussevitzky dropped his baton; spun on his heel; faced it manuscript in hand—all in a single motion. Accustomed to signify the pleasure of the court, Judge Cabot now stood by the stage waiting the pleasure of the Announcer. A radio world indeed; but one in which that same Announcer did himself credit by the reticence and the good taste of his introductory sentences. Neither the scandalous life and works of the inexhaustible Eulenspiegel, nor the Vergilian Eclogue behind Mr. Loeffler's tone-poem, nor even the "experiences"—as he chastely named them—of Mallarmé's and Debussy's "Faun" tempted him to overdo.

Speeches, But Brief

Said Dr. Koussevitzky for first interlude:

I am happy that my first speech on the radio is to welcome the Tercentenary of the State of Massachusetts. Today the Boston Symphony Orchestra takes part in your celebrations. We congratulate you on your great achievements during these three hundred years. Massachusetts possesses immense intellectual treasures: Harvard University, known as the most important center of culture and enlightenment; the Boston Symphony Orchestra, considered to be the leading orchestra of the whole musical world; a great number of first-class writers, painters, sculptors and composers of whom you may be proud—not only you people of Massachusetts but all the citizens of the United States.

Let me welcome you again, in the name of the Boston Symphony Or-

FIRST SYMPHONY CONDUCTOR HERE

Sir George Henschel Arrives to Take Part in 50th Anniversary

Sir George Henschel, first conductor of the Boston symphony orchestra, accompanied by Lady Henschel and their daughter, Elizabeth Georgie Henschel, arrived yesterday on the White Star liner Britannic from Liverpool and Queenstown, and will take part in the 50th anniversary of the organization, remaining here until Oct. 18, Sir George conducting concerts next Friday and Saturday. He was met at Commonwealth pier by Judge F. P. Cabot, president of the trustees; W. H. Brennan, general manager; G. E. Judd, assistant manager; E. B. Dane, trustee; Arthur Foote, composer.

Sir George resides in Aviemore, Scotland, where he teaches voice and composition. Although in his 80th year he looks fully 20 years younger. He expressed delight in again visiting Boston, his last previous visit being in 1908. Referring to the orchestra Sir George said it was back in 1881 when he began to conduct the organization which has attained perfection since his day.

He was knighted in 1914, having been married in New York in 1907. Sir George and family are guests of Mrs. M. Graeme Haughton, 13 Commonwealth avenue.

Dr. Henry Wade, surgeon of Edinburgh, Scotland, came on the Britannic to attend the clinical congress of the American College of Surgeons at Philadelphia, Oct. 15-16, as guest speaker, and the International Medical Association gathering at Minneapolis the latter part of this month. Dr. Wade won decorations from the British government for service in the Boer and world wars. He was met by Dr. Fred Cotton, chief surgeon at Boston City Hospital.

Greeting a brother whom she had not seen in 50 years, Mrs. Fannie Goldstein of Leeds, Eng., stepped from the Britannic into the arms of Simon Goldman of 20 Georgia street, Roxbury. They are Austrians and separated as children, she going to England and Mr. Lendman to the United States. A sister, Mrs. Rose Doucette of Canada, was at the pier and they had not met in 37 years.

Others landing here were Mr. and Mrs. Samuel Hoar, Samuel Hoar, Jr., of Concord; Mr. and Mrs. John Hoar of Brookline; Mrs. W. A. Gaston, Miss Laura Bailey of Brookline, Mrs. Ellerton P. Whitney of Milton.

Mrs. Margaret Gregory, 46, died of heart disease on Oct. 2 [illegible] the body [illegible] g day. [illegible] six days [illegible]intaining [illegible]ts. The [illegible]s of the [illegible]1 Liver- [illegible]a day

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE FREDERICK, OKLA.
LEADER

OCT 6 - 1930

The Editor's Scrapbook

FROM HENRY HIGGINSON TO HIS FATHER

Henry Lee Higginson, born in New York, November 18, 1834, of the New England stock which for two centuries before his birth had done less for the arts than for the virtues, departed early from the accepted paths of the young men of his time and station. . . Before the end of 1856, he found himself in Europe, where he stayed for four years, devoting himself chiefly to the study of music at Vienna. Many letters to his father are preserved. . . . In September the young student of music is established in Vienna, and writes thus to his father:—

As everyone has some particular object of supreme interest to himself, so I have music. It is almost my inner world; without it, I miss much, and with it I am happier and better. You may remember that I wished to study music some few years ago when in Europe before. On my return home other studies took up my time so much that music had to be neglected. . . . I felt the want of it greatly, and was very sorry to give up the thing dearest to me. When I came out here I had no plans, as you know. Trade was not satisfying . . . as a life-occupation. Out here I have consulted, and have decided to try to learn something of music ex- and internally, i.e., of playing and of harmony or thorough-bass. If I find that I am not profiting at all by my work, I shall throw it up and go home. If I gain something, I shall stick to it.

You will ask, "What is to come of it all if successful?" I do not know. But this is clear. I have then improved my own powers, which is every man's duty. I have a resource to which I can always turn with delight, however the world may go with me. I am so much the stronger, the wider, the wiser, the better for my duties in life. I can then go with satisfaction to my business, knowing my resource at the end of the day. It is already made, and has only to be used and it will grow. Finally it is my province in education, and having cultivated myself in it, I am fully prepared to teach others in it. . . . But the pleasure, pure and free from all disagreeable consequences or after-thoughts, of playing and still more of singing myself, is indescribable. In Rome I took about eight lessons of a capital master, and I used to enjoy intensely the singing to his accompaniment my exercises and some little Neapolitan songs. My reasons for studying harmony are manifest. I cannot properly understand music without doing so; moreover, it is an excellent exercise for the mind. As to writing music, I have nothing to say; but it is not my expectation. It is like writing poetry; if one is prompted to do so, and has anything to say, he does it. But I entirely disavow any such intention or aim in my present endeavor,—and this I wish to be most clearly expressed and understood, should anyone ask about me. I am studying for my own good and pleasure.

And now, old daddy, I hope you will be able to make something out of this long letter. You should not have been troubled with it, but I thought you would prefer to know all about it. It is only carrying out your own darling idea of making an imperishable capital in education. My money may fly away; my knowledge cannot. One belongs to the world, the other to me.—M. A. DeWOLFE HOWE, in "The Boston Symphony Orchestra."

[illegible] totalling $501.

Full Saturday, Off the Water Across the Air

Beginnings at Symphony Hall, Sir George Henschel Comes, The Radio Concert

EARLY on Saturday afternoon, the conductor of the Symphony Orchestra, the president of the trustees, the managerial staff at Symphony Hall, went to meet the first guest of the Jubilee Year. With them was one of the surviving friends of his distant Bostonian day—Arthur Foote, the composer. The guest was Sir George Henschel, arriving at Commonwealth Pier from London and Liverpool, accompanied by his wife and their daughter. The greeters went cheerfully, inasmuch as Providence, a sound constitution and discreet living had preserved the conductor of the first pair of Symphony Concerts in the first season (1881-82) to return to that post, able and eager, for the first pair in the fiftieth (1930-31). They came back well content, having found Sir George less the man of eighty that the date-books will have him than the practising musician of sixty, alert in body and mind, still keen for fresh and crowning adventure.

Other friends were waiting to escort Sir George to the house where he will be guest during his fortnight in Boston. (Since 1905, when he conducted at a concert for the Pension Fund of the orchestra, he has not revisited the city.) This morning he begins rehearsals at Symphony Hall, to continue daily through Thursday; on Friday and Saturday come the appointed concerts. Not to overtax himself, he will make it a week of work. Next a week of social opportunity; then the hearing of the orchestra under Dr. Koussevitzky in music of this immediate day; thereafter, leisurely return to London.

Air-Minded

Early on Saturday evening, in unusual circumstances, the preliminary concert of the new season. Long ago, the Symphony Orchestra promised a contribution to the Tercentenary rites. Last spring, they had hardly begun before Dr. Koussevitzky departed to Paris. Now, they were nearly ended; but there was still room for a radio concert—the first ever undertaken by the orchestra for the air only. Originally, station WEEI was to broadcast it. Quickly the National Broadcasting Company proposed that it be relayed over its circuit—Southern cities, Middle-Western cities, cities in California and Oregon, twenty-nine in all.

Symphony Hall readily agreed. Through an hour and a half, on this first Saturday of the Jubilee Year, it would be the seat of a national orchestra. The program, however, kept Bostonian quality: the longer half to three resident and living composers—Foote of the Suite that at each repetition brings fresh pleasure; Hill of "Lilacs" (after Amy Lowell's like-named verses); Loeffler, with "Pagan Poem"; the shorter half to two modern classics—Debussy's "Afternoon of A Faun" and Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel." All five are in the "active repertory"; but they were as carefully prepared as though the subscribers of Boston and New York awaited them. Dr. Koussevitzky does not "condescend" to a "radio audience"

Visible and Invisible

The circumstances, however, were different. At first, there were to be no guests at Symphony Hall. By itself the orchestra was to play for its invisible hearers through two microphones, suspended a third of the way down the auditorium. A visible audience had uses in that long tunnel. It might, as they used to say in wartime, stimulate morale. The conductor suggested that the families of the players be invited, along with a few friends of the orchestra. All told, they might have made a hundred-odd, seated just back of the broad cross-aisle. Of course, they were bidden, more than once, not to applaud. They took the command so urgently that they were the stillest audience yet known to Symphony Hall. They stirred neither hand nor foot; they almost breathed short. Not a coat or a skirt rustled. Through an hour and a half no cough, suppressed or unsuppressed, disturbed the musical peace. It can be done.

The orchestra was in usual place, but clothed as the subscribing public never sees it. One and all wore the jackets of rehearsal: while summer gray was as permissible as autumn black. Nor—if the faithful reporter is to tell the whole truth—did they sit the chairs with quite the dignity proper to Friday afternoons and to Saturday or Monday evenings. To every man his congenial position. The old hands noted also that the piano of "Pagan Poem" was now set at the left and in front of the orchestra; the celesta of other numbers moved equally forward. "Radio transmission" doubtless. These old hands further observed that, conducting to an "invisible audience." Dr. Koussevitzky used the same gestures to which he has accustomed his visible and watchful listeners. They are not mannerisms nor are they made "for effect." They are the conductor's natural expression of the music and himself upon the orchestra. (Memorandum: However much pianists and violinists may cultivate the short jacket for matinées, a long coat is essential to the conductor's "line.") chestra, and express our wish that the cultural life of Massachusetts always remains in the first rank, as it has been up to this day.

Said Judge Cabot when his moment came:

Fittingly, as part of the observance of Massachusetts's three hundredth anniversary, it is made possible for the people of Massachusetts and of our Nation to hear the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The early settlers set great store by the spoken word. They listened eagerly to exhortations expounding the ways of the spirit. Through their hearing, their imaginations were stirred. The first minister of Salem, the Reverened Francis Higginson, was a man of courage, patriotism and faith, giving all that he had to love of his people. It is well said that "he who dedicates his life to the beauty of holiness is not far from the sight of all beauty."

His direct descendant, Henry Lee Higginson, in the beginning of the last fifty-year period of the past 300 years, founded the Boston Symphony Orchestra, because, as he said, music was his inner world which he enjoyed in the depths of his soul as nothing else and he wished to make possible for others this great happiness. His characteristics, too, were courage, patriotism, friendship. He had faith that the great musical compositions could be produced by artists playing each year ever more perfectly under an interpreting master, so that the listeners would go forth rejoicing and live their lives refreshed.

What began thus in Boston has marvellously widened, extending today to countless numbers throughout the land. Yet the greatest happiness comes from listening in the presence of the artists themselves. Fittingly, therefore, in this fiftieth year of its assembly, this orchestra will hold a festival in the nation's capital and there in December, during four days, it will play the symphonies of Beethoven.

May each succeeding fifty years add to the orchestra's excellence and lasting significance in the life of Massachusetts and of the nation.

Reviewer's Epilogue

The purpose of this article is descriptive, not critical; but it would be at fault as record did it fail to note the quality of the orchestra. After three rehearsals it was unmistakably itself—in the vitalizing energy of its tone; the sensuous richness, the luminous texture, the instant plasticity. At call it gave back vigor or subtlety; its ear for euphony was unfailing; its technical prowess, the means to the musical end. For each composer and each music, it found the individualizing, intensifying voice. As for the chosen numbers, the 'radio ear" may be this, that or the other; but it must have caught something of the poetizing and jewelling Debussy; of the keen-witted and keen-voiced Strauss. The grace and the fancy of Mr. Foote's Suite could not have escaped it, though it may have missed the fineness of his composing fingers. It must have felt the spring air blowing through Mr. Hill's "Lilacs," the note of revery upon which it begins and ends—the New Englander musing over his own countryside. And which of us at first hearing, twenty-odd years ago, absorbed every spell of Mr. Loeffler's "Pagan Poem"? After all they have made and still make music in New England. Not yet is Euterpe chained "exclusively" in the market place of Manhattan.

As for the radio "up against" symphonic music from an orchestra of the first rank, the young Suzanne shall be spokeswoman. Her years are eleven and she listened on Saturday to Foote, Hill and Loeffler in the concert hall; to Debussy and Strauss off a neighboring set. "But, father," she said, as the last measures of "The Afternoon of a Faun" sounded, "there's something between." There is—machinery. H. T. P.

When there is no "visible audience," a symphony orchestra may tune its instruments on the stage—in these days rare experience in any concert-hall. When five numbers, two or three of appreciable length, must be crowded into ninety minutes—and not a moment over—it must also play virtually without pause. Add two speeches, though of the briefest, and not a second must be wasted. The Announcer's foot was on the step to the stage-microphone, as the last phrase of the orchestra sounded. Dr. Koussevitzky dropped his baton; spun on his heel; faced it manuscript in hand—all in a single motion. Accustomed to signify the pleasure of the court, Judge Cabot now stood by the stage waiting the pleasure of the Announcer. A radio world indeed; but one in which that same Announcer did himself credit by the reticence and the good taste of his introductory sentences. Neither the scandalous life and works of the inexhaustible Eulenspiegel, nor the Vergilian Eclogue behind Mr. Loeffler's tone-poem, nor even the "experiences"—as he chastely named them—of Mallarmé's and Debussy's "Faun" tempted him to overdo.

Speeches, But Brief

Said Dr. Koussevitzky for first interlude:

I am happy that my first speech on the radio is to welcome the Tercentenary of the State of Massachusetts. Today the Boston Symphony Orchestra takes part in your celebrations. We congratulate you on your great achievements during these three hundred years. Massachusetts possesses immense intellectual treasures: Harvard University, known as the most important center of culture and enlightenment; the Boston Symphony Orchestra, considered to be the leading orchestra of the whole musical world; a great number of first-class writers, painters, sculptors and composers of whom you may be proud—not only you people of Massachusetts but all the citizens of the United States.

Let me welcome you again, in the name of the Boston Symphony Or-

FIRST SYMPHONY CONDUCTOR HERE

Sir George Henschel Arrives to Take Part in 50th Anniversary

Sir George Henschel, first conductor of the Boston symphony orchestra, accompanied by Lady Henschel and their daughter, Elizabeth Georgie Henschel, arrived yesterday on the White Star liner Britannic from Liverpool and Queenstown, and will take part in the 50th anniversary of the organization, remaining here until Oct. 18, Sir George conducting concerts next Friday and Saturday. He was met at Commonwealth pier by Judge F. P. Cabot, president of the trustees; W. H. Brennan, general manager; G. E. Judd, assistant manager; E. B. Dane, trustee; Arthur Foote, composer.

Sir George resides in Aviemore, Scotland, where he teaches voice and composition. Although in his 80th year he looks fully 20 years younger. He expressed delight in again visiting Boston, his last previous visit being in 1908. Referring to the orchestra Sir George said it was back in 1881 when he began to conduct the organization which has attained perfection since his day.

He was knighted in 1914, having been married in New York in 1907. Sir George and family are guests of Mrs. M. Graeme Haughton, 13 Commonwealth avenue.

Dr. Henry Wade, surgeon of Edinburgh, Scotland, came on the Britannic to attend the clinical congress of the American College of Surgeons at Philadelphia, Oct. 15-16, as guest speaker, and the International Medical Association gathering at Minneapolis the latter part of this month. Dr. Wade won decorations from the British government for service in the Boer and world wars. He was met by Dr. Fred Cotton, chief surgeon at Boston City Hospital.

Greeting a brother whom she had not seen in 50 years, Mrs. Fannie Goldstein of Leeds, Eng., stepped from the Britannic into the arms of Simon Goldman of 20 Georgia street, Roxbury. They are Austrians and separated as children, she going to England and Mr. Lendman to the United States. A sister, Mrs. Rose Doucette of Canada, was at the pier and they had not met in 37 years.

Others landing here were Mr. and Mrs. Samuel Hoar, Samuel Hoar, Jr., of Concord; Mr. and Mrs. John Hoar of Brookline; Mrs. W. A. Gaston, Miss Laura Bailey of Brookline, Mrs. Ellerton P. Whitney of Milton.

Mrs. Margaret Gregory, 46, died of heart disease on Oct. 2 and the body was buried at sea the following day.

The Britannic crossed in six days seven hours nine minutes, maintaining average speed of nearly 18 knots. The performance is said by officials of the line to establish a record from Liverpool, the ship having docked a day earlier than heretofore.

17

...rapbook

New York, November 16, 1854.

...of the New England stock which for two centuries before his birth had done less for the arts than for the virtues, departed early from the accepted paths of the young men of his time and station. . . Before the end of 1856, he found himself in Europe, where he stayed for four years, devoting himself chiefly to the study of music at Vienna. Many letters to his father are preserved. . . . In September the young student of music is established in Vienna, and writes thus to his father:—

As everyone has some particular object of supreme interest to himself, so I have music. It is almost my inner world; without it, I miss much, and with it I am happier and better. You may remember that I wished to study music some few years ago when in Europe before. On my return home other studies took up my time so much that music had to be neglected. . . . I felt the want of it greatly, and was very sorry to give up the thing dearest to me. When I came out here I had no plans, as you know. Trade was not satisfying . . . as a life-occupation. Out here I have consulted, and have decided to try to learn something of music ex- and internally, i.e., of playing and of harmony or thorough-bass. If I find that I am not profiting at all by my work, I shall throw it up and go home. If I gain something, I shall stick to it.

You will ask, "What is to come of it all if successful?" I do not know. But this is clear. I have then improved my own powers, which is every man's duty. I have a resource to which I can always turn with delight, however the world may ...with me. I am so much the ...ger, the wider, the wiser, ...better for my duties in life. I can then go with satisfaction to my business, knowing my resource at the end of the day. It is already made, and has only to be used and it will grow. Finally it is my province in education, and having cultivated myself in it, I am fully prepared to teach others in it. . . . But the pleasure, pure and free from all disagreeable consequences or after-thoughts, of playing and still more of singing myself, is indescribable. In Rome I took about eight lessons of a capital master, and I used to enjoy intensely the singing to his accompaniment my exercises and some little Neapolitan songs. My reasons for studying harmony are manifest. I cannot properly understand music without doing so; moreover, it is an excellent exercise for the mind. As to writing music, I have nothing to say; but it is not my expectation. It is like writing poetry; if one is prompted to do so, and has anything to say, he does it. But I entirely disavow any such intention or aim in my present endeavor,—and this I wish to be most clearly expressed and understood, should anyone ask about me. I am studying for my own good and pleasure.

And now, old daddy, I hope you will be able to make something out of this long letter. You should not have been troubled with it, but I thought you would prefer to know all about it. It is only carrying out your own darling idea of making an imperishable capital in education. My money may fly away; my knowledge cannot. One belongs to the world, the other to me.—M. A. DeWOLFE HOWE, in "The Boston Symphony Orchestra."

...totalling $501.

18

THE SYMPHONY ON THE AIR

Boston has several good things to share with the nation, and it gave of its very best Saturday night, when the Symphony orchestra played especially for the radio, sending its music through twenty-nine broadcasting stations to listeners in every state. It was a notable occasion for the orchestra, as it signalized the beginning of its fiftieth season, with its reputation as a musical organization of world-wide prestige never higher. No less, it was an important event in radio history, for very seldom has an orchestra of the calibre of the Boston Symphony played exclusively for broadcasting and for so long a period, since the usual musical program rarely exceeds an hour. The hour and a half which the National Broadcasting Company allotted to the concert is evidence of its recognition of the importance of the orchestra.

No doubt there was some criticism of the program—there is usually some unfavorable comment on every program—because there was no concession to popular tastes. It contained no "Overture of 1812," not even one of the familiar symphonies. Instead the orchestra presented five works of the highest artistic standards written within the last generation, three of which were composed by New England musicians—a choice consistent with the uncompromising policy of the organization. The brilliance of the wood-wind choir and the richness of the string ensemble were as thrilling through the radio as within the portals of Symphony hall.

In harmony with the high standard of the broadcast was the announcing of "E. F. A" (Arthur F. Edes) of WEEI in Boston. Concise, straightforward and intelligent, his introductions added substantially to the enjoyment of the music and to the brief addresses by Dr. Koussevitzky and Judge Cabot.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK TIMES

HENSCHEL REACHES BOSTON

First Conductor of Symphony Orchestra to Take Part in Jubilee.

Special to The New York Times.

BOSTON, Oct. 5.—Sir George Henschel, first conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, accompanied by Lady Henschel and their daughter, Miss Elizabeth Georgie Henschel, arrived on the White Star liner Britannic from Liverpool and Queenstown, and will take part in the fiftieth anniversary of the organization, remaining here until Oct. 18. Sir George will conduct concerts next Friday and Saturday. He was met at Commonwealth pier by Judge F. P. Cabot, president of the trustees; W. P. Brennan, general manager; G. E. Judd, assistant manager; E. B. Dane, trustee, and Arthur Foote, composer.

Sir George resides in Aviemore, Scotland, where he teaches voice and composition. Although in his eightieth year, he looks fully twenty years younger. He expressed delight in again visiting Boston. His last previous visit was in 1908. Sir George said it was in 1881 that he began to conduct the orchestra.

He was knighted in 1914. He was married in New York in 1907. Sir George and his family are guests of Mrs. M. Graeme Haughton.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK TIMES

BRITANNIC GAINS IN SPEED.

New Cunarder Averages 17¾ Knots on Trip From Liverpool.

The White Star Line motor ship Britannic arrived last night from Liverpool by way of Queenstown. It is the first of those ships which call at Boston to land passengers in New York on a Sunday. Captain F. F. Summers, R. N. R., master of the Britannic, said the engines were developing greater speed and had averaged 17¾ knots for the trip. The weather was fine all the way across, Captain Summers said.

Among the passengers on the Britannic were the Countess A. de Sieyes and Miss Marion de Sieyes and Louis Van Hes, American lyric tenor. Sir George Henschel, first conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which he led from 1881 to 1884, left the motor ship at that port on Saturday to conduct the orchestra in the opening concerts of its fiftieth season at Symphony Hall.

THIS CLIPPING FROM NEW YORK MIRROR

HOW MANY got a thrill out of Koussevitzky's beautiful interpretation of Loeffler's, "A Pagan Poem"—to us the outstanding radio feature over the weekend?

* * *

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
REPUBLICAN

OCT 7 - 1930

Views of European Peril

Sergo Koussevitzky, the distinguished Russian conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, on his return from Europe a week ago gave out a statement dealing in part with present conditions in European countries. In Austria as in Germany he found in the people's countenances "a worried hopelessness." Only in France did the people seem free and confident.

The danger to Europe, in Dr Koussevitzky's opinion, is the Bolshevist "propaganda for a world 'revolution through economical 'means." "Thanks to the fact that 'the Bolshevists have at their dis-'position 120,000,000 of people whom 'they have changed into slaves and 'obliged to work nearly for nothing, 'they have the possibility to put on 'the world market goods for a price 'with which no nation can compete," Dr Koussevitzky said. He fears that unless some international organization such as a United States of Europe is developed, European culture will entirely perish, "as has perished 'the culture of Russia, invaded by 'barbarians who destroy all that is 'free and beautiful."

As a member of the Russian upper classes which have been ruthlessly treated by the revolutionists, Dr Koussevitzky is naturally in a position to understand the effects of Bolshevism upon the cultural life of Russia. But, as he frankly says, "it 'is rather difficult for a musician to 'become a politician," and other observers of the European scene do not agree that Russia's dumping program is directly intended as revolutionary propaganda. The more general belief is that Russia is intensely eager to obtain credits in foreign countries with which to finance its industrial expansion program and for that reason is taking advantage of its opportunity to sell products at any price.

The question now being asked is whether Russia itself will be able to stand the strain of the Bolshevis' regime. Other European nation: have the power to raise tariff bar riers against Russian imports though, as always with tariff bar riers, it is a question of expediency how far they can be applied withou resulting in economic derangemen at home.

Recent developments in German and Austria indicate a drift in pub lic sentiment not toward Bolshe vism, but toward Fascism. While e pressing his conviction that the co stitution of Germany was safe, J Hjalmar Schacht, former preside of the German Reichsbank, said arriving in New York last week th the rise of Fascism denoted a d mand for another readjustment o Germany's debt to the allies. "If the 'German people are going to starve, 'there are going to be many more 'Hitlers," he said.

As Dr Schacht did not mention Russia, it is fair to conclude that he does not regard Russia's export methods as a controling factor in the existing economic disorganization of Europe. But, like Dr Koussevitzky, he spoke of the need of greater cooperation between governments, and said that the present world-wide financial and economic depression might be a blessing in disguise if it brought about that result. The revival of nationalistic feeling which accompanies Fascism will probably make that outcome more difficult to attain.

THIS CLIPPING FROM HAVERHILL, MASS.
GAZETTE

7 1930

* * * *

NOTED IN THE NEWS

The Boston Symphony orchestra will give a Bach festival in March, in memory of the founder of the organization, Maj. Henry Lee Higginson. At that time the Mass in B Minor will be played and Dr. Davison's Harvard Glee club and Mr. Woodworth's Radcliffe choir, will assist the orchestra.

The Musical Art quartet has given a series of recitals in Italy by invitation of Ambassador and Mrs. Garrett, before distinguished audiences of diplomats and musicians, which have met with enthusiastic reception. The quartet's Fall tour in America will begin in Boston, Nov. 5.

Ernest Schelling will conduct four concerts for young people in Symphony hall, Boston, on the following Saturday mornings: Jan. 17, Feb. 14 and 21 and March 21.

*

THIS CLIPPING FROM HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT

OCT 8 - 1930

The Observation Post

By Walter Brown, Dramatic Editor

When George Will Remember.

On October 22, 1881, the brand new Boston Symphony Orchestra was heard for the first time, playing under the baton of a massive young Bavarian named on the program as George Henschel. Annie Louise Cary was the soloist at the concert and the program included Beethoven's Overture, "Dedication of the House"; an ...t, from Gluck's "Orpheus". Haydn's ...mphony in B flat; Ballet Music ...om Schubert's "Rosamunde"; a ...ene from Bruch's "Odysseus." And ...n Boston Friday, October 10, 1930, at a concert marking the opening of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's fiftieth season, the baton of Sir George Henschel, of England, will be raised over a band of musicians nearly twice as large as that original orchestra—and the original program (with the "Merstersinger" Prelude added as a final number and with Madame Matzenauer as soloist) will be given.

* * *

Now it seems to me not only a singularly appropriate, but likewise a most dramatically effective, thing to do to give that first program practically in its entirety forty-nine years later; and it seems an excellent commentary on the quality of the orchestra and its ideals that a program of the so very long-ago can be repeated not only with no loss of self-respect but even with pride.

And I cannot help thinking about what will be the feelings in the heart of the old Conductor as he faces first the huge crowd that will pack great Symphony Hall and then turns to the artists who await his signal to sound the first notes of the Beethoven Overture. That he will remember well that night in 1881 goes without saying; for musicians of the Henschel stamp do not forget their great moments—and the first concert by the new Boston Symphony Orchestra certainly marked one of the great moments of Sir George's long and useful musical life. I think, too, that he will remember many of the players he saw before him then, and that he has forgotten Annie Louise Cary's voice. He will not be able, physically, to lead the orchestra with the fire that was in him a half-century ago—but I venture to say that his players will give him every bit of their art in their playing that anniversary night. And I believe that more than one pair of eyes will grow dim as the music sounds.

THIS CLIPPING FROM BANGOR, ME.
COMMERCIAL

OCT 8 - 1930

NATURAL REACTION

Dr. Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, has returned from a visit to Europe and expresses himself as somewhat concerned by conditions found. Himself a Russian, who is without sympathy for bolshevism, Dr. Koussevitzky sees a great danger to Europe because of soviet propaganda for a world revolution through economic means and visions industrial ruin for some of Russia's neighbors because of the soviet's new industrial program under which 120,000,000 Russians virtually are slaves to the government with labor producing at the expense only of bare subsistence.

The Symphony leader touches upon a problem that is causing much agitation in some of the European countries that already have been affected by the influx of cheaply-produced goods from Russia—a problem that very likely is lending much support to the proposal of M. Briand for a United States of Europe with plans for meeting the Russian situation. However, the conditions are such that they can be met without united action and will be met in the most available manner—by raising tariff barriers.

We expect that Russia's industrial campaign will soon encounter a very vigorous snubbing. Russia has the labor and is availing itself thereof, but it requires foreign capital and foreign purchase of its production. Today the Russian government is disposing of goods at prices that make competition in free countries impossible. And in protection of their own laborers, Russia's neighbors will establish tariffs on Russian goods at rates that will bring their costs to figures that can be met. Such is a natural result. A nation that proposes to elevate itself by flooding the markets of other countries must take into consideration the natural reaction of those other countries, something that the Soviet government apparently has not done.

18

THE SYMPHONY ON THE AIR

Boston has several good things to share with the nation, and it gave of its very best Saturday night, when the Symphony orchestra played especially for the radio, sending its music through twenty-nine broadcasting stations to listeners in every state. It was a notable occasion for the orchestra, as it signalized the beginning of its fiftieth season, with its reputation as a musical organization of world-wide prestige never higher. No less, it was an important event in radio history, for very seldom has an orchestra of the calibre of the Boston Symphony played exclusively for broadcasting and for so long a period, since the usual musical program rarely exceeds an hour. The hour and a half which the National Broadcasting Company allotted to the concert is evidence of its recognition of the importance of the orchestra.

No doubt there was some criticism of the program—there is usually some unfavorable comment on every program—because there was no concession to popular tastes. It contained no "Overture of 1812," not even one of the familiar symphonies. Instead the orchestra presented five works of the highest artistic standards written within the last generation, three of which were composed by New England musicians—a choice consistent with the uncompromising policy of the organization. The brilliance of the wood-wind choir and the richness of the string ensemble were as thrilling through the radio as within the portals of Symphony hall.

In harmony with the high standard of the broadcast was the announcing of "E. F. A" (Arthur F. Edes) of WEEI in Boston. Concise, straightforward and intelligent, his introductions added substantially to the enjoyment of the music and to the brief addresses by Dr. Koussevitzky and Judge Cabot.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK TIMES

HENSCHEL REACHES BOSTON

First Conductor of Symphony Orchestra to Take Part in Jubilee.

Special to The New York Times.

BOSTON, Oct. 5.—Sir George Henschel, first conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, accompanied by Lady Henschel and their daughter, Miss Elizabeth Georgie Henschel, arrived on the White Star liner Britannic from Liverpool and Queenstown, and will take part in the fiftieth anniversary of the organization, remaining here until Oct. 18. Sir George will conduct concerts next Friday and Saturday. He was met at Commonwealth pier by Judge F. P. Cabot, president of the trustees; W. P. Brennan, general manager; G. E. Judd, assistant manager; E. B. Dane, trustee, and Arthur Foote, composer.

Sir George resides in Aviemore, Scotland, where he teaches voice and composition. Although in his eightieth year, he looks fully twenty years younger. He expressed delight in again visiting Boston. His last previous visit was in 1908. Sir George said it was in 1881 that he began to conduct the orchestra.

He was knighted in 1914. He was married in New York in 1907. Sir George and his family are guests of Mrs. M. Graeme Haughton.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK TIMES

BRITANNIC GAINS IN SPEED.

New Cunarder Averages 17¾ Knots on Trip From Liverpool.

The White Star Line motor ship Britannic arrived last night from Liverpool by way of Queenstown. It is the first of those ships which call at Boston to land passengers in New York on a Sunday. Captain F. F. Summers, R. N. R., master of the Britannic, said the engines were developing greater speed and had averaged 17¾ knots for the trip. The weather was fine all the way across, Captain Summers said.

Among the passengers on the Britannic were the Countess A. de Sieyes and Miss Marion de Sieyes and Louis Van Hes, American lyric tenor. Sir George Henschel, first conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which he led from 1881 to 1884, left the motor ship at that port on Saturday to conduct the orchestra in the opening concerts of its fiftieth season at Symphony Hall.

THIS CLIPPING FROM NEW YORK MIRROR

HOW MANY got a thrill out of Koussevitzky's beautiful interpretation of Loeffler's, "A Pagan Poem"—to us the outstanding radio feature over the weekend?

* * *

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
REPUBLICAN

OCT 7 - 1930

Views of European Peril

Serge Koussevitzky, the distinguished Russian conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, on his return from Europe a week ago gave out a statement dealing in part with present conditions in European countries. In Austria as in Germany he found in the people's countenances "a worried hopelessness." Only in France did the people seem free and confident.

The danger to Europe, in Dr Koussevitzky's opinion, is the Bolshevist "propaganda for a world 'revolution through economical 'means." "Thanks to the fact that 'the Bolshevists have at their dis-'position 120,000,000 of people whom 'they have changed into slaves and 'obliged to work nearly for nothing, 'they have the possibility to put on 'the world market goods for a price 'with which no nation can compete," Dr Koussevitzky said. He fears that unless some international organization such as a United States of Europe is developed, European culture will entirely perish, "as has perished 'the culture of Russia, invaded by 'barbarians who destroy all that is 'free and beautiful."

As a member of the Russian upper classes which have been ruthlessly treated by the revolutionists, Dr Koussevitzky is naturally in a position to understand the effects of Bolshevism upon the cultural life of Russia. But, as he frankly says, "it 'is rather difficult for a musician to 'become a politician," and other observers of the European scene do not agree that Russia's dumping program is directly intended as revolutionary propaganda. The more general belief is that Russia is intensely eager to obtain credits in foreign countries with which to finance its industrial expansion program and for that reason is taking advantage of its opportunity to sell products at any price.

The question now being asked is whether Russia itself will be able to stand the strain of the Bolshevis' regime. Other European nation: have the power to raise tariff bar riers against Russian imports though, as always with tariff bar riers, it is a question of expediency how far they can be applied withou resulting in economic derangemen at home.

Recent developments in German and Austria indicate a drift in pub lic sentiment not toward Bolshe vism, but toward Fascism. While e: pressing his conviction that the co, stitution of Germany was safe, Dr Hjalmar Schacht, former president of the German Reichsbank, said on arriving in New York last week that the rise of Fascism denoted a demand for another readjustment of Germany's debt to the allies. "If the 'German people are going to starve, 'there are going to be many more 'Hitlers," he said.

As Dr Schacht did not mention Russia, it is fair to conclude that he does not regard Russia's export methods as a controling factor in the existing economic disorganization of Europe. But, like Dr Koussevitzky, he spoke of the need of greater cooperation between governments, and said that the present world-wide financial and economic depression might be a blessing in disguise if it brought about that result. The revival of nationalistic feeling which accompanies Fascism will probably make that outcome more difficult to attain.

THIS CLIPPING FROM HAVERHILL, MASS.
GAZETTE

7 1930

* * * *

NOTED IN THE NEWS

The Boston Symphony orchestra will give a Bach festival in March, in memory of the founder of the organization, Maj. Henry Lee Higginson. At that time the Mass in B Minor will be played and Dr. Davison's Harvard Glee club and Mr. Woodworth's Radcliffe choir, will assist the orchestra.

The Musical Art quartet has given a series of recitals in Italy by invitation of Ambassador and Mrs. Garrett, before distinguished audiences of diplomats and musicians, which have met with enthusiastic reception. The quartet's Fall tour in America will begin in Boston, Nov. 5.

Ernest Schelling will conduct four concerts for young people in Symphony hall, Boston, on the following Saturday mornings: Jan. 17, Feb. 14 and 21 and March 21.

* * *

THIS CLIPPING FROM BANGOR, ME.
COMMERCIAL

OCT 8 - 1930

NATURAL REACTION

Dr. Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, has returned from a visit to Europe and expresses himself as somewhat concerned by conditions found. Himself a Russian, who is without sympathy for bolshevism, Dr. Koussevitzky sees a great danger to Europe because of soviet propaganda for a world revolution through economic means and visions industrial ruin for some of Russia's neighbors because of the soviet's new industrial program under which 120,000,000 Russians virtually are slaves to the government with labor producing at the expense only of bare subsistence.

The Symphony leader touches upon a problem that is causing much agitation in some of the European countries that already have been affected by the influx of cheaply-produced goods from Russia—a problem that very likely is lending much support to the proposal of M. Briand for a United States of Europe with plans for meeting the Russian situation. However, the conditions are such that they can be met without united action and will be met in the most available manner—by raising tariff barriers.

We expect that Russia's industrial campaign will soon encounter a very vigorous snubbing. Russia has the labor and is availing itself thereof, but it requires foreign capital and foreign purchase of its production. Today the Russian government is disposing of goods at prices that make competition in free countries impossible. And in protection of their own laborers, Russia's neighbors will establish tariffs on Russian goods at rates that will bring their costs to figures that can be met. Such is a natural result. A nation that proposes to elevate itself by flooding the markets of other countries must take into consideration the natural reaction of those other countries, something that the Soviet government apparently has not done.

THIS CLIPPING FROM HARTFORD, CONN.
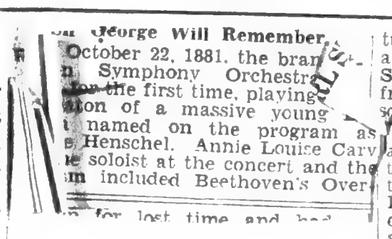
COURANT

OCT 8 - 1930

The Observation Post

By Walter Brown, Dramatic Editor



...George Will Remember.

...October 22, 1881, the bran... Symphony Orchestra ...the first time, playing ...ton of a massive young ... named on the program as ...s Henschel. Annie Louise Cary ...e soloist at the concert and the ...m included Beethoven's Over... ...for lost time and had ture. "Dedication of the House"; an air from Gluck's "Orpheus". Haydn's Symphony in B flat; Ballet Music from Schubert's "Rosamunde"; a scene from Bruch's "Odysseus." And in Boston Friday, October 10, 1930, at a concert marking the opening of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's fiftieth season, the baton of Sir George Henschel, of England, will be raised over a band of musicians nearly twice as large as that original orchestra—and the original program (with the "Merstersinger" Prelude added as a final number and with Madame Matzenauer as soloist) will be given.

\+ \+ \+

Now it seems to me not only a singularly appropriate, but likewise a most dramatically effective, thing to do to give that first program practically in its entirety forty-nine years later; and it seems an excellent commentary on the quality of the orchestra and its ideals that a program of the so very long-ago can be repeated not only with no loss of self-respect but even with pride.

And I cannot help thinking about what will be the feelings in the heart of the old Conductor as he faces first the huge crowd that will pack great Symphony Hall and then turns to the artists who await his signal to sound the first notes of the Beethoven Overture. That he will remember well that night in 1881 goes without saying; for musicians of the Henschel stamp do not forget their great moments—and the first concert by the new Boston Symphony Orchestra certainly marked one of the great moments of Sir George's long and useful musical life. I think, too, that he will remember many of the players he saw before him then, and that he has forgotten Annie Louise Cary's voice. He will not be able, physically, to lead the orchestra with the fire that was in him a half-century ago—but I venture to say that his players will give him every bit of their art in their playing that anniversary night. And I believe that more than one pair of eyes will grow dim as the music sounds.

THIS CLIPPING FROM MINNEAPOLIS, MINN.
TRIBUNE
OCT 9 - 1930

Boston's Symphony Orchestra.

To the Editor of The Tribune:

Mr. Davies states in his article in Sunday's Tribune that this is the first time an arrangement has been effected whereby a symphony orchestra of first rank will give an important series of concerts at a great university. In this he is in error.

The Boston symphony orchestra has, for at least 35 years, given annually 10 or 12 concerts of symphonic music at Harvard university. In addition the Boston orchestra maintains close relations with the leading musical organization of the university, "The Harvard Glee club." From time to time both organizations and often the Radcliffe Choral society assisting, appear in concerts of serious music.

It is interesting to note, in connection, that the Boston symphony orchestra (which is this year enjoying the fiftieth year of its existence) has, since its inception given thought to the problems of the music student and others to whom a season ticket is a prohibitive luxury. I mean that a certain number of seats, some 600, are set aside at every Friday afternoon concert and sold for 50 cents (at half of this sum before the war). I have been to many of these concerts and, like others of my acquaintance, looked forward to the time when I could afford a regular season ticket and be thus assured of a seat at the same location every concert.

It seems to me the size of the Northrop memorial auditorium is sufficiently large to admit of some such arrangement to attract those who love music but to whom a season ticket at the regular rate is something beyond their means.

Then, again, the Boston orchestra finishes its regular season of serious music—only about 73 concerts in metropolitan Boston—it appears for two solid months—six nights a week in popular programs—by popular I do not mean jazz or musical comedy selections but music of a lighter, more tuneful character. The orchestra is reduced to 86 men—the chairs removed from the floor of Symphony hall and tables (240) substituted. One may enjoy refreshments while listening to superlative playing or sit in the balcony and merely listen. These "pops" as they are affectionately termed in Boston have been going on year after year for close on to 50 seasons, hardly be called an experiment. They are very well patronized and increase the revenues of the orchestra besides educating an increasing clientele who develop a liking for the more serious symphonic fare of the "regular" season.

Of course Minneapolis is not the population to draw on that Boston has but 50 years ago Boston was a comparatively small city and it is only by foresighted work in educating the music lover and student—getting them to develop the symphony habit—that the Boston symphony is stronger today than ever in public estimation and public patronage.

JOSEPH ECKMAN,
Minneapolis.

Boston Daily Globe
FRIDAY, OCT 10, 1930

A LILY IN THE CORNFIELD

"Life in the United States is hard and dry. Your country is a great cornfield."

IMAGINE in Boston a resident company of distinguished actors playing each week three such classic dramas as the "Oedipus Rex" in Greek, "Faust" in German, and "King Lear" in English, playing them as well as they can be played and keeping this up for half a century. You cannot imagine this, for there are not enough such plays to keep a theatre going at that pace. But what you h a v e imagined is the Boston Symphony Orchestra. In fact you can imagine better; that it was the first of its kind in America, that within a quarter of a century after its founding it was esteemed the finest in existence, and that it begot others in leading cities of the United States.

* * *

In September, 1857, a young man twenty-three years of age studying music in Vienna writes home to his father in Boston:

"Music is almost my inner world; without it I miss much, and with it I am happier and better."

Brave, modest, affectionate, and fine-grained, this young man, only a few years later, comes home from the Civil War to carry through life the scar of a saber slash on his cheek, "Major" before his name, and in his heart an ideal of how a private citizen may serve his country. First there is a living to earn, a business to establish. But all the while this man of action and of affairs nourishes his love of music. Finally, in October, 1881, he is ready. He founds the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

"How do you found an orchestra?" Maj Higginson is asked years later by a like-minded Londoner. "All you have to do is set the game going and back it up." It was his cheerful view of a stormy past. For, as usual, with creative enterprises ordained out of the deeper sources of a man's being, little had he guessed when he picked it up what a burden he was shouldering; but also as usual in such enterprises the strength to carry it never failed to be given. Speaking in 1889 the major said that time after time when tempted to falter, the sight of eager young lives and weary old lives gladdened by this great music made him resolve "one more year anyway." For he must earn the money annually to keep it going. With what grim relish he heard himself told, "But you can never make it pay!" Pay? He had reckoned on a yearly deficit of $20,000, and was seldom disappointed. One year it was $52,000. Another year it did just pay expenses. He told Mr Richard Aldrich in 1905 that he took the orchestra as other men of wealth with different tastes took their yachts, racing stables, libraries or art galleries. By the turn of the century this orchestra was the envy of European connoisseurs: "Boston, O, yes, that is the city which has the great orchestra." By 1904 Dr Richard Strauss, conducting a rehearsal of his "Heldenleben," can say to its members: "You play that finely, but a little too finely. I want some roughness here;" and two years later Dr Karl Muck, coming to take command, paid it the highest compliment a distinguished conductor could pay a distinguished orchestra. At his first concert, midway in a symphony of Beethoven, he laid down his baton and let the musicians go it alone.

Symphony Hall is a house of worship, for music is a religion. People are glad to pay good money for the privilege of going there to worship. Consider what a symphony is. It is a noble utterance in a universal language. More terse than the novel, more compact than the drama, more lyrical than poetry, more moving emotionally than all three, it can and will teach literature lessons in its own art. For music is no longer literature's little sister Cinderella: it is Queen. Like attar of roses, great music is an essence; tons of petals compressed into a few drops of perfume. Here are works performed in 45 minutes which cost their authors years of effort. Intellectually, too, music is a better sportsman than literature, for it can afford to be. No subject is taboo, the whole of life is discussed, the composer can use his most intimate experience, tell all he knows out loud ,and tell it beautifully. No one is offended, for those who understand are not shocked and those who do not understand are unaware that anything is being said. Thus does a universal language embrace universal experience.

Familiarity with the noblest mental imagery, with the finest models in an art form (it is the testimony of great artists) is more than education for an art: it is also education for life. Cultivated tastes, high standards—we grow like that which we admire. In this sort the influence of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has been incalculable. Do we Bostonians fully appreciate it? German critics have spoken of our orchestra as "the finest instrument thus far created in the history of music." When Antonio Stradivarius was fabricating his violins, no doubt his Cremona neighbors deemed him merely an averagely estimable citizen.

The good major has gone to his rest and his reward. But valiantly has he wrought. The kind voice has ceased to speak, the generous heart has ceased to beat, but his orchestra goes on filling our world with beauty and courage. Yet years ago, even while he still lived and worked, Mrs Fanny Kemble, the English actress, knew an Antonio Stradivarius when she met him in a street of Cremona for she told the major:

"You have planted a lily in a cornfield!"

Uncle Dudley.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BUFFALO, N. Y.
COURIER
OCT 1 0 1930

JUBILEE PROGRAM

News to observe its 50th anniversary October 11th

In celebration of its 50th anniversary, the Buffalo Evening News on Saturday, October 11th, will broadcast a three-hour program over WBEN, beginning at 8 p. m. The entertainment will be built around the story of Then and Now, both musically and in regard to local history.

Two numbers by the late John Lund, who, throughout the existence of the first Buffalo symphony orchestra, was its conductor, will be played by the orchestra under the direction of Edward A. Murphy, solo hornist of the St. Louis symphony orchestra, and Arthur C. Snellgrove. Music heard on the first program of the Boston symphony orchestra and at the opening performance at the Metropolitan opera house, both of which are celebrating their 50th anniversary this year, also will have a place on the jubilee program.

HARVARD AND THE SYMPHONY

This afternoon Sir George Henschel will lift the baton he first raised fifty years ago, and will signal the Boston Symphony Orchestra to begin the same program that they played under his direction at their first concert. To Harvard men the occasion will be the anniversary of a most valuable and delightful aspect of life in Cambridge. There has always been a very close association between the Boston Symphony Orchestra and Harvard College.

This relationship has been largely due to the personal interest of the late Major Henry Lee Higginson in both institutions. Major Higginson was the founder of the orchestra, and for long a fellow of Harvard College; throughout his life he worked to bring them together as much as possible. The plans for the Sanders Theatre series of concerts were drawn up by him, in organizing the orchestra, as an essential part of its program. They have contributed both enjoyment and educational benefit to fifty years of Harvard faculty and students.

What the Boston Symphony has thus contributed to Harvard has been reciprocated, in part, by the contributions of the Harvard and Radcliffe Glee Clubs to the Symphony. Since 1923, when the Harvard Glee Club first sang with the orchestra, they have both contributed vocal parts to such notable programs as Brahms' "Ein Deutches Requiem" and Beethoven's Ninth Symphony.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is celebrating its anniversary by performing, in conjunction with the Glee Clubs, an "Ode for the Jubilee of the Symphony Orchestra" composed by two Harvard men, which comes as a fitting climax to the friendly relations of the past.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TIMES
OCT 1 0 1930

ORCHESTRA CELEBRATES.

Sir George Henschel to Conduct Boston Symphony, as He Did in 1881

Sir George Henschel, who in 1881 conducted the first concert ever given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will direct today and tomorrow the opening pair of concerts of its fiftieth anniversary season at Symphony Hall in Boston.

Mr. Henschel will play this afternoon the same program he gave on Oct. 22, 1881, with one exception. Wagner's prelude to "Die Meistersinger" will be substituted for Weber's "Festival" overture. The rest of the program includes Beethoven's "Dedication of the House" overture, the ario "Che Faro senza Euridyce," from Gluck's "Orpheus"; Haydn's Symphony in B flat, the ballet music from Schubert's "Rosamunde" and the aria "Penelope's Lament," from Bruch's "Odysseus." Margaret Mateznauer will be the solojst. The late Annie Louise Cary was the soloist fifty years ago.

THIS CLIPPING FROM HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT
OCT 1 0 1930

Miss Elsie J. Dresser of Evergreen Avenue and Mrs. Olive Russell Dawley of Torwood Street are in Boston as the guests of Mrs. Dawley's sister, Mrs. Joel M. Barnes of Newton Center, Mass., for the first concert to be given this season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra this afternoon in Symphony Hall.

This is the forty-ninth year of the symphony and Sir George Henschel, who conducted the first concert in 1881, will conduct, giving the same program as on that occasion.

THIS CLIPPING FROM WORCESTER, MASS.
TELEGRAM
OCT 1 0 1930

TO ATTEND SYMPHONY CONCERT

Mrs. Walter D. Ross, of 84 West Boylston street, will go to Boston today to attend the opening concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra this afternoon. Mrs. Ross has been a subscriber to the series for many years.

Sir George Henschell, who conducted the first Boston Symphony orchestra concerts 50 years ago, has returned to Boston from England to conduct the opening concerts.

victor in ... totalling $501.

THIS CLIPPING FROM MINNEAPOLIS, MINN.
TRIBUNE
OCT 9 - 1930

Boston's Symphony Orchestra.

To the Editor of The Tribune:

Mr. Davies states in his article in Sunday's Tribune that this is the first time an arrangement has been effected whereby a symphony orchestra of first rank will give an important series of concerts at a great university. In this he is in error.

The Boston symphony orchestra has, for at least 35 years, given annually 10 or 12 concerts of symphonic music at Harvard university. In addition the Boston orchestra maintains close relations with the leading musical organization of the university, "The Harvard Glee club." From time to time both organizations and often the Radcliffe Choral society assisting, appear in concerts of serious music.

It is interesting to note, in connection, that the Boston symphony orchestra (which is this year enjoying the fiftieth year of its existence) has, since its inception given thought to the problems of the music student and others to whom a season ticket is a prohibitive luxury. I mean that a certain number of seats, some 600, are set aside at every Friday afternoon concert and sold for 50 cents (at half of this sum before the war). I have been to many of these concerts and, like others of my acquaintance, looked forward to the time when I could afford a regular season ticket and be thus assured of a seat at the same location every concert.

It seems to me the size of the Northrop memorial auditorium is sufficiently large to admit of some such arrangement to attract those who love music but to whom a season ticket at the regular rate is something beyond their means.

Then, again, the Boston orchestra finishes its regular season of serious music—only about 72 concerts in metropolitan Boston—it appears for two solid months—six nights a week in popular programs—by popular I do not mean jazz or musical comedy selections but music of a lighter, more tuneful character. The orchestra is reduced to 80 men—the chairs removed from the floor of Symphony hall and tables (240) substituted. One may enjoy refreshments while listening to superlative playing or sit in the balcony and merely listen. These "pops" as they are affectionately termed in Boston have been going on year after year for close on to 50 years so can hardly be called an experiment. They are very well patronized and increase the revenues of the orchestra besides educating an increasing clientele who develop a liking for the more serious symphonic fare of the "regular" season.

Of course Minneapolis has not the population to draw upon that Boston has but 50 years ago Boston was a comparatively small city and it is only by foresighted work in educating the music lover and student—getting them to develop the symphony habit—that the Boston symphony is stronger today than ever in public estimation and public patronage.

JOSEPH ECKMAN,
Minneapolis.

Boston Daily Globe

FRIDAY, OCT. 10, 1930

A LILY IN THE CORNFIELD

"Life in the United States is hard and dry. Your country is a great cornfield."

IMAGINE in Boston a resident company of distinguished actors playing each week three such classic dramas as the "Oedipus Rex" in Greek, "Faust" in German, and "King Lear" in English, playing them as well as they can be played and keeping this up for half a century. You cannot imagine this, for there are not enough such plays to keep a theatre going at that pace. But what you have imagined is the Boston Symphony Orchestra. In fact you can imagine better; that it was the first of its kind in America, that within a quarter of a century after its founding it was esteemed the finest in existence, and that it begot others in leading cities of the United States.

* * *

In September, 1857, a young man twenty-three years of age studying music in Vienna writes home to his father in Boston:

"Music is almost my inner world; without it I miss much, and with it I am happier and better."

Brave, modest, affectionate, and fine-grained, this young man, only a few years later, comes home from the Civil War to carry through life the scar of a saber slash on his cheek, "Major" before his name, and in his heart an ideal of how a private citizen may serve his country. First there is a living to earn, a business to establish. But all the while this man of action and of affairs nourishes his love of music. Finally, in October, 1881, he is ready. He founds the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

"How do you found an orchestra?" Maj Higginson is asked years later by a like-minded Londoner. "All you have to do is set the game going and back it up." It was his cheerful view of a stormy past. For, as usual, with creative enterprises ordained out of the deeper sources of a man's being, little had he guessed when he picked it up what a burden he was shouldering; but also as usual in such enterprises the strength to carry it never failed to be given. Speaking in 1889 the major said that time after time when tempted to falter, the sight of eager young lives and weary old lives gladdened by this great music made him resolve "one more year anyway." For he must earn the money annually to keep it going. With what grim relish he heard himself told, "But you can never make it pay!" Pay? He had reckoned on a yearly deficit of $20,000, and was seldom disappointed. One year it was $52,000. Another year it did just pay expenses. He told Mr Richard Aldrich in 1905 that he took the orchestra as other men of wealth with different tastes took their yachts, racing stables, libraries or art galleries. By the turn of the century this orchestra was the envy of European connoisseurs: "Boston, O, yes, that is the city which has the great orchestra." By 1904 Dr Richard Strauss, conducting a rehearsal of his "Heldenleben," can say to its members: "You play that finely, but a little too finely. I want some roughness here;" and two years later Dr Karl Muck, coming to take command, paid it the highest compliment a distinguished conductor could pay a distinguished orchestra. At his first concert, midway in a symphony of Beethoven, he laid down his baton and let the musicians go it alone.

Symphony Hall is a house of worship, for music is a religion. People are glad to pay good money for the privilege of going there to worship. Consider what a symphony is. It is a noble utterance in a universal language. More terse than the novel, more compact than the drama, more lyrical than poetry, more moving emotionally than all three, it can and will teach literature lessons in its own art. For music is no longer literature's little sister Cinderella; it is Queen. Like attar of roses, great music is an essence; tons of petals compressed into a few drops of perfume. Here are works performed in 45 minutes which cost their authors years of effort. Intellectually, too, music is a better sportsman than literature, for it can afford to be. No subject is taboo, the whole of life is discussed, the composer can use his most intimate experience, tell all he knows out loud ,and tell it beautifully. No one is offended, for those who understand are not shocked and those who do not understand are unaware that anything is being said. Thus does a universal language embrace universal experience.

Familiarity with the noblest mental imagery, with the finest models in an art form (it is the testimony of great artists) is more than education for an art: it is also education for life. Cultivated tastes, high standards—we grow like that which we admire. In this sort the influence of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has been incalculable. Do we Bostonians fully appreciate it? German critics have spoken of our orchestra as "the finest instrument thus far created in the history of music." When Antonio Stradivarius was fabricating his violins, no doubt his Cremona neighbors deemed him merely an averagely estimable citizen.

The good major has gone to his rest and his reward. But valiantly has he wrought. The kind voice has ceased to speak, the generous heart has ceased to beat, but his orchestra goes on filling our world with beauty and courage. Yet years ago, even while he still lived and worked, Mrs Fanny Kemble, the English actress, knew an Antonio Stradivarius when she met him in a street of Cremona for she told the major:

"You have planted a lily in a cornfield!"

Uncle Dudley.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BUFFALO, N. Y.
COURIER

OCT 1 0 1930

JUBILEE PROGRAM

News to observe its 50th anniversary October 11th

In celebration of its 50th anniversary, the Buffalo Evening News on Saturday, October 11th, will broadcast a three-hour program over WBEN, beginning at 8 p. m. The entertainment will be built around the story of Then and Now, both musically and in regard to local history.

Two numbers by the late John Lund, who, throughout the existence of the first Buffalo symphony orchestra, was its conductor, will be played by the orchestra under the direction of Edward A. Murphy, solo hornist of the St. Louis symphony orchestra, and Arthur C. Snellgrove. Music heard on the first program of the Boston symphony orchestra and at the opening performance at the Metropolitan opera house, both of which are celebrating their 50th anniversary this year, also will have a place on the jubilee program.

FRIDAY, OCTOBER 10, 1930.

19.

HARVARD AND THE SYMPHONY

This afternoon Sir George Henschel will lift the baton he first raised fifty years ago, and will signal the Boston Symphony Orchestra to begin the same program that they played under his direction at their first concert. To Harvard men the occasion will be the anniversary of a most valuable and delightful aspect of life in Cambridge. There has always been a very close association between the Boston Symphony Orchestra and Harvard College.

This relationship has been largely due to the personal interest of the late Major Henry Lee Higginson in both institutions. Major Higginson was the founder of the orchestra, and for long a fellow of Harvard College; throughout his life he worked to bring them together as much as possible. The plans for the Sanders Theatre series of concerts were drawn up by him, in organizing the orchestra, as an essential part of its program. They have contributed both enjoyment and educational benefit to fifty years of Harvard faculty and students.

What the Boston Symphony has thus contributed to Harvard has been reciprocated, in part, by the contributions of the Harvard and Radcliffe Glee Clubs to the Symphony. Since 1923, when the Harvard Glee Club first sang with the orchestra, they have both contributed vocal parts to such notable programs as Brahms' "Ein Deutches Requiem" and Beethoven's Ninth Symphony.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is celebrating its anniversary by performing, in conjunction with the Glee Clubs, an "Ode for the Jubilee of the Symphony Orchestra" composed by two Harvard men, which comes as a fitting climax to the friendly relations of the past.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TIMES

OCT 1 0 1930

ORCHESTRA CELEBRATES.

Sir George Henschel to Conduct Boston Symphony, as He Did in 1881

Sir George Henschel, who in 1881 conducted the first concert ever given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will direct today and tomorrow the opening pair of concerts of its fiftieth anniversary season at Symphony Hall in Boston.

Mr. Henschel will play this afternoon the same program he gave on Oct. 22, 1881, with one exception. Wagner's prelude to "Die Meistersinger" will be substituted for Weber's "Festival" overture. The rest of the program includes Beethoven's "Dedication of the House" overture, the ario "Che Faro senza Euridyce," from Gluck's "Orpheus"; Haydn's Symphony in B flat, the ballet music from Schubert's "Rosamunde", and the aria "Penelope's Lament," from Bruch's "Odysseus." Margaret Mateznauer will be the soloist. The late Annie Louise Cary was the soloist fifty years ago.

THIS CLIPPING FROM HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT

OCT 1 0 1930

Miss Elsie J. Dresser of Evergreen Avenue and Mrs. Olive Russell Dawley of Torwood Street are in Boston as the guests of Mrs. Dawley's sister, Mrs. Joel M. Barnes of Newton Center, Mass., for the first concert to be given this season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra this afternoon in Symphony Hall.

This is the forty-ninth year of the symphony and Sir George Henschel, who conducted the first concert in 1881, will conduct, giving the same program as on that occasion.

THIS CLIPPING FROM WORCESTER, MASS.
TELEGRAM

OCT 1 0 1930

TO ATTEND SYMPHONY CONCERT

Mrs. Walter D. Ross, of 84 West Boylston street, will go to Boston today to attend the opening concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra this afternoon. Mrs. Ross has been a subscriber to the series for many years.

Sir George Henschell, who conducted the first Boston Symphony orchestra concerts 50 years ago, has returned to Boston from England to conduct the opening concerts.

victor in ... totalling $501.

20

Plays and Players --- Music and Musicians

Fifty Years Described In Fifty Minutes

Over the Symphony Concerts, With Arthur Foote As Eye-and-Ear Witness

THERE was new departure at the Public Library yesterday afternoon. By precedent the company in the Lecture-Hall should have listened to description, with examples and comment, of the pieces to be played at the Symphony Concerts today and tomorrow. On the platform, indeed, stood a piano ready for that purpose. From it, however, not a note sounded; while in an hour's discourse, the impending program was but cursorily mentioned. Yes: it was to begin with Beethoven's last overture, "Dedication of the House"—in vogue in the eighteen-eighties for ceremonial occasions, now fallen into disuse and relegated to the "minor works." As the speaker said, it was more Handelian than Beethoven. The familiar air, "Che faró" from Gluck's opera, "Orpheus" was to follow; later on another air, likewise for contralto, from Bruch's "Odysseus." In those eighteen-eighties they were favorite concert-pieces with Annie Louise Cary, American singer of remarkable voice, then at the height of her powers. Now Mme. Matzenauer would undertake them. And a Symphony by Haydn, and the dances that Schubert wrote for the forgotten play of "Rosamond, Queen of Cyprus." Finally, the Prelude to Wagner's opera, "Die Meistersinger." But that was a desirable substitution for Weber's trumpery "Jubilee Overture" with climax in "God Save the King" or "Heil dir im Siegeskranz," according as the concert-room was English or German.

By this time the secret was out. The program in question, save only Wagner's "Prelude," was the program of the first pair of Symphony Concerts, in the old Boston Music Hall, on Oct. 21 and 22, 1881. It was now to be repeated at the first concerts of the fiftieth year of the Symphony Orchestra, in the present Symphony Hall, on Oct. 11 and 12, 1930. The conductor of 1881 was also to be the conductor of 1930—not only alive but able and practicing half a century afterward. In short, the meeting at the Public Library was an anniversary occasion. Therefore the director of the course, Mr. R. G. Appel of the Brown Music Library, had put by rule and custom; dispensed with exposition; bidden Mr. Arthur Foote summarize the course of the Symphony Concerts from the earliest times to the present day. As a young man of twenty-eight he began to attend them. As an elderly man of seventy-seven he was still regularly in his place. As composer of music, Mr. Foote was heard at the Symphony Concerts in 1887 in the overture, "In the Mountains." Only last Saturday the orchestra had repeated from its present repertory his Suite for Strings. By all odds he was the speaker for the occasion, standing at ease in the light of the desk-lamp, lifting one sheet of blue paper after another, reading from it as informally as though he were sitting by his own fireside.

Earliest Times

Mr. Foote began at the beginning—with the foundation of the Handel and Haydn Society in 1815, as consequence of a peace-jubilee to celebrate the end of the War of 1812. Its concern was choral music. (It asked, but never received, a manuscript from Beethoven.) Twenty-five years later orchestral concerts were afoot in a small way. Eight years on, and the aftermath of the revolutions of 1848 brought young musicians in flight to Boston from Paris and other European cities. They formed the Germania Orchestra, which put orchestral playing on a better level. There were concerts as well of a Musical Club, of a Philharmonic Orchestra. The ultimate residue was the Harvard Musical Association, undertaking an annual series of orchestral concerts from 1856 to 1882, when the newly risen Symphony Orchestra extinguished them. In the later years Mr. Foote knew them at first hand. He reported them as "influential" and "important" for their day, drawing "fine audiences," well provided with money. The programs were conservative but generally admirable, including most of the symphonic music then worth the hearing—when most of the modern composers, now counted as classics, were unborn or unknown; when Bruch passed for a figure rising toward greatness; when a "new work" from Raff or Rubinstein seemed as notable and debatable as nowadays a "first time" from Ravel or Stravinsky. Needless to say, the open-minded Foote was on the liberal side.

In time, the concerts of the Harvard Musical Association declined. The controlling powers tended to be cliquish, to fall into ultra-conservative courses. Theodore Thomas, moreover, had begun to bring his orchestra to Boston. His pro[illegible] ranged wider and sounded [illegible] performance ran[illegible]. Unmistakably he exce[illegible] conductors. The orchestra of the Harvard Musical Association seemed elderly in comparison. (Imagine it beside the orchestra of Muck or Koussevitzky!) Few, or none, of the players were virtuosi. Hardly any could give full time and energy to symphonic work. A dissatisfied public was forsaking the concerts, when, at one of the last of them, Major Higginson believed that he had found in Mr. Henschel the conductor he was seeking for the new orchestra he had in mind.

The Henschels

Before, however, Mr. Foote recounted the familiar story, he digressed to the career and the qualities of Mr. Henschel; recalled his boyish feats as pianist and singer; noted his first public appearance, aged sixteen, at Cologne. (Years afterward, in these days of radio, Sir George was broadcasting to that city and inquired vainly whether anyone remembered.) By the seventies—Mr. Foote went on—he was an established singer; settled in London, practising his profession with praise, beginning to expand into the "all-round" musician he was ultimately to be. Song-recitals first brought him to Boston. With him was Lillian Bailey, later the first Mrs. Henschel. Upon this partnership, noted in its time, Mr. Foote descanted.

Miss Bailey, come to Boston with her family from Columbus in Ohio, was a singer of rare presence, voice and what we should now call musicality. She made her way here—Mr. Foote was her first pianist—migrated to London; was attracted to Mr. Henschel. At their concerts—"ideally perfect" as Mr. Foote recalled them—each sang solo-pieces; joined their voices in duets; while Mr. Henschel was accompanist throughout. The pair were offset and complement to each other, singing up and down Europe, returning to America long after he had ceased to be conductor of the Symphony Orchestra or of the orchestra that he assembled and maintained through ten years in London. To the memory of his wife he dedicated his Mass of Requiem; for her in degree made his setting of the hymn, "Stabat Mater."

In these later years, Sir George (as he then was) had become full-fledged composer. Early he had begun the practice of that calling. He was conducting in a youthful Concert Overture when he caught Major Higginson's eye and ear. With all his work at the Symphony Concerts, he found time and zest to write a comic opera, for which the novelist, Howells, who liked to dabble in the theater, wrote text and verses. It was never published and never performed; but there is Mr. Foote's word that it contained much good and charming music. So much for Sir George's "full, interesting and successful life," putting to use manifold musical abilities.

From Henschel to Gericke

Back then to the first years of the Symphony Orchestra—to the free hand and the absolute control that Major Higginson gave Mr. Henschel and his successors, through half a century established principle and policy; to the scores and parts that Mr. Henschel assembled as nucleus of an orchestral library after fifty years hardly to be matched in Europe or America; to the Henschelian program-making, a model in its kind; to the long battle in the newspapers over the first conductor's abilities and courses. This and that reviewer was hostile and bitter. The writers of "letters to the editor" spared no words. Fortunately Mr. Henschel kept the confidence of those that counted most. Throughout, the younger public of the Symphony Concerts was on his side—liberal-minded then as now.

Next to the first coming of Gericke, in succession to Mr. Henschel, and the transformation of the orchestra. In the earlier day, resident players had filled it. Gericke judged many of them poor in quality and began importations from Europe—importations of young men to replace old. Loud but impotent was the local hubbub. Moreover, these youngsters spoke for themselves. Mr. Foote recalled the concerts at which the boyish Kneisel—Mr. Gericke's "imported" concert-master—was to play Beethoven's Concerto. His displaced predecessor and many another veteran went to hear him "go wrong"; in spite of themselves departed admiring. Gericke taught the Bostonian public what the preparation of orchestral concerts should be. In chamber-music the Kneisel Quartet enforced this lesson—and Mr. Foote again digressed to praise its work and example, nowadays half-forgotten. For a year it busied itself with Franck's quartet before it was ready to play it publicly. Its quality encouraged composer after composer to write for it. Mr. Foote could name at least a dozen pieces. At the end of Gericke's first conductorship, there was a new standard of performance for the orchestra; a new insistence from the public upon it.

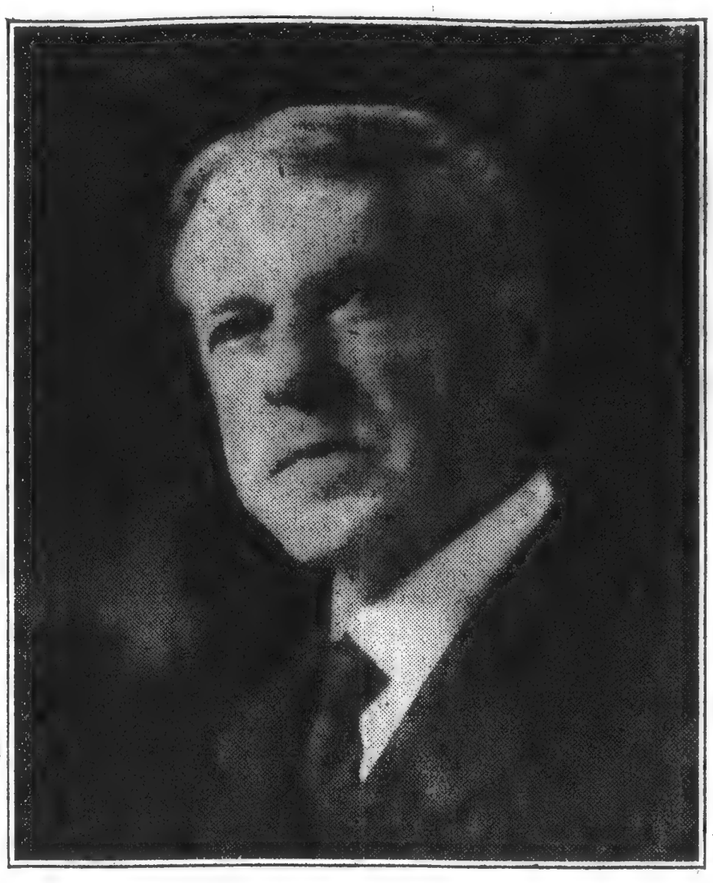
The Lengthening List

Then to Nikisch, the one "young genius" in the long line of conductors, electrical at one pair of concerts, taking his ease at the next. At his departure, the clebrated Hans Richter was Major Higginson's choice; but though the contract was drawn, it was never signed. For Richter dreaded the change to a new world overseas. Major Higginson then sought Theodore Thomas. Reasons of health, ambition, inclination, prompted him to Boston; but a fine sense of obligation to the Chicago that had sheltered him and maintained his orchestra prevailed. Major Higginson understood; like Thomas, kept their secret. Finally, Paur from Germany; in Mr. Foote's opinion an under-estimated conductor.

More and more briefly onward, through Gericke's second term and the transfer of the concerts from the old Music Hall, which was a fire-trap, to the new Symphony Hall; through Muck's two years "on loan" from Berlin; through the four of Fiedler, another underestimated conductor, to the return of Muck. Gericke had come back freer-handed and larger-minded. Muck's seven years were the years of a conductor at the maturity of remarkable powers. A word about the war-time difficulties and controversies; another about the decline of the orchestra under Rabaud. The first years of Monteux, and the internal dissensions culminating in the still remembered "strike." Through a year there was only to rebuild the orchestra in numbers and quality, to regain little by little the prestige lost in Boston and still more in New York. With the liberalizing of the programs and the production in both cities at the opportune moment of Stravinsky's "Le Sacre de Printemps," the re-conquest proceeded.

After Monteux, and to complete it, the present Koussevitzky and a virtually new orchestra to be his instrument. Under him the Symphony Concerts at the pitch and range at which the youngest generation knows them. Gone is the old German preponderance in the repertory. A better balance gives room to Russians, Parisians, Italians and English, to Americans that can hold their own beside them, receiving a just and hospitable encouragement. The older music of the seventeenth and the eighteenth centuries now has place beside that of the twentieth. The program of six or seven miscellaneous items has yielded to the program of three or four, lengthier, more concentrated, better unified. The merely decorative "soloist" has vanished. New ways, new methods, but always to ampler, more diversified, more catholic accomplishment. . . . Mr. Foote turned his last blue sheet. Into fifty minutes he had condensed fifty years of the Symphony Orchestra.

Faith and Works



Arthur Foote Bachrach (C.)

Listener at the Symphony Concerts Through Fifty Years; Contributor to the Programs as Composer Through Forty-Three; Yesterday Informal Lecturer About Past and Present

Oct. 11 '30

21

BOSTON EVENING

TURDAY, OCTOBER 11, — Boston Herald

Symphony

First Concert Recalled For Fiftieth Year

Sir George Henschel Acclaimed, Matter and A Moral from The Old Program

AFTER the event human speculation before it often seems futile, sounds silly. . . . When it was hinted last winter that Sir George Henschel, conductor at the first concerts in the first year of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, would also be conductor next October at the first concerts of the fiftieth season, conjecture ran wide. Sir George would return in his eighty-first year. Unless they had encountered him in London, few hereabouts had looked upon him for a quarter of a century. Report had it that he was well-preserved and active. But could he endure the journey over the Atlantic—he who had crossed it many times when steamers were no "floating hotels"? Would he be able to lead through the whole concert of a Friday and a Saturday? Or must he confine himself to one or two numbers, say at the beginning and the end? Imaginative eyes saw a feeble old man advancing cautiously to the conductor's stand, recalling his métier and gathering his strength to wave a stick over an understanding orchestra; then receiving the plaudits of an audience that had looked and heard as at some resurrection from the musical history-books.

To the foot of the letter actuality belied this half-remembered expectation. As prompt to the hour as though Mr. Higginson were watching from the Elysian Fields, Sir George and Dr. Koussevitzky emerged, yesterday afternoon at Symphony Hall, from the door to the right of the stage. Sir George, a stocky figure in formal clothes, led the way. His shoulders drooped little; his step was firm; his thick hair and beard less white than grizzling. Dr. Koussevitzky, in the jacket of conductorial ease, followed, clapping with uplifted hands. The orchestra rose, each choir, according to its means, making the usual noises of welcome. For once, the audience stood spontaneously; in a hail of applause mentally escorted Sir George to the conductor's platform. At odds with custom, it was railed, trimmed with greenery, provided with a chair. Into it, after many acknowledgments, he settled, for the first and the only time throughout the concert; while Dr. Koussevitzky made the second speech of his six years at Symphony Hall. (The Beethoven Festival was occasion for the other.) Cast in English, it was brief, ardent and, at middle distance, difficult to catch. It praised the orchestra "at zenith of zenith"; twice it saluted the guest as "wonderful man." Sir George, better accustomed to English reticence than Russian effusion, ran both hands uneasily through his hair.

—

Under cover of applause, Dr. Koussevitzky vanished; the orchestra sat; Sir George rose; the concert began. For the instant, the old-new conductor was more engrossing than the old-new number—Beethoven's Overture to "The Dedication of the House"—which was first piece. Sir George conducted scoreless, beating the measure clear and crisp, without superfluous or exaggerated gesture. He stood quietly, save when he turned to stay or summon group or choir. His left hand sparingly supplemented his right. His one mannerism was to hold it akimbo on the hip. Old-fashioned conducting (if the hearer liked) doing its work in the rehearsal-room rather than the concert-hall, proffering the finished product, reminding rather than adjuring the orchestra; but with a clear mind and a firm will behind.

Old-fashioned conducting again in reticence and poise, in quality of tone and deference to the composer. In the sonorities of Beethoven's Overture, Sir George preferred smooth and mellowed brass to the piercing intensities of twentieth-century practice. In the two airs sung by Mme. Matzenauer, he considered the singer, fusing voice and orchestra rather than taking imperious command. In the Symphony from Haydn he wrested out no "inner voices"; did no feats of superhuman fleetness. Rather his care was rounded phrase, melody curved and spaced, unforced accent, deft play of light and shade, Haydn's simplicity and Haydn's musical cunning. In the two dances from Schubert's music to "Rosamünde," melodic sweetness and rhythmic light went hand in hand, with the superlative virtuosi of the wind choir for voice to both. The tonal pageant of the Prelude to "Die Meistersinger" unfolded, slow and clear, full-voiced and stately, as though to dim, speed or otherwise manipulate so magnificent a flood of music were mere vanity and pettiness. In sum, a conducting born of musical intelligence, directed by a musical will, making a purely musical effect. Fifty years ago the reviewers reproached Sir George for vehemence and impetuosity. Now all is flow and measure.

Wagner's golden Prelude to "Die Meistersinger" replaced Weber's faded "Jubilee Overture," that the anniversary concert might end on a festal note better attuned to present ears. Mme. Matzenauer was singer in succession to Annie Louise Cary. Otherwise the program of Oct. 10, 1930, repeated, item by item, the program of Oct. 21, 1881. The eighteenth-century air from Gluck's "Orpheus" again sounded unchanging and undying. From all else exhaled the sense of the past. Six miscellaneous pieces, where three or four more or less unified now suffice. A decorative singer, otherwise unrelated to the scheme of a program designed to be ceremonial and festival hodge-podge. Exhibitional airs for her, one of which happens to be a masterpiece; while the other—Penelope's lament and prayer from Bruch's dead-and-gone "Odysseus"—owed all its momentary virtue to performance in the grand style. An "occasional" overture of Beethoven, mildly interesting in the Handelian pomps of the introduction and the Handelian vigors of the final fugue; once and again in the sweep of a sonority or the thrust of a phrase suggesting the great Ludwig himself. A minor Symphony by Haydn, fluent, nicely made, pleasing to his noble patrons, but long since on the semi-retired list. Two dances of Schubert, amiable and characteristic, but more likely nowadays to be heard at The Pops between cigarettes and chatter.

Our Symphony Concerts have changed for the better we say proudly, pointing to the substitution, yesterday, of the Prelude to "Die Meistersinger." But have all our likings changed with them? Certainly not—by the clear evidence of Friday afternoon. Grant Sir George Henschel his measure of the applause that followed every number, swelling at the intermission and the close. Grant Mme. Matzenauer hers as an eminent singer, in the air from "Odysseus" in the full exercise of voice and manner. Allow the orchestra its portion for sonorous and upspringing Beethoven; for light-lipped, light-fingered, brightly turned Haydn; for Schubert that was beauty of tone double-distilled. Even so, enough palms were beaten together to prove how pleased were many in the audience with this six-fold musical miscellany, with this return to a decorative singer, with the run of the musical mill in every piece but the air from "Orpheus" and the Prelude to "Die Meistersinger."

Clap hands and feave the hateful brood of reviewers to their grumblings, to their morals on a festal day. Yet even they had compensations. If Mme. Matzenauer treated rudely the delicate inflections, the fine-woven pathos, the haunting beauty of Gluck's air, she and Sir George with her filled Bruch's stilted and empty "Scena" with the pleasing deceits of the nineteenth-century "grand style." And for the thousandth time the splendors of the Prelude to "Die Meistersinger" swept all else away. From that summit of music, our symphonic jubilee may take its

Spared Six

Still Surviving from the First Boston Symphony Orchestra

THERE are six survivors of the Boston Symphony Orchestra as Sir George Henschel led it in the old Music Hall at the first pair of concerts, Oct. 21 and 22, 1881. As many of them as are within reach may be called to the stage of Symphony Hall at the anniversary concert this evening. They are:

Daniel Kuntz of Boston.
Carl Behr of Asheville.
Paul Fisher in Germany.
Ernest Regestein of Lexington.
George U. Stewart of Brighton.
Eustach Strasser of Westwood.

Mr. Loeffler, then violinist rather than composer, joined the orchestra in its second year. Later comers of the Henschelian day are E. B. Marble, still living at Woodstock, and Ludwig Manoly, long double-bass player in the Philharmonic Society of New York.

MUSIC

SYMPHONY CONCERT

By PHILIP HALE

The first concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's 50th season took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony hall. Sir George Henschel—in 1881 Mr. Georg (sic) Henschel—was invited to conduct the opening concert of this anniversary season, for as the first conductor of the orchestra he arranged the program for its first concert given in Music hall on Oct. 22, 1881. This program with one exception—the substitution of the Prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg" for Weber's "Festival" overture—was as follows: Beethoven, overture to "The Consecration of the House"; Gluck, "Che faro senza Eurydice" from "Orfeo ed Eurydice"; Haydn, symphony, B flat (B. & H. No. 12); Schubert, ballet music from "Rosamunde"; Bruch, Penelope's Sorrow from "Odysseus"; Wagner, the prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg." The substitution of Wagner's music for Weber's is to be regretted, for the program of 1881 in full would have given the audience of yesterday a better idea of what those assembled in Music hall 50 years ago applauded, or condemned as "radical," "too modern," "anarchistic."

If Wagner's Prelude is left out of consideration, the program of 1881 now seems respectable enough, respectably prosaic, or as some would say, dull. What conductor today would put the "Consecration of the House" in rehearsal if Beethoven's name were not signed to it? Yet for many years in the history of this orchestra the overture was solemnly performed and reverently heard. Suppose a composer in 1930 should hand this work to Dr. Koussevitzky, or Mr. Toscanini or Mr. Stokowski and ask for a performance?

Haydn's Symphony No. 12 is not one of his most characteristic works. Schubert's music was charming 50 years ago and delights the ear today; nor in this instance is Schubert's prolixity fatal. What prima donna in 1930 would deliberately choose Bruch's air from "Odysseus"? But for several season's Bruch's "Odysseus," "Arminius," "Achilleus" were regarded by the orthodox as masterpieces of choral song. How paltry, how labored this air of Penelope seemed yesterday after Gluck's great air! The singer at the concert in 1881 was Annie Louise Cary; yesterday Margaret Matzenauer. Par nobile sororum!

It would be interesting to know how many in the audience yesterday were at the concert of 50 years ago; and of those, how many display the mental and physical activity of Sir George? He conducted with the force and the gusto of a young man exultant in the direction of a great orchestra. It is doubtful whether as a young man of 31 he conducted with the same confidence and vigor.

When Dr. Koussevitzky and Sir George appeared on the stage, there was the now customary scene of homage: audience rising, applauding while standing, all in a friendly and joyous spirit. Dr. Koussevitzky spoke a few words, not merely by way of introduction—for Sir George's name and reputation have long been known even to those who have never seen him conduct, never heard him sing—but as a graceful tribute to the man who had the arduous task of the first years and now must rejoice in the present splendor of the orchestra—nor did Dr. Koussevitzky neglect to remind the audience that it was Maj. Higginson's courage, one might say his artistic obstinacy in the face of many discouragements, as well as his princely munificence that enabled Sir George and his successors to carry out their own musical aims and win at last the world-wide fame acknowledged even by rivals.

The occasion yesterday was one for sentimental reminiscences. Hearing the music was associated to some, perhaps to many, with memories of the past; of singers who once gave delight but whose lips have long been dumb; of violinists and pianists whose brave deeds are now only a tradition. But here is Sir George amazingly buoyant, enthusiastic, virile.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program next week will be as follows: Bach, Two Preludes arranged for strings by Pick-Mangiagalli (first time here). Beethoven, Symphony No. 7, A major. Hill, an Ode (for the 50th anniversary of the Boston Symphony orchestra), poem by Robert Hillyer (first performance). Moussorgsky-Ravel, "Pictures at an Exhibition." The chorus for Mr. Hill's music will be the Harvard Glee Club, joined by the Radcliffe Choral Society.

Symphony's First Conductor Vigorous in His Old Role

Sir George Henschel Leads Famous Orchestra Again and Receives Scores of Old Friends At Close of a Stirring Afternoon

The concert was over. The conductor had finished leading the huge Boston Symphony orchestra in the final number, "The Mastersingers of Nuremburg."

Without eyeglasses, without faltering, without glancing at his score, he had vigorously bent to the tremendous task of bringing a great overture once more into being through the timed and studied genius of 100 skilled musicians.

It was a job to leave a younger man tired and nervous, and on trigger-edge.

LEADS AFTER 46 YEARS

The conductor, Sir George Henschel, sound and sturdy despite his 80 years, his bearing almost military in its erectness, with a merry twinkle in his eyes, turned to face the clamorous applause of his audience. He was leading the symphony again after 46 years. He bowed, and then strode rapidly upstairs to a reception room where old friends awaited him.

Some one in the reception room pushed forward a chair. Sir George laughed, and declined to sit. Instead, he made room for Mrs. Henry Lee Higginson, 92, a little, old lady dressed in black, to sit down. She was the widow of his old friend, whose enthusiasm started and built, and whose fortune endowed the great musical organization. But even more important to Sir George was the fact that she was herself a patron of his art, and one who never misses the Friday concerts of the symphony.

The applause of the audience could still be heard below, augmented by salvos of clapping from the orchestra itself, the members swept away by admiration for their conductor. For a long time the sound continued unabated, but finally died out. Then, young musicians and the sons and daughters and grandsons of Sir George's earlier admirers began to climb the stairs to shake the hand which still wields the magic wand of music with such fine and certain touch. Beside them, more slowly and painfuly, cimbed the older ones—those who heard Sir George's first concert here and those who have been getting to the concerts with increasing difficulty but undiminished eagerness down the years.

GREETS OLD FRIENDS

There were tall, dignified, elderly women dressed according to the conservative fashion of certain venerable streets in Cambridge and the Back Bay who weekly are in their places at the Sanders theatre or Symphony Hall for the internationally famous concerts.

Sir George kissed several of them affectionately on the cheek in the Continental manner, and he gave his old friend and first manager, Charles A. Ellis, a little push on the shoulder as they parted. He autographed the programs of dozens of music lovers, and shook hands with as many more. He remembered the grandfathers and aunts and great-aunts of several eager young chaps who pressed forward to meet him.

"Well, I feel better now than I did this forenoon," he said to one man, 'though he denied that he had been suffering from stage fright this time. "I was looking forward to the concert with great pleasure," he said. "It gives one a wonderful feeling to lead such an orchestra."

The symphony has doubled and the ability of the musicians has been added to a hundredfold since he was leader of it. He recalled the change briefly, with great optimism for the present.

DAUGHTER ATTENDS

His tall and charming daughter, "Georgie," dressed in blue, was smoking a cigarette and greeting her father's old friends smilingly. Sir George put an unlighted cigarette in his mouth, but was a long time waiting for a chance to light it. He was enjoying the reception immensely.

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, present conductor of the orchestra, was beaming with pleasure at the reception tendered Sir George. "It is a very fine audience which attends the Friday afternoon concerts," he said. "They are so eager and appreciative. These people who have been attending concerts for 50 years have a wonderful musical education. It is a pleasure to lead for them."

Telegrams were arriving from musical leaders throughout the country. One came from A. Van Rensselaer, president of the Philadelphia Orchestra Association. It said:

The 50th season of the Boston Symphony orchestra is an important event in the musical life of America. This occasion is made doubly notable by the appearance at these concerts of Sir George Henschel, your first conductor.

The founding of a symphony orchestra by a group of music lovers 50 years ago would have been unusual. But this act by a private citizen was a unique occurrence, and such an undertaking as Maj. Higginson's has not been repeated since.

On behalf of the board of directors of the Philadelphia Orchestra Association I send you congratulations on the long and distinguished career of the Boston Symphony orchestra.

It was the superb music of your players that inspired Philadelphia to want an orchestra of its own, and to you the Philadelphia orchestra and other orchestras in the United States are much indebted.

Adella Prentiss Hughes and Nikolai Sokoloff sent a telegram on behalf of the Cleveland organization, and the Rochester philharmonic committee's message said: "The Rochester Philharmonic orchestra committee extends its congratulations to you, to Mr. Henschel, and the Boston Symphony orchestra on its 50th birthday. America is indebted to your organization for the high standard of achievement you have maintained."

HENSCHEL ONCE MORE

After a lapse of nearly 50 years, George Henschel, the first conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, again stood before that incomparable band yesterday, as it played, with one exception, the identical programme of that far-off opening concert.

It was an occasion of deep feeling for those in the audience—there must have been some—who sat in old Music Hall, on the first day of the orchestra's history, and listened to what the youthful leader, with his flashing eye and black beard, had to say, through his players.

Even for those who knew him not, the occasion was one of rare sentiment. To see the living embodiment of the beginning of such a glorious entity as the Symphony Orchestra, and after the passing of half a century, is not often given to men and women.

Boston Post Oct 11 '30

With his grizzled hair and beard, and with the fire of his eye unquenched, George Henschel typified the eternal in music. Of the kind and quality of his conducting another pen will tell the readers of the Post.

22
Boston Post
18  OCT 11 '30

SYMPHONY LED BY ITS FIRST HEAD

50th Season Opens With Sir George Henschel Conducting

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

This simple announcement in the programme-book told the story: "Sir George Henschel (conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra 1881-1884) will conduct these concerts."

Here was the Symphony Orchestra entering upon its 50th season and with its first conductor, his appearance giving the lie to the 80 years with which he is credited, at the helm. This was indeed an occasion.

DR. KOUSSEVITZKY SPEAKS

When Sir George Henschel yesterday walked forth upon the stage, once more to lead the orchestra at whose baptism he had presided, he was accompanied by his present successor, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky. Orchestra and audience stood in greeting and there was long and warm applause. But Dr. Koussevitzky, as it soon appeared, was not there merely to do the honors of host. For the first time in the regular course of the Symphony Concerts he addressed an audience.

Dr. Koussevitzky's words came a little haltingly and he spoke them as the phrase goes, with an accent. But they were eloquent and to the point. "This wonderful man," he said of Sir George, "realized the dream of Henry Lee Higginson." And therein lay the kernel of his brief speech. Though it should be mentioned that when he referred to the present Symphony Orchestra as being at the zenith of its powers he was interrupted by applause.

Conducts From Memory

A wonderful man, in truth, is Sir George Henschel. With his 81st birthday a little over four months away, he has the outward appearance and the seeming vitality of a man 15 or 20 years younger. He conducted with authority; his beat was firm, his gestures decisive. And all the music of the afternoon, except the accompaniment to two vocal solos, he conducted from memory. If this does not suggest mental powers unimpaired, what else would? There was a chair placed on the podium, but only once or twice did the conductor deign to make use of it, and then only for an instant.

It was appropriate that yesterday's programme should have been a replica of the first programme that the Boston Symphony Orchestra ever played; and that, save for a trifling change, it was. On the original list the closing number was the "Jubil," Overture of Weber. Yesterday's concert ended instead with the "Meistersinger" Prelude of Wagner. No doubt Sir George felt that the prevailing tameness and tepidity of his inaugural programme required, as a concession to modern taste, at least an exciting close.

Mme. Matzenauer Soloist

A four-page insert in the programme-book offered the portraits of Major Higginson, Sir George Henschel and Dr. Koussevitzky and also a facsimile of the programme of the concert of Saturday, Oct. 22, 1881. And thus it ran: Overture, Op. 124, "Dedication of the House," Beethoven; Air (Orpheus), Gluck; Symphony in B flat, Haydn (No. 12 of Breitkopf's edition); Ballet Music (Rosamunde), Schubert; Scena (Odysseus), Max Bruch; Festival Overture, Weber. Soloist: Miss Annie Louise Cary. Yesterday the singer was Mme. Margaret Matzenauer, and, as was said above, Weber yielded place to Wagner.

Beethoven's Overture, composed in 1822 for the opening of a theatre in Vienna, just misses actual dullness. Gluck's "Che faro senza Eurydice" is, of course, a noble air. The Symphony not often heard is agreeable Haydn; at times as in the slow movement, something more. The "Rosamunde" music is amiable. Bruch's Scena had vitality yesterday chiefly in the tones of Mme. Matzenauer's voice and Sir George's orchestra.

Uses Slower Pace

Doubly welcome then was the "Meistersinger" Prelude, taken by Sir George at the older, slower pace and gaining in consequence a breadth and dignity that no recent performance in Symphony Hall has accorded it.

Had there been any doubts during the course of the concert as to Sir George's eloquence and forcefulness as conductor the performance of the Prelude would have dispelled them. As a matter of fact there was impressive conducting and notable playing throughout the afternoon. And it hardly need be added that the end brought many plaudits for all concerned.

Boston Transcript
SATURDAY, OCTOBER 11, 1930

The Symphony's Semi-Centennial

What long-lived men have been conductors of the Boston Symphony Orchestra! It gave yesterday, it repeats this evening, the first concert of its fiftieth year. Less one number, too time-worn and outmoded for revival, the program is the first program of its first season. The conductor, on Oct. 21-22, 1881, was George Henschel, in his thirty-first year. The conductor, on Oct. 10-11, 1930, is again George Henschel, in his eighty-first year; yet with a mind and a will of his own and an active body to enjoin them upon the players. Wilhelm Gericke succeeded him; filled a second term at the beginning of the twentieth century. Within recollection, he died in Vienna in stately and mellow old age. The third conductor, Arthur Nikisch, likewise no longer living, came nearest to death in prime. The other six survive—Emil Paur in retirement in Germany, Karl Muck in the occasional practice of his profession at Baireuth, Berlin and Hamburg; Max Fiedler still capable of a winter's work at Essen; Henri Rabaud at the head of the Conservatory in Paris; Pierre Monteux, from Paris to Amsterdam and back again as orchestral engagements call; Serge Koussevitzky with a hundred-odd concerts "on his hands" for this anniversary year. Not an orchestra in Europe or America, with half a century behind it, has proved so life-giving.

As the advertisements say, there is a reason; possibly more. Under the wise policy begun by Major Higginson, continued by the present trustees, the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is a law unto himself. Without let or hindrance he can make and remake the personnel, choose his program; in matters small or great follow his own courses. There is no check upon him save his own discretion, a decent regard for the finances of the orchestra, his sense of the air around. He is a free man, an acknowledged master, with freedom to bring peace of mind and power to feed ambition.

The ways and means open to that ambition have long been made and provided. In the eighteen-eighties, Gericke taught the orchestral virtues; set high the standards of preparation and performance. His immediate successors, each according to his ability, did not depart from them. In turn Dr. Muck raised and refined, to ears at home and ears abroad lifting the Boston Orchestra to the first rank. Under the stress of war and internal dissension came inevitable decline. Monteux began the work of restoration. Dr. Koussevitzky continued it until the orchestra reached its present pitch of power and splendor, beauty, finesse and individuality. A conductor fights to maintain this acme; but it is the good fight that renews his strength and warms his soul.

The programs were liberal-minded even in Henschel's embattled time. Paur and Fiedler made amends for limited abilities by programatic breadth of view. Gericke returned with wider-opened ears and hands. Dr. Muck was not so indifferent to the music of the immediate hour as, cynically, he professed to be. Monteux, having saved the orchestra from its disordered self, set afoot the vigilance, courage and catholicity that were to make the programs of the Symphony Concerts, here in Boston, the most liberal and wide-ranging in the world. Where Monteux ended hesitatingly, Dr. Koussevitzky began boldly, pressing forward until those programs became rounded epitome of ancients and moderns, classics and romantics, the oldest styles, the newest experiments—and on equal terms with all the rest whatever Americans might do. Conductors do not stale in such a tradition; orchestras do not become institutional. Both go on alive.

Through half a century the Symphony Concerts have not relaxed these standards. They have yielded nothing to financial success—and never lacked the generous wherewithal. Except in rare missteps repented, they have never courted popularity—and now, in whatever city, are thronged to the doors. In a day that seeks compromise Symphony Hall has stood stiff-backed—and won. In a time that exalts mediocrity and cherishes conformity, it has answered, "Get thee behind me, Sathanas"—and chosen the hard, independent, individual way. Single-handed the Symphony Orchestra has maintained an honorable name for Boston in quarters prone to regard the city and most of its works with derision. With reason its conductors, doing such deeds, live long. The pride of the good life, well fought, sustains them.

THIS CLIPPING FROM PHILADELPHIA, PA.
Evening Public Ledger
OCT 1 1 1930

THE CRITIC TALKS TO MUSIC LOVERS

By SAMUEL L. LACIAR

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra this year will celebrate the fiftieth anniversary of its foundation and, if plans went off according to schedule, the opening concert of the fiftieth season was conducted in Symphony Hall, Boston, last evening by Sir George Henschel, who led the first concert of the Orchestra in 1881. Sir George is now nearly 81 years of age and made the trip to the United States, one of his exceedingly few visits since he left the helm of the Boston Orchestra in 1884, especially to conduct these anniversary concerts. He is a remarkable man, distinguished alike as conductor, composer, pianist and singer. He led the Boston Symphony Orchestra from the time of its organization in 1881 until the close of the season of 1883-84, when he went to London, becoming naturalized there (he is a German by birth), and organizing both the London Symphony Concerts, which he conducted from 1885 to 1896, and the Scottish Symphony Orchestra, at Glasgow, which he led from 1891 to 1895.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is the second oldest American orchestra which is still in existence. The oldest one which has had a continuous existence since the time of its organization is the New York Philharmonic, now, since a recent amalgamation with the former "Damrosch" Orchestra, the New York Philharmonic-Symphony. It dates back to 1842, thus being in its eighty-ninth year. Many other American orchestras have come and gone since the foundation of the New York Philharmonic and some of them did brilliant work in the establishment of orchestral music in the United States, a branch of musical art in which today our country unquestionably leads the world, both in the number of orchestras which it maintains and, even more important, in the quality of these organizations.

* * *

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra, especially in its earlier days, played a very important part in the development of orchestral music in this country. The principal pioneer figure in this work, however, was Theodore Thomas, who, many years ago, even before the organization of the Boston Symphony, made tours of the country with his orchestra and was the first actually to spread the orchestral gospel throughout the country. He organized his orchestra in New York in 1869 and for nine years made tours of the East and the Middle West, giving untold thousands of Americans their first opportunity to hear a real symphony orchestra. The effect of these tours upon the musical development of the country was incalculable and it was due to them that later Mr. Thomas was persuaded to remove to Chicago and in 1891 organize what is at present the Chicago Orchestra, now in its fortieth year of continuous existence.

Another pioneer antedating, although by only two years, the foundation of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was Dr. Leopold Damrosch, who in 1878 founded the New York Symphony Society Orchestra, which continued the Thomas orchestral concerts. Dr. Leopold Damrosch made but one important tour with his orchestra, that being to the West in 1883. He was succeeded by his son, Walter Damrosch, who toured with his orchestra for many years, and thus carried out in an even greater measure the work which his father had begun. Theodore Thomas and the Damroschs, father and son, laid the cornerstone for American orchestral music; it remained for the Boston Symphony Orchestra to put the crown upon the structure in its earlier days.

* * *

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra was founded upon an entirely different basis from that of the Thomas and the Damrosch orchestras. This was due to the vision and foresight of the late Henry L. Higginson, whose work as a layman (for he never interfered with his conductors once they were selected) is probably unapproached in the annals of American orchestral development. Major Higginson's idea was to develop the best possible orchestra in America; later he gave the United States what was, for a number of years, the best orchestra in the world, and it formed the model upon which the later great American orchestras were built. His idea was to establish and orchestra which should be entirely independent of the box office and whose members should not necessarily have to do any work other than that with the orchestra for their living.

There is not space in this brief discussion, to enumerate the many trials and discouragements which the originators of the Boston Orchestra experienced; suffice it to say that Major Higginson succeeded. For thirty-seven years, this noted financier and patron of art, devoted his best energies and the limit of his income to perfecting the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He obtained the best musicians available anywhere and the greatest conductors to shape the organization into a perfect ensemble. Being freed from the nationalism which impeded the greatest orchestras of Europe, the Boston Symphony was enabled to choose its woodwinds from the French; its horns and brasses from the Germans, the strings from Germans, Austrians, Italians and Americans, and generally to select the best material regardless of where the members of the orchestra came from. In this manner was the old Boston Symphony Orchestra built up to a point of excellence which had never before been even approached in the world.

* * *

AFTER the retirement of Sir George Henschel as a conductor of the Boston Orchestra, Wilhelm Gericke succeeded to the post. It was due to him that the Boston Orchestra achieved the position which it did, for he was a severe drill-master, just the man who was needed at the helm in those formative days. He was followed at the end of four years by Arthur Nikisch undoubtedly one of the most brilliant conductors of the last half century, who "played upon the orchestra as Liszt played upon the piano" to quote one writer. After four seasons, Nikisch was succeeded by Emil Pauer, who, in his five years of leadership, added little to the prestige of the organization and then Mr. Gericke returned for eight more seasons. Again he developed the orchestra to a phenomenal point of virtuosity, delicacy and precision, retiring at the close of the season of 1906 in favor of Dr. Karl Muck, who probably did the finest work that has been done with the orchestra. Dr. Muck was unable to remain for more than two years and after Max Fiedler conducted for four seasons, Dr. Muck returned to win further laurels for himself.

The troubles associated with the World War led to Dr. Muck's retirement in 1918, and came near having disastrous consequences to the organization. Two French conductors, Henri Rabaud and Pierre Monteux led for six seasons, when Serge Koussevitzky, the distinguished Russian conductor, was engaged and brought the orchestra from the slough of despond into which it had fallen, back to its former heights. In the meantime Major Higginson had passed away, leaving the fate of the orchestra in the hands of a Board of Trustees, who have since administered the finances of the organization. The history of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has been one of the most illustrious in the annals of American orchestral music; not only did it become the greatest orchestra in the world for a number of years and thus reflect luster upon the country as well as upon the city of its foundation, but also by its tours, conducted over a long period of years, it revealed to the lovers of orchestral music in other American cities what was possible. In this manner, it undoubtedly led, more or less directly, to the foundation of great orchestras in other large cities of the United States and played an important part in making America today the greatest of orchestral countries, not only in the number of orchestras maintained, but also in their quality and in the public support given to them.

CYRENA VAN GORDON
Will sing "Amneris" in "Aida" with Philadelphia Grand Opera Company next Thursday evening

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE RUTLAND, VT.
HERALD
OCT 1 1 1930

do with the American Legion.

LEADS SYMPHONY AFTER 50 YEARS

Sir George Henscher Relives Boston's First Concert.

BOSTON, Oct. 10 (AP).—A dream of beauty first realized half a century ago was relieved here today as the Boston Symphony orchestra opened its 15th season with Sir George Henscher, its first conductor, once again leading the concert he had played, on that October afternoon in 1881. Dynamic and vibrant, giving no hint of his 80 years, Sir George swept his musicians through the strains of Beethoven's "Dedication of the House" without once glancing at the score.

The revered artist was presented to the audience by his present successor, Conductor Serge Koussevitzky, who also paid brief tribute to one of the orchestra's founders and great patron, Henry Lee Higginson.

No member of the orchestra as it is now was a member in 1881, but there were a number of listeners who have attended through 49 seasons. Among them was the great patron's widow, Mrs. Henry Lee Higginson, to whom a large bouquet of roses was presented at intermission as she sat in her usual place.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE RUTLAND, VT.
HERALD
OCT 1 1 1930

signifa and had absolutely
do with the American Legion."

LEADS SYMPHONY AFTER 50 YEARS

Sir George Henscher Relives Boston's First Concert.

BOSTON, Oct. 10 (AP).—A dream of beauty first realized half a century ago was relieved here today as the Boston Symphony orchestra opened its 15th season with Sir George Henscher, its first conductor, once again leading the concert he had played, on that October afternoon in 1881. Dynamic and vibrant, giving no hint of his 80 years, Sir George swept his musicians through the strains of Beethoven's "Dedication of the House" without once glancing at the score.

The revered artist was presented to the audience by his present successor, Conductor Serge Koussevitzky, who also paid brief tribute to one of the orchestra's founders and great patron, Henry Lee Higginson.

No member of the orchestra as it is now was a member in 1881, but there were a number of listeners who have attended through 49 seasons. Among them was the great patron's widow, Mrs. Henry Lee Higginson, to whom a large bouquet of roses was presented at intermission as she sat in her usual place.

THIS CLIPPING FROM BROOKLYN
STANDARD UNION
OCT 1 1 1930

Music

By JOSEPH A. MILLER

GOLDEN JUBILEE

Sir George Henschel, who conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra during its first seasons, came back to this country after 46 years and last night conducted the magnificent ensemble of over 100 musicians in the first programme of its fiftieth anniversary season. Sir George, now 80 years old, was erect and vigorous and conducted even without eyeglasses. His programme was identical with the one he gave when he inaugurated the career of this ine organization. Margareta Matzenauer came from California to act as soloist, and an audience that included many of the patrons of half a century ago packed the vast auditorium. Sir George received a wonderful ovation, and after the ordeal was over he met a number of his old friends, including the 92-year-old widow of Major Higginson, founder of the orchestra, kissing the old ladies on the cheek.

REDUCTION RATIO 17x

2.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

2.0 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

PM-MGP 13"x18"
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

200 mm

150 mm

100 mm

A5

A4

A3

1.0 mm

1.5 mm

2.0 mm

2.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

PRECISION[SM] RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

4.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

3.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

3.0 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. Herald Tribune
OCT 1 1 1930

Henschel Opens Fiftieth Boston Symphony Year

Leader of Orchestra's First Recital Repeats Program of '81; Greeted Warmly

Advance in Music Shown

Sir George, Though 80, Gives a Vigorous Performance

By Francis D. Perkins

BOSTON, Oct. 10.—Forty-nine years from the time when he conducted the first concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra Sir George Henschel reappeared on a Boston concert stage this afternoon to repeat his program of October 22, 1881, save for one number, and to inaugurate the Boston Symphony's fiftieth season. As he did nearly fifty years ago, Sir George today began his program with Beethoven's overture, "Die Weihe des Hauses," and gave as his principal offering Haydn's Symphony in B flat, which is the ninth symphony of the set composed for Salomon in London and the twelfth in the old Breitkopf and Haertel list. This was followed today by the ballet music from Schubert's "Rosamunde." For the last number of the 1881 concert, however, Weber's "Jubilee Overture." Sir George wisely substituted today a far fresher work, Wagner's prelude to "Die Meistersinger von Nurnburg."

Margarete Matzenauer, contralto, and formerly of the Metropolitan Opera, sang the numbers given by Annie Louise Cary as soloist in the inaugural concert of forty-nine years ago. These were the air "Che Faro" and its preceding recitative, from Gluck's "Orfeo ed Euridice" and the recitative and aria, "Thou, Far Darling Sun," from Max Bruch's "Odysseus."

Welcomed by Standing Audience

Sir George, who was welcomed with several minutes of applause by a standing audience and was introduced by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, the orchestra's ninth and present conductor, was born in Breslau eighty and one-half years ago, but his physical appearance and his manner of conducting belie his years. When he came to Boston in 1881 he was already well known as a baritone, although only at the beginning of his conductorial career. He conducted the Boston Symphony for three seasons and then returned to Europe to settle in England, be naturalized as a British subject and to become one of the most prominent figures in British musical life. During the twenty years following his departure from Boston he paid occasional visits to America and conducted his "requiem" at Symphony Hall here in 1902. This was his last complete concert in Boston until today, but on November 26, 1905 he conducted the Beethoven overture heard today in concert noting the fact that the orchestra had reached its twenty-fifth season.

There were not a few present today in Symphony Hall who had been his concerts in former days. Among these was Mrs. Henry L. Higginson, widow of the founder of the orchestra, who had met its entire support for thirty-seven years.

Vigor Evident Throughout

Sir George's vigor at his age is remarkable—a chair had been placed on the rostrum today, but he used it only while listening to Dr. Koussevitzky's speech. It was clear that Sir George had not forgotten his skill with the baton with the passing of time. He led with a firm, undemonstrative, clear and vigorous beat; the musicians gave ready and enthusiastic response. The impression of age was given not by the conductor's appearance or his conducting, but by the program, which suggested that not a few items of the regular repertoire of fifty years ago have been shelved since. The "Weihe des Hauses" overture which the friends of music revived in New York a few years ago, is one of those items forgotten in one of his less inspired moments. The Haydn "Symphony in B flat" is little played now, although it has not lost its freshness. Some of the Schubert ballet music is still with us, but Bruch's "Odysseus" is little known at present outside the music dictionaries.

Wagner Number Provides Contrast

That some of the numbers performed today have grown somewhat dated in style, compared with the music of the present day, was inevitable, but it was a happy contrast to Wagner number, a new feature. In casting this aside Boston does Sir George pay the compliment of assuming that the Wagner work is the oldest of the but impressed with the Bruch as illustrated vividly the difference between music always in its prime and music which passes. In the Wagner piece Sir George left a vivid reminiscence performance and made one wish to hear him in the operas which he conducted and which made his name known to us.

Miss Matzenauer's singing was characterized by the same qualities of style and diction which distinguished Beethoven, and did not suffer by comparison with the Gluck. She evoked a memorable interpretation of what should be a notable season in this orchestra's history.

Sir George and Lady Henschel will remain in Boston about ten days, and will hear the next pair of concerts, under Dr. Koussevitzky, before returning to England.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
OCT 1 1930

Henschel Opens Fiftieth Boston Symphony Year

Leader of Orchestra's First Recital Repeats Program of '81; Greeted Warmly

Advance in Music Shown

Sir George, Though 80, Gives a Vigorous Performance

By Francis D. Perkins

BOSTON, Oct. 10.—Forty-nine years from the time when he conducted the first concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Sir George Henschel re-appeared on a Boston concert stage this afternoon to repeat his program of October 22, 1881, save for one number, and to inaugurate the Boston Symphony's fiftieth season. As he did nearly fifty years ago, Sir George today began his program with Beethoven's overture, "Die Weihe des Hauses," and gave as his principal offering Haydn's Symphony in B flat, which is the ninth symphony of the set composed for Salomon in London and the twelfth in the old Breitkopf and Haertel list. This was followed today by the ballet music from Schubert's "Rosamunde." For the last number of the 1881 concert, however, Weber's "Jubilee Overture." Sir George wisely substituted today a far fresher work, Wagner's prelude to "Die Meistersinger von Nurnburg."

Margarete Matzenauer, contralto, and formerly of the Metropolitan Opera, sang the numbers given by Annie Louise Cary as soloist in the inaugural concert of forty-nine years ago. These were the air "Che Faro" and its preceding recitative, from Gluck's "Orfeo ed Euridice" and the recitative and aria, "Thou, Far Darling Sun," from Max Bruch's "Odysseus."

Welcomed by Standing Audience

Sir George, who was welcomed with several minutes of applause by a standing audience and was introduced by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, the orchestra's ninth and present conductor, was born in Breslau eighty and one-half years ago, but his physical appearance and his manner of conducting belie his years. When he came to Boston in 1881 he was already well known as a baritone, although only at the beginning of his conductorial career. He conducted the Boston Symphony for three seasons and then returned to Europe to settle in England, be naturalized as a British subject and to become one of the most prominent figures in British musical life. During the twenty years following his departure from Boston he paid occasional visits to America and conducted his "requiem" at Symphony Hall here in 1902. This was his last complete concert in Boston until today, but on November 26, 1905 he conducted the Beethoven overture heard today in concert noting the fact that the orchestra had reached its twenty-fifth season.

There were not a few present today in Symphony Hall who had heard him in concerts in former days. Among these was Mrs. Henry L. Higginson, widow of the founder of the orchestra, who had met its entire support for thirty-seven years.

Vigor Evident Throughout

Sir George's vigor at his age is remarkable—a chair had been placed on the rostrum today, but he used it only while listening to Dr. Koussevitzky's speech. It was clear that Sir George had not forgotten his skill with the baton with the passing of time. He led with a firm, undemonstrative, clear and vigorous beat; the musicians gave ready and enthusiastic response. The impression of age was given not by the conductor's appearance or his conducting, but by the program, which suggested that not a few items of the regular repertoire of fifty years ago have been shelved since. The "Weihe des Hauses" overture which the friends of music revived in New York a few years ago, is one of those items forgotten in one of his less inspired moments. The Haydn "Symphony in B flat" is little played now, although it has not lost its freshness. Some of the Schubert ballet music is still with us, but Bruch's "Odysseus" is little known at present outside the music dictionaries.

Wagner Number Provides Contrast

That some of the numbers performed today have grown somewhat dated in style, compared with the music of the present day, was inevitable, but it was a happy contrast to Wagner number, a new feature. In casting this aside Boston does Sir George pay the compliment of assuming that the Wagner work is the oldest of the

but impressed with the Bruch as illustrated vividly the difference between music always in its prime and music which passes. In the Wagner piece Sir George left a vivid reminiscence performance and made one wish to hear him in the operas which he conducted and which made his name known to us.

Miss Matzenauer's singing was characterized by the same qualities of style and diction which distinguished Beethoven, and did not suffer by comparison with the Gluck. She evoked a memorable interpretation of what should be a notable season in this orchestra's history.

Sir George and Lady Henschel will remain in Boston about ten days, and will hear the next pair of concerts, under Dr. Koussevitzky, before returning to England.

Conductor of Boston Symphony 50 Years Ago Again Holds Baton

Boston, Oct. 10.—(AP)—A dream of boyish zeal realized a half century ago was revived here today as the Boston Symphony Orchestra opened its 50th season with Sir George Henschel, its first conductor, again leading the concert he had played on that October afternoon in 1881. Dynamic and vibrant, giving no hint of his 80 years, Sir George swept his musicians through the strains of Beethoven's "Dedication of the House" without once glancing at the score.

The revered old artist was presented to the audience by his present successor, Conductor Serge Koussevitzky, who also paid brief tribute to one of the orchestra's founders and greatest patrons, Henry Lee Higginson.

No member of the orchestra as it is now was a member in 1881, but there were a number of listeners who have attended through 49 seasons. Among them was the widow of Mr. Higginson.

BOSTON SUNDAY POST, OCTOBER 12, 19

GREAT OVATION FOR SIR GEORGE

Symphony Audience Thrilled by Conducting of Henschel---Greeted by Former Members

Louis H. Lee Back, But Silent on Action

SUICIDE NOTE WRITER HOME

Police and Husband Find No Trace of Her

HUNT WOMAN IN ACCIDENT

FLIERS MAY GO ON TO AUSTRALIA

Pensacola Starts Sout to Protect Lives of Citizens

HENSCHEL CONDUCTS OPENING CONCERT
First Conductor of Orchestra Cheered
Fiftieth Anniversary Symphony Season Under Way
Sir George Henschel, the first conductor of the Boston Symphony, led as guest yesterday afternoon at the opening concert of the orchestra's 50th season, the program he conducted in the old Music Hall, Oct. 22, 1881, at the first Boston Symphony concert ever given. Margaret Matzenauer, contralto, sang the two arias allotted in 1881 to Annie Louise Cary.
In the present orchestra there is no player who was a member in 1881. In yesterday's audience were, however, a number of listeners who have attended through the 49 intervening seasons.
One of them, Mrs Henry Lee Higginson, widow of the founder and sustainer of the Boston Symphony, was given a great bunch of roses during the intermission. When the audience saw these flowers carried to where Mrs Higginson sat in her usual place, there was an outburst of applause.
When the last warning bell had sounded before the concert, and all the doors of the hall were shut, there was a moment of silence. Then from the right of the stage came Dr Koussevitzky, preceding a brisk, alert figure, bearded and gray-haired, but with no hint of hoary age. One would
Continued on the Eighth Page
Post Globe
Oct 11 30
THE

HENSCHEL CONDUCTS OPENING CONCERT
Continued From the First Page

have deemed Sir George Henschel a man in his late 50s. Yet he is in his 80th year.

Chair on Stand

The conductor's stand was railed in with laurel and gilt. On it was a chair. When Sir George had acknowledged the hearty applause of the orchestra and audience, who stood to greet him, he seated himself in this chair, but, however, to conduct. Merely to listen to a speech of welcome [illegible] Koussevitzky, the present conductor of the Boston Symphony has ventured at the Friday concerts.

"And so the longing and dream of Lee Higginson were realized 50 years ago," began Dr Koussevitzky, pointing to Sir George Henschel and the orchestra. His speech has, naturally, a foreign accent, but his English was carefully and correctly phrased. Once or twice he hesitated over an idiom, but most of his delivery was fluent.

"I shall not now pay tribute to Maj Higginson. For that there will be an occasion next March when we shall give a Bach festival in his honor. Today I wish to congratulate this man, this wonderful man, who has come back to us after so many years to conduct again the program of our orchestra's first concert.

"I am very happy to be able to say to him and to you that our orchestra is now by common consent at the zenith of zenith." This remark brought a burst of applause.

"Not merely Boston, but all America should be proud of the Boston Symphony," concluded its present conductor, to more applause.

Sir George, whose impatience to begin had become obvious before the end of Dr Koussevitzky's brief speech, rose to his feet, bowed his thanks, raised his baton and without glancing at the score on his desk, bade the orchestra begin the Beethoven overture "Dedication of the House."

Except for the accompaniments to Mme Matzenauer's solos, he conducted from memory throughout the concert, in itself something of a feat for a man of any age. Nor did he again make use of the chair placed for him, but remained standing to conduct.

SIR GEORGE HENSCHEL

Great Reputation

One, of course, was prepared to discover in Sir George Henschel a musician of high rank. His great reputation as a conductor, a composer, a pianist, a singer, and a teacher of singing was established long ago. What one had not expected from a man of 80 was the energy, the vitality of such a musician in his prime.

He conducted the Beethoven overture, a Haydn Symphony in B Flat, the ballet music from Schubert's "Rosamunde" and the prelude to Wagner's "Die Meistersinger" with unflagging zest as well as refinement of style and precision of detail.

For each number he sought the quality and intensity of tone [illegible] of the modern orchestra for the music of Bruch and Wagner, written for it. His "tempi" were invariably rightly chosen. His adagio was a true adagio without lingering and broken phrases. His allegro was bright and clear, fluent or pompous, as the music dictated.

Mme Matzenauer sang "Che faro senza Eurydice" from Gluck's "Orpheus," and the prayer of Penelope, from Max Bruch's "Odysseus" with a restraint and a sense of style that made the use of her voice as remarkable as its volume and quality have long been. She had taken the trouble to memorize both numbers, words as well as music, and she was eager to share the applause for them with Sir George Henschel. For her share in the concert there can be nothing but praise.

The orchestra, as was to be expected, did its very best for Sir George [illegible] again proved its right to [illegible] among the foremost. [illegible] credit must go to Dr Koussevitzky, its conductors since the tragic collapse a dozen years ago, when for a time one feared the Boston Symphony Orchestra would become not the least of the casualties due to the World War, and also to the present trustees and guarantors, whose ability and generosity make the continuance of the concerts possible.

Dream Realized

No one who cares for great music could help but to face the prospect of living in a Boston without the Symphony concerts. Major Higginson's dream, forty years ago, of a Symphony orchestra which should do for Boston what the great orchestras of Europe do for their respective cities, in coming true so gloriously, has put us so greatly in his debt that there are no words in which one can express the obligation.

The same program will be conducted tonight Sir George Henschel for the Saturday subscribers. For the sake of the record, here it is.

Overture, "Dedication of the House," Beethoven; air "Che faro," from Orpheus," Gluck; symphony in B flat, Haydn; ballet music from "Rosamunde," Schubert; air and Penelope, from "Odysseus," Bruch; prelude to "Die Meistersinger," Wagner. Soloist, Margaret Matzenauer.

The Wagner number was substituted yesterday for Weber's "Festival Overture," the only change in the numbers of the program of Oct 22, 1881. There was some gossip in the audience over this change.

One's guess is that it is what Sir George Henschel really wanted to conduct in 1881. The new orchestra could hardly have been ready at its first concert for Wagner's exacting, and then relatively unfamiliar prelude. But yesterday it made an appropriate and triumphant close to an unusually satisfying commemoration of a great anniversary date.

P. R.

REDUCTION RATIO 14x

PM-MGP 13"x18"
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

200 mm

150 mm

100 mm

A3

A4

A5

1.0 mm

1.5 mm

2.0 mm

2.5 mm

1.0

1.1

1.25

1.4

1.6

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century

A&P

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

HENSCHEL CONDUCTS OPENING CONCERT

First Conductor of Orchestra Cheered

Fiftieth Anniversary Symphony Season Under Way

Sir George Henschel, the first conductor of the Boston Symphony, led as guest yesterday afternoon at the opening concert of the orchestra's 50th season, the program he conducted in the old Music Hall, Oct 22, 1881, at the first Boston Symphony concert ever given. Margaret Matzenauer, contralto, sang the two solos allotted in 1881 to Annie Louise Cary.

In the present orchestra there is no player who was a member in 1881. In yesterday's audience were, however, a number of listeners who have attended through the 49 intervening seasons.

One of them, Mrs Henry Lee Higginson, widow of the founder and sustainer of the Boston Symphony, was given a great bunch of roses during the intermission. When the audience saw these flowers carried to where Mrs Higginson sat in her usual place, there was an outburst of applause.

When the last warning bell had sounded before the concert, and all the doors of the hall were shut, there was a moment of silence. Then from the right of the stage came Dr Koussevitzky, preceding a brisk, alert figure, bearded and gray-haired, but with no hint of hoary age. One would

Continued on the Eighth Page

Boston Globe
Oct 11 '30

HENSCHEL CONDUCTS OPENING CONCERT

Continued From the First Page

have deemed Sir George Henschel a man in his late 50s. Yet he is in his 80th year.

Chair on Stand

The conductor's stand was railed in with laurel and gilt. On it was a chair. When Sir George had acknowledged the hearty applause of the orchestra and audience, who stood to greet him, he seated himself in this chair. Not, however, to conduct. Merely to listen to a speech of welcome and congratulation from Dr Koussevitzky, the present conductor of the Boston Symphony has ventured at the Friday concerts.

"And so the longing and dream of Lee Higginson were realized 50 years ago," began Dr Koussevitzky, pointing to Sir George Henschel and the orchestra. His speech has, naturally, a foreign accent, but his English was carefully and correctly phrased. Once or twice he hesitated over an idiom, but most of his delivery was fluent.

"I shall not now pay tribute to Maj Higginson. For that there will be an occasion next March when we shall give a Bach festival in his honor. Today I wish to congratulate this man, this wonderful man, who has come back to us after so many years to conduct again the program of our orchestra's first concert.

"I am very happy to be able to say to him and to you that our orchestra is now by common consent at its zenith of zeniths." This remark brought a burst of applause.

"Not merely Boston, but all America should be proud of the Boston Symphony," concluded its present conductor, to more applause.

Sir George, whose impatience to begin had become obvious before the end of Dr Koussevitzky's brief speech, rose to his feet, bowed his thanks, raised his baton and without glancing at the score on his desk, bade the orchestra begin the Beethoven overture "Dedication of the House."

Except for the accompaniments to Mme Matzenauer's solos, he conducted from memory throughout the concert, in itself something of a feat for a man of any age. Nor did he again make use of the chair placed for him, but remained standing to conduct.

SIR GEORGE HENSCHEL

Great Reputation

One, of course, was prepared to discover in Sir George Henschel a musician of high rank. His great reputation as a conductor, a composer, a pianist, a singer, and a teacher of singing was established long ago. What one had not expected from a

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. Herald Tribune

OCT 11 1930

E, SATURDAY, OCT

Henschel Opens Fiftieth Boston Symphony Year

Leader of Orchestra's First Recital Repeats Program of '81; Greeted Warmly

Advance in Music Shown

Sir George, Though 80, Gives a Vigorous Performance

By Francis D. Perkins

BOSTON, Oct. 10.—Forty-nine years from the time when he conducted the first concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra Sir George Henschel reappeared on a Boston concert stage this afternoon to repeat his program of October 22, 1881, save for one number, and to inaugurate the Boston Symphony's fiftieth season. As he did nearly fifty years ago, Sir George today began his program with Beethoven's overture, "Die Weihe des Hauses," and gave as his principal offering Haydn's Symphony in B flat, which is the ninth symphony of the set composed for Salomon in London and the twelfth in the old Breitkopf and Haertel list. This was followed today by the ballet music from Schubert's "Rosamunde." For the last number of the 1881 concert, however, Weber's "Jubilee Overture," Sir George wisely substituted today a far fresher work, Wagner's prelude to "Die Meistersinger von Nurnourg."

Margarete Matzenauer, contralto, and formerly of the Metropolitan Opera, sang the numbers given by Annie Louise Cary as soloist in the inaugural concert of forty-nine years ago. These were the air "Che Faro" and its preceding recitative, from Gluck's "Orfeo ed Euridice" and the recitative and aria, "Thou, Far Darting Sun," from Max Bruch's "Odysseus."

Welcomed by Standing Audience

Sir George, who

Henschel Opens Fiftieth Boston Symphony Year

Leader of Orchestra's First Recital Repeats Program of '81; Greeted Warmly

Advance in Music Shown

Sir George, Though 80, Gives a Vigorous Performance

By Francis D. Perkins

BOSTON, Oct. 10.—Forty-nine years from the time when he conducted the first concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Sir George Henschel re-appeared on a Boston concert stage this afternoon to repeat his program of October 22, 1881, save for one number, and to inaugurate the Boston Symphony's fiftieth season. As he did nearly fifty years ago, Sir George today began his program with Beethoven's overture, "Die Weihe des Hauses," and gave as his principal offering Haydn's Symphony in B flat, which is the ninth symphony of the set composed for Salomon in London and the twelfth in the old Breitkopf and Haertel list. This was followed today by the ballet music from Schubert's "Rosamunde." For the last number of the 1881 concert, however, Weber's "Jubilee Overture," Sir George wisely substituted today a far fresher work, Wagner's prelude to "Die Meistersinger von Nurnourg."

Margarete Matzenauer, contralto, and formerly of the Metropolitan Opera, sang the numbers given by Annie Louise Cary as soloist in the inaugural concert of forty-nine years ago. These were the air "Che Faro" and its preceding recitative, from Gluck's "Orfeo ed Euridice" and the recitative and aria, "Thou, Far Darting Sun," from Max Bruch's "Odysseus."

Welcomed by Standing Audience

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

OCT 11 1930

Conductor of Boston Symphony 50 Years Ago Again Holds Baton

Boston, Oct. 10.—(AP)—A dream of beauty first realized a half century ago was relived here today as the Boston Symphony Orchestra opened its 50th season with Sir George Henscher, its first conductor, again leading the concert he had played on that October afternoon in 1881. Dynamic and vibrant, giving no hint of his 80 years, Sir George swept his musicians through the strains of Beethoven's "Dedication of the House" without once glancing at the score.

The revered old artist was presented to the audience by his present successor. Conductor Serge Koussevitzky, who also paid brief tribute to one of the orchestra's founders and greatest patrons, Henry Lee Higginson.

No member of the orchestra as it is now was a member in 1881, but there were a number of listeners who have attended through 49 seasons. Among them was the widow of Mr. Higginson.

BOSTON SUNDAY POST, OCTOBER 12, 19

GREAT OVATION FOR SIR GEORGE

Symphony Audience Thrilled by Conducting of Henschel---Greeted by Former Members

Leader of Orchestra's First Recital Repeats Program of '81; Greeted Warmly

Advance in Music Shown

Sir George, Though 80, Gives a Vigorous Performance

By Francis D. Perkins

BOSTON, Oct. 10.—Forty-nine years from the time when he conducted the first concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra Sir George Henschel reappeared on a Boston concert stage this afternoon to repeat his program of October 22, 1881, save for one number, and to inaugurate the Boston Symphony's fiftieth season. As he did nearly fifty years ago, Sir George today began his program with Beethoven's overture, "Die Weihe des Hauses," and gave as his principal offering Haydn's Symphony in B flat, which is the ninth symphony of the set composed for Salomon in London and the twelfth in the old Breitkopf and Haertel list. This was followed today by the ballet music from Schubert's "Rosamunde." For the last number of the 1881 concert, however, Weber's "Jubilee Overture," Sir George wisely substituted today a far fresher work, Wagner's prelude to "Die Meistersinger von Nurnburg."

Margarete Matzenauer, contralto, and formerly of the Metropolitan Opera, sang the numbers given by Annie Louise Cary as soloist in the inaugural concert of forty-nine years ago. These were the air "Che Faro" and its preceding recitative, from Gluck's "Orfeo ed Euridice" and the recitative and aria, "Thou, Far Darting Sun," from Max Bruch's "Odysseus."

Welcomed by Standing Audience

Sir George, who was welcomed with several minutes of applause by a standing audience and was introduced by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, the orchestra's ninth and present conductor, was born in Breslau eighty and one-half years ago, but his physical appearance and his manner of conducting belie his years. When he came to Boston in 1881 he was already well known as a barytone, although only at the beginning of his conductorial career. He conducted the Boston Symphony for three seasons and then returned to Europe to settle in England, be naturalized as a British subject an dto become one of the most prominent figures in British musical life. During the twenty years following his departure from Boston he paid occasional visits to America and conducted his "requiem" at Symphony Hall here in 1902. This was his last complete concert in Boston until today, but on November 26, 1905, he conducted the Beethoven overture heard today in a concert noting the fact that the orchestra had reached its twenty-fifth season.

There were not a few present today in Symphony Hall who had heard his concerts in former days. Among these was Mrs. Henry L. Higginson, widow of the founder of the orchestra, who had met its entire support for thirty-seven years.

Vigor Evident Throughout

Sir George's vigor at his age is remarkable—a chair had been placed on the rostrum today, but he used it only while listening to Dr. Koussevitzky's speech. It was clear that Sir George had not forgotten his skill with the baton with the passing of time. He led with a firm, undemonstrative, clear and vigorous beat; the musicians gave ready and enthusiastic response. The impression of age was given not by the conductor's appearance or his conducting, but by the program, which suggested that not a few items of the regular repertoire of fifty years ago have been shelved since. The "Weihe des Hauses" overture, which the friends of music revived in New York a few years ago, is one of those items, representing Beethoven in one of his less inspired moments. The Haydn "Symphony in B flat" is little played now, although it has not lost its freshness. Some of the Schubert ballet music is still with us, but Bruch's "Odysseus" is little known at present outside the music dictionaries.

Wagner Number Provides Contrast

That some of the numbers revived today had faded with the years and grown pale contributed to an occasional impression of limited variety of color before the Wagner number was reached. In giving this after the Bruch work, Sir George furnished a striking and instructive contrast. The Wagner work is the elder of the two, but, compared with the Bruch, it illustrated vividly the difference between music always in its prime and music which passes. In the Wagner prelude, Sir George led a vivid, proclamative performance, and again gave occasion to admire his ability as a leader and his vigor and enthusiasm after a professional career which began more than sixty years ago.

Mme. Matzenauer sang with her accustomed artistry, and was also an object of ardent applause from the many Bostonians, young and old, who attended a memorable inauguration of what should be a notable season in this orchestra's history.

Sir George and Lady Henschel will remain in Boston about ten days, and will hear the next pair of concerts, under Dr. Koussevitzky, before returning to England.

Leader of Orchestra's First Recital Repeats Program of '81; Greeted Warmly

Advance in Music Shown

Sir George, Though 80, Gives a Vigorous Performance

By Francis D. Perkins

BOSTON, Oct. 10.—Forty-nine years from the time when he conducted the first concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Sir George Henschel re-appeared on a Boston concert stage this afternoon to repeat his program of October 22, 1881, save for one number, and to inaugurate the Boston Symphony's fiftieth season. As he did nearly fifty years ago, Sir George today began his program with Beethoven's overture, "Die Weihe des Hauses," and gave as his principal offering Haydn's Symphony in B flat, which is the ninth symphony of the set composed for Salomon in London and the twelfth in the old Breitkopf and Haertel list. This was followed today by the ballet music from Schubert's "Rosamunde." For the last number of the 1881 concert, however, Weber's "Jubilee Overture," Sir George wisely substituted today a far fresher work, Wagner's prelude to "Die Meistersinger von Nurnburg."

Margarete Matzenauer, contralto, and formerly of the Metropolitan Opera, sang the numbers given by Annie Louise Cary as soloist in the inaugural concert of forty-nine years ago. These were the air "Che Faro" and its preceding recitative, from Gluck's "Orfeo ed Euridice" and the recitative and aria, "Thou, Far Darting Sun," from Max Bruch's "Odysseus."

Welcomed by Standing Audience

Sir George, who was welcomed with sereval minutes of applause by a standing audience and was introduced by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, the orchestra's ninth and present conductor, was born in Breslau eighty and one-half years ago, but his physical appearance and his manner of conducting belie his years. When he came to Boston in 1881 he was already well known as a barytone, although only at the beginning of his conductorial career. He conducted the Boston Symphony for three season and then returned to Europe to settle in England, be naturalized asa British subject and to become one of the most prominent figures in British musical life. During the twenty years following his departure from Boston he paid occasional visits to America and conducted his "requiem" at Symphony Hall here in 1902. This was his last complete concert in Boston until today, but on November 26, 1005, he conducted the Beethoven overture heard today in a concert noting the fact that the orchestra had reached its twenty-fifth season.

There were not a few present today in Symphony Hall who had heard his concerts in former days. Among these was Mrs. Henry L. Higginson, widow of the founder of the orchestra, who had met its entire support for thirty-seven years.

Vigor Evident Throughout

Sir George's vigor at his age is remarkable—a chair had been placed on the rostrum today, but he used it only while listening to Dr. Koussevitzky's speech. It was clear that Sir George had not forgotten his skill with the baton with the passing of time. He led with a firm, undemonstrative, clear and vigorous beat; the musicians gave ready and enthusiastic response. The impression of age was given not by the conductor's appearance or his conducting, but by th eprogram, which suggested that not a few items of the regular repertoire of fifty years ago have bee nshelved since. The "Weihe des Hauses" overture, which the friends of music revived in New York a few years ago, is on eof those items, representing Beethoven in one of his less inspired moments. The Haydn "Symphony in B flat" is little played now, although it has not lost its freshness. Some of the Schubert ballet music is still with us, but Bruch's "Odysseus" is little known at present outside the music dictionaries.

Wagner Number Provides Contrast

That some of the numbers revived today had faded with the years and grown pale contributed to an occasional impression of limited variety of color before the Wagner number was reached. In giving this after the Bruch work, Sir George furnished a striking and instructive contrast. The Wagner work is the elder of the two, but, compared with the Bruch, it illustrated vividly the difference between music always in its prime and music which passes. In the Wagner prelude, Sir George led a vivid, proclamative performance, and again gave occasion to admire his ability as a leader and his vigor and enthusiasm after a professional career which began more than sixty years ago.

Mme. Matzenauer sang with her accustomed artistry, and was also an object of ardent applause from the many Bostonians, young and old, who attended a memorable inauguration of what should be a notable season in this orchestra's history.

Sir George and Lady Henschel will remain in Boston about ten days, and will hear the next pair of concerts, under Dr. Koussevitzky, before returning to England.

of beauty first realized a half century ago was relived here today as the Boston Symphony Orchestra opened its 50th season with Sir George Henscher, its first conductor, again leading the concert he had played on that October afternoon in 1881. Dynamic and vibrant, giving no hint of his 80 years, Sir George swept his musicians through the strains of Beethoven's "Dedication of the House" without once glancing at the score.

ed to the audience by his pres successor. Conductor Serge Kou vitzky, who also paid brief trib to one of the orchestra's found and greatest patrons, Henry Lee H ginson.

No member of the orchestra as is now was a member in 1881, b there were a number of listene who have attended through 49 se sons. Among them was the widc of Mr. Higginson.

GREAT OVATION FOR SIR GEORGI

Symphony Audience Thrilled b Conducting of Henschel---Greeted by Former Members

THREE OLD CRONIES GET TOGETHER

Three members of the original Boston Symphony Orchestra, who played together 50 years ago, shown in an excellent informal picture, as they discussed old times after the manner of real old cronies. Left to right: George Stewart, Sir George Henschel and Carl Behr.

Feet stamped, jeweled hands beat together clamorously and constant cries of "Bravo" filled Symphony Hall as the most magnificent and heartfelt tribute ever paid to a musician in Boston was showered down on the gray head of Sir George Henschel last night.

TWO EX-MEMBERS

The little bearded man who travelled 3000 miles across the ocean in his 80th year to lead the Boston Symphony Orchestra again as he did a half a century ago, could only bow, press his hand to his heart and blink back something that rushed into his eyes as the finest audience that ever filled that temple of music rendered homage to him.

And in the vanguard of the worshippers, leading the barrages of handclapping which were hurled at the stage were George Stewart of Boston and Carl Behr of Nashville, N. C., who 50 years ago were members of the first Symphony Orchestra. They were the only two of five living members of the first body of musicians who were able to be present last night.

"Perfectly Happy"

"I am perfectly happy. This is marvelous," Sir George told a Post reporter as he linked his arm with that of Lady Henschel and darted away like a sprite from the throng of adoring men and women who wished that they might stay on for hours with him, talking over old memories.

No jubilee in any branch of endeavor was ever opened more auspiciously than the semi-centennial of the Boston Symphony through the remarkable performances of Sir George Henschel. When he conducted Friday afternoon he swept critics and music lovers virtually off their feet by the vim and vitality he displayed. Friday afternoon's appearance was brilliant and fine. Last night he was surpassing.

Brilliant Picture

The great hall was a picture, a brilliant picture of beautiful women in beautiful gowns, with colorful evening cloaks and the menfolk in dull black and resplendent white. More than wealth was there culture and name and above all a true love of music. Many present could easily trace their families back to the Puritans whom Boston is honoring this year, and even beyond that.

Practically every seat was taken when Sir George appeared. He came bobbing onto the stage, sprightly and eagerly. The storm of applause broke as he appeared and rose to thunder heights as he ascended the dais. It continued in intensity even when he waved his left hand deprecatingly at the audience as if to say, "Now, children, enough of that. We must have music."

The slim wand was lifted and fell like a shaft of light and Beethoven walked across the stage of the Symphony. On and on, higher and higher the music rose, but every instance the man on the dais, the little man with the grey beard and the curley cluster of hair on his head, maintained the beat, surely and succinctly.

Forgot the Music

What a silence was there? The dropping of a pin would have sounded like a bowling ball rumbling down the aisle. People forgot the music to watch the man. And then as the first number ended, he bowed and the audience rose to him. Again and again the applause continued. Again Sir George sought to stop it.

For a moment he slipped off the stage. Some folks thought it was to rest. But, no, he was back again with Madame Margaret Matzenauer.

The songbird had come from her home at Santa Monica, Calif., to sing especially at this concert and the throng vociferously greeted her. She endeavored to include Sir George, but he waved her away as a man who didn't have time for anything but his music. And both laughed.

After the symphony came the intermission and he rested in quiet. But the crowd did not. The foyer was thronged as the attendants at Symphony Hall had never seen it thronged before. People wanted to talk. You could feel the excitement in the air. This was the night of night, an event.

Wears No Glasses

With undiminished vigor he returned to the hall again. People were noticing things now. He did not bother with the score. It rested on a corner of the dais four feet away from him, and only rarely he glanced at it. And more amazing, for a man of 80 years, he wore no glasses. With perfect eyes he scanned the bars in a glance.

How the orchestra played! To great heights they rose, giving their best to this man out of the past who was decades older than any of them and who up to a few days ago was a name only in the music world. The players sensed the significance of the event and followed every motion.

Through Schubert and Bruch, Sir George rested only slightly before he took up the prelude of the Mastersingers, Wagnerian and sturdy, rugged music, but he did not falter. For he had been the first man to introduce Wagner to Boston. Wagner was not liked. Folks said it was not music. But last night few could have thought that in the hands of Sir George.

Stronger and stronger, force and vim and vigor personified, he put his heart and strength, remarkable strength, into the leading and as the last note passed the house rose to its feet and the cries of "Bravo" rang out clearly. For the first time in anybody's memory feet were stamped until the thumps became a chant, and again and yet again Sir George had to come back to acknowledge it. Try as he might to include his orchestra, the members smiled and shook their heads and gallantly gave him the thunder.

How He Ended It

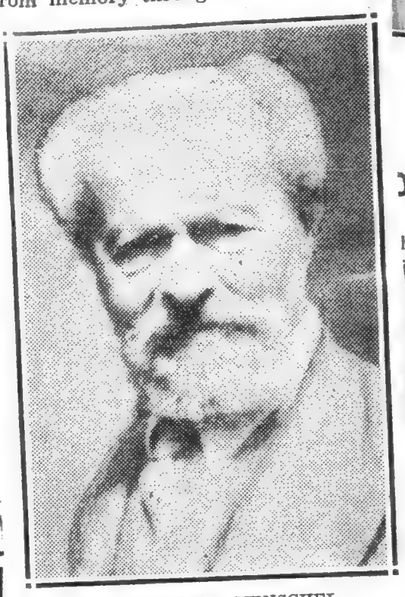
For five minutes it lasted and Sir George ended it himself by failing to return. Up in Dr. Koussevitzky's office there was no relief. Happily he greeted George Stewart, trombonist and Carl Behr, celloist in the first orchestra. Mr. Behr presented Sir George a membership in the Schubert Philharmonic Association of Asheville, N. C., which Mr. Behr conducts.

But their chat together was short-lived. Programmes were pressed on the man of the hour for autographs. One of these was a programme from a concert in 1902 in Boston given by Miss Helen Henschel, daughter of Sir George. Sir Felix George conducted that concert and Felix George conducted the concert and Mr. Fox who produced the programme last night.

In the midst of the excitement Sir George and Madame Matzenauer had a little talk by themselves, with mutual congratulations. Folks who had attended the concert 50 years ago and who brought their children and grandchildren to meet Sir George last night kept repeating: "This is like 50 years ago. This is marvelous."

Musical folks by the score congratulated him, among them Helen Hopekirk, Heinrich Gebhard, William Arms Fisher, James R. Houghton, Jesus Maria Sanroma and others. Messenger boys kept Lady Henschel busy receiving telegrams. Sir George was still writing autographs a half an hour after the concert until suddenly he looked at his watch.

"I must be going. I must be going. Come, Amy," he called to his wife, and off he bobbed through the door and nimbly run down the steps to a waiting automobile—leaving folks still wondering how a man of 80 years could be so young.



SIR GEORGE HENSCHEL

in itself something of a feat for a man of any age. Nor did he again make use of the chair placed for him, but remained standing to conduct.

Great Reputation

One, of course, was prepared to discover in Sir George Henschel a musician of high rank. His great reputation as a conductor, a composer, a pianist, a singer, and a teacher of singing was established long ago. What one had not expected from a man of 80 was the energy, the vitality of such a musician in his prime.

He conducted the Beethoven overture, a Haydn Symphony in B Flat, the ballet music from Schubert's "Rosemunde" and the prelude to Wagner's "Die Meistersinger" with unflagging zest as well as refinement of style and precision of detail.

For each number he sought the quality and intensity of tone appropriate, reserving the great sonorities of the modern orchestra for the music of Bruch and Wagner, written for it. His tempi were invariably rightly chosen. His adagio was a true adagio without lingering and broken phrases. His allegro was bright and clear, fluent or pompous, as the music dictated.

Mme Matzenauer sang "Che faro senza Eurydice" from Gluck's "Orpheus," and the prayer of Penelope from Max Bruch's "Odysseus" with a restraint and a sense of style that made the use of her voice as remarkable as its volume and quality have long been. She had taken the trouble to memorize both numbers, words as wel las music, and she was eager to share the applause for them with Sir George Henschel. For her share in the concert there can be nothing but praise.

The orchestra, as was to be expected, did its very best for Sir George Henschel. It again proved its right to be counted among the foremost in the Koussevitzky, its conductors since the tragic collapse a dozen years ago, when for a time one feared the Boston Symphony Orchestra would become not the least of the casualties due to the World War, and also to the present trustees and guarantors, whose ability and generosity make the continuance of the concerts possible.

Dream Realized

No one who cares for great music could now bear to face the prospect of living in a Boston without the Symphony concerts. Major Higginson's dream, 50 years ago, of a Symphony Orchestra which should do for Boston what the great orchestras of Europe do for their respective cities, in coming true so gloriously, has put us so greatly in his debt that there are no words in which one can express the obligation.

The same program will be conducted tonight by Sir George Henschel for the Saturday subscribers. For the sake of the record, here it is."

Overture, "Dedication of the House," Beethoven; air "Che faro," from "Orpheus," Gluck; symphony in B flat, Haydn; ballet music from "Rosemunde," Schubert; air of Penelope from "Odysseus," Bruch; prelude to "Die Meistersinger," Wagner. Soloist, Margaret Matzenauer.

The Wagner number was substituted yesterday for Weber's "Festival Overture," the only change in the numbers of the program of Oct 22, 1881. There was some gossip in the audience over this change.

One's guess is that it is what Sir George Henschel really wanted to conduct in 1881. The new orchestra could hardly have been ready at its first concert for Wagner's exacting, and then relatively unfamiliar prelude. But yesterday it made an appropriate and triumphant close to an unusually satisfying commemoration of a great anniversary date. P. R.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. Herald Tribune

OCT 11 1930

Henschel Opens Fiftieth Boston Symphony Year

Leader of Orchestra's First Recital Repeats Program of '81; Greeted Warmly

Advance in Music Shown

Sir George, Though 80, Gives a Vigorous Performance

By Francis D. Perkins

BOSTON, Oct. 10.—Forty-nine years from the time when he conducted the first concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra Sir George Henschel reappeared on a Boston concert stage this afternoon to repeat his program of October 22, 1881, save for one number, and to inaugurate the Boston Symphony's fiftieth season. As he did nearly fifty years ago, Sir George today began his program with Beethoven's overture, "Die Weihe des Hauses," and gave as his principal offering Haydn's Symphony in B flat, which is the ninth symphony of the set composed for Salomon in London and the twelfth in the old Breitkopf and Haertel list. This was followed today by the ballet music from Schubert's "Rosamunde." For the last number of the 1881 concert, however, Weber's "Jubilee Overture," Sir George wisely substituted today a far fresher work, Wagner's prelude to "Die Meistersinger von Nurnburg."

Margarete Matzenauer, contralto, and formerly of the Metropolitan Opera, sang the numbers given by Annie Louise Cary as soloist in the inaugural concert of forty-nine years ago. These were the air "Che Faro" and its preceding recitative, from Gluck's "Orfeo ed Euridice" and the recitative and aria, "Thou, Far Darting Sun," from Max Bruch's "Odysseus."

Welcomed by Standing Audience

Sir George, who was welcomed with several minutes of applause by a standing audience and was introduced by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, the orchestra's ninth and present conductor, was born in Breslau eighty and one-half years ago, but his physical appearance and his manner of conducting belie his years. When he came to Boston in 1881 he was already well known as a barytone, although only at the beginning of his conductorial career. He conducted the Boston Symphony for three seasons and then returned to Europe to settle in England, be naturalized as a British subject an dto become one of the most prominent figures in British musical life. During the twenty years following his departure from Boston he paid occasional visits to America and conducted his "requiem" at Symphony Hall here in 1902. This was his last complete concert in Boston until today, but on November 26, 1905, he conducted the Beethoven overture heard today in concert noting the fact that the orchestra had reached its twenty-fifth season.

There were not a few present today in Symphony Hall who had heard his concerts in former days. Among these was Mrs. Henry L. Higginson, widow of the founder of the orchestra, who had met its entire support for thirty-seven years.

Vigor Evident Throughout

Sir George's vigor at his age is remarkable—a chair had been placed on the rostrum today, but he used it only while listening to Dr. Koussevitzky's speech. It was clear that Sir George had not forgotten his skill with the baton with the passing of time. He led with a firm, undemonstrative, clear and vigorous beat; the musicians gave ready and enthusiastic response. The impression of age was given not by the conductor's appearance or his conducting, but by the program, which suggested that not a few items of the regular repertoire of fifty years ago have been shelved since. The "Weihe des Hauses" overture, which the friends of music revived in New York a few years ago, is one of those items, representing Beethoven in one of his less inspired moments. The Haydn "Symphony in B flat" is little played now, although it has not lost its freshness. Some of the Schubert ballet music is still with us, but Bruch's "Odysseus" is little known at present outside the music dictionaries.

Wagner Number Provides Contrast

That some of the numbers revived today had faded with the years and grown pale contributed to an occasional impression of limited variety of color before the Wagner number was reached. In giving this after the Bruch work, Sir George furnished a striking and instructive contrast. The Wagner work is the elder of the two, but, compared with the Bruch, it illustrated vividly the difference between music always in its prime and music which passes. In the Wagner prelude, Sir George led a vivid, proclamative performance, and again gave occasion to admire his ability as a leader and his vigor and enthusiasm after a professional career which began more than sixty years ago.

Mme. Matzenauer sang with her accustomed artistry, and was also an object of ardent applause from the many Bostonians, young and old, who attended a memorable inauguration of what should be a notable season in this orchestra's history.

Sir George and Lady Henschel will remain in Boston about ten days, and will hear the next pair of concerts, under Dr. Koussevitzky, before returning to England.

Henschel Opens Fiftieth Boston Symphony Year

Leader of Orchestra's First Recital Repeats Program of '81; Greeted Warmly

Advance in Music Shown

Oct. 11 Sun.

Sir George, Though 80, Gives a Vigorous Performance

By Francis D. Perkins

BOSTON, Oct. 10.—Forty-nine years from the time when he conducted the first concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Sir George Henschel re-appeared on a Boston concert stage this afternoon to repeat his program of October 22, 1881, save for one number, and to inaugurate the Boston Symphony's fiftieth season. As he did nearly fifty years ago, Sir George today began his program with Beethoven's overture, "Die Weihe des Hauses," and gave as his principal offering Haydn's Symphony in B flat, which is the ninth symphony of the set composed for Salomon in London and the twelfth in the old Breitkopf and Haertel list. This was followed today by the ballet music from Schubert's "Rosamunde." For the last number of the 1881 concert, however, Weber's "Jubilee Overture," Sir George wisely substituted today a far fresher work, Wagner's prelude to "Die Meistersinger von Nurnburg."

Margarete Matzenauer, contralto, and formerly of the Metropolitan Opera, sang the numbers given by Annie Louise Cary as soloist in the inaugural concert of forty-nine years ago. These were the air "Che Faro" and its preceding recitative, from Gluck's "Orfeo ed Euridice" and the recitative and aria, "Thou, Far Darting Sun," from Max Bruch's "Odysseus."

Welcomed by Standing Audience

Sir George, who was welcomed with sereval minutes of applause by a standing audience and was introduced by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, the orchestra's ninth and present conductor, was born in Breslau eighty and one-half years ago, but his physical appearance and his manner of conducting belie his years. When he came to Boston in 1881 he was already well known as a barytone, although only at the beginning of his conductorial career. He conducted the Boston Symphony for three season and then returned to Europe to settle in England, be naturalized asa British subject and to become one of the most prominent figures in British musical life. During the twenty years following his departure from Boston he paid occasional visits to America and conducted his "requiem" at Symphony Hall here in 1902. This was his last complete concert in Boston until today, but on November 26, 1005, he conducted the Beethoven overture heard today in concert noting the fact that the orchestra had reached its twenty-fifth season.

There were not a few present today in Symphony Hall who had heard his concerts in former days. Among these was Mrs. Henry L. Higginson, widow of the founder of the orchestra, who had met its entire support for thirty-seven years.

Vigor Evident Throughout

Sir George's vigor at his age is remarkable—a chair had been placed on the rostrum today, but he used it only while listening to Dr. Koussevitzky's speech. It was clear that Sir George had not forgotten his skill with the baton with the passing of time. He led with a firm, undemonstrative, clear and vigorous beat; the musicians gave ready and enthusiastic response. The impression of age was given not by the conductor's appearance or his conducting, but by th eprogram, which suggested that not a few items of the regular repertoire of fifty years ago have bee nshelved since. The "Weihe des Hauses" overture, which the friends of music revived in New York a few years ago, is on eof those items, representing Beethoven in one of his less inspired moments. The Haydn "Symphony in B flat" is little played now, although it has not lost its freshness. Some of the Schubert ballet music is still with us, but Bruch's "Odysseus" is little known at present outside the music dictionaries.

Wagner Number Provides Contrast

That some of the numbers revived today had faded with the years and grown pale contributed to an occasional impression of limited variety of color before the Wagner number was reached. In giving this after the Bruch work, Sir George furnished a striking and instructive contrast. The Wagner work is the elder of the two, but, compared with the Bruch, it illustrated vividly the difference between music always in its prime and music which passes. In the Wagner prelude, Sir George led a vivid, proclamative performance, and again gave occasion to admire his ability as a leader and his vigor and enthusiasm after a professional career which began more than sixty years ago.

Mme. Matzenauer sang with her accustomed artistry, and was also an object of ardent applause from the many Bostonians, young and old, who attended a memorable inauguration of what should be a notable season in this orchestra's history.

Sir George and Lady Henschel will remain in Boston about ten days, and will hear the next pair of concerts, under Dr. Koussevitzky, before returning to England.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

OCT 11 1930

23

Conductor of Boston Symphony 50 Years Ago Again Holds Baton

Boston, Oct. 10.—(AP)—A dream of beauty first realized a half century ago was relived here today as the Boston Symphony Orchestra opened its 50th season with Sir George Henscher, its first conductor, again leading the concert he had played on that October afternoon in 1881. Dynamic and vibrant, giving no hint of his 80 years, Sir George swept his musicians through the strains of Beethoven's "Dedication of the House" without once glancing at the score.

The revered old artist was presented to the audience by his present successor. Conductor Serge Koussevitzky, who also paid brief tribute to one of the orchestra's founders and greatest patrons, Henry Lee Higginson.

No member of the orchestra as it is now was a member in 1881, but there were a number of listeners who have attended through 49 seasons. Among them was the widow of Mr. Higginson.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
LAWRENCE, MASS.
TRIBUNE

OCT 11 1930

1

BOSTON—Sir George Henscher, first conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, conducts opening of 50th season.

THIS CLIPPING FROM HAVERHILL, MASS.
GAZETTE

OCT 11 1930

BOSTON—Sir George Henscher, first conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, conducts opening of 50th season.

NEWPORT, Vt. — Edward Tacy, Greenfield, Mass., and Oagland, Calif., driver of car which frustrated a customs capture, loses license and is ordered to leave Vermont.

THIS CLIPPING FROM LYNN, MASS.
EVE. ITEM

OCT 11 1930

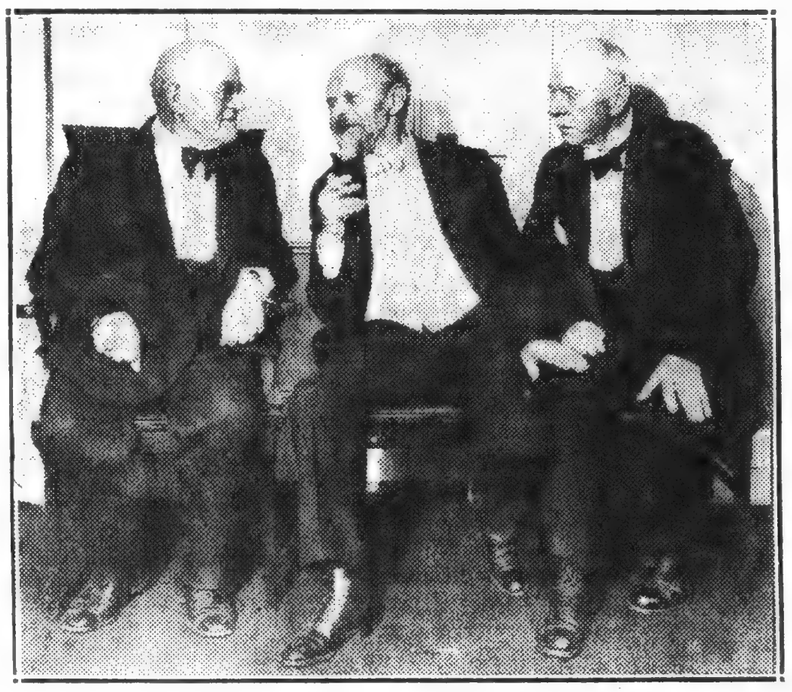
ornnage at navy yard.

BOSTON.—Sir George Henscher, first conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, conducts opening of 50th season.

BOSTON SUNDAY POST, OCTOBER 12, 19

GREAT OVATION FOR SIR GEORGE

Symphony Audience Thrilled by Conducting of Henschel---Greeted by Former Members



THREE OLD CRONIES GET TOGETHER

Three members of the original Boston Symphony Orchestra, who played together 50 years ago, shown in an excellent informal picture, as they discussed old times after the manner of real old cronies. Left to right: George Stewart, Sir George Henschel and Carl Behr.

Feet stamped, jeweled hands beat together clamorously and constant cries of "Bravo" filled Symphony Hall as the most magnificent and heartfelt tribute ever paid to a musician in Boston was showered down on the gray head of Sir George Henschel last night.

TWO EX-MEMBERS

The little bearded man who travelled 3000 miles across the ocean in his 80th year to lead the Boston Symphony Orchestra again as he did a half a century ago, could only bow, press his hand to his heart and blink back something that rushed into his eyes as the finest audience that ever filled that temple of music rendered homage to him.

And in the vanguard of the worshippers, leading the barrages of handclapping which were hurled at the stage were George Stewart of Boston and Carl Behr of Nashville, N. C., who 50 years ago were members of the first Symphony Orchestra. They were the only two of five living members of the first body of musicians who were able to be present last night.

"Perfectly Happy"

"I am perfectly happy. This is marvelous," Sir George told a Post reporter as he linked his arm with that of Lady Henschel and darted away like a sprite from the throng of adoring men and women who wished that they might stay on for hours with him, talking over old memories.

No jubilee in any branch of endeavor was ever opened more auspiciously than the semi-centennial of the Boston Symphony through the remarkable performances of Sir George Henschel. When he conducted Friday afternoon he swept critics and music lovers virtually off their feet by the vim and vitality he displayed. Friday afternoon's appearance was brilliant and fine. Last night he was surpassing.

Brilliant Picture

The great hall was a picture, a brilliant picture of beautiful women in beautiful gowns, with colorful evening cloaks and the menfolk in dull black and resplendent white. More than wealth was there culture and name and above all a true love of music. Many present could easily trace their families back to the Puritans whom Boston is honoring this year, and even beyond that.

Practically every seat was taken when Sir George appeared. He came hobbling onto the stage, aged and eagerly. The storm of applause broke as he appeared and rose to crescendo heights as he ascended the dais. It continued in intensity even when he waved his left hand deprecatingly at the audience as if to say, Now, children, enough of that. We must have music."

The slim wand was lifted and fell like a shaft of light and Beethoven walked across the stage of the Symphony. On and on, higher and higher the music rose, but every instance the man on the dais, the little man with [illegible] and the curley cluster of at Santa Monica, Calif., to sing especially at this concert and the throng vociferously greeted her. She endeavored to include Sir George, but he waved her away as a man who didn't have time for anything but his music. And both laughed.

After the symphony came the intermission and he rested in quiet. But the crowd did not. The foyer was thronged as the attendants at Symphony Hall had never seen it thronged before. People wanted to talk. You could feel the excitement in the air. This was the night of night, an event.

Wears No Glasses

With undiminished vigor he returned to the hall again. People were noticing things now. He did not bother with the score. It rested on a corner of the dais four feet away from him, and only rarely he glanced at it. And more amazing, for a man of 80 years, he wore no glasses. With perfect eyes he scanned the bars in a glance.

How the orchestra played! To great heights they rose, giving their best to this man out of the past who was decades older than any of them and who up to a few days ago was a name only in the music world. The players sensed the significance of the event and followed every motion.

Through Schubert and Bruch. Sir George rested only slightly before he took up the prelude of the Mastersingers, Wagnerian and sturdy, rugged music, but he did not falter. For he had been the first man to introduce Wagner to Boston. Wagner was not liked. Folks said it was not music. But last night few could have thought that in the hands of Sir George.

Stronger and stronger, force and vim and vigor personified, he put his heart and strength, remarkable strength, into the leading and as the last note passed the house rose to its feet and the cries of 'Bravo" rang out clearly. For the first time in anybody's memory feet were stamped until the thumps became a chant, and again and yet again Sir George had to come back to acknowledge it. Try as he might to include his orchestra, the members smiled and shook their heads and gallantly gave him the thunder.

How He Ended It

For five minutes it lasted and Sir George ended it himself by failing to return. Up in Dr. Koussevitzky's office there was no relief. Happily he greeted George Stewart, trombonist and Carl Behr, cellost in the first orchestra. Mr. Behr presented Sir George a membership in the Schubert Philharmonic Association of Asheville, N. C., which Mr. Behr conducts.

But their chat together was shortlived. Programmes were pressed on the leader of the hour for autographs. One of these was a programme from a concert in 1867 in Boston given by Miss Helen Henschel, daughter of Sir George. Sir Fox George conducted that concert and Felix George conducted the concert and Mr. Fox also produced the programme last night.

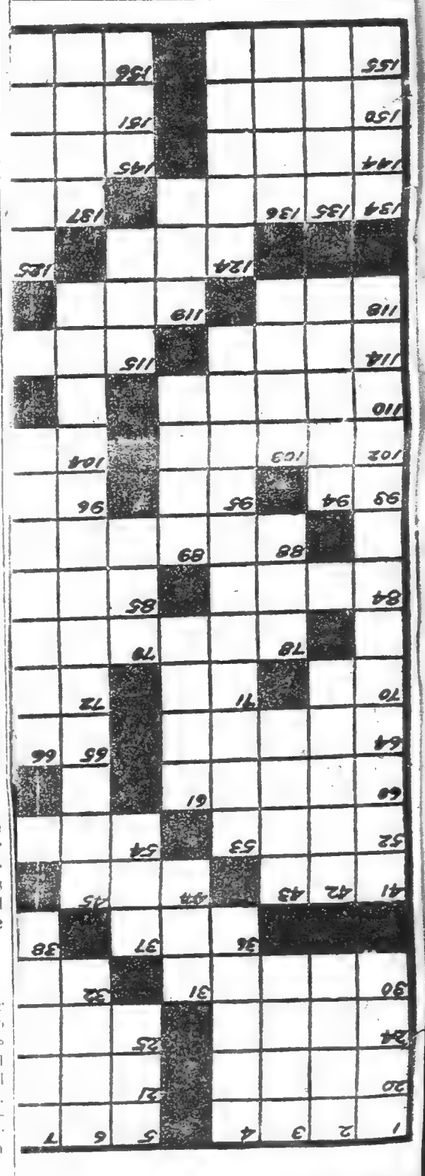
In the midst of the excitement Sir George and Mme. Matzenauer had a little talk by themselves, with mutual congratulations. Folks who had attended the concert 40 years ago and who brought their children and grand children to meet Sir George last night kept

GLOBE—OCTOBER 12

MUSI

Music Notes and Comment

Dr Koussevitzky will conduct this week's Symphony concerts. He has put on the program a new ode composed for the orchestra's 50th anniversary by Prof E. B. Hill of Harvard to words by Prof Robert Hillyer. This will be sung by a chorus from the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society. The concerts of Oct 17 and 18 are the nearest to the date, Oct 22, of the first concert in the first season. Another novelty will be an orchestral version by the Italian composer Pick-Mangiagalli of an organ prelude and a violin prelude by Bach.



1—An advisory council.
10—Flowers.
8—Coral island.
7—Of age (abbr).
5—Damp.
4—From the sign (mus).
2—Chosen; picked.
1—Technical degree (abbr).
0—A continent.
9—Thus.
7—Mouth.
6—Snakelike fish.
5—Negative.
3—Terbium (abbr).
ture, etc.
3—Pardon.

minster and the sea"; Richard Wagner as a boy hears Beethoven's Ninth Symphony and it determines his career. To have known the best, and known it early in life, confers a knighthood of the spirit. There is a self-respect of the intellect and it is cultivated through the acquaintance with the finest models. What is more, such familiarity (which breeds not contempt but reverence) with one art or with one great personality becomes a passport to others. Accustomed to distinguish between the excellent and the mediocre, one moves easily and naturally among masterpieces, be they of the arts or the sciences or of human character.

* * *

In Paris one is struck by the profusion of fine paintings, and small wonder! for at the heart of that capital of taste is the most princely of art collections, the Louvre. In Italy noble architecture is plenteous, in Germany it is music, and in England is a heritage of poetry unexampled in any literature outside of the Greek, and perhaps not even there. Once high standards have been set it is not so difficult to sustain them, but to establish them in a new territory can be bitter business and often exacts the patience of the saint, the fortitude of the stoic and the faith of the martyr.

For half a century the Symphony Orchestra has, in the midst of this city (and, as the event proves, also for the country at large) been maintaining the art of music at its highest level. It is an aristocratic art. It asks not our suffrages. It little consults our likes or dislikes. It fixes its aspiration on the highest reaches of the human spirit and says to us, "Come along if you will."

Compared to that of Paris, our painting is as a newsstand to a library; our public buildings are to those of Rome as a country town to a capital; but in our libraries we have access to great thought and in our orchestra hall to the best in music. Thus do we learn table manners which qualify us to be guests at other banquets of the mind, and thus, too, do the fledgling artists among us learn to disdain all but the noblest models in an art form and bring their souls to the wedlock of art as the choicest of young men and maidens bring their bodies to the wedlock of flesh unsullied through having cheapened their affections.

* * *

Until our own era music has been a manuscript drama unobtainable in print, a drama which to be known had to be heard in performance, for of course printed scores are legible only to musicians. But suddenly the other day a key turned, a door opened, and we were invited to walk at our pleasure into a vast library of printed sound. These novel and often glorious books we call phonograph records. The classics among them are only gradually being published along with a flood of lighter literature, often trash, much as though when the art of printing was discovered in Europe the Gutenberg Bible and the Aldine Plato had been issued from the press along with "Slimy Stories" and the works of Mr Slapdash Slobbergobble. Still, these classics of musical literature can be obtained, and like any other great book they require to be read (that is, heard) repeatedly in order to be fully enjoyed and understood. Good music will bear 20 times the repetition that even the best poetry can endure—indeed, cannot be properly grasped without it; and here again the inculcation of a discriminating taste among books of printed sound has a beneficial effect upon one's whole mental organism, for such music soothes; it gives release from the tensions of everyday wear and tear; it provides an emergency exit into an ideal world where one can find peace and joy; it introduces into the seeming chaos of daily events a realm of order, a law of rhythm, and a harmony which cause our perplexing affairs to fall into their properly subordinate places, to take back seats where they belong, to hold their idle tongues as they should, and mind their manners in the presence of their betters.

* * *

Perhaps in eulogising as mundane and as expensive an institution as the Boston Symphony Orchestra the credit balance set down above may strike practically minded persons as highly metaphysical. No doubt, no doubt! Yet one seems to recall that spirituality in any kind is a highly metaphysical value and that when speaking of such music as the Symphony Orchestra plays we are speaking of more than art. We are speaking of religion.

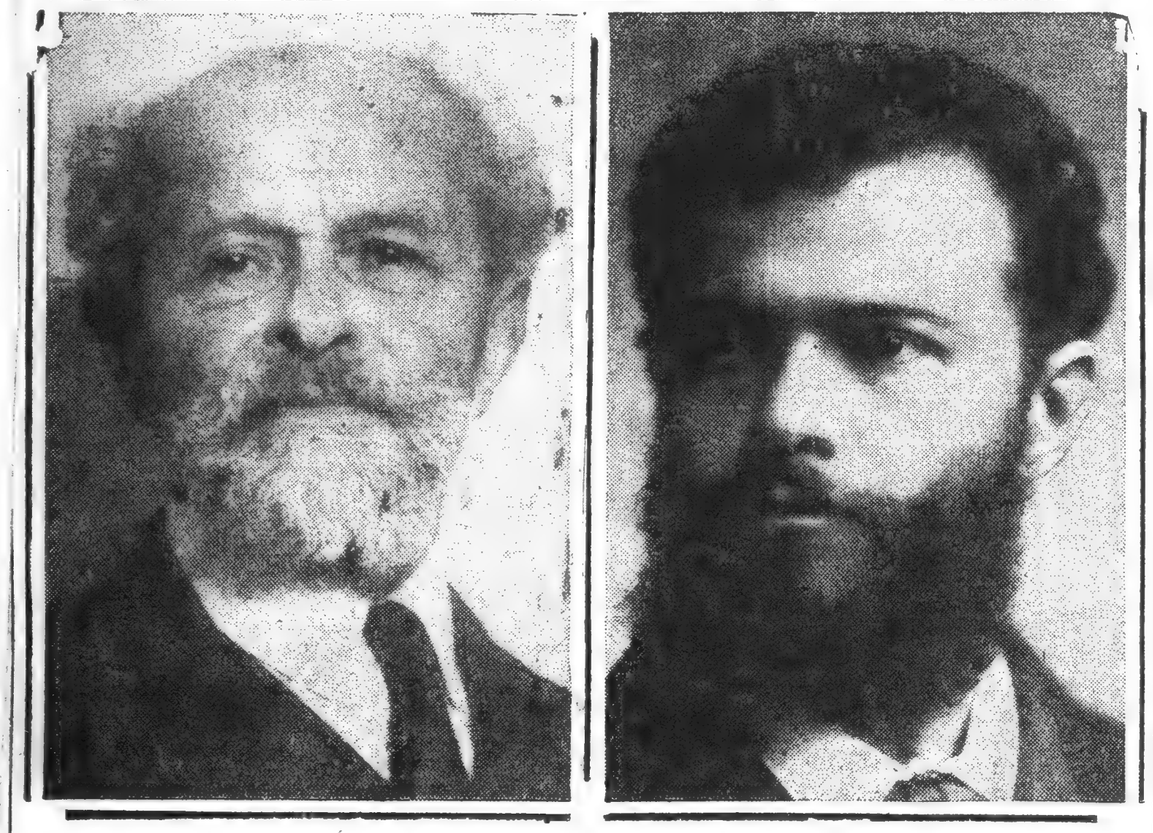
Uncle Dudley.

24

America First—BOSTON SUNDAY ADVERTISER—Largest Sunday

Symphony's First Leader Is Marvel to All

At 80, Sir George Henschel Still Very Active



SIR GEORGE HENSCHEL, 80-year-old Symphony Orchestra conductor, as he looks today (on right) and as he looked 50 years ago when he led the first public concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Man Who Led First Concert Here 50 Years Ago Repeats His Success

By ALEX WARBURTON

A great celebration was being enacted at Symphony Hall during the week just passed, for the Boston Symphony Orchestra was inaugurating the 50th year of its history. But for an 80-year-old man and some of his friends there was something more—there was drama.

The concert-going public, which buys every seat in the hall in advance of the season, is sentimentally aroused by the fact that the man who was its first conductor came back, at the invitation of the trustees, almost fifty years later, to conduct the opening pair of concerts on Friday afternoon and last night. It was "wonderful" that he should be alive on this occasion, and be able to raise a baton.

But for Sir George Henschel, for many years a resident of England, where he is still a semi-practicing musician, the week is more than a passing show. It is the culmination of a brilliant career, a logical and deserved tribute to the first artistic builder of what is now a magnificent and world-famous structure—the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Eloquent Shrugs

And yet—such is the genuine simplicity of the man—he would waive this praise aside. And he actually did, when Serge Koussevitzky, the orchestra's present conductor, uttered such sentiments before the assembled audiences at the opening concerts. Sir George's shrugs were eloquent. They seemed to say what he had himself said when he landed in Boston a week ago.

"It is Henry Lee Higginson who was Boston's great benefactor, who made possible this great orchestra."

The simplicity, the gentle humor of this man, mellowed by experience, is evident as he poses for a photograph, without fuss and fuming. It is evident as, at a rehearsal, he spurs his men on to their best performance. His tone is not domineering. He does not command. But he imparts his wishes, he makes contagious his excitement with the music at hand.

This man of eighty has not yet sung his swan song. As he rehearses his men you see clearly that he is still the practicing, sensitive conductor, knowing what he wants, and generally getting it. The men sitting under him marvelled first of all at his exuberant vitality, then even more at his keen musical brain, which has not lost its edge with the passage of time.

Going over the score of an aria that Margaret Matzenauer is singing with orchestral accompaniment, he takes only a moment to grasp a discrepancy between her piano arrangement and his own orchestral score; another moment to tell the musicians what change to make; and a few seconds to realize that they had not understood his English vernacular, and to make the correction in "American." And with it all goes a smile.

As he stands before his assembled audiences he relieves what threatens to be a solemn occasion by being apparently the most unconcerned person present. There is no pose, no desire to center attention upon himself. He mixes easily with the men of the orchestra; takes his bows modestly, unassumingly; fends off the applause as much as he can.

A kindly man, he talks to you of his friends, not of himself. For he still has a few friends left from the old days of '81. Arthur Foote, Boston composer, is one of them. Sixty persons have written to him at Symphony Hall to say they heard his first concert a half-century ago. Four of his original players, now retired from the orchestra, were on stage to greet him last night.

Knew Brahms

What memories! Memories of those three years when he was shaping the orchestra, when the success of the venture with the public was surprisingly great and prompt, while the critics "roasted" the young German musician. Ridicule and abuse were hurled at him, an one writer parodied on his name: "Eggshel Concert; Conductor, Henor Eggshel."

And Sir George's answer? "All this deluge of abuse affected Mr. Higginson and me as water does the proverbial back of a duck . . . I was greatly amused."

His memories go back more than fifty years of concerts in England and the continent, as well as America. They include a changed picture of musical England, with orchestral music of the best type becoming ever better and more widely known, just as has been true in the same period in America.

Memories of his friendship with the great Johannes Brahms, when that man was being vilified by Wagnerians, or classed as a bore by critics and public alike. And all the while Henschel was championing, for him, propagandizing for him, forcing people to listen to—and like—his music. Memories of Wagner and Liszt, of Clara Schumann and Richter, of Bruch and Sullivan. . . .

Yet, at eighty, he plans to broadcast concerts. Memories are not enough for this man.

Boston
SUNDAY

"SYMPHONY DOMESTIC"

WHAT is this long line of people doing here in the city street? They stand motionless in bleak weather, an icy wind drawing down the avenue. Out of a gray sky fall flurries of snow, yet they do not seem to mind. They chat contentedly. Traffic roars. They are quite indifferent. Some read, some study; some, having brought cushions, sit on the stone steps of the imposing hall, feet tucked up under them like setting hens and as composedly. Are they poor people waiting for a soup kitchen to open? Apparently not. For although some of them are poorly dressed others look quite well-to-do, and neither is there distinction of race, color, nationality, age, sex, or previous condition of servitude. All sorts are here, from Yankee to Japanese. Then why do they loiter on this corner in serene good humor, often in high spirits? They are waiting to pay a trifling sum, enter the hall, and hear an orchestra play two symphonies and a concerto with violin soloist, and glad of the chance! This is the genuine cultural democracy, and if you have a guest who asks to be shown one of the unique institutions of Boston take him to the "rush line" any Friday afternoon from October to April at Symphony Hall. Your guest will see a dress rehearsal of the queue waiting outside the gates of the celestial city.

* * *

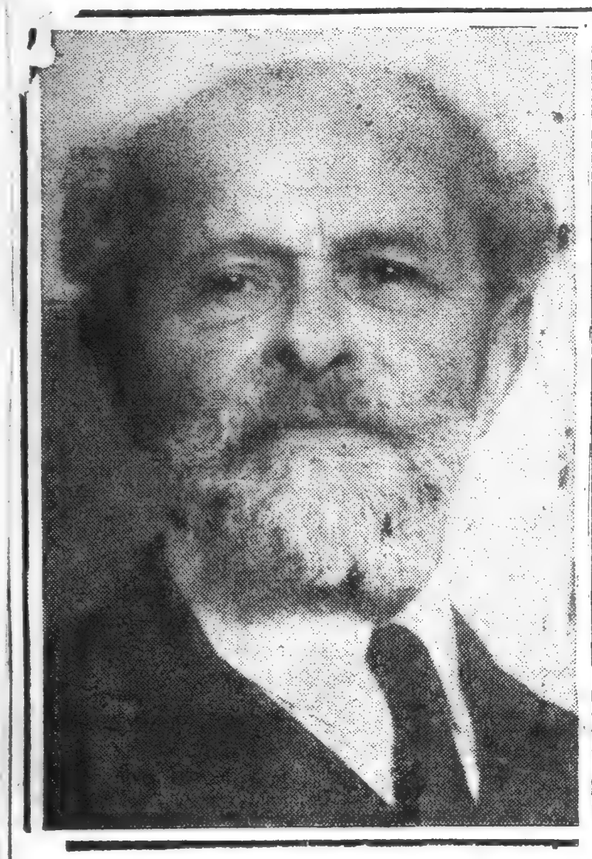
This Autumn our orchestra is half a century old. Its history has been recited in these columns, but more significant than the orchestra's age is its effect upon the life of the city. The obvious one is that it has helped create a numerous and fastidious musical public and fostered a taste which has beneficently seeped through into the multitude of our houses of learning, while notably it has sustained the profession of musical criticism in our press at a level of integrity and scholarship hard to match elsewhere in the United States outside of New York. But these are surface effects. In higher coin of the realm just what do we as a community owe to the Symphony Orchestra?

If you will dig diligently in the biographies of exceptional persons you are likely to find that at some impressionable period, often at a very early age, they came into contact with a personality, a book, a monument, a landscape, a work of art or of music, or an heroic deed that was the best of its kind. They saw for a brief space what life at its highest can be. Never thereafter were they as they had been before. Their inner worlds were changed and they then devoted the remainders of their lives to changing their outer worlds so as to bring the two more nearly into harmony. John Masefield reads Geoffrey Chaucer's "Canterbury Tales" in a New York barroom and becomes poet laureate of England; Abraham Lincoln fishes a copy of Blackstone out of a barrel of books bought at auction and is off for the Presidency; the daughter of a country parson in Yorkshire named Bronte writes, "I have seen York-

24

Symphony's First Leader Is Marvel to All

At 80, Sir George Henschel Still Very Active



SIR GEORGE HENSCHEL, 80-year-old Symphony Orchestra conductor, as he looks today (on right) and as he looked 50 years ago when he led the first public concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Man Who Led First Concert Here 50 Years Ago Repeats His Success

By ALEX WARBURTON

A great celebration was being enacted at Symphony Hall during the week just passed, for the Boston Symphony Orchestra was inaugurating the 50th year of its history. But for an 80-year-old man and some of his friends there was something more—there was drama.

The concert-going public, which buys every seat in the hall in advance of the season, is sentimentally aroused by the fact that the man who was its first conductor came back, at the invitation of the trustees, almost fifty years later, to conduct the opening pair of concerts on Friday afternoon and last night. It was "wonderful" that he should be alive on this occasion, and be able to raise a baton.

But for Sir George Henschel, for many years a resident of England, where he is still a semi-practicing musician, the week is more than a passing show. It is the culmination of a brilliant career, a logical and deserved tribute to the first artistic builder of what is now a magnificent and world-famous structure—the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Eloquent Shrugs

And yet—such is the genuine simplicity of the man—he would waive this praise aside. And he actually did, when Serge Koussevitzky, the orchestra's present conductor, uttered such sentiments before the assembled audiences at the opening concerts. Sir George's shrugs were eloquent. They seemed to say what he had himself said when he landed in Boston a week ago.

"It is Henry Lee Higginson who was Boston's great benefactor, who made possible this great orchestra."

The simplicity, the gentle humor of this man, mellowed by experience, is evident as he poses for a photograph, without fuss and fuming. It is evident as, at a rehearsal, he spurs his men on to their best performance. His tone is not domineering. He does not command. But he imparts his wishes, he makes contagious his excitement with the music at hand.

This man of eighty has not yet sung his swan song. As he rehearses his men you see clearly that he is still the practicing, sensitive conductor, knowing what he wants, and generally getting it. The men sitting under him marvelled first of all at his exuberant vitality, then even more at his keen musical brain, which has not lost its edge with the passage of time.

Going over the score of an aria that Margaret Matzenauer is singing with orchestral accompaniment, he takes only a moment to grasp a discrepancy between her piano arrangement and his own orchestral score; another moment to tell the musicians what change to make; and a few seconds to realize that they had not understood his English vernacular, and to make the correction in "American." And with it all goes a smile.

As he stands before his assembled audiences he relieves what threatens to be a solemn occasion by being apparently the most unconcerned person present. There is no pose, no desire to center attention upon himself. He mixes easily with the men of the orchestra; takes his bows modestly, unassumingly; fends off the applause as much as he can.

A kindly man, he talks to you of his friends, not of himself. For he still has a few friends left from the old days of '81. Arthur Foote, Boston composer, is one of them. Sixty persons have written to him at Symphony Hall to say they heard his first concert a half-century ago. Four of his original players, now retired from the orchestra, were on stage to greet him last night.

Knew Brahms

What memories! Memories of those three years when he was shaping the orchestra, when the success of the venture with the public was surprisingly great and prompt, while the critics "roasted" the young German musician. Ridicule and abuse were hurled at him, an one writer parodied on his name: "Eggshel Concert; Conductor, Henor Eggshel."

And Sir George's answer? "All this deluge of abuse affected Mr. Higginson and me as water does the proverbial back of a duck . . . I was greatly amused."

His memories go back more than fifty years of concerts in England and the continent, as well as America. They include a changed picture of musical England, with orchestral music of the best type becoming ever better and more widely known, just as has been true in the same period in America.

Memories of his friendship with the great Johannes Brahms, when that man was being vilified by Wagnerians, or classed as a bore by critics and public alike. And all the while Henschel was championing for him, propagandizing for him, forcing people to listen to—and like—his music. Memories of Wagner and Liszt, of Clara Schumann and Richter, of Bruch and Sullivan. . . .

Yet, at eighty, he plans to broadcast concerts. Memories are not enough for this man.

Boston Sunday Globe

SUNDAY, OCTOBER 12, 1930

"SYMPHONY DOMESTIC"

WHAT is this long line of people doing here in the city street? They stand motionless in bleak weather, an icy wind drawing down the avenue. Out of a gray sky fall flurries of snow, yet they do not seem to mind. They chat contentedly. Traffic roars. They are quite indifferent. Some read, some study; some, having brought cushions, sit on the stone steps of the imposing hall, feet tucked up under them like setting hens and as composedly. Are they poor people waiting for a soup kitchen to open? Apparently not. For although some of them are poorly dressed others look quite well-to-do, and neither is there distinction of race, color, nationality, age, sex or previous condition of servitude. All sorts are here, from Yankee to Japanese. Then why do they loiter on this corner in serene good humor often in high spirits? They are waiting to pay a trifling sum, enter the hall, and hear an orchestra play two symphonies and a concerto with violin soloist, and glad of the chance! This is the genuine cultural democracy, and if you have a guest who asks to be shown one of the unique institutions of Boston take him to the "rush line" any Friday afternoon from October to April at Symphony Hall. Your guest will see a dress rehearsal and the queue waiting outside the gate of the celestial city.

* * *

This Autumn our orchestra is half a century old. Its history has been recited in these columns, but more significant than the orchestra's past is its effect upon the life of the city. The obvious one is that it has helped create a numerous and fastidious musical public and fostered a taste which has beneficently seeped through into the multitude of our houses of learning, while notably it has sustained the profession of musical criticism in our press at a level of integrity and scholarship hard to match elsewhere in the United States outside of New York. But these are surface effects. In higher coin of the realm just what do we as a community owe to the Symphony Orchestra?

If you will dig diligently in the biographies of exceptional persons you are likely to find that at some impressionable period, often at a very early age, they came into contact with a personality, a book, a monument, a landscape, a work of art or of music, or an heroic deed that was the best of its kind. They saw for a brief space what life at its highest can be. Never thereafter were they as they had been before. Their inner worlds were changed and they then devoted the remainders of their lives to changing their outer worlds so as to bring the two more nearly into harmony. John Masefield reads Geoffrey Chaucer's "Canterbury Tales" in a New York barroom and becomes poet laureate of England; Abraham Lincoln fishes a copy of Blackstone out of a barrel of books bought at auction and is off for the Presidency; the daughter of a country parson in Yorkshire named Bronte writes, "I have seen York-is, heard) repeatedly in order to be fully enjoyed and understood. Good music will bear 20 times the repetition that even the best poetry can endure—indeed, cannot be properly grasped without it; and here again the inculcation of a discriminating taste among books of printed sound has a beneficial effect upon one's whole mental organism, for such music soothes; it gives release from the tensions of everyday wear and tear; it provides an emergency exit into an ideal world where one can find peace and joy; it introduces into the seeming chaos of daily events a realm of order, a law of rhythm, and a harmony which cause our perplexing affairs to fall into their properly subordinate places, to take back seats where they belong, to hold their idle tongues as they should, and mind their manners in the presence of their betters.

* * *

Perhaps in eulogizing as mundane and as expensive an institution as the Boston Symphony Orchestra the credit balance set down above may strike practically minded persons as highly metaphysical. No doubt, no doubt! Yet one seems to recall that spirituality in any kind is a highly metaphysical value and that when speaking of such music as the Symphony Orchestra plays we are speaking of more than art. We are speaking of religion.

Uncle Dudley.

NEW ATIO
s Largest Exclusive R
DEP
• AT THE • ATISFACTION PURCHASI
Gardner—272 Central St.
Haverhill—20 Fleet St.
Lawrence—229 Broadway
Lynn—5 Market St.
Quincy—1253 Hancock St.

NEWS AND COMMENT OF THE CURF

HENSCHEL'S RETURN

The First Conductor—Past and Present of The Boston Symphony Orchestra

By OLIN DOWNES.

THERE is more than local interest and significance in the return to Boston of Sir George Henschel to conduct last Friday afternoon and yesterday evening the opening pair of concerts of the fiftieth anniversary season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The sentiment which attaches to the occasion and which is warm in Boston today is caused less by Sir George's fame as an orchestral leader than by the character of the man and the fact that he led one of the most famous orchestras of the world through the first three years of its rise to rank and international repute.

It was George Henschel, pianist, singer, teacher, composer and conductor of sorts, whose presence in Boston and prowess as conductor of a concert of the Harvard Musical Association persuaded Henry L. Higginson that he had found the leader needed to develop a permanent orchestra in his native city. Without Henschel the dream of a Boston Symphony Orchestra might have waited much longer than it did to become reality. Now, half a century from the time of the beginnings of the organization, has come the hour when the first conductor, who is 80 years of age, and the orchestra can again join forces, to the edification of the august public assembled. Great has been the joy and honor of the observance. But there is a wider import to the business, because, although there are older American orchestras than the Boston Symphony, and the oldest of them in this city, it was the creation of the Boston organization and the standards of orchestral performance which it soon enforced that marked a new period in the whole musical life of America and one fraught with significance for its whole future.

* * *

THE New York Philharmonic Orchestra, now the Philharmonic-Symphony, is the oldest permanent orchestra in America, having begun its career in 1842. The New York Symphony Orchestra, which amalgamated with the Philharmonic three seasons ago, dates from 1878. The Chicago Symphony Orchestra, though its origins were early, was not established till 1891, when it became known as the Chicago Orchestra, a continuation of former orchestral concerts given by Theodore Thomas in the mid-Western city. After the founding of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the position it attained in the first ten years of its existence as one of the finest orchestras in the world there sprang up the symphony orchestras of Cincinnati in 1895, Los Angeles in 1897, Minneapolis in 1903, St. Louis in 1907, San Francisco in 1909, Detroit in 1914, Cleveland in 1918, the symphony orchestra of Rochester and many other bodies of lesser dimensions which have contributed impressively to the orchestral advance in which this country is outdistancing other parts of the world. The two oldest symphony orchestras of New York and the orchestra of Thomas which eventually crystallized into the Chicago Symphony were the organizations which carried symphonic music and made it known through the United States before the Boston Symphony reinforced them on the Eastern coast. But it was the Boston Orchestra, with its wise, far-seeing and preeminently idealistic policies, which gave the stamp of the highest excellence to symphonic performance in this country, and which was the first to gain recognition—without a European tour to advertise it—from Europe. And the first drill-master of that orchestra was George Henschel.

* * *

MR. HENSCHEL, roughly handled by the Boston critics, and no doubt with considerable reason, since he was an inexperienced and unskilled leader when he took the baton for Mr. Higginson, gave place in due season to a series of great conductors. He was succeeded after his third season, in the Winter of 1884-1885, by Wilhelm Gericke, who by his capacities as drill-master and musician of extraordinary sensitiveness of ear brought the organization to a state of technical and tonal supremacy which has not been surpassed in Boston or elsewhere. Gericke was followed by Arthur Nikisch and Emil Paur. Gericke then returned, to be followed in the season of 1906-1907 by Karl Muck, then by Max Fiedler, Muck again, Henri Rabaud, Pierre Monteux, and, since 1924, Mr. Koussevitzky. Orchestral standards and repertory have advanced since 1881 to a place which could not have been conceived of in Mr. Henschel's dreams. But the early principles upon which the Boston Symphony was founded and under which it has been developed have not been changed despite the modest beginnings.

Henschel came to Boston with a letter of introduction from Robert Browning to Charles Perkins, and another from Lord Houghton to Longfellow. The Boston Orchestra, when newly assembled, numbered sixty. Its ranks were recruited principally from those of the Harvard Musical Association, described by the visiting virtuoso, Ovide Musin, as "a fortuitous aggregation of heterogeneous elements." The standards of orchestral discipline in 1881 may be inferred by the solemn words of admonition and warning issued by Mr. Henschel to his musicians:

Let us be punctual. Better ten minutes before than one behind the time appointed.

Tuning will cease the moment the conductor gives the signal for doing so.

No member of the orchestra, even if his presence be not needed for the moment, will leave the hall during the time of the rehearsals and concerts without the consent of the conductor

The folios containing the parts will be closed after each rehearsal and concert.

Inasmuch as we are engaged for musical purposes we will not talk of private matters during rehearsals and concerts.

These precepts and rulings are now part of the routine of all professional orchestral bodies, but it is evident that they were novel and in need of emphasis at the founding of the Boston Symphony.

Mr. Henschel in the course of his memoirs, "Musings and Memories of a Musician," gives us further details of his work. "Being absolutely my own master as regards the orchestra and its work, I tried several experiments in the way of placing the orchestra, dividing, for instance, the strings into equal halves on my right and left, with the object of enabling the listeners on either side of the hall to have the full effect of the whole string quintet. These experiments I submitted in letters, illustrated by diagrams, to Brahms, who most kindly, in his answers, commented upon their practicability or otherwise. 'But,' he writes on one occasion, 'by far the best feature in your arrangements of the orchestra is the fact that no committee will be sitting in front of it. There is not a kapellmeister on the whole of our continent who would not envy you that.'"

In making his programs Mr. Henschel, who, if his abilities as conductor were severely handled by the press, was unconditionally recognized as program maker of the first rank, was guided, if you please, by the principles of good drama laid down by Gustav Freytag.

Sir George's first program, given on Oct. 22, 1881, was scheduled to be repeated, with the exception of one composition, at the concerts of Friday afternoon and last night in Boston, and was as follows: Beethoven, overture, "Consecration of the House"; Gluck, aria, "Che faro senza Eurydice"; Haydn, Symphony in B flat (B. & H. No. 12); Schubert, ballet music from "Rosamunde"; Bruch, "Penelope's Lament"; Weber, "Festival" overture. The exception noted was the substitution of Wagner's "Meistersinger" prelude for Weber's overture. The place of Anna Louise Cary was announced to be taken by Margarete Matzenauer.

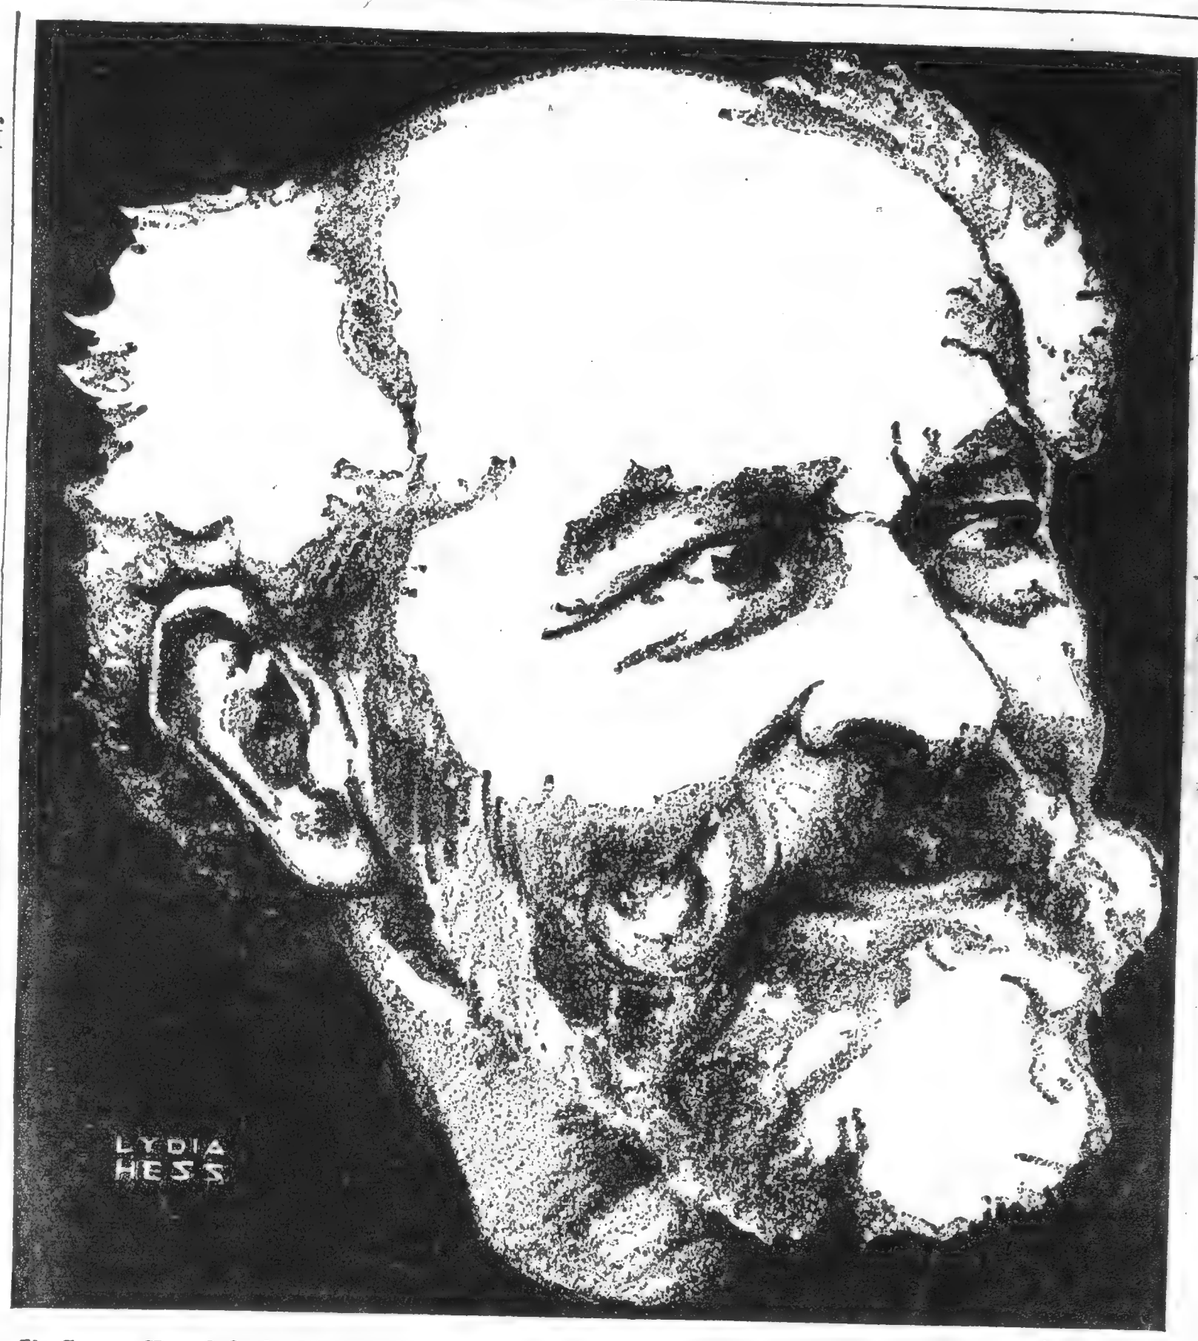
* * *

AMONG "first performances" under Henschel's directorship were Cowen's "Scandinavian" symphony, which probably no one of the younger generation of symphony audiences or critics has heard, at least in this country; Volkmann's Second Symphony; Raff's "Winter" symphony. In 1911 William Foster Apthorp, writing for The Boston Transcript about the early years of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, mentioned as the principal novelties of enduring worth produced by Henschel Chadwick's "Thalia" overture, Bizet's "Roma," Brahms's "Tragic" overture and music from Wagner's "Parsifal." It will be seen that the first two of this list have been virtually forgotten. The work of Mr. Chadwick's early period which survives is not his "Thalia" but his "Melpomene" overture, which should be more often played, and it is probable that a good quarter of the compositions which made the programs of the first three seasons of the Boston Symphony repertory have been consigned to the outer darkness. To how many does the name of Volkmann even occur today? Where is Raff? We would fain hear again his "Leonore" symphony, with the march that so stirred the breast of the heroine of "The First Violin." Bizet's "Roma" is now café music. And there are greater ones that vanished. Where is Rubinstein in the modern orchestral repertory? The list could be lengthily extended. A great event was the performance of Dvorak's First Symphony. There were references to the "cacaphonous dreariness of Wagner," and a Brahms movement was labeled "the sapient musings of some brilliant idiot."

* * *

MR. HENSCHEL returned to Europe, whence Clara Schumann had written in tones of shocked inquiry. "Do you want to forsake Europe altogether? You can imagine how the news of your having accepted for a second year astonishes me, and how much I, and doubtless many with me, deplore it. What will Brahms say to it?" Good heavens! What would Brahms say to it? It is not exactly the condition today. Find the composer or musician in Europe who will not announce it as matter for rejoicing to family and friends that he has a good American engagement in his pocket.

Further tokens of the times might be read into the return of George Henschel—who, by the way, taught In New York as late as 1905 at the Institute of Musical Art. But there has been enough "interpretation" of his visit, with its many reminders and its admonitions of the passage of time and the mortality of many things. The things that do not pass are the fellowship of men who labor in a great cause, and all that Major Higginson and the sincere and admirable musician accomplished for the good of their fellow-citizens, the advancement of human understanding and the glory of art.



Sir George Henschel, the First Conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1881, Who Directed the Opening Concerts of the Orchestra's Fiftieth Anniversary.

COMPOSER AND PIANIST SPEAK

ALBERT ROUSSEL, who, at the age of 61 has nevertheless a position in the vanguard of contemporaneous French music, landed in New York last week to make a short American visit, attend Mrs. Elizabeth Coolidge's festival of chamber music which begins today in Chicago, and also to present himself as guest of honor at the first performances of his new symphony by Mr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Boston, on the 24th and 25th of this month. The present visit of Mr. Roussel is the prelude to a longer visit already arranged for next season. His symphony is one of the new works ordered by Mr. Koussevitzky and the directors of the Boston Symphony as a special feature of its fiftieth anniversary season.

Mr. Roussel has been longer than some composers in coming into his own. It is an enormous tribute to him that although he only commenced the serious study of composition at the age of 25 he is now one of the most finished musical workmen of his period, and that, in spite of his years, he stands in the forefront of French music and exemplifies some of its latest tendencies today. Roussel's development as a composer went on under serious handicaps. The position of marine officer in the French Navy preceded his definite decision to spend his life as a composer. At the same time these years on the sea, spent principally in eastern climes, had undoubtedly a strong effect upon his imagination. Much later in life, as automobile driver at the front (including Verdun and the Marne), through the four years of the war his art suffered an interruption of a kind and an extent which would have concluded the creative labors of a less concentrated and virile character. Today Mr. Roussel presents the picture of a slight, dark-complexioned, rather shy and nervous but incisive personality, a man of exceptional and real modesty, one whose views of his art are those of today, tempered with a degree of moderation and perspective which is hardly attained save with years.

* * *

ASKED if he believed that the harmonic material of music would change in the years before us, Mr. Roussel expressed his doubt of this taking place. "For the present, at least," he said, "I believe all the 'chords' have been written. Something remains to be done, it is true, by the critics and teachers of musical theory. They have still to completely systematize and explain the latest harmonic and contrapuntal developments. These things are the work of the theorists, and modern composition has given them much to digest.

"Contrapuntal development is another matter. Under this head, of course, we logically include polytonality and atonality. Polytonality, which is a counterpoint of keys as well as melodic lines, I believe in—when it defines tonality! Why not? Polytonal effects, when two or more keys are heard at the same time, are, under circumstances of clear thinking and genuine inspiration, wholly natural, logical, artistic if properly applied. But I do not consider these musical media properly applied if they destroy the sensation of key. When the key of a composition is firmly established, the counterpoint may well bring together and cause to clash two or more keys. I feel that if the sensation of a fundamental key or tonality is not present the composer has failed.

Atonality I cannot feel or believe in, as it represents the relinquishment of tonality. And yet I have seen Alban Berg's "Wozzek," which is purely atonal in workmanship and style, and I must say that I was impressed. Possibly atonalism—the negation of tonality—is more appropriate in the theatre, where sudden dramatic effects have to be made, than in the concert room. Anyhow, 'Wozzek' is a remarkable and very impressive score. 'Wozzek' is against my ideas of music, but 'Wozzek' is a work of a form; a manner and inspiration all its own. Ergo, we composers have principally to do one thing: hold to our faith, labor with care and conscience and continue our appointed way."

26

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT
OCT 1 2 1930

Sharps and Flats

By Pierre Key

George Henschel Arrives.

Nearly Everyone who is interested in matters symphonic knows who Gorge Henschel is—they call him "Sir," now since King George knighted him. But some fifty years ago this distinguished musician was called to be the first conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Responding he started that great organization on its way, in addition to which his singing, with his wife Lillian Henschel, appealed to those familiar with such things as about "the last word."

Sir George returned to this country the other day; yet his long absence did not dim the warmth of his reception. Older, of course, than when he led the first Boston Symphony—and looking it. Still, he was moderately spry, and his handclasp is no puny affair.

Henschel will participate in the fiftieth anniversary of the Beantown orchestra, his share consisting chiefly in his conducting of the two concerts scheduled within a few days after the typing oif these lines.

Music Mill Grinding.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
REPUBLICAN
OCT 1 2 1930

Boston Symphony's 50th Year

The Boston Symphony orchestra, which, despite some vicissitudes, has retained its position as one of the world's half-dozen greatest orchestras (most of which, by the way, are now in America) and one of the nation's leading cultural institutions, is now beginning its 50th season. While strictly the 50th anniversary does not occur until the present season has been completed, the first concert having been on October 22, 1881, the programs for this season have been arranged with commemorative purpose, and the opening concerts the past week were especially notable because they were conducted by Sir George Henschel, who—known then as Georg Henschel—conducted the first concert ever given by the orchestra 49 years ago. With one exception the program of October 22, 1881, was repeated on the program of the past week.

"Here is Sir George, amazingly 'buoyant, enthusiastic, virile," wrote Philip Hale, and the public cannot fail to respond to the sentimental interest of a spirited and well-preserved musician of 80 years crossing the Atlantic to lead the orchestra which he as a young man of 30 launched on its memorable career. Externally a tribute to this man of Polish descent, most of his life a naturalized Briton, the occasion was no less a tribute to the late Maj Higginson, whose wealth and devotion to music made the Boston Symphony orchestra one of Boston's supreme achievements. Among celebrations which this year have drawn attention to Boston this one is not the least significant.

THIS CLIPPING FROM DALLAS, TEX.
NEWS

Boston Symphony Under First Maestro

When the Boston Symphony Orchestra opened its fiftieth season on Friday, the guest conductor of the occasion was Sir George Henschel who led the first concert of the organization a half century ago and was the regular conductor during its first four years of existence.

Steuart Wilson. A fine dramatic soprano voice also was heard in that of the statuesque Milo Miloradovich.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. Herald Tribune
OCT 1 2 1930

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, which opened its home season in Symphony Hall last Friday and Saturday, when its first conductor, Sir George Henschel, conducted the program, except for one number given in the inaugural concert of 1881, gives its second pair of concerts next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening under its regular conductor, Serge Koussevitsky.

In this week's Symphony Hal. appearance, Dr. Koussevitzky will conduct one of the numbers written for the orchestra's semi-centennial season, an ode for orchestra and chorus, composed to Robert Hillyer's text by Edward Burlingame Hill, a member of Harvard University's music department. Other specially commissioned works to be performed during the season for the first time include a Psalm Symphony by Igor Stravinsky, symphonies by Albert Roussel, Arthur Honegger, Serge Prokofieff and Professor Hill, a symphonic ode by Aaron Copland, a piano concerto by Arnold Bax and shorter works by Ravel, Dukas, Hindemith and Sibelius. Among other modern numbers to be heard are works by Arthur Lourié, Nabokoff, Trebinsky and Ferroud.

Special features of the Boston Symphony's season include a Beethoven festival to be given in Washington in the first week of December, and a Bach festival to be given in Boston next spring in honor of the orchestra's founder, Major Henry L. Higginson.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TIMES
OCT 1 21930

COMPOSER AND PIANIST SPEAK

ALBERT ROUSSEL, who, at the age of 61 has nevertheless a position in the vanguard of contemporaneous French music, landed in New York last week to make a short American visit, attend Mrs. Elizabeth Coolidge's festival of chamber music which begins today in Chicago, and also to present himself as guest of honor at the first performances of his new symphony by Mr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Boston, on the 24th and 25th of this month. The present visit of Mr. Roussel is the prelude to a longer visit already arranged for next season. His symphony is one of the new works ordered by Mr. Koussevitzky and the directors of the Boston Symphony as a special feature of its fiftieth anniversary season.

Mr. Roussel has been longer than some composers in coming into his own. It is an enormous tribute to him that although he only commenced the serious study of composition at the age of 25 he is now one of the most finished musical workmen of his period, and that, in spite of his years, he stands in the forefront of French music and exemplifies some of its latest tendencies today. Roussel's development as a composer went on under serious handicaps. The position of marine officer in the French Navy preceded his definite decision to spend his life as a composer. At the same time these years on the sea, spent principally in eastern climes, had undoubtedly a strong effect upon his imagination. Much later in life, as automobile driver at the front (including Verdun and the Marne), through the four years of the war his art suffered an interruption of a kind and an extent which would have concluded the creative labors of a less concentrated and virile character. Today Mr. Roussel presents the picture of a slight, dark-complexioned, rather shy and nervous but incisive personality, a man of exceptional and real modesty, one whose views of his art are those of today, tempered with a degree of moderation and perspective which is hardly attained save with years.

* * *

ASKED if he believed that the harmonic material of music would change in the years before us, Mr. Roussel expressed his doubt of this taking place. "For the present, at least," he said, "I believe all the 'chords' have been written. Something remains to be done, it is true, by the critics and teachers of musical theory. They have still to completely systematize and explain the latest harmonic and contrapuntal developments. These things are the work of the theorists, and modern composition has given them much to digest.

"Contrapuntal development is another matter. Under this head, of course, we logically include polytonality and atonality. Polytonality, which is a counterpoint of keys as well as melodic lines, I believe in—when it defines tonality! Why not? Polytonal effects, when two or more keys are heard at the same time, are, under circumstances of clear thinking and genuine inspiration, wholly natural, logical, artistic if properly applied. But I do not consider these musical media properly applied if they destroy the sensation of key. When the key of a composition is firmly established, the counterpoint may well bring together and cause to clash two or more keys. I feel that if the sensation of a fundamental key or tonality is not present the composer has failed.

Atonality I cannot feel or believe in, as it represents the relinquishment of tonality. And yet I have seen Alban Berg's "Wozzek," which is purely atonal in workmanship and style, and I must say that I was impressed. Possibly atonalism—the negation of tonality—is more appropriate in the theatre, where sudden dramatic effects have to be made, than in the concert room. Anyhow, 'Wozzek' is a remarkable and very impressive score. 'Wozzek' is against my ideas of music, but 'Wozzek' is a work of a form, a manner and inspiration all its own. Ergo, we composers have principally to do one thing: hold to our faith, labor with care and conscience and continue our appointed way."

THIS CLIPPING FROM NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
MERCURY
OCT 1 3 1930

A very interesting event occurred in Boston last week which compensated for the disrepute that came to the city in the manifestations of lawlessness in the Massachusetts capital. The Boston Symphony Orchestra celebrated its fiftieth anniversary. A picturesque incident was the fact that Sir George Henschel, the first conductor, led the orchestra. There was curiosity concerning the personality of the leader who would resume the baton at the age of eighty-one. The black-whiskered Henschel was not to be forgotten. We recall his appearances in New Bedford at the time, with his orchestra on one or two occasions, but rather in concert. Henschel had a baritone voice and gave voice recitals here with Mrs. Henschel who used to turn a languishing face to his as they sang their songs of Arcady, or wherever it was they loved. But the audience saw nothing of senility in the sound and sturdy man with a military set-up and enthusiasm in his eyes albeit gray whiskers who conducted the great orchestra built upon the corner stone of the structure he had raised through the financing and zest of Major Higginson.

To indicate how long ago it was when Henschel came to Boston, it may be related that he brought a letter of introduction from Robert Browning to Charles Perkins and another from Lord Houghton to Henry W. Longfellow. Henschel was a pianist as well as a singer, a composer and a conductor, and it was his success as conductor of the Harvard Musical Association that led Major Higginson to decide that he had found a leader who would carry out his dream of a Boston Symphony Orchestra which would do for Boston what the great orchestras of Europe did for their respective cities.

In the audience Friday afternoon where she has been a figure for fifty years, sat Mrs. Henry Lee Higginson, now ninety-two years old, bearing a bouquet of roses, a patron of the art her husband loved, whose fortune endowed and whose enthusiasm kept alive this great musical organization. And there were others present who heard the first concert and came from their homes on the venerable streets. Sir George kissed several of the old ladies on the cheek, and greeted their sons and daughters and grandsons and granddaughters who have received the legacy of the founders.

THIS CLIPPING FROM TIME
OCT 13 1930

a subtle change has come to pass. Symphony concerts have become the height of fashion. Symphonic tastes are being cultivated. Subscriptions are at a premium. Last week as fashionable a gathering as ever attended opera gathered for the first concert of the New York Philharmonic-Symphony. Yet not Conductor Arturo Toscanini, whose administration is in large measure responsible for the current Philharmonic vogue, but a henchman chosen by him last spring in Germany (TIME, June 16) held the baton. His name: Erich Kleiber. His home: Berlin, where he is director of the Staatsoper on Unter den Linden.

Weber's Freischütz Overture, an unknown Mozart serenade, Beethoven's Eighth Symphony, Richard Strauss' Till Eulenspiegel—this was the conventional program with which Kleiber chose to introduce himself to the U. S. By hearsay most members of his audience knew him to be a charming, unassuming person, born in Vienna, educated in Prague (where privation robbed him of his hair), trained in the opera houses of Darmstadt, Barmen-Elberfeld, Düsseldorf, Mannheim. They knew him to have a pretty U. S. wife, a former Ruth Goodrich of California whom he met three years ago in Buenos Aires when he was conducting at the Colón and she was attached to the U. S. Embassy there. They had heard of his penchant for photography, his admiration for Napoleon, Nikisch, Toscanini; of his open-mindedness toward all new music. Yet personal detail holds scant interest if a conductor's music is uninspired. To their regret, through the Freischütz and the Mozart, the Philharmonic's subscribers could not refrain from reckoning the weeks until Toscanini's return in November. But the Beethoven was more compelling and the Strauss earned the newcomer an ovation.

Critics were unconvinced. They were amused that Conductor Kleiber looks like a sturdy, militant edition of their colleague, Samuel Chotzinoff of the New York World. Their verdict was of the kindly, noncommittal sort, as if they realized the unfairness of trying to fit a merely capable musician to the seven-league boots worn so easily by the giant Toscanini.

In Philadelphia subscribers were meticulously prompt for the opening of the 31st season. They had been warned that last year's system would prevail: doors would be closed at the beginning of the concert, none admitted until the lights went up for intermission. Last year this decree caused considerable dissatisfaction among subscribers. Many objected to what seemed to them the high-handedness of Conductor Leopold Stokowski. Tardiness, they argued, was occasionally unavoidable, long waiting in the lobby an undeserved penance. Was it too much to expect Stokowski to follow the conventional pattern, start his program with a short number, then admit late-comers before proceeding with the rest of the concert?

As if to show his disdain for so unappreciative a herd, Stokowski began his program last week with Tchaikovsky's Fifth Symphony which takes the best part of an hour to perform. A few unfortunates were locked out, but neither Stokowski nor his audience gave them thought. He was completely absorbed in recreating long-familiar music, later in translating the Prometheus of Skriabin in which Pianist Harold Bauer was expert soloist and the Firebird Suite of Igor Stravinsky.

Thanks to the income from a $2,000,000 endowment fund, outstanding contributors to which were Orchestra President Alexander Van Rensselaer and the late Edward Bok, the Philadelphia season is a long, ambitious one this year. Stokowski will conduct the first part of the season (with the exception of the two weeks when he changes places with Toscanini), Ossip Gabrilowitsch the second part, Stokowski the last. Alexander Smallens, talented conductor of the defunct Civic Opera (TIME, Apr. 21) has been engaged as assistant. A South American tour is under consideration for spring.

In Seattle the Orchestra has followed the example of Cleveland, chosen for its new manager a woman, Bertha M. Stryker, energetic worker in the Seattle Music and Art Foundation. (Cleveland's capable orchestra manager is Adella Prentiss Hughes.) Karl Krueger, young Viennese conductor who took over the Seattle Orchestra at the time of its reorganization in 1926, again has sole command.

Detroit's opening concert was scheduled to present Ossip Gabrilowitsch as soloist as well as conductor. Associate Victor Kolar will have charge during Gabrilowitsch's tenure in Philadelphia (see above). A tour will take in several college towns.

Cleveland will begin its 13th season Oct. 16 under Conductor Nikolai Sokoloff. In January it is anticipated that the Orchestra will move into its own hall, given by John L. and the late Mrs. Severance.

Chicago, Cincinnati and Minneapolis will hear their first programs on Oct. 17. Under Conductor Frederick Stock the Chicago Symphony will give its usual series in Orchestra Hall, additional concerts in Milwaukee and at the University of Chicago. The Cincinnati Symphony points with pride to its thriving under the sponsorship of the Institute of Fine Arts (endowment scheme begun three years ago by Mrs. Charles Phelps Taft and her late husband). Minneapolis concerts under Belgian Henri Verbrugghen are to be broadcast over a nation-wide hook-up. Mrs. Carlyle Scott is this Orchestra's new manager.*

California concerts are also scheduled to begin in October. Los Angeles will have its second season under Conductor Artur Rodzinski (formerly Philadelphia Orchestra assistant), its eleventh with William Andrews Clark Jr. as sole supporter. San Francisco will have two new conductors to succeed Alfred Hertz: for the first three months, British Basil Cameron; then Russian Issai Dobrowen (recent conductor in Norway).

The Portland (Ore.) Symphony is again under Willem Van Hoogstraten.

St. Louis will have three guest conductors: Spanish Enrique Fernandez Ar-

*There has been no merger with a St. Paul orchestra as was erroneously reported in TIME. The Minneapolis Symphony used to give concerts in St. Paul but this year the series has been discontinued.

The Public Pulse

...e University.
Tribune:
...en called to
...kman in the ...n which he
...s of a state-
...vies in last
..."this is the
...nt has been
...hony orches-
...ckman will give a series of concerts at a great university."

Mr. Eckman then proceeds to state: "In this he (Dr. Davies) is in error. The Boston Symphony orchestra has, for the last 35 years given annually 10 to 12 concerts of symphony music at Harvard university."

Mr. Eckman is quite correct so far as he goes but if he had read Dr. Davies' article with more care and, if he had conscientiously read the various articles which have appeared in The Tribune since the first announcement of the orchestra's affiliation with the university, he would have realized that there is a vast difference between the course to be presented at the university this winter and the series of concerts given by the Boston Symphony at Harvard. The difference is that the Minneapolis Symphony orchestra by the new arrangement becomes part and body of the cultural activities of the University of Minnesota —that the entire physical plant of the orchestra finds housing on the university campus—that the concerts are presented by the university not merely for the faculty and student body but for the music-loving public of Minneapolis, St. Paul and the state of Minnesota as well.

The orchestra's daily rehearsals will be held in a specially prepared room in the Northrop Memorial auditorium which building will house the orchestra's exhaustive library and business offices as well. In other words, the Minneapolis Symphony orchestra becomes a part and parcel of university activities with the great difference that these concerts are for the edification and pleasure of all who wish to attend.

The faculty and student body of the university receive special consideration to the extent of a reduction in the price of season tickets, although a minimum price of $10 for a season ticket which admits to the 16 concerts remains the same for all. This price cannot possibly be beyond the limit of anyone's pocketbook and I question if Mr. Eckman can find its equal in this country especially when it includes the hearing of such world renowned artists as Paderewski and Jeritzka, who, it is well known, appear with no other symphony orchestra in this country.

I concede that the Boston orchestra appears in a series of concerts at Harvard but strictly as a visiting organization. If that is the same thing as is taking place at the University of Minnesota this winter, then I would request Mr. Eckman to restudy Dr. Davies' article and those which have preceded it.

With reference to the Boston's "Pops, that is another story, and if Mr. Eckman will have the patience to await future developments he may have cause to congratulate himself that he lives in Minneapolis which, though a much smaller and younger city, is not one whit behind Boston in the enterprise of its citizens. Given the faith and support of our public there is no limit to what our orchestra through its affiliation with the university, may yet offer to the northwest.

CARLO FISCHER,
Minneapolis.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
MERCURY
OCT 13 1930

A very interesting event occurred in Boston last week which compensated for the disrepute that came to the city in the manifestations of lawlessness in the Massachusetts capital. The Boston Symphony Orchestra celebrated its fiftieth anniversary. A picturesque incident was the fact that Sir George Henschel, the first conductor, led the orchestra. There was curiosity concerning the personality of the leader who would resume the baton at the age of eighty-one. The black-whiskered Henschel was not to be forgotten. We recall his appearances in New Bedford at the time, with his orchestra on one or two occasions, but rather in concert. Henschel had a baritone voice and gave voice recitals here with Mrs. Henschel who used to turn a languishing face to his as they sang their songs of Arcady, or wherever it was they loved. But the audience saw nothing of senility in the sound and sturdy man with a military set-up and enthusiasm in his eyes albeit gray whiskers who conducted the great orchestra built upon the corner stone of the structure he had raised through the financing and zest of Major Higginson.

To indicate how long ago it was when Henschel came to Boston, it may be related that he brought a letter of introduction from Robert Browning to Charles Perkins and another from Lord Houghton to Henry W. Longfellow. Henschel was a pianist as well as a singer, a composer and a conductor, and it was his success as conductor of the Harvard Musical Association that led Major Higginson to decide that he had found a leader who would carry out his dream of a Boston Symphony Orchestra which would do for Boston what the great orchestras of Europe did for their respective cities.

In the audience Friday afternoon where she has been a figure for fifty years, sat Mrs. Henry Lee Higginson, now ninety-two years old, bearing a bouquet of roses, a patron of the art her husband loved, whose fortune endowed and whose enthusiasm kept alive this great musical organization. And there were others present who heard the first concert and came from their homes on the venerable streets. Sir George kissed several of the old ladies on the cheek, and greeted their sons and daughters and grandsons, and granddaughters who have received the legacy of the founders.

THIS CLIPPING FROM HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT
OCT 13 1930

A Notable Anniversary

Among the anniversaries which have been celebrated in Massachusetts recently none was more notable than that of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which is now entering upon its fiftieth season. In the past few years, the reputation of Boston as a capital of culture has been much assailed, with some reason, as its fanatical censorship of literture has amply demonstrated. Yet it is not wholly lost to barbarism. Even if its educational institutions should lose their primacy and its museums should decay, as long as the Boston Symphony Orchestra occupies Symphony Hall it will have a just claim to be considered among the civilized communities of the world.

Like Harvard University, the Boston Symphony Orchestra has long been more than a local institution. Since its establishment by Major Higginson, it has exerted a great influence on musical taste throughout the nation. If it was not first in the land, it was indubitably the foremost for many years, a shining example of artistic merit to other communities. A succession of notable conductors contributed to its renown. As his appearances on the podium at the first concerts this year have proved, its first conductor, Sir George Henschel, was a musician of solid worth. His successors have been men of brilliant powers, whose names make a list of notable contributors to musical culture. Under Fiedler and Gericke, Nikisch and Muck, the Boston Symphony Orchestra set standards in programs and in performances that, in a day of numerous admirable orchestras, remain unsurpassed.

Happily, the Boston Symphony Orchestra is not an institution the glory of which rests in its traditions. It has suffered tribulations only to triumph over them. At no time in its history has it been more alive than it is today. Under Dr. Koussevitzky, it is once more a notable cultural agency, whose performances reflect the greatest technical proficiency, whose programs reveal not only a reverence for the past but a keen zest for the present moment in musical history. Not only Boston and New England, but the whole country may be gratified that at the end of a half century the Boston Symphony Orchestra remains an enlivening and an energizing force in the cultural life of the nation.

27

THIS CLIPPING FROM TIME
OCT 13 1930

a subtle change has come to pass. Symphony concerts have become the height of fashion. Symphonic tastes are being cultivated. Subscriptions are at a premium. Last week as fashionable a gathering as ever attended opera gathered for the first concert of the New York Philharmonic-Symphony. Yet not Conductor Arturo Toscanini, whose administration is in large measure responsible for the current Philharmonic vogue, but a henchman chosen by him last spring in Germany (TIME, June 16) held the baton. His name: Erich Kleiber. His home: Berlin, where he is director of the Staatsoper on Unter den Linden.

Weber's Freischütz Overture, an unknown Mozart serenade, Beethoven's Eighth Symphony, Richard Strauss' Till Eulenspiegel—this was the conventional program with which Kleiber chose to introduce himself to the U. S. By hearsay most members of his audience knew him to be a charming, unassuming person, born in Vienna, educated in Prague (where privation robbed him of his hair), trained in the opera houses of Darmstadt, Barmen-Elberfeld, Düsseldorf, Mannheim. They knew him to have a pretty U. S. wife, a former Ruth Goodrich of California whom he met three years ago in Buenos Aires when he was conducting at the Colón and she was attached to the U. S. Embassy there. They had heard of his penchant for photography, his admiration for Napoleon, Nikisch, Toscanini; of his open-mindedness toward all new music. Yet personal detail holds scant interest if a conductor's music is uninspired. To their regret, through the Freischütz and the Mozart, the Philharmonic's subscribers could not refrain from reckoning the weeks until Toscanini's return in November. But the Beethoven was more compelling and the Strauss carried the newcomer an ovation.

Critics were unconvinced. They were amused that Conductor Kleiber looks like a sturdy, militant edition of their colleague Samuel Chotzinoff of the New York World. Their verdict was of the safely noncommittal sort, as if they resented the unfairness of trying to fit a merely capable musician to the seven-league boots worn so easily by the giant Toscanini.

In Philadelphia subscribers were suspiciously prompt for the opening of their first season. They had been warned that last year's system would prevail: doors would be closed at the beginning of the concert, none admitted until the first went up for intermission. Last year this decree caused considerable dissatisfaction among subscribers. Many objected to what seemed to them the high-handedness of Conductor Leopold Stokowski. Tardiness, they argued, was occasionally unavoidable, long waiting in the lobby an undeserved penance. Was it too much to expect Stokowski to follow the conventional pattern, start his program with a short number, then admit late-comers before proceeding with the rest of the concert?

As if to show his disdain for so unappreciative a herd, Stokowski began his program last week with Tchaikovsky's Fifth Symphony which takes the best part of an hour to perform. A few unfortunates were locked out, but neither Stokowski bos, Czech George Szell and Parisian Vladimir Golschmann.

Omaha will have Joseph Littau, conductor at Roxy's cinemansion in Manhattan, to succeed Sandor Harmati who is i

The Rochester (N. Y.) Philharmoni nucleus of a civic orchestra which give popular concerts and concerts for schoo children, will play first on Nov. 7 unde Eugene Goossens.

The Syracuse (N. Y.) Symphony co tinues under Vladimir Shavitch.

conduct the first part of the season (with the exception of the two weeks when he changes places with Toscanini), Ossip Gabrilowitsch the second part, Stokowski the last. Alexander Smallens, talented conductor of the defunct Civic Opera (TIME, Apr. 21) has been engaged as assistant. A South American tour is under consideration for spring.

In Seattle the Orchestra has followed the example of Cleveland, chosen for its new manager a woman, Bertha M. Stryker, energetic worker in the Seattle Music and Art Foundation. (Cleveland's capable orchestra manager is Adella Prentiss Hughes.) Karl Krueger, young Viennese conductor who took over the Seattle Orchestra at the time of its reorganization in 1926, again has sole command.

Detroit's opening concert was scheduled to present Ossip Gabrilowitsch as soloist as well as conductor. Associate Victor Kolar will have charge during Gabrilowitsch's tenure in Philadelphia (see above). A tour will take in several college towns.

Cleveland will begin its 13th season Oct. 16 under Conductor Nikolai Sokoloff. In January it is anticipated that the Orchestra will move into its own hall, given by John L. and the late Mrs. Severance.

Chicago, Cincinnati and Minneapolis will hear their first programs on Oct. 17. Under Conductor Frederick Stock the Chicago Symphony will give its usual series in Orchestra Hall, additional concerts in Milwaukee and at the University of Chicago. The Cincinnati Symphony points with pride to its thriving under the sponsorship of the Institute of Fine Arts (endowment scheme begun three years ago by Mrs. Charles Phelps Taft and her late husband). Minneapolis concerts under Belgian Henri Verbrugghen are to be broadcast over a nation-wide hook-up. Mrs. Carlyle Scott is this Orchestra's new manager.*

California concerts are also scheduled to begin in October. Los Angeles will have its second season under Conductor Artur Rodzinski (formerly Philadelphia Orchestra assistant), its eleventh with William Andrews Clark Jr. as sole supporter. San Francisco will have two new conductors to succeed Alfred Hertz: for the first three months, British Basil Cameron; then Russian Issai Dobrowen (recent conductor in Norway).

The Portland (Ore.) Symphony is again under Willem Van Hoogstraten.

St. Louis will have three guest conductors: Spanish Enrique Fernandez Ar-

*There has been no merger with a St. Paul orchestra as was erroneously reported in TIME. The Minneapolis Symphony used to give concerts in St. Paul but this year the series has been discontinued.

THIS CLIPPING FROM MINNEAPOLIS, MINN.
TRIBUNE
OCT 13 1930

27

The Public Pulse

The Symphony and the University.

To the Editor of The Tribune:

My attention has been called to the letter by Joseph Eckman in the Public Pulse column in which he questions the correctness of a statement by Dr. James Davies in last Sunday's Tribune that "this is the first time an arrangement has been effected whereby a symphony orchestra of first rank will give a series of concerts at a great university."

Mr. Eckman then proceeds to state: "In this he (Dr. Davies) is in error. The Boston Symphony orchestra has, for the last 35 years given annually 10 to 12 concerts of symphony music at Harvard university."

Mr. Eckman is quite correct so far as he goes but if he had read Dr. Davies' article with more care and, if he had conscientiously read the various articles which have appeared in The Tribune since the first announcement of the orchestra's affiliation with the university, he would have realized that there is a vast difference between the course to be presented at the university this winter and the series of concerts given by the Boston Symphony at Harvard. The difference is that the Minneapolis Symphony orchestra by the new arrangement becomes part and body of the cultural activities of the University of Minnesota—that the entire physical plant of the orchestra finds housing on the university campus—that the concerts are presented by the university not merely for the faculty and student body but for the music-loving public of Minneapolis, St. Paul and the state of Minnesota as well.

The orchestra's daily rehearsals will be held in a specially prepared room in the Northrop Memorial auditorium which building will house the orchestra's exhaustive library and business offices as well. In other words, the Minneapolis Symphony orchestra becomes a part and parcel of university activities with the great difference that these concerts are for the edification and pleasure of all who wish to attend.

The faculty and student body of the university receive special consideration to the extent of a reduction in the price of season tickets, although a minimum price of $10 for a season ticket which admits to the 16 concerts remains the same for all. This price cannot possibly be beyond the limit of anyone's pocketbook and I question if Mr. Eckman can find its equal in this country especially when it includes the hearing of such world renowned artists as Paderewski and Jeritzka, who, it is well known, appear with no other symphony orchestra in this country.

I concede that the Boston orchestra appears in a series of concerts at Harvard but strictly as a visiting organization. If that is the same thing as is taking place at the University of Minnesota this winter, then I would request Mr. Eckman to restudy Dr. Davies' article and those which have preceded it.

With reference to the Boston's "Pops, that is another story, and if Mr. Eckman will have the patience to await future developments he may have cause to congratulate himself that he lives in Minneapolis which, though a much smaller and younger city, is not one whit behind Boston in the enterprise of its citizens. Given the faith and support of our public there is no limit to what our orchestra through its affiliation with the university, may yet offer to the northwest.

CARLO FISCHER.
Minneapolis.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
MERCURY

A very interesting event occurred in Boston last week which compensated for the disrepute that came to the city in the manifestations of lawlessness in the Massachusetts capital. The Boston Symphony Orchestra celebrated its fiftieth anniversary. A picturesque incident was the fact that Sir George Henschel, the first conductor, led the orchestra. There was curiosity concerning the personality of the leader who would resume the baton at the age of eighty-one. The black-whiskered Henschel was not to be forgotten. We recall his appearances in New Bedford at the time, with his orchestra on one or two occasions, but rather in concert. Henschel had a baritone voice and gave voice recitals here with Mrs. Henschel who used to turn a languishing face to his as they sang their songs of Arcady, or wherever it was they loved. But the audience saw nothing of senility in the sound and sturdy man with a military set-up and enthusiasm in his eyes albeit gray whiskers who conducted the great orchestra built upon the corner stone of the structure he had raised through the financing and zest of Major Higginson.

To indicate how long ago it was when Henschel came to Boston, it may be related that he brought a letter of introduction from Robert Browning to Charles Perkins and another from Lord Houghton to Henry W. Longfellow. Henschel was a pianist as well as a singer, a composer and a conductor, and it was his success as conductor of the Harvard Musical Association that led Major Higginson to decide that he had found a leader who would carry out his dream of a Boston Symphony Orchestra which would do for Boston what the great orchestras of Europe did for their respective cities.

In the audience Friday afternoon where she has been a figure for fifty years, sat Mrs. Henry Lee Higginson, now ninety-two years old, bearing a bouquet of roses, a patron of the art her husband loved, whose fortune endowed and whose enthusiasm kept alive this great musical organization. And there were others present who heard the first concert and came from their homes on the venerable streets. Sir George kissed several of the old ladies on the cheek, and greeted their sons and daughters and grandsons, and granddaughters who have received the legacy of the founders.

THIS CLIPPING FROM HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT
OCT 1930

A Notable Anniversary

Among the anniversaries which have been celebrated in Massachusetts recently none was more notable than that of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which is now entering upon its fiftieth season. In the past few years, the reputation of Boston as a capital of culture has been much assailed, with some reason, as its fanatical censorship of literture has amply demonstrated. Yet it is not wholly lost to barbarism. Even if its educational institutions should lose their primacy and its museums should decay, as long as the Boston Symphony Orchestra occupies Symphony Hall it will have a just claim to be considered among the civilized communities of the world.

Like Harvard University, the Boston Symphony Orchestra has long been more than a local institution. Since its establishment by Major Higginson, it has exerted a great influence on musical taste throughout the nation. If it was not first in the land, it was indubitably the foremost for many years, a shining example of artistic merit to other communities. A succession of notable conductors contributed to its renown. As his appearances on the podium at the first concerts this year have proved, its first conductor, Sir George Henschel, was a musician of solid worth. His successors have been men of brilliant powers, whose names make a list of notable contributors to musical culture. Under Fiedler and Gericke, Nikisch and Muck, the Boston Symphony Orchestra set standards in programs and in performances that, in a day of numerous admirable orchestras, remain unsurpassed.

Happily, the Boston Symphony Orchestra is not an institution the glory of which rests in its traditions. It has suffered tribulations only to triumph over them. At no time in its history has it been more alive than it is today. Under Dr. Koussevitzky, it is once more a notable cultural agency, whose performances reflect the greatest technical proficiency, whose programs reveal not only a reverence for the past but a keen zest for the present moment in musical history. Not only Boston and New England, but the whole country may be gratified that at the end of a half century the Boston Symphony Orchestra remains an enlivening and an energizing force in the cultural life of the nation.

28

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TRENTON, N. J.
TIMES

OCT 14 1930

Boston Symphony Honors Henschel

An unusual occasion was enjoyed by the music lovers of Boston last Friday, when Sir George Henschel, noted English conductor, stood once more on the conductor's stand of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and led that splendid organization through the same program he gave here half a century ago. Both the famed orchestra, which today stands as one of the finest in America, and the Boston public united to do honor to this musician, now 80 years old, and crowned with the honors that have come in recognition of his musicianship.

It was many years ago that George Henschel's accomplishments as conductor of the Harvard Musical Association persuaded Colonel Henry L. Higginson that here was the leader he needed to develop a great symphony orchestra in Boston.

In the days when Henschel began with the orchestra, it was composed of some 60 men, mainly members of the Harvard Musical Association. Since that day the orchestra personnel has grown far beyond Sir George's anticipation, has forged to the front rank among orchestral societies, due largely to the excellent foundation work done by the English conductor, and has been directed by some of the most famous musicians of 50 years. Among them have been Arthur Nikisch, Karl Muck, Pierre Monteux and now Serge Koussevitsky.

Sir George's first program with the Boston Symphony was given October 22, 1881, and last Friday the orchestra played the same program with the exception of one number. For the "Festival" overture of Weber, the "Meistersinger" prelude was substituted in order to give full play to the sonority of the orchestra, which is twice the size that which Sir George conducted a half century ago. The other numbers were: Beethoven's Overture, op. 124, "Consecration of the House," the Recitative and Air, "Che faro senza Eurydice," from Gluck's "Orfeo ed Eurydice;" Haydn's B flat Symphony (B. & H. No. 12); the Ballet Music from Schubert's incidental music to "Rosamunde," and the Recitative and Aria, "Thou Far-darting Sun," from Bruch's "Odysseus."

Anna Louise Cary was the soloist in that first concert, and her place was taken last Friday by Mme. Margaret Matzenauer.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
LOWELL, MASS.
EVE. LEADER

OCT 14 1930

Needless to say that when Sir George Henschel, the first conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, returned to lead in the anniversary programs last week he found a much finer band at his command than he had fifty years ago. The record of the orchestra, with the exception of a brief period about the time of the war, has been one of steady advancement until it is recognized everywhere as one of the finest organizations of its kind in the world. That has been due in great measure to the fact that it has adhered strictly to the policy established by its founder,

Y THE NEWS.

the late Maj. Higginson. The emphasis has been on perfection, with opportunity for sufficient rehearsals to attain it. Boston has an institution of which she may well be proud.

SCHNECTADY, N. Y.
GAZETTE

BIRTHDAY OBSERVANCE

The 50th season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, an important event in the musical life of America, was begun last week when Sir George Henschel, original leader, reappeared as guest conductor after 46 years. It was a job that would have left a younger genius nervous and on trigger edge. Sir George, sound and sturdy despite his 80 years, his bearing almost military in its erectness, lead the huge orchestra in practically the same program as 50 years ago.

In the reception room after the concert he met many of his old friends who had heard his first concert, including the 92-year-old widow of his old friend, whose enthusiasm started and built and whose fortune endowed the great musical organization, Mrs. Henry Lee Higginson.

* * *

THIS CLIPPING FROM
EVE. LEADER
LOWELL, MASS.

OCT 14 1930

Needless to say that when Sir George Henschel, the first conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, returned to lead in the anniversary programs last week he found a much finer band at his command than he had fifty years ago. The record of the orchestra, with the exception of a brief period about the time of the war, has been one of steady advancement until it is recognized everywhere as one of the finest organizations of its kind in the world. That has been due in great measure to the fact that it has adhered strictly to the policy established by its founder, the late Maj. Higginson. The emphasis has been on perfection, with opportunity for sufficient rehearsals to attain it. Boston has an institution of which she may well be proud.

THIS CLIPPING FROM HAMILTON, O.
NEWS

OCT 13 1930

How a Russian Musical Leader Was Secured for Boston

Koussevitzky Proves to Be a Great Director for the Boston Symphony Orchestra

The present director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, a Russian, Sergei Koussevitzky, has turned out to be a big success. This is the most important musical organization in this country, and has been for 50 years.

The way the directors secured the Russian was as follows:

They were appraising all the availables in Europe, when they came upon a Russian exiled in Paris. At 12, he had been chef d'orchestre in the theatre of his native town, composed whatever music was required for the plays and conducted the entr'actes. At 14, he went to Moscow to study, chose for his instrument the bull fiddle, toured Europe for ten years as a contrabass virtuoso. By 1919 he had achieved his ambition, become a conductor again. Koussevitzky concerts were soon famous in Moscow and Petrograd. He wanted to reach the great masses of Russians who had never heard a symphony concert. So for several summers, he chartered a steamer, cruised the 2,300 miles down the River Volga playing to the peasants who gathered on its banks. The Revolution made Russia impossible. Koussevitzky settled in Paris, where in partnership with his wife, he still conducts the profitable music-publishing house called Edition Russe.

The choice of Koussevitzky for Boston has proved singularly happy. He is an excellent musician, although it is said he cannot read a score, has to hire pianists to teach him new music before he in turn can transmit it to his men. He has the magnetism, the energy which were necessary to rejuvenate Boston's orchestra in 1924. He has an insatiable interest in new music and a talent for playing it. His programs are indisputably the best in the country. So is his understanding of Ravel and Debussy.

In Boston, Koussevitzky has become completely at home. He has an establishment in Jamaica Plain, an entourage which includes his wealthy, matronly-looking wife, Nathalie; a vivacious niece, Olga Naumoff, who is his secretary; Valet Ivan who prepares him occasional Russian dishes; Ivan's wife, and Droll, a lively Boston terrier. Often in the early morning, the Maestro may be seen walking in the Rockwood Street section around Jamaica Pond. Even those who do not recognize him, suspect him of being a great musician.

THIS CLIPPING FROM TH
LOWELL, MASS.
COURIER-CITIZEN

OCT 15 1930

he Boston Symphony.

For the concerts by the Boston ymphony Orchestra Friday and aturday this week Mr. Koussevitky will return to the conductor's lace. A feature of the program will e the first public performance of ne of the works written especially or the orchestra in its anniversary eason, Mr. Hill's "Anniversary Ode," which it is understood will nlist the services of the choirs from Harvard and Radcliffe. Other items n the program are a series of Bach Preludes arranged for stringed orhestra; Beethoven's Seventh Symhony and Mussorgsky's "Pictures of An Exhibition."

THIS CLIPPING FROM DALLAS, TEX.
NEWS

Notes on the Passing Show

Touching Ceremonial in Boston as Famed Symphony Orchestra Starts Fiftieth Season—First Conductor Returns to Duplicate Initial Program—Major Higginson.

BY JOHN ROSENFIELD JR.

LAST FRIDAY NIGHT BOSTON was the scene of a musical ceremony of which there have not been nearly enough in America. Sir George Henschel, age 80 years, stood before the Boston Symphony Orchestra and conducted the first program of the noted band's fiftieth season. With one exception the program was the same as given exactly forty-nine years ago when Sir George, then Herr Georg Henschel, started the orchestra off on its great career. In the audience was a mild-mannered but still active lady of 97 years, the relict of the late Henry L. Higginson, Boston banker and millionaire, who personally paid the orchestra's deficits for thirty-seven years. Deficits in those days were badges of honor.

Despite his maturity, Sir George conducted with precision, vigor, and musicianship. The whole performance, aside from its sentimental aspects, was one to command the admiration of the Boston audience, which has heard great music and great conductors during the half century.

In duplicating his first program, Sir George opened with Beethoven's overture, "Die Weihe des Hauses," followed with Haydn's "B-Flat Symphony" and Schubert's "Rosamunde" ballet. Then came the overture to Wagner's "Die Meistersinger," substituted for Weber's "Jubilee" overture, which was not thought worthy of revival. Margaret Matzenauer, contralto of the Metropolitan until this season, sang "Che Faro," from Gluck's "Orfeo ed Eurydice," and "Thou, Far Darting Sun," from Max Bruch's "Odysseus." These two arias were given in the first concert by the late Annie Louise Cary.

Henschel's Singing Career.

Henschel came to Boston in 1881 as a young baritone with no published ambitions toward conducting. He was given charge of the Symphony when Major Higginson founded it, and straightway ran up a reputation as a conductor. He continued at the helm for three seasons, after which he retired to England, where he became a naturalized British subject and was knighted for distinguished service to the cause of British music. He has taught singing continuously and among his pupils has been Miss Evelyn Finty, mezzo-soprano of Dallas.

The Boston Conductors.

Henschel was succeeded in Boston by Wilhelm Gericke, who remained until 1889, relinquishing the post to one of the greatest maestros ever to wield a baton, the late Artur Nikisch. Nikisch continued until 1894, when Emil Paur took charge for four golden years. Gericke was recalled for four more seasons, after which he was succeeded by the austere but inspired Karl Muck. Muck conducted from 1906 to 1908 and turned the post over to Max Fiedler, who held forth until 1912. Muck then returned in 1912 and remained until 1918. During the tenures of Nikisch, Paur and Muck the orchestra was developed into one of the most amazing instruments ever assembled. Major Higginson willingly bore the burden and was satisfied with nothing short of the best men in every chair. Key players were celebrities. Other musicians regarded their posts as the capstones of personal ambitions.

Dr. Karl Muck.

Dr. Muck was a unique personality, a combination of the German drillmaster and the inspired interpretative artist. With the one quality he whipped his band into a rarely sensitive and responsive combination. With the other he led it through readings of unsurpassable brilliance.

But Dr. Muck had his weaknesses. He held a low opinion of American musical taste and gave it utterance at least once a week. His looks and demeanor corroborated his tactless speech. In 1917 America entered the war. Dr. Muck, stanchly German in his sympathies, demurred when asked to open his concert with the national anthem. The patriots argued with some heat that as long as Dr. Muck enjoyed the hospitality of the United States he should defer to its loyal demonstrations. Dr. Muck countered with the idea that a national anthem had no place on his rarified programs, whether it be "The Star-Spangled Banner" or "Die Wacht am Rhein." He capitulated at last, but the whole business left a bad taste. In 1918 Dr. Muck was dragged from Boston and interned as an alien enemy in Atlanta. There were charges of espionage, never successfully proved. After the armistice he was quietly deported to Germany, where he has remained ever since. He conducted in Bayreuth last summer.

The Wreck.

Major Higginson, Civil War veteran, was a man of unquestioned patriotism, but he upheld Dr. Muck in all things. The Major had the loftiest artistic conceptions of his orchestra and would not admit that chauvinism had any place in its direction. Inasmuch as the orchestra had played continuously under German conductors, its personnel was preponderantly Teutonic. The war, deportations, the impounding of aliens, made inroads and virtually wrecked the great organization. Added to this was labor trouble and Major Higginson, something of a firebrand himself, washed his hands of the whole business. He went so far as to organize a civic symphony association to carry on, and then he retired. Soon afterward he died.

Since 1918.

The orchestra started at scratch in 1918. New players were assembled and Henri Rabaud, eminent French composer, was imported for the job. Mr. Rabaud proved scarcely the man for it, and next year the Boston Symphony drafted Pierre Monteux, another Frenchman, for the conductorship. Dallas knew Mr. Monteux slightly as he was in the pit when Diaghilev's Ballet Russe exhibited here at the old Coliseum. Monteux had five years, in which he brought the Boston Symphony three-fourths of the way back. As a builder of orchestras and a maker of programs he disclosed fine capabilities. As a virtuoso he did not arouse the public. His temperament was Gallic, manifesting itself in a restrained, almost languorous, beat. America, even Boston, likes its music loud and fast.

Monteux was relieved in 1924 and his successor came from Russia, Sergei Koussewitzky by name. An old character, this man. His instrument is the double-bass, on which he is the world's greatest virtuoso. As a conductor he is vibrant, arresting, interesting, entertaining. Yet, it is said that he can not read a partitur. He directs by ear, after his private pianist has played over the parts for him. This seems to be no handicap. Under Mr. Koussewitzky the Boston Symphony Orchestra has become a grand band again. And his leadership evidently satisfies everybody in Boston, New York and elsewhere—J. R. Jr.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
LOWELL, MASS.
COURIER CITIZEN

OCT 15 1930

Hall Auditorium on Oct. 20.

The Boston Symphony.

For the concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra Friday and Saturday this week Mr. Koussevitzky will return to the conductor's place. A feature of the program will be the first public performance of one of the works written especially for the orchestra in its anniversary season, Mr. Hill's "Anniversary Ode," which it is understood will enlist the services of the choirs from Harvard and Radcliffe. Other items on the program are a series of Bach Preludes arranged for stringed orchestra; Beethoven's Seventh Symphony and Mussorgsky's "Pictures of An Exhibition."

28

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TRENTON, N. J.
TIMES

OCT 1 4 1930

Boston Symphony Honors Henschel

An unusual occasion was enjoyed by the music lovers of Boston last Friday, when Sir George Henschel, noted English conductor, stood once more on the conductor's stand of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and led that splendid organization through the same program he gave here half a century ago. Both the famed orchestra, which today stands as one of the finest in America, and the Boston public united to do honor to this musician, now 80 years old, and crowned with the honors that have come in recognition of his musicianship.

It was many years ago that George Henschel's accomplishments as conductor of the Harvard Musical Association persuaded Colonel Henry L. Higginson that here was the leader he needed to develop a great symphony orchestra in Boston.

In the days when Henschel began with the orchestra, it was composed of some 60 men, mainly members of the Harvard Musical Association. Since that day the orchestra personnel has grown far beyond Sir George's anticipation, has forged to the front rank among orchestral societies, due largely to the excellent foundation work done by the English conductor, and has been directed by some of the most famous musicians of 50 years. Among them have been Arthur Nikisch, Karl Muck, Pierre Monteux and now Serge Koussevitsky.

Sir George's first program with the Boston Symphony was given October 22, 1881, and last Friday the orchestra played the same program with the exception of one number. For the "Festival" overture of Weber, the "Meistersinger" prelude was substituted in order to give full play to the sonority of the orchestra, which is twice the size that which Sir George conducted a half century ago. The other numbers were: Beethoven's Overture, op. 124, "Consecration of the House," the Recitative and Air, "Che faro senza Eurydice," from Gluck's "Orfeo ed Eurydice;" Haydn's B flat Symphony (B. & H. No. 12); the Ballet Music from Schubert's incidental music to "Rosamunde," and the Recitative and Aria, "Thou Far-darting Sun," from Bruch's "Odysseus."

Anna Louise Cary was the soloist in that first concert, and her place was taken last Friday by Mme. Margaret Matzenauer.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
LOWELL, MASS.
EVE. LEADER

OCT 1 4 1930

Needless to say that when Sir George Henschel, the first conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, returned to lead in the anniversary programs last week he found a much finer band at his command than he had fifty years ago. The record of the orchestra, with the exception of a brief period about the time of the war, has been one of steady advancement until it is recognized everywhere as one of the finest organizations of its kind in the world. That has been due in great measure to the fact that it has adhered strictly to the policy established by its founder,

Y THE NEWS.

the late Maj. Higginson. The emphasis has been on perfection, with opportunity for sufficient rehearsals to attain it. Boston has an institution of which she may well be proud.

SCHNECTADY, N. Y.
GAZETTE

BIRTHDAY OBSERVANCE

The 50th season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, an important event in the musical life of America, was begun last week when Sir George Henschel, original leader, reappeared as guest conductor after 46 years. It was a job that would have left a younger genius nervous and on trigger edge. Sir George, sound and sturdy despite his 80 years, his bearing almost military in its erectness, lead the huge orchestra in practically the same program as 50 years ago.

In the reception room after the concert he met many of his old friends who had heard his first concert, including the 92-year-old widow of his old friend, whose enthusiasm started and built and whose fortune endowed the great musical organization, Mrs. Henry Lee Higginson.

* * *

THIS CLIPPING FROM
EVE. LEADER
LOWELL, MASS.

OCT 1 4 1930

Needless to say that when Sir George Henschel, the first conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, returned to lead in the anniversary programs last week he found a much finer band at his command than he had fifty years ago. The record of the orchestra, with the exception of a brief period about the time of the war, has been one of steady advancement until it is recognized everywhere as one of the finest organizations of its kind in the world. That has been due in great measure to the fact that it has adhered strictly to the policy established by its founder, the late Maj. Higginson. The emphasis has been on perfection, with opportunity for sufficient rehearsals to attain it. Boston has an institution of which she may well be proud.

THIS CLIPPING FROM HAMILTON, O.
NEWS

How a Russian Musical Leader Was Secured for Boston

Koussevitzky Proves to Be a Great Director for the Boston Symphony Orchestra

The present director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, a Russian, Sergei Koussevitzky, has turned out to be a big success. This is the most important musical organization in this country, and has been for 50 years.

The way the directors secured the Russian was as follows:

They were appraising all the availables in Europe, when they came upon a Russian exiled in Paris. At 12, he had been chef d'orchestre in the theatre of his native town, composed whatever music was required for the plays and conducted the entr'actes. At 14, he went to Moscow to study, chose for his instrument the bull fiddle, toured Europe for ten years as a contrabass virtuoso. By 1919 he had achieved his ambition, become a conductor again. Koussevitzky concerts were soon famous in Moscow and Petrograd. He wanted to reach the great masses of Russians who had never heard a symphony concert. So for several summers, he chartered a steamer, cruised the 2,300 miles down the River Volga playing to the peasants who gathered on its banks. The Revolution made Russia impossible. Koussevitzky settled in Paris, where in partnership with his wife, he still conducts the profitable music-publishing house called Edition Russe.

The choice of Koussevitzky for Boston has proved singularly happy. He is an excellent musician, although it is said he cannot read a score, has to hire pianists to teach him new music before he in turn can transmit it to his men. He has the magnetism, the energy which were necessary to rejuvenate Boston's orchestra in 1924. He has an insatiable interest in new music and a talent for playing it. His programs are indisputably the best in the country. So is his understanding of Ravel and Debussy.

In Boston, Koussevitzky has become completely at home. He has an establishment in Jamaica Plain, an entourage which includes his wealthy, matronly-looking wife, Nathalie; a vivacious niece, Olga Naumoff, who is his secretary; Valet Ivan who prepares him occasional Russian dishes; Ivan's wife, and Droll, a lively Boston terrier. Often in the early morning, the Maestro may be seen walking in the Rockwood Street section around Jamaica Pond. Even those who do not recognize him, suspect him of being a great musician.

THIS CLIPPING FROM TH
LOWELL, MASS.
COURIER-CITIZEN

OCT 1 5 1930

he Boston Symphony.

For the concerts by the Boston ymphony Orchestra Friday and aturday this week Mr. Koussevitky will return to the conductor's lace. A feature of the program will e the first public performance of ne of the works written especially or the orchestra in its anniversary eason, Mr. Hill's "Anniversary Ode," which it is understood will nlist the services of the choirs from Harvard and Radcliffe. Other items n the program are a series of Bach Preludes arranged for stringed orhestra; Beethoven's Seventh Symphony and Mussorgsky's "Pictures of an Exhibition."

THIS CLIPPING FROM DALLAS, TEX.
NEWS

Notes on the Passing Show

Touching Ceremonial in Boston as Famed Symphony Orchestra Starts Fiftieth Season—First Conductor Returns to Duplicate Initial Program—Major Higginson.

—BY JOHN ROSENFIELD JR.—

LAST FRIDAY NIGHT BOSTON was the scene of a musical ceremony of which there have not been nearly enough in America. Sir George Henschel, age 80 years, stood before the Boston Symphony Orchestra and conducted the first program of the noted band's fiftieth season. With one exception the program was the same as given exactly forty-nine years ago when Sir George, then Herr Georg Henschel, started the orchestra off on its great career. In the audience was a mild-mannered but still active lady of 97 years, the relict of the late Henry L. Higginson, Boston banker and millionaire, who personally paid the orchestra's deficits for thirty-seven years. Deficits in those days were badges of honor.

Despite his maturity, Sir George conducted with precision, vigor, and musicianship. The whole performance, aside from its sentimental aspects, was one to command the admiration of the Boston audience, which has heard great music and great conductors during the half century.

In duplicating his first program, Sir George opened with Beethoven's overture, "Die Weihe des Hauses," followed with Haydn's "B-Flat Symphony" and Schubert's "Rosamunde" ballet. Then came the overture to Wagner's "Die Meistersinger," substituted for Weber's "Jubilee" overture, which was not thought worthy of revival. Margaret Matzenauer, contralto of the Metropolitan until this season, sang "Che Faro," from Gluck's "Orfeo ed Eurydice," and "Thou, Far Darting Sun," from Max Bruch's "Odysseus." These two arias were given in the first concert by the late Annie Louise Cary.

Henschel's Singing Career.

Henschel came to Boston in 1881 as a young baritone with no published ambitions toward conducting. He was given charge of the Symphony when Major Higginson founded it, and straightway ran up a reputation as a conductor. He continued at the helm for three seasons, after which he retired to England, where he became a naturalized British subject and was knighted for distinguished service to the cause of British music. He has taught singing continuously and among his pupils has been Miss Evelyn Finty, mezzo-soprano of Dallas.

The Boston Conductors.

Henschel was succeeded in Boston by Wilhelm Gericke, who remained until 1889, relinquishing the post to one of the greatest maestros ever to wield a baton, the late Artur Nikisch. Nikisch continued until 1894, when Emil Paur took charge for four golden years. Gericke was recalled for four more seasons, after which he was succeeded by the austere but inspired Karl Muck. Muck conducted from 1906 to 1908 and turned the post over to Max Fiedler, who held forth until 1912. Muck then returned in 1912 and remained until 1918. During the tenures of Nikisch, Paur and Muck the orchestra was developed into one of the most amazing instruments ever assembled. Major Higginson willingly bore the burden and was satisfied with nothing short of the best men in every chair. Key players were celebrities. Other musicians regarded their posts as the capstones of personal ambitions.

Dr. Karl Muck.

Dr. Muck was a unique personality, a combination of the German drillmaster and the inspired interpretative artist. With the one quality he whipped his band into a rarely sensitive and responsive combination. With the other he led it through readings of unsurpassable brilliance.

But Dr. Muck had his weaknesses. He held a low opinion of American musical taste and gave it utterance at least once a week. His looks and demeanor corroborated his tactless speech. In 1917 America entered the war. Dr. Muck, stanchly German in his sympathies, demurred when asked to open his concert with the national anthem. The patriots argued with some heat that as long as Dr. Muck enjoyed the hospitality of the United States he should defer to its loyal demonstrations. Dr. Muck countered with the idea that a national anthem had no place on his rarified programs, whether it be "The Star-Spangled Banner" or "Die Wacht am Rhein." He capitulated at last, but the whole business left a bad taste. In 1918 Dr. Muck was dragged from Boston and interned as an alien enemy in Atlanta. There were charges of espionage, never successfully proved. After the armistice he was quietly deported to Germany, where he has remained ever since. He conducted in Bayreuth last summer.

The Wreck.

Major Higginson, Civil War veteran, was a man of unquestioned patriotism, but he upheld Dr. Muck in all things. The Major had the loftiest artistic conceptions of his orchestra and would not admit that chauvinism had any place in its direction. Inasmuch as the orchestra had played continuously under German conductors, its personnel was preponderantly Teutonic. The war, deportations, the impounding of aliens, made inroads and virtually wrecked the great organization. Allied to this was labor trouble and Major Higginson, something of a firebrand himself, washed his hands of the whole business. He went so far as to organize a civic symphony association to carry on, and then he retired. Soon afterward he died.

Since 1918.

The orchestra started at scratch in 1918. New players were assembled and Henri Rabaud, eminent French composer, was imported for the job. Mr. Rabaud proved scarcely the man for it, and next year the Boston Symphony drafted Pierre Monteux, another Frenchman, for the conductorship. Dallas knew Mr. Monteux slightly as he was in the pit when Diaghilev's Ballet Russe exhibited here at the old Coliseum. Monteux had five years, in which he brought the Boston Symphony three-fourths of the way back. As a builder of orchestras and a maker of programs he disclosed fine capabilities. As a virtuoso he did not arouse the public. His temperament was Gallic, manifesting itself in a restrained, almost languorous, beat. America, even Boston, likes its music loud and fast.

Monteux was relieved in 1924 and his successor came from Russia, Sergei Koussewitzky by name. An old character, this man. His instrument is the double-bass, on which he is the world's greatest virtuoso. As a conductor he is vibrant, arresting, interesting, entertaining. Yet, it is said that he can not read a partitur. He directs by ear, after his private pianist has played over the parts for him. This seems to be no handicap. Under Mr. Koussewitzky the Boston Symphony Orchestra has become a grand band again. And his leadership evidently satisfies everybody in Boston, New York and elsewhere—J. R. Jr.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
LOWELL, MASS.
COURIER CITIZEN

OCT 1 5 1930

The Boston Symphony.

For the concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra Friday and Saturday this week Mr. Koussevitzky will return to the conductor's place. A feature of the program will be the first public performance of one of the works written especially for the orchestra in its anniversary season, Mr. Hill's "Anniversary Ode," which it is understood will enlist the services of the choirs from Harvard and Radcliffe. Other items on the program are a series of Bach Preludes arranged for stringed orchestra; Beethoven's Seventh Symphony and Mussorgsky's "Pictures of An Exhibition."

Early Season In Bostonian Concert Halls

Koussevitzky's First Program, Recitals Near and Far, Other Prospects

On Friday and Saturday Dr. Koussevitzky addresses himself to the fifty-first season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Sir George Henschel has come and won his laurels. Now the present conductor makes his festive beginnings. Before leaving Boston last spring he planned that the concerts of the fiftieth season might well begin (as far as he was concerned) with a program containing one work composed specifically for the occasion. To Professor Hill of Harvard he confided his intention: requested a commemorative piece.

Thus upon this week's program stands "An Ode for the Fiftieth Anniversary of the Boston Symphony Orchestra," poem by Robert Hillyer (also of the University), music by Edward B. Hill. The work is choral as well as orchestral. For it a hundred members of the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society, trained by Dr. Davison and Mr. Woodworth, will form the choir. Professor Hill gives assurance that there is "absolutely nothing to fear" about the piece, but lets slip the information that it is seven minutes in length; that the respective verses are to be sung by full chorus, by women's chorus, by men's chorus; that there are no solos. He further says that, to make the Ode entirely new at the time of first performance, Mr. Hillyer's poem will not be released for print until it has been heard at the concert of Friday afternoon. For once, the thrills of novelty may not be even mildly anticipated.

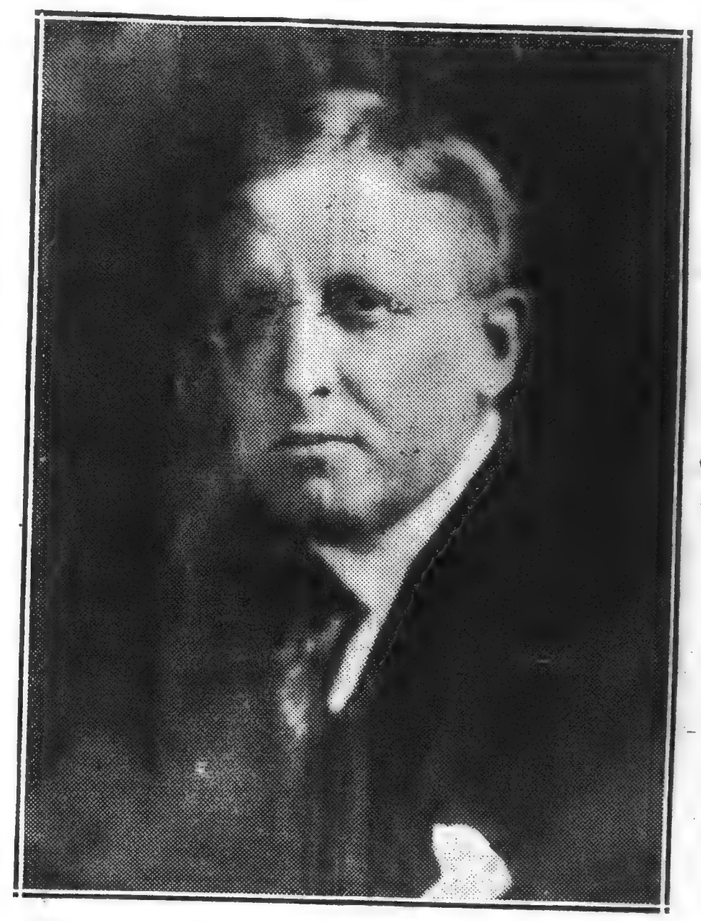
Yet another item of the program comes to first orchestral hearing anywhere. The reader probably infers transcription, and rightly so. For orchestral transcription from the works of the great Johann Sebastian goes on apace. This time the Italian, Pick-Mangiagalli, remembered at Bach concerts for an exceedingly musical Prelude and Fugue played a year ago, has laid hands upon the chief among the Bachs. Out of two works of diverse kind he has drawn movements for a new grouping of his own. The program announces simply, "Two Preludes—Adagio, Vivace, arranged for String Orchestra."

The Adagio proves to be in E minor, the Vivace in E major. The Adagio is taken from a familiar Prelude and Fugue for Organ in D minor, transposed (as well as transcribed) into E minor, to be companion-piece to the Vivace which remains in its own key. Indeed, this is probably not the first time the little piece has been transcribed. Schweitzer argues that "from its construction and general style we may draw the conclusion that it was written for the harpsichord." Bach took this harpsichord-prelude, joined it with his own transcription for organ of the second movement of his Violin Sonata in G minor; then published the two under the caption above noted. Thus he himself has given ample precedent for further transcription. Pick-Mangiagalli has taken a leaf out of Bach's own book in yet another sense. For the arranger's companion-piece also comes from one of the composer's violin-sonatas (or partitas), the one most played by violinists, in E major. Any "Kreisler-fan" will have heard it; in fact all violinists keep it in their active repertory.

Organists are wont to play this Prelude with great solidity and majestic dignity. Bach gave no tempo-indication. Pick-Mangiagalli has labelled it "Adagio," and the disposition of the orchestral voices is such that a lyric mood fairly flows from the printed page. In the Vivace, the music retains all the brightness and zest of the violin-piece. The score was published during the present year, 1930.

A. H. M.

Sealing Fifty Years of Mutual Good Will



Harvard University Salutes the Symphony Orchestra

(Bachrach C.)

Robert Hillyer, Poet, of the English Department, and Edward Burlingame Hill, Composer, of the Division of Music, Who Have Joined Hands in An Anniversary Ode to Be Heard at the Symphony Concerts Tomorrow and Saturday in Sanders Theater at Cambridge, the first of a new series:

Symphony, No. 7, in A major . . . . Beethoven
Ronde, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks" . . . . Strauss
Prelude to Mallarmp's Eclogue, "The Afternoon of A Faun" . . . . Debussy
Prelude to The Opera, "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg" . . . . Wagner

From Dr. Koussevitzky for the third pair of Symphony Concerts on Oct. 24 and 25 in Symphony Hall:

Overture to The Opera, "Benvenuto Cellini" . . . . Berlioz
Symphonic Sketches, "The Sea" . . . . Debussy
Choreographic Poem, "The Waltz" . . . . Ravel
Second Symphony . . . . Roussel
(New: First Times)

Monsieur Roussel wrote the symphony at the request of the conductor and the trustees of the orchestra. It is inscribed for the semi-centenary. At both concerts it will be played in the presence of the composer, now on brief visit to Chicago, New York and Boston.

30

MUSIC

SYMPHONY CONCERT

By PHILIP HALE

The program of the concert given by the Boston Symphony orchestra yesterday afternoon in Symphony hall was as follows: Bach-Pick-Mangiagalli, two preludes; Adagio and Vivace, for string orcheestra (first performance). Beethoven, symphony No. 7. Hill, An Ode (Robert Hillyer's poem) for the 50th Anniversary of the Orchestra (first performance. Moussorgsky-Ravel, "Pictures tures at an exhibition."

They will not let Bach alone; they think he stands in need of transcriptions for orchestra to make his name more illustrious. In London we heard a few months ago a thunderous orchestral version by Respighi of the Passacaglia, which was written originally for a species of pedal piano. Mr. Pick-Mangiagalli was more modest in his homage as a transcriber. He took the slow movement of an organ prelude to a fugue in D minor, music that suggests the treatment he gave it. For the quick movement he chose a prelude in Bach's Partita No. 3, which, utilized by Bach for other purposes, has been made familiar by organists as well as violinists. For the latter prelude he kept the original first violin part, and under it wrote other parts in the "strict contrapuntal manner of Bach."

In saying this he was not presumptuous. His own Fugue played here a year ago proved that he had a mastery of counterpoint and not merely in the pedant's sense, for his music had vitality and when grace and beauty were needed they were not missing. The first prelude played yesterday might have been transcribed by Bach himself for strings; it was so ingenious, at the same time so serene, so lovely in its tenderness. The Fugue, taken at a most rapid pace, was exciting. The parts written by the transcriber added to the musical excitement and seemed a necessary integral part; there was no hint at modernization. The expressive euphony of performance in the first prelude, the dazzling brilliance of the strings in the second were at once appreciated, warmly appreciated by the audience. Seldom is a new, unknown work so cordially received.

Mr. Koussevitzky was heartily welcomed when he came on the platform. Orchestra and audience stood to greet him. The welcome was spontaneous on the part of the audience, hearty and sincere. Having conducted the transcriptions with gusto, admiring the work of the composer as he does, he with his valiant artists gave an incomparable interpretation of Beethoven's symphony. Not that he endeavored to make all things new, but as is his way with Beethoven's music, familiarity with it does not in him breed indifference, the willingness to "let the music speak for itself," an excuse given by uninspired or lazy conductors for tame, perfunctory performance. That of yesterday was charged with the composer's Dionysiac spirit; there was the wildness of joy in the lively movements, the poetic frenzy, Bacchic revelry, while the famous Allegretto was free from the lethargic sentimentalism that some conductors find necessary for contrast. Here the great Beethoven was revealed in a manner that made the epithet "titanic" bestowed on him by biographers fond of purple phrases and the swollen style, seem not extravagant.

Before the performance of Mr. Hill's "Ode," the poet spoke his verses; then they were sung by the combined chorus of the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society. They were also printed in the program book. All this, so that there might be no possible excuse for those present not dilating with the right emotions, music or no music.

The poetic sentiments served well the musician, who made of his work a little cantata, conspicuous for clear effective writing for the chorus; and for an instrumental prelude and interludes that, while they displayed tasteful instrumentation, anticipated and then sustained the poet's various declarations. In writing for the chorus, Mr. Hill treated the singers as human beings with vocal limitations, not as orchestral instruments. He shrewdly used female voices for a stanza that seemed to require them. The maidens from Radcliffe clad in a Fascist uniform but with white collars came on the stage in solemn procession. A dash of red, or even of heliotrope, would better have suited the occasion. They did not, lifting up their voices, lament with a great lamentation, as one would have expected from their garb. They sang sweetly and smoothly of "Windy," not waterlogged, flute, harp, and "violins of graver phrase," while the more heroic spirit of the third stanza filled the breasts of the Harvard men and was expelled in their characteristically broken, syllabic sentences with the staccato that often was like unto a bark. Mr. Hill's accompaniment preserved due proportion; there was no attempt to outvie in strength and stress the vocal forces; the accompaniment supported and embellished. Poet and composer were duly applauded.

There was a compelling performance of Ravel's idea of Moussorgsky's Suite for piano, a performance of marked virtuosity. One might justly ask whether the original version for the piano is not nearer to the Russian's impression of Hartmann's pictures than is Ravel's elaborate transcription, if the title might not well be "Study in Orchestration by Ravel with Helpful Hints by Moussorgsky." The two names are not easily associated.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program of next week will comprise Berlioz's overture to "Benvenuto Cellini," Roussel's new symphony, G minor (first performance); Debussy's "La Mer" and Ravel's "La Valse."

SECOND IN JUBILEE OF SYMPHONY

Harvard and Radcliffe Singers Heard in Hill's Ode

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

The rites with which the Boston Symphony Orchestra is marking the beginning of its 50th season will continue. At the concerts of last Friday and Saturday there was the first conductor, Sir George Henschel, leading the orchestra through what was virtually a repetition of its first programme. This week Dr. Koussevitzky is in command, and among the pieces offered is an Ode written and composed especially for this golden jubilee by Robert Hillyer and Edward Burlingame Hill.

VERSES READ AND SUNG

Before the performance of this Ode yesterday Mr. Hillyer, escorted to the platform by Dr. Koussevitzky, recited his verses which later were sung by a chorus drawn from the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society. Since Mr. Hillyer is an assistant professor in English at Harvard and Mr. Hill the head of the department of music in that university, Cambridge could consider itself well represented.

Mr. Hill's music, made by a practiced hand, will probably not escape the oblivion that awaits most occasional pieces, but for the moment it gave much pleasure; it caressed or stirred the ear and it seemed well fitted to the lines that gave it birth. These last, herewith reproduced, may speak for themselves:

Bannered horn of golden doom
Where the clouded bastions loom,
Flaming dark with ancient wars,
With nobler muci now prevail,
While native trumpets mildly hail
The trumpets calling clear from farther shores.

When these many songs be done,
Merge their harmonies in one!
Mortal past and future yearn
For music vaster than their own;
The Orphic chord, the final tone,
Before the silence whither all return.

Silence, yield! We lay too long
Thrall to thee and strange to song;
Now our fifty singing years
Have flown beyond the reach of time,
And Earth's reverberant echoes climb
To sweet accord with her companion stars.

Windy flute of pastoral themes,
Call to fold our wandering dreams;
Harp, remember, leafy light
That danced above our younger days;
And violins of graver phrase,
Oh, follow love with voices down the night!

Called to the Stage

After the performance of this Ode yesterday Mr. Hill was summoned to the stage by Dr. Koussevitzky that he might acknowledge in person the warm applause that his music had provoked. Mr. Hill is primarily a composer for orchestra but he has written here gracefully and effectively for voices. More mature singers would perhaps have done his music fuller justice.

Familiar matter made most of the balance of yesterday's programme though there came as opening number a pair of preludes of Bach, the one for organ, the other for violin, transcribed for string orchestra by Pick-Mangiagalli. These arrangements valuably extend the range of orchestral Bach and they make yet another vehicle through which Dr. Koussevitzky can display the tonal and technical virtues of his string choir.

Ravel and Moussorgsky

Upon these preludes followed yesterday the Seventh Symphony of Beethoven and in a performance that was in many respects noteworthy. In particular was the Allegretto, one of the finest of all of Beethoven's flights of fancy, beautifully and illuminatingly played.

But no matter how signally Dr. Koussevitzky and his men may triumph with the classics it is in contemporary music that they become truly inimitable. The final number yesterday was Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition," in the more than masterly orchestration of Ravel, and the performance of this so graphic music gave authority to the claim made by Dr. Koussevitzky in his address of last week that the orchestra is now "at its zenith of zeniths."

NEW ODE SUNG AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Anniversary Piece by Two Harvard Professors

Dr Koussevitzky Applauded on First Bow of Season

An ode written at the request of the trustees of the Boston Symphony to commemorate the 50th anniversary of the orchestra was sung at yesterday's Symphony concert by a chorus from the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society. The verses are by Robert Hillyer, the musical setting for chorus and orchestra by Edward Burlingame Hill. Both men are well-known members of the faculty of arts and sciences at Harvard.

Dr Koussevitzky, making his first appearance as conductor for the present season, was warmly welcomed by orchestra and audience.

Mr Hillyer recited his ode to the audience before it was sung by the chorus. It runs as follows:

Silence, yield! We lay too long
Thrall to thee and strange to song:
Now our fifty singing years
Have flown beyond the reach of time,
And Earth's reverberant echoes climb
To sweet accord with her companion stars.

Windy flute of pastoral themes,
Call to fold our wandering dreams:
Harp, remember leafy light
That danced above our younger days:
And violins of graver phrase,
Oh, follow love with voices down the night!

Bannered horn of golden doom
Where the clouded bastions loom,
Flaming dark with ancient wars,
With nobler music now prevail,
While native trumpets mildly hail
The trumpets calling clear from farther shores.

When these many songs be done,
Merge their harmonies in one!
Mortal past and future yearn
For music vaster than their own:
The Orphic chord, the final tone,
Before the silence whither all return.

One cannot expect of verses and music written to honor a particular occasion more than that they shall be correct in form and dignified in manner. The history of both poetry and music offers only the rarest instances when a masterpiece has been produced by such a request as that made to Mr Hillyer and Mr Hill.

Of their joint contribution to the commemoration of the Boston Symphony's anniversary, then, it is only necessary to say that it was above rather than below the level struck by most such occasional pieces in the past. Mr Hill's music belong more obviously to the 20th century than do Mr Hillyer's verses, which might almost have been written in 17th century England.

The concert began with two effective arrangements by Pick-Mangiagalli of preludes by J. S. Bach, scored for string orchestra. The first of these is in D minor, based on the ninth prelude in the Bach Gesellschaft edition of the organ preludes and fugues. The second is the prelude of the third partita, in E major, originally for violin alone. For this the arranger has supplied other parts in Bach's manner, retaining the first violin part as Bach wrote it. These arrangements, performed yesterday for the first time in public, will be welcomed by those who believe it desirable to make more of Bach's music playable by a modern orchestra.

They are open, however, to the obvious objection that all such transcription must face, of taking an unwarrantable liberty with the work of a dead master. Pick-Mangiagalli has done his task in a competent and musicianly manner. But would it not be preferable to have an organist play the D minor prelude, not severed from the fugue which ought to follow; and a violinist play the whole partita if these numbers are to be included on a Symphony program.

Another arrangement on yesterday's program, the now familiar one by Ravel of Musorgsky's piano pieces "Pictures at an Exhibition," is worked out with such astonishing brilliance and such fidelity to the spirit of the original that one is compelled to except it from the foregoing strictures. In this number Dr Koussevitzky, as on several previous occasions, was yesterday at the height of his powers, conducting with the utmost eloquence and verve.

In Beethoven's Seventh Symphony, however, conductor and orchestra were not at their best. In the first movement their noisy and lumbering performance was very disappointing. Of this music d'Indy has said that it should be "like the song of a bird." But yesterday the coarse tone of the strings and the painful overstressing of all strong accents did violence to both the letter and the spirit of a masterpiece.

The other movements fared somewhat better. The tempo in the famous allegretto, for instance, kept to the proper pace and avoided the misplaced languors of some now fashionable interpretations. The finale was well played. No doubt the old excuse that the season has just begun is now in order.

Next week the French composer Roussel will be present to hear the first performances anywhere of his new Symphony in G minor, one of the several important works commissioned by the Boston Symphony for its anniversary season. Partly, no doubt, in his honor, the rest of the program is from French composers. The other numbers are to be Berlioz' "Benvenuto Cellini" overture, Debussy's "La Mer," and Ravel's "La Valse."

P. R.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
REPUBLICAN

OCT

Since the close of the Legion convention the city has been taking account of stock, and there has been inevitable controversy, with some hasty and unthought words uttered. All in all, Boston has enjoyed this convention. Not because it brought two or three million dollars in trade and spending to the city, but because there is a natural and mighty thrill at the thought of having these thousands of former service men, from all the states in the Union, here in this old New England city. We all had a subconscious sense of the bigness of the United States.

As to the behavior of the Legionnaires, we saw much of them and we saw little to criticize—less than might normally have been expected from so many men on a holiday. There were surprisingly few catastrophes. Lurid tales of destruction and misbehavior did not find support in fact.

All in all, here was a splendid lot of Americans, and many of their families, whom Boston welcomed and liked.

A reunion of quite another sort was that of the Boston Symphony orchestra and Sir George Henschel, its first conductor, who last week opened the season of the great band, again conducting, with one change in the program, that which he had led in the old Music hall on October 22, 1881.

Of the orchestra, all the players are new since that birth year; but in the audience were some who had gone the long way with the orchestra's half-century. The soloist also was different; Mme Margaret Matzenauer sang the two solos which 50 years ago had been sung by Annie Louise Cary.

We recall a little boy of years ago who one night attended a concert in Springfield's old City hall—whose great bell had a disconcerting way of booming unwanted obligato in the midst of sober symphonies. On the program, as we recall, was the "Moonlight Sonata"; or maybe there was talk of it among the older people gathered around before the playing of the program began. At all events, the little boy's mother told how the youngster—who was never to be a musician—had written, on a sheet of yellow paper, a try at music. This much amused Mrs Mattoon, who was one of the group, and holding up the program on which the name of Annie Louise Cary was printed in large type, as the evening's soloist, she said:—

"You really ought to call it the 'Lamplight Sonata'—dedicated to Miss Cary-sene."

And that was the first "real joke" that small boy had ever heard, outside his own family, where there were always many; so he never forgot it.

Our Boston Symphony orchestra is now a firmly established institution, and there is none more admirable. It has survived its problems, some of them serious, and if Maj Higginson still retains interest in earthly things, this reunion with the first conductor must have pleased him.

What memories it stirred in the minds of the older persons there, whose thoughts went drifting back to that opening season 50 years ago! For there was much criticism in that first season, and Mr Henschel—he was not Sir George then, of course—suffered from the sharp thrusts of critics. It is most instructive to read, now as this reunion occurs, the excellent story of the orchestra as told by M. A. DeWolfe Howe, published in 1914 by the Houghton Mifflin company and therein recall the difficult days through which the young conductor and the farvisioned Maj Higginson made their victorious way.

Henschel won, of course, and placed the new orchestra on a firm musical foundation. It is worth while to quote from Mr Howe's book these few words, from Mr Henschel's own account of his farewell:—

"I shall never forget that last symphony concert I conducted in 1884. It was, to begin with, the 'Manfred Overture.' I had just made the last touch with my baton to insure silence and raised it for the first sharp chord of the overture, when to my utter surprise and dismay—the whole orchestra and behind me the whole audience rose to their feet and instead of hearing the 'Manfred Overture,' my ears bathed in the flow of 'Auld Lang Syn,' sung by a thousand people."

And again on this 1930 reunion a Boston audience stood and cheered Mr Henschel. Altogether, this seems to be an emotional season for old Boston.

THIS CLIPPING FROM FALL RIVER, MASS.
HERALD

HIS GREATEST TRIUMPH.

(Boston Post.)

Not to many men is given the privilege of having the greatest triumph of a lifetime after more than fourscore years of existence. Too often those who reach this advanced age are relegated to the figurative hearthstone, simply waiting the call of the Reaper. But Sir George Henschel, first conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, never before received such acclaim as that which engulfed him Friday and Saturday. It was truly a climax to a brilliant career. How fine it is that this splendid old man should be thus deservedly hailed in the evening of his distinguished life.

THIS CLIPPING FROM RICHMOND, VA.
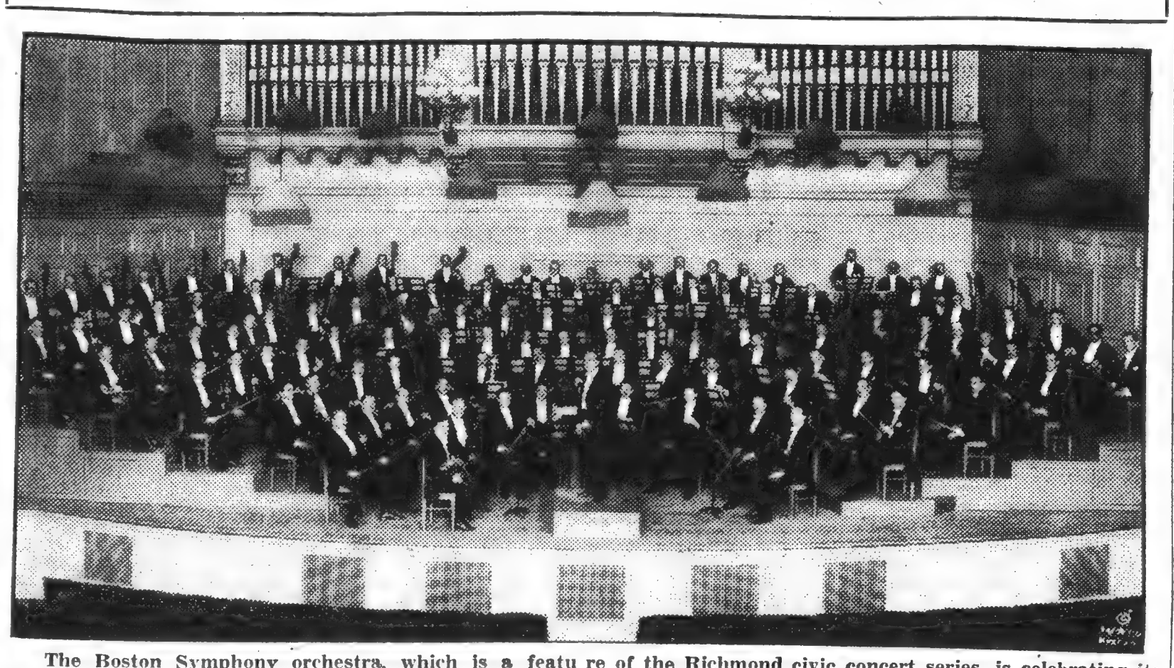
NEWS LEADER

Boston Symphony Orchestra to Be Heard Here



The Boston Symphony orchestra, which is a featu re of the Richmond civic concert series, is celebrating its fiftieth anniversary this season. The orchestra plays i n concert at the Mosque Feb. 2, the fifth attraction of a series, including Paderewski, Paul Kochanski, Don Cossa ck chorus, Mme. Claire Clairbert and Kreutzberg and Georgi, dancers. Series tickets are now on sale at the M osque by the Richmond Civic Musical Association at $1 to $10 for all six attractions.

THIS CLIPPING FROM LAUREL, MISS.
LEADER

OCT 15 1930

A Semi-Centennial of Music

On October 10-11 the Boston Symphony Orchestra celebrated its semi-centennial with a repetition of the concert of fifty years ago, when, with Sir George Henschel, started it on its career.

Sir George was then in his thirty-fifth year. The other day he came back from London to Boston to conduct the Boston Symphony in its festal concert, and he was eighty-one.

The public may have looked on his return with a little of the dread one feels in seeing the shadow of former strength. When Sir George emerged from the ante-room on the stroke of the hour, he walked as quickly, as alertly as ever. He was a bit stooped in the shoulders, a bit heavier through the torso.

He took his place as conductor of the orchestra, and directed the music scoreless through a long and difficult program, "all flow and measure."

The Boston Symphony Orchestra took great pride in the return of that first conductor, and in the fact that its first program, with the excepion of one number, was as good music and as well received as any that might have been assembled for a present-day concert.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra never fails to attract great crowds. It has the ardent following of its city, and yet has never lowered its standards of really great music. It receives the financial support it deserves.

It has popularized good music. No musical organization could hope to do more.

THIS CLIPPING FROM QUINCY, MASS.
PATRIOT LEDGER

OCT 16 1930

Good Music

Frederick Stock, conductor of the Chicago symphony orchestra, returning from a summer abroad, says: "Europe's lead over America in music rests with the few at the top. In judging great musical contests during the last few years, I have discovered that three-fourths of the entries are worthless, but in the remaining fourth you must watch out for fear of overlooking genuine talent."

He quotes Director Koussevitsky of the Boston orchestra as saying that our present American music, on the whole, is better than Europe's. By the same token, our worst is probably worse than Europe's. And it is the worst that we hear oftenest. The good, new stuff must be appreciated. Talented composers must be encouraged. It seems a pity, though, for music-lovers to be so overwhelmed by musical rubbish as they are, when there is a world full of good music already available. Why not make more use of what has been proved good?

THIS CLIPPING FROM WINSTED, CONN.
CITIZEN

OCT 16 1930

GOOD MUSIC

Frederick Stock, conductor of the Chicago Symphony orchestra, returning from a summer aboard, says:

"Europe's lead over America in music rests with the few at the top.

"In judging great musical contests during the last few years, I have discovered that three-fourths of the entries are worthless, but in the remaining fourth you must watch out for fear of overlooking genuine talent."

He quotes Director Koussevitzky of the Boston orchestra as saying that our present American music, on the whole, is better than Europe's.

By the same token, our worst is probably worse than Europe's. And it is the worst that we hear oftenest.

The good, new stuff must be appreciated. Talented composers must be encouraged. It seems a pity, though, for music-lovers to be so overwhelmed by musical rubbish as they are, when there is a world full of good music already available. Why not make more use of what has been proved good?

THIS CLIPPING FROM CHICAGO, ILL.
NEWS

First conductor of the Boston Symphony arrives to attend that orchestra's golden jubilee. Sir George Henschel, a picturesque figure in current musical history, sits for his picture aboard S. S. Britannic.
(By Underwood & Underwood)

32

THIS CLIPPING FROM REVIEW
Bayside N.Y.
OCT 17 1930

WE, TOO ACT and MAKE MUSIC

PRESS CLIPPINGS

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
NEWS
Flushing N.Y.
OCT 17 1930

WE, TOO ACT and MAKE MUSIC

PRESS CLIPPINGS

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
NEWS
Richmond Hill

WE, TOO ACT and MAKE MUSIC

By FREDERICK BRUEGGER

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HERALD
White Plains N.Y.
OCT 17 1930

WE, TOO ACT and MAKE MUSIC

By FREDERICK BRUEGGER

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is celebrating its fiftieth anniversary and by far, at least to me, the outstanding joy of it is the fact that Sir George Henschel conducted.

Only a few weeks ago I was coaching an artist amateur who, among other songs sent her rich contralto voice ringing through Henschel's inspiring 'Morning Hymn.' We wondered about him. It was thought that he must have passed Beyond. Yet last Friday he directed the orchestra in the same program he had conducted in Boston forty-nine years before.

The Boston dispatches say that Sir George was born in Breslau eighty and a half years ago but that his personal appearance and his manner of conducting "a firm, undemonstrative and clear, vigorous beat" belie his years. "Wonderful," we say, and yet that old "three score and ten" sentence ought never have been passed and should be remanded for appeal by all just as Sir George must have done.

Frederick Bruegger

Some time ago I mentioned two grandmothers, Scheumann-Heink and Louise Homer, who are appealing the sentence of vocal death; also I told how Sousa is reprieving himself, for it is our own selves must do the appealing and the reprieving by keeping our artistic faculties working. And now we have another proof that years may be told to stand back.

I'm willing to wager that Sir George still sings.

In my vocal youth I used to sit near the front—whenever I had the price—as not only to hear but to watch him as he sang in concert. As naturally as if he were telling a story he would sit at the piano, no notes before him, seemingly or quite unconscious of the fact that he [illegible] and [illegible] do in accompanying, singing dramatically, sympathetically, whatever the mood of the song demanded. It was Art with a capital "A."

Accompanying [illegible] Mary [illegible] and [illegible]

Mme. Tetzel, who [illegible] made a great [illegible] and the newspapers once told us that, at a concert [illegible] had heard De Pachmann, the wizard of the pianoforte, [illegible] accompanist for [illegible] and ever and anon [illegible] knew up to [illegible] and admire time he could [illegible] accompany the [illegible] in his playing. Wonderful as his work is for others, [illegible] the composer to improve upon.

Too Much of This Today

There is such a [illegible] out with the idea [illegible] really there [illegible] er was ever [illegible] ages.

Interdependence [illegible] It must be in [illegible] Our [illegible] done immediately [illegible] tered [illegible] dependence [illegible] support [illegible] well [illegible] talent of the [illegible]

Sir George [illegible] immensely thrilled by [illegible] Boston. However the performance would have been a [illegible] not [illegible] between [illegible] every [illegible] orchestra.

[illegible] would like to [illegible] of all the [illegible] place [illegible] what I thought and did there. That is the Stock Exchange that buys nothing and sells nothing but even so keeps the entire population of the earth in [illegible] because of nothing, that [illegible] what [illegible] yet, before the [illegible] are [illegible] into [illegible].

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. EVE. WORLD

MUSIC BRIEFS

Ernest Hutcheson, dean of the Juilliard Graduate School, has announced the award of fifty-five fellowships as a result of recent examinations of music students. The fellowships are for composition, piano, voice, violin, cello and a newly inaugurated department of conducting. The successful students represent fifteen states. Two, a violinist and a cellist, are to go to Germany in exchange for two German students who come here to study.

The organ recital that Fernando Germani was to have given in the Wanamaker Auditorium next Monday has been indefinitely postponed.

"Ode," written by Edward Burlingame Hill for the fiftieth anniversary of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will be performed at Boston today, and later in New York.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TIMES
OCT 17 1930

MUSIC NOTES.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Serge [illegible] conducting again, will present this afternoon in Symphony Hall in Boston Edward Burlingame Hill's "Ode," written for the fiftieth anniversary of the Boston orchestra, based on a poem by Robert Hillyer. The other pieces on the program are two preludes by Bach, arranged for string orchestra by Pick-Mangiagalli; Beethoven's Seventh symphony and Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition," arranged for orchestra by Ravel.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TELEGRAM

Sir George Henschel, conducting as guest the other day the first concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's fiftieth season, stirred Philip Hale to the following comment in the Boston Herald:—

"He conducted with the force and the gusto of a young man exultant in the direction of a great orchestra. It is doubtful whether as a young man of 31 he conducted with the same confidence and vigor. . . . Here is Sir George amazingly buoyant, enthusiastic, virile."

Henschel, who is now in his 81st year, was the original conductor of the Boston Symphony.

Concert-Chronicle

OCT 17

Cantabrigian Bow

BEFORE Dr. Koussevitzky can appear before his Boston audiences, fate, in the guise of the schedule-maker, decrees that he shall conduct in Cambridge. And in Cambridge he did conduct last evening, assembling a program from a variety of sources: from the list of the current week at Symphony Hall, Beethoven's Seventh Symphony; from the radio broadcast of two weeks ago, Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel" and Debussy's "Prelude to the Afternoon of a Faun"; from Sir George Henschel's program, the prelude to Wagner's "The Mastersingers of Nüremberg." By way of greeting, a large floral "piece" of dark red roses hung suspended from the conductor's stand; further, orchestra and audience rose amid much hand-clapping when Dr. Koussevitzky made his way to the conductor's stand.

The course of the symphony Dr. Koussevitzky planned in such a way as to make everything lead up to that riot of sound which is its finale. Gradually the long ascent of the introduction unfolded. At its end the conductor held his men poised for the plunge into the hurtling rhythms of the first movement. And then the insistent rhythms themselves, leaping this way and that, never ceasing, always renewing themselves in some fresh felicity of melody, surging relentlessly onward and onward. The first movement, corner-stone of the symphony, completed, there unfolded that succession of three movements which begins in the lowest depths and continues through many an intervening stage until it reaches its goal in the almost overwhelming tumults of the finale. Beautifully paced, of a buoyant elasticity, was the Allegretto, which can be so easily misread into a thing of gloom. From its darkening beginnings it rose to regions of hope and joy before the close came. Followed the tripping scherzo, all lightness and grace, but an inevitable link in the chain leading to the final goal. And, that goal (which is finale) once reached, it came with an intensity that made it seem as if Dr. Koussevitzky had been practicing only restraints when he released its vigors. All in all, a memorable reading of a great symphony.

No story-teller or a painter could be more graphic with his stories of the old rogue of German legend, Till Eulenspiegel, than was Dr. Koussevitzky. Herr Dr. Strauss's musical version of that questionable hero's exploits. The wag once again stood portrayed; was heard rushing on his horse through the old wives' pots and pans in the marketplace; preaching morality clad in clerical vestments; wooing, losing, raging at his loss; assuming learned mien the while he mocks it; going on his way, singing his nonchalant merry tune; suffering stern denunciation, condemnation, hard death itself. One can hardly meet this most perfect of Strauss's tone poems other than with pure delight. And last evening that delight was much enhanced by the sheer beauty, the exquisite proportioning of the performance.

So with the vague gambolings, the half-formed sensations of Debussy's awakening faun, trying to remember darkly the experiences of a previous afternoon. Again pure loveliness from conductor and men.

With Sir George Henschel's "Mastersingers' Prelude" still ringing in one's ears, it is nothing short of inevitable that one should make comparison of the ways of two generations with that prelude. The older generation passed in review the pomps and the ceremoniousness, the dignities and the splendors, the magnificent pageantry of the powerful old singers' guild. Was not the very title of opera and of prelude, "The Mastersingers," were not they the central figures in the work? Then must their music dominate all; then must all else be secondary. But much as one had thrilled to the magnificences of Sir George with this prelude, one discovered that the reading representing the present generation, with Dr. Koussevitzky as its mouthpiece, added greatly to this idea of the Mastersingers and lost nothing in the process. For after all, it is not really the guild of the singers who are at the heart of either opera or prelude. They furnish no more than background and occasion—and are occasionally at the hands of Wagner an object of ridicule. Wagner's central theme is the freshness and the spontaneity and the great love of Walter. About this theme and the accompanying music all other themes, all other musics must group themselves. Thus Dr. Koussevitzky last evening. And under his hands a pompous old piece becomes a work teeming with lyricism, full of song and the joys of song, giving voice to the exuberance of youthful creation, the joys and the triumphs of budding love. All this Wagner put into his score. One heard and felt it last evening.

A. H. M.

Incident

THIS CLIPPING FROM ALEXANDRIA, LA.
TOWN TALK

Good Music

Frederick Stock, conductor of the Chicago symphony orchestra, returning from a summer abroad, says:

"Europe's lead over America in music rests with the few at the top.

In judging great musical contests during the last few years, I have discovered that three-fourths of the entries are worthless, but in the remaining fourth you must watch out for fear of overlooking genuine talent.

He quotes Director Koussevitzky of the Boston orchestra as saying that our present American music, on the whole, is better than Europe's.

By the same token, our worst is probably worse than Europe's. And it is the worst that we hear oftenest.

The good, new stuff must be appreciated. Talented composers must be encouraged. It seems a pity, though, for music lovers to be so overwhelmed by musical rubbish as they are, when there is a world full of good music already available. Why not make more use of what has been proved good?

ATURDAY, OCTOBER 18, 1930

MUSIC

SYMPHONY CONCERT

By PHILIP HALE

The program of the concert given by the Boston Symphony orchestra yesterday afternoon in Symphony hall was as follows: Bach-Pick-Mangiagalli, two preludes; Adagio and Vivace, for string orchestra (first performance). Beethoven, symphony No. 7. Hill, An Ode (Robert Hillyer's poem) for the 50th Anniversary of the Orchestra (first performance. Moussorgsky-Ravel, "Pictures tures at an exhibition."

They will not let Bach alone; they think he stands in need of transcriptions for orchestra to make his name more illustrious. In London we heard a few months ago a thunderous orchestral version by Respighi of the Passacaglia, which was written originally for a species of pedal piano. Mr. Pick-Mangiagalli was more modest in his homage as a transcriber. He took the slow movement of an organ prelude to a fugue in D minor, music that suggests the treatment he gave it. For the quick movement he chose a prelude in Bach's Partita No. 3, which, utilized by Bach for other purposes, has been made familiar by organists as well as violinists. For the latter prelude he kept the original first violin part, and under it wrote other parts in the "strict contrapuntal manner of Bach."

In saying this he was not presumptuous. His own Fugue played here a year ago proved that he had a mastery of counterpoint and not merely in the pedant's sense, for his music had vitality and when grace and beauty were needed they were not missing. The first prelude played yesterday might have been transcribed by Bach himself for strings: it was so ingenious, at the same time so serene, so lovely in its tenderness. The Fugue, taken at a most rapid pace, was exciting. The parts written by the transcriber added to the musical excitement and seemed a necessary integral part; there was no hint at modernization. The expressive euphony of performance in the first prelude, the dazzling brilliance of the strings in the second were at once appreciated, warmly appreciated by the audience. Seldom is a new, unknown work so cordially received.

Mr. Koussevitzky was heartily welcomed when he came on the platform. Orchestra and audience stood to greet him. The welcome was spontaneous on the part of the audience, hearty and sincere. Having conducted the transcriptions with gusto, admiring the work of the composer as he does, he with his valiant artists gave an incomparable interpretation of Beethoven's symphony. Not that he endeavored to make all things new, but as is his way with Beethoven's music, familiarity with it does not in him breed indifference, the willingness to "let the music speak for itself," an excuse given by uninspired or lazy conductors for tame, perfunctory performance. That of yesterday was charged with the composer's Dionysiac spirit; there was the wildness of joy in the lively movements, the poetic frenzy, Bacchic revelry, while the famous Allegretto was free from the lethargic sentimentalism that some conductors find necessary for contrast. Here the great Beethoven was revealed in a manner that made the epithet "titanic" bestowed on him by biographers fond of purple phrases and the swollen style, seem not extravagant.

Before the performance of Mr. Hill's "Ode," the poet spoke his verses; then they were sung by the combined chorus of the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society. They were also printed in the program book. All this, so that there might be no possible excuse for those present not dilating with the right emotions, music or no music.

The poetic sentiments served well the musician, who made of his work a little cantata, conspicuous for clear effective writing for the chorus; and for an instrumental prelude and interludes that, while they displayed tasteful instrumentation, anticipated and then sustained the poet's various declarations. In writing for the chorus, Mr. Hill treated the singers as human beings with vocal limitations, not as orchestral instruments. He shrewdly used female voices for a stanza that seemed to require them. The maidens from Radcliffe clad in a Fascist uniform but with white collars came on the stage in solemn procession. A dash of red, or even of heliotrope, would better have suited the occasion. They did not, lifting up their voices, lament with a great lamentation, as one would have expected from their garb. They sang sweetly and smoothly of "Windy," not waterlogged, flute, harp, and "violins of graver phrase," while the more heroic spirit of the third stanza filled the breasts of the Harvard men and was expelled in their characteristically broken, syllabic sentences with the staccato that often was like unto a bark. Mr. Hill's accompaniment preserved due proportion; there was no attempt to outvie in strength and stress the vocal forces; the accompaniment supported and embellished. Poet and composer were duly applauded.

There was a compelling performance of Ravel's idea of Moussorgsky's Suite for piano, a performance of marked virtuosity. One might justly ask, whether the original version for the piano is not nearer to the Russian's impression of Hartmann's pictures than is Ravel's elaborate transcription, if the title might not well be "Study in Orchestration by Ravel with Helpful Hints by Moussorgsky." The two names are not easily associated.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program of next week will comprise Berlioz's overture to "Benvenuto Cellini," Roussel's new symphony, G minor (first performance), Debussy's "La Mer" and Ravel's "La Valse."

TON POST, SATUR

SECOND IN JUBILEE OF SYMPHONY

Harvard and Radcliffe Singers Heard in Hill's Ode

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

The rites with which the Boston Symphony Orchestra is marking the beginning of its 50th season will continue. At the concerts of last Friday and Saturday there was the first conductor, Sir George Henschel, leading the orchestra through what was virtually a repetition of its first programme. This week Dr. Koussevitzky is in command, and among the pieces offered is an Ode written and composed especially for this golden jubilee by Robert Hillyer and Edward Burlingame Hill.

VERSES READ AND SUNG

Before the performance of this Ode yesterday Mr. Hillyer, escorted to the platform by Dr. Koussevitzky, recited his verses which later were sung by a chorus drawn from the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society. Since Mr. Hillyer is an assistant professor in English at Harvard and Mr. Hill the head of the department of music in that university, Cambridge could consider itself well represented.

Mr. Hill's music, made by a practiced hand, will probably not escape the oblivion that awaits most occasional pieces, but for the moment it gave much pleasure; it caressed or stirred the ear and it seemed well fitted to the lines that gave it birth. These last, herewith reproduced, may speak for themselves:

Bannered horn of golden doom
Where the clouded bastions loom,
Flaming dark with ancient wars,
With nobler music now prevail,
While native trumpets mildly hail
The trumpets calling clear from farther shores.

When these many songs be done,
Merge their harmonies in one!
Mortal past and future yearn
For music vaster than their own;
The Orphic chord, the final tone,
Before the silence whither all return.

Silence, yield! We lay too long
Thrall to thee and strange to song;
Now our fifty singing years
Have flown beyond the reach of time,
And Earth's reverberant echoes climb
To sweet accord with her companion stars.

Windy flute of pastoral themes,
Call to fold our wandering dreams;
Harp, remember, leafy light
That danced above our younger days;
And violins of graver phrase,
Oh, follow love with voices down the night!

Called to the Stage

After the performance of this Ode yesterday Mr. Hill was summoned to the stage by Dr. Koussevitzky that he might acknowledge in person the warm applause that his music had provoked. Mr. Hill is primarily a composer for orchestra but he has written here gracefully and effectively for voices. More mature singers would perhaps have done his music fuller justice.

Familiar matter made most of the balance of yesterday's programme though there came as opening number a pair of preludes of Bach, the one for organ, the other for violin, transcribed for string orchestra by Pick-Mangiagalli. These arrangements valuably extend the range of orchestral Bach and they make yet another vehicle through which Dr. Koussevitzky can display the tonal and technical virtues of his string choir.

Ravel and Moussorgsky

Upon these preludes followed yesterday the Seventh Symphony of Beethoven and in a performance that was in many respects noteworthy. In particular was the Allegretto, one of the finest of all of Beethoven's flights of fancy, beautifully and illuminatingly played.

But no matter how signally Dr. Koussevitzky and his men may triumph with the classics it is in contemporary music that they become truly inimitable. The final number yesterday was Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition," in the more than masterly orchestration of Ravel, and the performance of this so graphic music gave authority to the claim made by Dr. Koussevitzky in his address of last week that the orchestra is now "at its zenith of zeniths."

NEW ODE SUNG AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Anniversary Piece by Two Harvard Professors

Dr Koussevitzky Applauded on First Bow of Season

An ode written at the request of the trustees of the Boston Symphony to commemorate the 50th anniversary of the orchestra was sung at yesterday's Symphony concert by a chorus from the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society. The verses are by Robert Hillyer, the musical setting for chorus and orchestra by Edward Burlingame Hill. Both men are well-known members of the faculty of arts and sciences at Harvard.

Dr Koussevitzky, making his first appearance as conductor for the present season, was warmly welcomed by orchestra and audience.

Mr Hillyer recited his ode to the audience before it was sung by the chorus. It runs as follows:

Silence, yield! We lay too long
Thrall to thee and strange to song;
Now our fifty singing years
Have flown beyond the reach of time,
And Earth's reverberant echoes climb
To sweet accord with her companion stars.

Windy flute of pastoral themes,
Call to fold our wandering dreams;
Harp, remember leafy light
That danced above our younger days;
And violins of graver phrase,
Oh, follow love with voices down the night!

Bannered horn of golden doom
Where the clouded bastions loom,
Flaming dark with ancient wars,
With nobler music now prevail,
While native trumpets mildly hail
The trumpets calling clear from farther shores.

When these many songs be done,
Merge their harmonies in one!
Mortal past and future yearn
For music vaster than their own;
The Orphic chord, the final tone,
Before the silence whither all return.

One cannot expect of verses and music written to honor a particular occasion more than that they shall be correct in form and dignified in manner. The history of both poetry and music offers only the rarest instances when a masterpiece has been produced by such a request as that made to Mr Hillyer and Mr Hill.

Of their joint contribution to the commemoration of the Boston Symphony's anniversary, then, it is only necessary to say that it was above rather than below the level struck by most such occasional pieces in the past. Mr Hill's music belong more obviously to the 20th century than do Mr Hillyer's verses, which might almost have been written in 17th century England.

The concert began with two effective arrangements by Pick-Mangiagalli of preludes by J. S. Bach, scored for string orchestra. The first of these is in D minor, based on the ninth prelude in the Bach Gesellschaft edition of the organ preludes and fugues. The second is the prelude of the third partita, in E major, originally for violin alone. For this the arranger has supplied other parts in Bach's manner, retaining the first violin part as Bach wrote it. These arrangements, performed yesterday for the first time in public, will be welcomed by those who believe it desirable to make more of Bach's music playable by a modern orchestra.

They are open, however, to the obvious objection that all such transcription must face, of taking an unwarrantable liberty with the work of a dead master. Pick-Mangiagalli has done his task in a competent and musicianly manner. But would it not be preferable to have an organist play the D minor prelude, not severed from the fugue which ought to follow; and a violinist play the whole partita if these numbers are to be included on a Symphony program.

Another arrangement on yesterday's program, the now familiar one by Ravel of Musorgsky's piano pieces "Pictures at an Exhibition," is worked out with such astonishing brilliance and such fidelity to the spirit of the original that one is compelled to except it from the foregoing strictures. In this number Dr Koussevitzky, as on several previous occasions, was yesterday at the height of his powers, conducting with the utmost eloquence and verve.

In Beethoven's Seventh Symphony, however, conductor and orchestra were not at their best. In the first movement their noisy and lumbering performance was very disappointing. Of this music d'Indy has said that it should be "like the song of a bird." But yesterday the coarse tone of the strings and the painful overstressing of all strong accents did violence to both the letter and the spirit of a masterpiece.

The other movements fared somewhat better. The tempo in the famous allegretto, for instance, kept to the proper pace and avoided the misplaced languors of some now fashionable interpretations. The finale was well played. No doubt the old excuse that the season has just begun is now in order.

Next week the French composer Roussel will be present to hear the first performances anywhere of his new Symphony in G minor, one of the several important works commissioned by the Boston Symphony for its anniversary season. Partly, no doubt, in his honor, the rest of the program is from French composers. The other numbers are to be Berlioz' "Benvenuto Cellini" overture, Debussy's "La Mer," and Ravel's "La Valse." P. R.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
MERCURY
OCT 13 1930

A very interesting event occurred in Boston last week which compensated for the disrepute that came to the city in the manifestations of lawlessness in the Massachusetts capital. The Boston Symphony Orchestra celebrated its fiftieth anniversary. A picturesque incident was the fact that Sir George Henschel, the first conductor, led the orchestra. There was curiosity concerning the personality of the leader who would resume the baton at the age of eighty-one. The black-whiskered Henschel was not to be forgotten. We recall his appearances in New Bedford at the time, with his orchestra on one or two occasions, but rather in concert. Henschel had a baritone voice and gave voice recitals here with Mrs. Henschel who used to turn a languishing face to his as they sang their songs of Arcady, or wherever it was they loved. But the audience saw nothing of senility in the sound and sturdy man with a military set-up and enthusiasm in his eyes albeit gray whiskers who conducted the great orchestra built upon the corner stone of the structure he had raised through the financing and zest of Major Higginson.

To indicate how long ago it was when Henschel came to Boston, it may be related that he brought a letter of introduction from Robert Browning to Charles Perkins and another from Lord Houghton to Henry W. Longfellow. Henschel was a pianist as well as a singer, a composer and a conductor, and it was his success as conductor of the Harvard Musical Association that led Major Higginson to decide that he had found a leader who would carry out his dream of a Boston Symphony Orchestra which would do for Boston what the great orchestras of Europe did for their respective cities.

In the audience Friday afternoon where she has been a figure for fifty years, sat Mrs. Henry Lee Higginson, now ninety-two years old, bearing a bouquet of roses, a patron of the art her husband loved, whose fortune endowed and whose enthusiasm kept alive this great musical organization. And there were others present who heard the first concert and came from their homes on the venerable streets. Sir George kissed several of the old ladies on the cheek, and greeted their sons and daughters and grandsons and granddaughters who have received the legacy of the founders.

34

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TIMES

LETTERS FROM TIMES READERS

Sir George Henschel — More 'Boheme' History and Casts

To the Editor of The New York Times:

Reading in THE TIMES columns of the return of Sir George Henschel, after a lapse of forty-six years, to once more conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra, brings to mind those early days when we young students of painting at the school of the Boston Museum of Fine Arts used to attend the public rehearsals of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for relaxation and inspiration. This was in the first year of the orchestra's existence.

George Henschel's method of conducting at these rehearsals was stimulating and unconventional.

He shocked many by rearranging the placement of the orchestra. A baritone singer of renown, he often accentuated or interpreted passages by singing vigorously while wielding the baton.

This picturesque young conductor and singer, with his shock of black hair and trimmed beard, always evoked enthusiasm from his audiences, it mattered not whether he was conducting or spectacularly singing Mephistophels in the "Damnation de Faust," or, immediately after his marriage to an American soprano, singing in duet with his young wife the simple song, "O that we two were Maying."

While Boston Music Hall had for years harbored the Boston Philharmonic, the Handel and Haydn Society and the Apollo Club, it was the first concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with the original inspiring young Henschel, which set the musical world of Boston agog and established a never-to-be-forgotten milestone in the history of music in America.

J. WILLIAM FOSDICK.
New York, Oct. 14, 1930.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
POST

OCT 1930

THIS CLIPPING FROM PORTLAND, ORE.
OREGONIAN

Boston Symphony Orchestra Nearly Fifty Years Old.

Writer Recalls Organization and Experiences of Conductor.

BY JOHN HENRY COLEMAN.

BOSTON, Oct. 18.—(Special.)—It will soon be 50 years since Sir George Henschel became the first conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, for the first concert of that organization took place under Mr. Henschel's direction October 22, 1881. He remained in that position three years. The half-century of that orchestra will be completed October 22, 1931. The program rendered at the first concert consisted of: Overture opus 124, "Dedication of the House" (Beethoven); air, "Orpheus" (Gluck); symphony in B flat (Haydn); ballet music, 'Rosamunde" (Schubert); scene, "Odysseus" (Max Bruch) and festival overture (Weber).

The music world knows that the Boston Symphony orchestra, and its first conductor, George Henschel, owes their being to their financial backer and artistic adviser, Major Henry L. Higginson.

When the orchestra was assembled the musicians were asked to conform to a set of rules drawn up by Mr. Henschel, and the latter has left this memorandum of the incident:

To the members of the Boston Symphony orchestra:

Gentlemen—I beg leave to say a few words to you now, in order to avoid waste of time after our work has once begun. Wherever a body of men are working together for one and the same end, as you and I, the utmost of unity and mutual understanding is required in order to achieve anything that is great or good.

Everyone of us, engaged for the concerts we are on the point of beginning, has been engaged because his powers, his talents have been considered valuable for the purpose. Every one of us, therefore, should have a like interest as well as a like share in the success of our work, and it is in this regard that I address you now, calling your attention to the following points with which I urgently beg of you to acquaint yourselves thoroughly:

Let us be punctual. Better ten minutes before than one behind the time appointed.

Tuning will cease the moment the conductor gives the sign for doing so.

No member of the orchestra, even if his presence be not needed for the moment, will leave the hall during the time of the rehearsals and concerts without the consent of the conductor.

The folios containing the parts will be closed after each rehearsal and concert.

Inasmuch as we are engaged for musical purposes we will not talk of private matters during rehearsals and concerts.

Hoping that, thus working together with perfect understanding, our labors will be crowned with success, I am, gentlemen, your obedient servant. G. H.

As to criticisms directed against Sir George, he was severely handled in his early days as orchestral conductor in Boston. One Boston music critic thus wrote:

Mr. Henschel will appear as pianist, composer and conductor, and he has already appeared as a singer in the series. That is a good deal for one man to do. But he will do it with all satisfaction to the public, which seems to be entirely captivated by him. The only thing he cannot do is to appear as a string quartet or sing duets with himself.

Sir George Henschel, accompanied by Lady Henschel and their daughter Elizabeth Georgie Henschel, arrived recently in this country for the semi-centennial celebration of this orchestra, and Sir George conducted a rehearsal of the Boston Symphony orchestra October 10.

Celebrate Orchestra's Fiftieth Anniversary

ENTHUSIASTIC reports continue to come from the North concerning the spectacular opening concert at Symphony Hall, Boston, recently, which ushered in the fiftieth anniversary season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. This same orchestra, incidentally, under the baton of Serge Koussevitzky, will present a four-concert Beethoven festival at Convention Hall on December 2, 3, 5 and 6, under the local management of Mrs. Wilson-Greene.

The first regular concert of the Boston Symphony's fiftieth season was conducted at Symphony Hall in Boston on Friday afternoon, October 10, by Sir George Henschel, the symphony's first conductor, who led this famous Boston musical organization through its first concert on October 22, 1881. Sir George selected, for its first concert of its golden jubilee season, the same program he had played 46 years ago with the single exception of a final number.

This erstwhile director in chief of the Boston Orchestra, although 80 years old, came to this country from his home in England especially for this occasion. Apparently, it was worth the effort, for at the conclusion of the concert the entire audience and orchestra rose en masse to applaud the man who, although four-score years of age, "conducted with the force and the gusto of a young man exultant in the direction of a great orchestra," to quote Philip Hale in the Boston Herald. "It is doubtful," Hale continued, "whether as a young man of 31 he conducted with the same confidence and vigor."

The program Sir George conducted after he had been officially welcomed by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, included Beethoven's overture to "The Consecration of the House;" Gluck's "Che faro senza Eurydice," from "Orfeo et Eurydice;" Haydn's B-flat symphony (B. & H., No. 12); Schubert's ballet music from "Rosamunde;" Bruch's "Penelope's Sorrow," from "Odysseus;" and Wagner's prelude to "The Meistersingers of Nuremburg." This last number was substituted for Weber's "Festival" overture. Margaret Matzenauer was soloist.

Immediately after the concert Sir George was taken to a reception room, where he met, after a lapse of many years, the 92-year-old widow of Maj. Henry Lee Higginson, the man whose money made the Boston Symphony Orchestra possible and who maintained it for many years and who brought Sir George Henschel to Boston as its first conductor. C. A. Ellis, first manager of the orchestra, was on hand also for the event.

Philip Hale, commenting critically on the performance, brought out the fact that this program 46 years ago was regarded as radical and anarchistic though it seems respectable enough today, "or, as one would say, dull. What conductor today would put 'The Consecration of the House' in rehearsal if Beethoven's name was not signed to it?"

Quoting from one of the reviews—thrilling reviews—of the recent 50th anniversary observance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra:

"A great celebration was being enacted at Symphony Hall during the week just passed, for the Boston Symphony Orchestra was inaugurating the 50th year of its history. But for an 80-year-old man and some of his friends there was something more—there was drama.

"The concert-going public, which buys every seat in the hall in advance of the season, is sentimentally aroused by the fact that the man who was its first conductor came back, at the invitation of the trustees, almost 50 years later, to conduct the opening pair of concerts on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. Oct. 10-11. It was 'wonderful' that he should be alive on this occasion, and be able to raise a baton.

"But for Sir George Henschel, for many years a resident of England where he is still a semi-practicing musician, the week is more than a passing show. It is the culmination of a brilliant career, a logical and deserved tribute to the first artistic builder of what is now a magnificent and world-famous structure—the Boston Symphony Orchestra. And yet—such is the genuine simplicity of the man—he would waive this praise aside. And he actually did, when Serge Koussevitzky, the orchestra's present conductor, uttered such sentiments before the assembled audiences at the opening concerts. Sir George's shrugs were eloquent.

"The simplicity, the gentle humor of this man, mellowed by experience, is evident as he poses for a photograph, without fuss, and fuming. It is evident as, at a rehearsal, he spurs his men on to their best performance. His tone is not domineering. He does not command. But he imparts his wishes, he makes contagious his excitement with the music at hand. This man of eighty has not yet sung his swan song. As he rehearses his men you see clearly that he is still the practicing, sensitive conductor. The men sitting under him marvelled first at his exuberant vitality, then even more at his keen musical brain.

"He still has a few friends left from the old days of '81. Arthur Foote, Boston composer, is one of them. Sixty persons have written him to say they heard his first concert a half-century ago in Boston. Four of his original players, now retired from the orchestra, were on stage to greet him.

"What memories! Memories of those three years when he was shaping the orchestra, when the success of the venture with the public was surprisingly great and prompt, while the critics 'roasted' the young German musician. Ridicule and abuse were hurled at him, and one writer parodied on his name: 'Eggshel Concert; Conductor, Henor Eggshel.' His memories go back more than 50 years of concerts in England and the continent, as well as America. They include a changed picture of musical England, with orchestral music of the best type becoming ever better and more widely known. Memories of his friendship with the great Johannes Brahms, when that man was being villified by Wagnerians, or classed as a bore by critics and public alike. Memories of Wagner, of Liszt, of Clara Schumann and Richter, of Bruch and Sullivan.

"Yet at eighty he plans to broadcast concerts. Memories are not enough for this man.'

THIS CLIPPING FROM BALTIMORE, MD.
SUN

BEETHOVEN FESTIVAL

It is not too soon to speak of the Beethoven festival by the Boston Symphony Orchestra scheduled for December 2, 3, 5 and 6 in Washington, similiar to the one given in Boston recently. It is most fitting that the Boston aggregation hold its fiftieth anniversary celebration in the nation's capital.

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, the brilliant conductor of the Boston musicians, will direct the four concerts which will be further marked by the appearance of two renowned pianists, Josef Hofmann and Harold Bauer, and Efrem Zimbalist, violinist. Both Messrs. Bauer and Hofmann are considered to be probably the finest piano interpreters of Beethoven now living. The final program will include Beethoven's Ninth Symphony with full orchestra and a chorus of 200.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
LOWELL, MASS.
COURIER CITIZEN

OCT 2 2 1930

Boston Programs.

Novelty in the programs of the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening this week will be Roussel's new Symphony in G minor. This is one of the pieces written especially for performance by the orchestra in its golden anniversary year. The composer expects to be present at the performances of his work, although as guest and not as conductor. Other items on the list for the week are Debussy's "The Sea;" Ravel's "The Waltz;" and for the opening number the Overture to "Benvenuto Cellini" of Berlioz.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
STAR

THIS CLIPPING FROM

OCT 2 1 1930

AMONG MUSICIANS

By ELISABETH E. POE.

NOVEMBER will see the beginning of the formal concert season in Washington and a feast of operatic and other stars has been arranged by the impressarios of the city. Once more Constitution Hall will be the scene of a number of brilliant concerts, while Mrs. Lawrence Townsend will continue her series of musical mornings at the Mayflower Hotel.

Mrs. Wilson-Greene, one of the leading impresarios of Washington, has secured a fine group of artists for her series of concerts. Mrs. Wilson-Greene offers a special opportunity for music lovers and students in the evening concerts. Thus those who are employed during the day have a chance to hear great artists in comfort and at prices which are within reach of all. T. Arthur Smith, another well-known impressario of the city, contributes his share to the season's musical events, especially in the presentation of the Philadelphia and other symphony orchestras.

All musical roads led to Boston last week where the Boston Symphony Orchestra is celebrating its fiftieth anniversary. Through a rare streak of good fortune the orchestra was able to have Sir George Henschel, the first conductor of the orchestra, open the series of anniversary concerts last week. Sir George, who is in his eightieth year, was in splendid condition when he raised his baton to conduct the symphony last Friday for the first time in 47 years. By a happy arrangement the program played was the same as that he had led with such high hopes on October 22, 1881. The only substitution made on the program was that of Wagner's "Meistersinger" prelude for Weber's overture.

THIS CLIPPING FROM MINNEAPOLIS, MINN.
JOURNAL

* * *

BOSTON SYMPHONY, although not like the Minneapolis organization offering the unique combination of a major orchestra in affiliation with a major university, is a musical body of the first importance which has drawn a wholesome influence from the proximity of the eternal youth of a great student body. It was only some weeks ago brought out in the press how the popularity of a Ravel composition with the Harvard students had caused marked attention.

The Boston orchestra is in these days celebrating its fiftieth anniversary in connection with which its first conductor, Sir George Henschel, now 80 years of age, has come across the ocean to conduct some of its concerts. Great has been the joy and honor of the observance. But, as Olin Downes points out in a music editorial in New York Times, there is a wider import to the business because, although there are older American orchestras than the Boston Symphony, it was the creation of the Boston organization and the standards of orchestral performance which it soon enforced that marked a new period in the whole musical life of America and one fraught with significance for its whole future.

* * *

Reminiscences of Henschel.

A Mr. J. William Fosdick of New York writes interestingly to the Times of his reminiscences of Sir George Henschel. Mr. Fosdick was in Boston when the Symphony orchestra started its career and was accustomed to attend the rehearsals. He says of its first conductor:

George Henschel's method of conducting at these rehearsals was stimulating and unconventional.

He shocked many by rearranging the placement of the orchestra. A baritone singer of renown, he often accentuated or interpreted passages by singing vigorously while wielding the baton.

This picturesque young conductor and singer, with his shock of black hair and trimmed beard, always evoked enthusiasm from his audiences, it mattered not whether he was conducting or spectacularly singing Mephistophels in the "Damnation de Faust," or, immediately after his marriage to an American soprano, singing in duet with his young wife the simple song, "O That We Two Were Maying."

While Boston Music Hall had for years harbored the Boston Philharmonic, the Handel and Haydn Society and the Apollo Club, it was the first concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with the original inspiring young Henschel, which set the musical world of Boston agog and established a never-to-be-forgotten milestone in the history of music in America.

Heard Oct 22

More perhaps than any other Boston resident, Sergei Koussevitzky deserves to be called a citizen of the world. Probably he comes closer than any other Bostonian to being a man without a country. Legally he is not a Russian, nor is he a naturalized Frenchman or American, although socially he is "of Boston and Paris." It would take at least an international lawyer to determine his technical nationality, if any. Soviet Russia does not recognize as hers any son who, like Koussevitzky, has left the land without her consent. And Koussevitzky has not asked either France or America to claim him. The basis of his passports is the certificate of identity issued by the French government to certain alien residents.

So little has his name been associated with politics since he became conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra six years ago that few Bostonians, even directors of the Symphony, recall the absurd complaints that were brought against him at the start of his local career. When one evening's program called by its rightful name of "Leningrad," the Russian city which had been successively "St. Petersburg" and 'Petrograd," the Commercial Bulletin, owned by Courtenay Guild, then, as now, president of the Handel and Haydn Society and the Harvard Musical Association, had this to say:

"If we are pleased to pay reverence to Lenin to please the new leader of our Symphony orchestra, it may be desirable to look for a new conductor, in spite of the undoubted musical ability of our Russian visitor."

But when Koussevitzky announced that he would be the last to wish to honor Lenin and Trotzky, that he had left his country because of "terrible things" that they had done, and that he had opposed the use of "Leningrad" for "Petrograd," this particular tempest in a teapot at once subsided.

Koussevitzky has become, certainly, a highly respected Boston institution.

He remains, of course, a great musician and, what interests us especially, "good copy." Tomorrow we shall try to prove this latter point.

3 23, 1930 CT. THURSDAY, OCTOBER 23, 1930

MUSIC

"Vanguardist"

By Laning Humphrey

BOSTON, without the knowledge of its population, is sheltering one of the greatest figures in the world of modern music—some would almost say the greatest.

Yet he stole into this musical capital unannounced, and has been leading an anonymous existence here, his lodging-place unknown.

It is almost as if Richard Wagner, at the height of his powers, had taken up an anonymous sojourn in Boston. That is to say, barring details from the comparison. The present visitor is Albert Roussel—like Wagner a musical revolutionist whose force of thought challenges the consideration of those who disagree with him.

The modernity of Roussel's symphony, played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra when Koussevitzky was first introducing the city to ultra-modern composition, was a terrific strain to the musical digestion of many listeners. Yet there was a force to it which make its memory endure these years since as an artistic satisfaction. Now it is conceded to be an event of events, musically, that Friday and Saturday Koussevitzky is to conduct the world premiere of the most recent work of Roussel, a symphony written especially for the orchestra's jubilee celebration.

Roussel, in his works a giant, an earth-shaker, these days leans over the Symphony Hall balcony at rehearsals an unassuming, recluse-seeming nervously-intent little gentleman. He shies from wielding, himself, the baton that evokes his own potent wizardry from the orchestra. He meekly watches and listens from the balcony, and speaks only when queried by the leader at sundry stages of the rehearsal. This is the man in whose music "muscularity" is found by critics. Contradictions are dominant in Roussel and his music.

The rather diffident Roussel plunged into the World War at the age of 45 as an ambulance driver, and saw four strenuous years of service. He began his professional career not in the musical world, but in the French Navy. Graduated from the Naval School a midshipman in 1889, he had become a lieutenant four years later. Cruises here and there about the world fascinated him. But at the end of the four years he resigned. He had come to a momentous decision.

Roussel was born in a large industrial town, Tourcoing. It was an environment where people did not think of watching for musical talent and setting their children on the path to careers as musical artists. Yet, to a marked degree, Roussel was a musically sensitive child. He was sent to the Naval School after obtaining a little bit of musical instruction. On his cruises he came to compose a little. With this nebulous omen on one side, and a Naval lieutenancy gained on the other, Roussel decided to devote himself seriously to a musical career. This was in his 25th year—a late start to begin to seek musical mastery. But he became a greater master of musical science than most of his comtemporaries. He became teacher of counterpoint at the Paris Schola.

Impressionism in general, and Debussy in particular, exerted a deep influence on Roussel in his early works. Yet he kept one eye on the more orthodox precepts of Cesar Franck. Then, with his wife, he toured in Italy, Germany, Spain, Northern Africa, India and Cambodia. In his "Evocations" he composed a magnificent impressionistic picture of his memories of India. Yet, although his music suggested the Orient, it was not actually oriental. It was his individual mode of expression. The same applies to his "Padmatavi," stage spectacle inspired by the story of the heroine of India who went joyfully to the stake with her handmaids, rather than fall into the power of the conqueror.

While Roussel was driving military ambulances, he thought his way to a new musical development. After the war his music became stamped with remarkable new qualities of individualism.

All during Roussel's career modernist composers have strained to revolutionize music according to this, that or the other striking formula. Hot conflicts have raged around the theories, and the products of the theorists. But Roussel has kept himself confined to the role of onlooker, rather than proponent or critic of any of the formulas. So, taking no sides, seeking to advance no particular revolutionary cause, he has acquired a tremendous power to express himself—and to show that his personality is that of an arresting thinker, well worthy of expression. But he believes that this is a most favorable time for a return to comic opera, and several forms of ballet. He has favorable expectations for the talking machine, radio and the Theremin, which produces music by the passing of one's hands over an electric apparatus.

He believes in a "counterpoint of keys"—the simultaneous playing of musical themes in different keys. But he insists that the definite sense of key must be maintained.

He is against the principle of "atonality," or the disregard of the sense of key. Yet he admits being impressed by "Wozzek," an atonal score by Alban Berg.

He dislikes the idea of attaching specific ideas or images to music, but believes that in the best modernist works neither romanticism nor sentiment have been abolished—but that they exist in a special guise.

"I see no reason for excluding sentiment from music," says this symphonic composer whose modernistic mode of expression seems to some listeners to have done just that. And yet, to more acute auditors it exerts a strange power, which must be some form of sentiment. "I cannot conceive of music absolutely devoid of it—not even in Stravinsky's works," Roussel declares. "He uses a peculiar form of expression which nevertheless contains some sentiment and presupposes a sensation. Music that would banish sentiment would be that in which the composer gave up in so far as possible his own original thought, his own personal perception, feeling and expression—in other words, the necessity of being himself."

Well, there we have it. Roussel clings to his own original thought, personal perception, feeling and expression—and actually has them. He may compose music hard to understand, but he understands what he is composing. Wherein he differs greatly from sundry other composers today whose music seems to deserve some such word as "unmusic."

ALBERT ROUSSEL

By PHILIP HALE

Albert Roussel is in town. He will hear his new symphony played by the Boston Symphony orchestra tomorrow afternoon, the symphony written expressly for the 50th anniversary of the orchestra. He came to this country, invited by Mrs. Elizabeth Sprague Coolidge to attend her Chicago Festival of Chamber Music at which his Trio for flute, viola and piano was performed. Mr. Loeffler's Partita for violin and piano was played at the same concert on Oct. 15.

The name of Roussel is by no means unknown here. His orchestral pieces have been performed by at least three orchestras—one the scratch orchestra, brought here by Mr. Toscanini, when he first visited Boston. Some of his songs have also been heard. He was born at Tourcoing, department of the north, France, in 1869. His people were manufacturers, but the ocean had its lure; he entered the French navy and as a passed midshipman went on the gunboat Styx to the east. Impressions of the Orient led to certain compositions, as his "Evocations," and later a ballet-opera. He resigned from the navy to devote himself to music. On his return to Paris he spent some years as pupil, also teacher, at the Schola Cantorum. One or two writers about him hint at differences of opinion between him and Vincent d'Indy. Others say that Roussel looks on d'Indy as his great and only teacher. As a matter of fact, he studied with Gigout and others. Within the last years Roussel's music has been much played at Paris. There was a Roussel festival of three concerts at Paris and a fourth at Fontainebleau in 1929. (We note in Paris journals that on Sunday, Oct. 12, 1930, his "Festival of the Spider" was performed at the Colonne concert, and on the same day his piano concerto was played at the Lamoureux concert by Mme. Caffaret.) Leading critics in Paris have written more or less elaborate essays in the peculiar character of his music. The Revue Musicale has published a whole number in his honor.

At the symphony concerts tomorrow afternoon and Saturday evening Roussel's Symphony will follow a Suite formed by Felix Mott from two ballets of Rameau. The overture to "Benvenuto Cellini had been announced but it was withdrawn at the last moment for the Ballet Suite. The second part of the program will comprise Debussy's Three Sketches, "La Mer" and Ravel's "La Valse."

The program of the concerts of Oct. 31, Nov. 1, as now planned, is as follows: An overture by an anonymous composer; a symphony written for the 50th anniversary by Nabokov, and Tchaikovsky's Symphony No. 4.

Next Sunday afternoon Winifred Christie (Mrs. Emanuel Moor) will play the Moor double keyboard piano in Symphony hall. When she was here some years ago she played delightfully at a symphony concert and in recitals. She and her husband have their home, in summer at least, on romantic Mont Pelerin, Vevey. Moor, composer and pianist, first came to Boston as musical director of a concert company that included Lilli Lehmann, Ovide Musin and Franz Rummell. Harold Bauer played one of Moor's concertos here at a symphony concert in 1908. Mr. Paderewski, wishing to hear it, sat on the stage, unseen by the audience, but visible to the pianist.

And on next Sunday afternoon Giovanni Cerullo, tenor, who lost his sight in chemical work, will sing at Jordan hall with the assistance of Mr. Martino's orchestra in accompaniments and orchestral pieces. Mr. Cerullo will sing several operatic arias, also groups of songs.

Bronson de Cou's second "Dream Picture," "Our National Parks" will show next Sunday evening in Symphony hall Crater lake, the Yosemite valley, the new Zion Carmel road across the desert, the Grand Canyon from the North Rim, Studies of Bryce, the new National Park, and Bryce Canyon.

Danielson, Gardiner H. Fiske, Sumner Pingree, Gordon C. Prince, George S. West, Richard Saltonstall and the Misses Clarissa Donham, Betty Dumaine, Marjorie Field, Katherine Field and Dorothy Neyhart.

The marriage of Miss Marion Langley, daughter of Prof. and Mrs. Ernest Felix Langley of 18 Bates street, Cambridge, to Mr. John Willis Stanley, son of Mr. and Mrs. Henry Stanley of Newtonville, formerly of London and New York, will take place next Saturday evening in the First Congregational Church in Cambridge. Miss Langley will have her sister, Mrs. John S. Martin of Philadelphia, as matron of honor. The attendants will be Miss Winifred Langley and Mrs. John Loew Whitney of New York, formerly Miss Barbara Brigham of Cambridge. Mr. C. Willis Huggard will be [illegible]

THIS CLIPPING FROM EL PASO, TEX.
TIMES

OCT 23 1930

Boston's Tribute To Music

The financial report of the Boston Symphony orchestra for the year ending July 31, 1930, shows that within that time the income rose to $744,435 its expenditures to $830,446.

Less the income from the endowment fund, $17,286, the deficit stood at $68,744.

For the year 1928 it was $87,068; for the year 1929, $145,493.

Orchestral salaries still tend to rise. In 1930 they touched $455,219. On the other hand, royalties for records made by the orchestra for the Victor company, are a new, if modest, source of income—$7,920.

For the anniversary year, now beginning, the trustees ask guarantees against an operating deficit of $100,000. There are commissioned pieces for which composers must be paid along with other more or less costly rites.

These figures are reproduced because they should be of interest to El Pasoans.

Boston is of course a much larger city but it does not hesitate to spend hundreds of thousands as an investment in good music.

El Paso, it would appear, is not willing to subscribe a mere $3,000 to put across its own symphony season of three concerts.

Boston had to start as does El Paso. Continued patronage and a determined spirit of co-operation have rounded out now for the eastern city an outstanding symphony organization.

El Paso has in its symphony orchestra a nucleus which augurs ultimately a splendid representative playing body.

But it will never reach the heights and redound to the artistic glorification of the Pass City if it is to be neglected by the failure of El Paso music-lovers to co-operate.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE COURIER
Bath, N.Y.
OCT 24 1930

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Dark-coated men with instruments: a sound,
Tentative, groping—as each seeks to pitch
This string to that—this key—one knows not which,
Each questioning note by other questions drowned.
The blundering horns, with shining mouths and round,
The 'cellos quivering their contralto rich,
The pastoral flutes, whose crystal notes bewitch,
Expectant all—till some accord be found.
The leader lifts his slender rod, and lo,
The turmoil dies—and as we strain to hear
With one quick sweep the miracle is done—
A myriad wandering tones are bound in one—
One many-throated voice, impassioned, clear,
Instinct with things we seek but cannot know.

—James Fenimore Cooper, Jr., in "Afterglow."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TIMES

MUSIC NOTES.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Serge Koussevitsky, will present an all-French program this afternoon at Symphony Hall in Boston. Albert Roussel's Symphony in G major will be among the works played, with the composer, who is in this country on a visit, present for the performance. The other compositions on the program are: Berlioz's overture to "Benvenuto Cellini," Debussy's "La Mer," and Ravel's choreographic poem, "La Valse."

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
NEWS

OCT 25 1930

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, recognized as one of America's greatest musical organizations, recently presented its first concert planned exclusively for radio listeners. Serge Koussevitsky (above) is director of the orchestra.

36

MUSIC ART LITERA

Distinguished Conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra Now Celebrating Its 50th Anniversary

DR. SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY

Doctor Koussevitzky is the distinguished conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, an orchestra now celebrating its fiftieth anniversary. Both Doctor Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony orchestra are discussed by William E. Donovan in today's issue of "Lines and Spaces" on this page.

Another composition written expressly for the 50th anniversary of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be performed at its concerts this week: a new overture by one who does not wish his name to be mentioned—the good old formula. A symphony by Nabokov will be performed. He is one of the Russian composers now living in Paris, where they are perhaps less miserable than they would be in their native land. Nabokov has an easier name for English ears than those of his colleagues, which recall Byron's lines:

"There was Strongenoff, and Strokonoff,
Meknop, Serge Low, Arsniew of modern Greece,
And Tschitsshakoff, and Roguenoff, and Chokenoff
And others of twelve consonants apiece.

* * *

Scherematoff, and Chromatoff, Koklophti,
Koclobski, Konrakin, and Mouskin Poushkin."

Contrast them with these heroes at the Siege:

"Mongst them were several Englishmen of pith, Sixteen call'd Thomson and nineteen named Smith."

Nobokov's symphony was performed at Paris Feb. 11, 1930.

Edward MacDowell once said to us that any Russian composer whose name ended with "sky" or "off" had a great advantage over Jones, Brown and Robinson, when their compositions were brought to a hearing.

The question inevitably comes up, how many of these 50th anniversary pieces will be performed 20, even 10 years from now? The life of a piece d'occasion is usually short.

— the Stockholm Opera has been ordering the

Herald Oct 26

LINES and SPACES

By WILLIAM E. DONOVAN
JOURNAL-TRANSCRIPT MUSIC EDITOR

AN APPRECIATION

There are certain things in life that become indelibly stamped in one's consciousness. They are absolutely unforgettable.

Who is there among us that cannot remember the thrill received on viewing an ocean or a mountain park for the first time. Who is there that cannot recall the thrill and emotion of hearing or seeing for the first time, a great play, a great painting, a great piece of statuary or a great musical composition. And who is there that cannot recall the thrilling experience of seeing and hearing a great symphony orchestra for the first time.

When we heard the Boston Symphony Orchestra by radio the other evening, it was as if we were greeting an old friend of years gone by. For us it was a great delight although a peculiar coincidence when we found out that they had programmed Debussy's "Afternoon of a Faun" and Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks." It was just 16 years ago, almost to the hour, that we had our first introduction to a great symphonic organization—the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Dr. Karl Muck, in Boston—and they, too, had, among other things, programmed the two identical numbers noted above. Was that not a coincidence?

We remembered how we had many times patiently waited in a long line on Huntington avenue, sometimes for an hour or more, waiting for admittance to Symphony Hall. After seeming ages the line would start to move and finally we would arrive at the entrance, paying the old doorkeeper a quarter for a seat in the second balcony. Even then we had another wait of three-quarters to an hour for the beginning of the concert. But we were mostly all students and we passed the time by discussing amongst one another our various musical endeavors with the seriousness—and wisdom, so we the nthought—of people twice our age. In addition we had chocolate bars and Philip Hales' analytical program notes and what a real treat the latter proved to be. To this day, Philip Hale, eminent music critic of the Boston Herald, still remains for us the foremost musical critic in the United States and one of the greatest of all time.

After awhile Neuman, the tympanist of the orchestra, and Holy, the harpist, would make their appearance on the platform to tune their respective instruments. Later the main body of the orchestra would file in, generally headed by Longy, the oboeist. After they had found their chairs he would sound the (A) that all instruments might be in tune and what a bedlam of noise there would be for a moment or so. Finally an electric bell would sound throughout the corridors signifying that the concert was about to begin, that doors would close and that late comers would be denied admission to the hall until the first number had been completed. The door at the right of the platform would open and from it would emerge Doctor Muck, walking briskly and business like to the dias in front of fthe orchestra. After the customary greetings had been exchanged between audience, conductor and orchestra, silence, absolute silence, Doctor Muck would have his baton upraised, for the concert was about to begin.

Two winters ago it was our great privilege to hear this great orchestra again. It was in Orchestra Hall, Chicago. There of course was a new conductor—Doctor Koussevitzky — and numerous changes in the personnel of the orchestra. This concert to us was positively the most thrilling musical experience we have ever had. The points for which the Boston orchestra had long been famous, tone, ensemble, virtuosity, was there to the Nth degree. Doctor Koussevitzky is a most dynamic personality and during the evening he conducted in a masterly fashion, inspiring his men to the utmost. At the conclusion of the concert both conductor and orchestra received one of the greatest ovations we have ever heard or witnessed. We are sure that if Major Higginson could have been present for that concert he would have been immensely pleased by the playing of his orchestra and their warm reception by the audience.

Music in the United States owes a vast debt of gratitude to Major Higginson the founder and the Boston Symphony Orchestra itself. Through his far seeing vision, splendid courage and financial assistance, he made possible his dream of establishing a great orchestra in a great center of music. Through a fortunate succession of noted conductors and an orchestral personnel of the finest musicians

Globe Oct 26

Music Notes and Comment

Dr Koussevitzky has put on the program for this week's Boston Symphony concerts an anonymous overture. The only clews to the identity of its composer are that the work was written for the 50th anniversary of the orchestra and that this week's program is announced as "Russian." One cannot be certain that this implies that the overture was written by a Russian. Gossips will doubtless recall that Mr Stokowski has performed in Philadelphia several anonymous works, which have been attributed to him without any explicit denial being made that the conductor was in fact the composer. Dr Koussevitzky's concerto for the double bass has been played by him in Boston, but there has never been any hint that he wrote for orchestra. So far as one can find out, there has never been an anonymous work on a Boston Symphony program before. Certainly there has been none in the past 20 seasons.

Post Oct 26

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

The Symphony Orchestra is going in for mystery. An anonymous overture is announced for performance at the concerts of this week. Whether or not the composer's name will later be revealed is not stated. It is to be understood, however, that the work was written in commemoration of the orchestra's 50th season, now in progress, and that it forms part of an all-Russian programme, the other numbers on which are a symphony by Nabokoff, a composer unknown in these parts, and the fourth symphony of Tchaikovski.

* * * *

TRANSCRIPT
PEORIA, ILL.

OCT 26 1930

LINES and SPACES

By WILLIAM E. DONOVAN
JOURNAL-TRANSCRIPT MUSIC EDITOR

AN APPRECIATION

There are certain things in life that become indelibly stamped in one's consciousness. They are absolutely unforgettable.

Who is there among us that cannot remember the thrill received on viewing an ocean or a mountain park for the first time. Who is there that cannot recall the thrill and emotion of hearing or seeing for the first time, a great play, a great painting, a great piece of statuary or a great musical composition. And who is there that cannot recall the thrilling experience of seeing and hearing a great symphony orchestra for the first time.

When we heard the Boston Symphony Orchestra by radio the other evening, it was as if we were greeting an old friend of years gone by. For us it was a great delight although a peculiar coincidence when we found out that they had programmed Debussy's "Afternoon of a Faun" and Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks." It was just 16 years ago, almost to the hour, that we had our first introduction to a great symphonic organization—the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Dr. Karl Muck, in Boston—and they, too, had, among other things, programmed the two identical numbers noted above. Was that not a coincidence?

We remembered how we had many times patiently waited in a long line on Huntington avenue, sometimes for an hour or more, waiting for admittance to Symphony Hall. After seeming ages the line would start to move and finally we would arrive at the entrance, paying the old doorkeeper a quarter for a seat in the second balcony. Even then we had another wait of three-quarters to an hour for the beginning of the concert. But we were mostly all students and we passed the time by discussing amongst one another our various musical endeavors with the seriousness—and wisdom, so we the nthought—of people twice our age. In addition we had chocolate bars and Philip Hales' analytical program notes and what a real treat the latter proved to be. To this day, Philip Hale, eminent music critic of the Boston Herald, still remains for us the foremost musical critic in the United States and one of the greatest of all time.

After awhile Neuman, the tympanist of the orchestra, and Holy, the harpist, would make their appearance on the platform to tune their respective instruments. Later the main body of the orchestra would file in, generally headed by Longy, the oboeist. After they had found their chairs he would sound the (A) that all instruments might be in tune and what a bedlam of noise there would be for a moment or so. Finally an electric bell would sound throughout the corridors signifying that the concert was about to begin, that doors would close and that late comers would be denied admission to the hall until the first number had been completed. The door at the right of the platform would open and from it would emerge Doctor Muck, walking briskly and business like to the dias in front of fthe orchestra. After the customary greetings had been exchanged between audience, conductor and orchestra, silence, absolute silence, Doctor Muck would have his baton upraised, for the concert was about to begin.

Two winters ago it was our great privilege to hear this great orchestra again. It was in Orchestra Hall, Chicago. There of course was a new conductor—Doctor Koussevitzky — and numerous changes in the personnel of the orchestra. This concert to us was positively the most thrilling musical experience we have ever had. The points for which the Boston orchestra had long been famous, tone, ensemble, virtuosity, was there to the Nth degree. Doctor Koussevitzky is a most dynamic personality and during the evening he conducted in a masterly fashion, inspiring his men to the utmost. At the conclusion of the concert both conductor and orchestra received one of the greatest ovations we have ever heard or witnessed. We are sure that if Major Higginson could have been present for that concert he would have been immensely pleased by the playing of his orchestra and their warm reception by the audience.

Music in the United States owes a vast debt of gratitude to Major Higginson the founder and the Boston Symphony Orchestra itself. Through his far seeing vision, splendid courage and financial assistance, he made possible his dream of establishing a great orchestra in a great center of music. Through a fortunate succession of noted conductors and an orchestral personnel of the finest musicians obtainable in Europe and America, the orchestra has reached and maintained the highest standard of symphonic playing, a standard that has become the ideal of other orchestras but as yet unmatched anywhere.

We salute the memory of Maj. Henry L. Higginson the founder, We congratulate both the Boston Symphony Orchestra and its conductor, Doctor Koussevitzky on the occasion of their fiftieth anniversary. It is our hope that we shall be able to congratulate them again when they have reached and are celebrating their 100th anniversary.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is unquestionably the foremost symphonic organization in the world of music today. Sic itur ad Astra.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA OPENS SEASON

Sir George Henschel, as the Boston Symphony Orchestra's first conductor and its guest of honor for the week, opened its season in Symphony Hall, October 11 and 12. Sir George conducted the original program of October 22, 1881, with the exception of one number. It included Beethoven's Overture to the "Dedication of the House;" "Haydn's Symphony in B-flat;" Airs from Gluck's "Orpheus" and Bruch's "Odysseus," to be sung by Margaret Matzenauer (the original soloist was Miss Annie Louise Cary); Ballet from Schubert's "Rosamunde;" and Wagner's Prelude to "Die Meistersinger."

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky made his first appearance of the present year at the concerts of October 17 and 18, then conducting an Ode for Orchestra and Chorus, written especially for the orchestra's anniversary by Edward Burlingame Hill to the text of Robert Hillyer. This will be the first of an impressive list of new scores which have been especially composed for the orchestra's jubilee year by the foremost living composers. They include a "Symphonie de Psaumes" by Stravinsky; also symphonies by Roussel, Honegger, Prokofieff and Hill. There will be a Symphonic Ode by Copland and shorter pieces by Ravel, Dukas, Hindemith and Sibelius, also a Piano Concerto by Bax. The Russian composers Lourie, Nabokoff and Trebinsky and the French composer Ferroud will be introduced to America. This music will be performed in the course of the regular concerts.

Other features of the season will be a Beethoven Festival to be given in Washington, D. C., during the first week of December and a Bach Festival to be given in Boston next spring in memory of Maj. Henry L. Higginson the orchestra's founder.

A TRULY ILLUSTRIOUS HALF-CENTURY

Just how and why the Boston Symphony Orchestra has come to be one of the very greatest in the world, leaves little room for speculation or debate. The simple facts of its history are self-explanatory. In 1881, the late Maj. Henry L. Higginson realized the first dream and aspiration of his life by founding in Boston an orchestra of European standards—a phenomenon then unknown in America. The idea had come to him as a student in Vienna. It was an ambitious dream for an impecunious young man, but after many years, having made his fortune as a banker, he was able to give the Boston Symphony Orchestra to the world. He engaged the finest musicians in Europe and brought to this country a successison of the greatest conductors of their time. In contradistinction to current usage, he exacted of the musicians entire devotion of their talents to the orchestra. To the conductor he gave entire artistic freedom. The wisdom of these policies soon showed as each conductor expended his genius to the cumulative improvement of an ensemble which soon commanded the world's attention. George Henschel first established the orchestra in his three seasons of 1881-1884. Then came Wilhelm Gericke, who through 12 years drilled it into what come to be its tradition of perfection. Arthur Nikisch, the most illustrious conductor of the day, had a shorter term, as did Emil Paner and Max Fiedler. In 1900 Symphony Hall, the orchestra's present home was built. Dr. Karl Muck, from 1906, carried the orchestra to an unprecedented degree of virtuosity and beauty. In his eighty-fourth year, the orchestra's founder left it in control of a board of trustees. After two French conductors, Henri Rabaud and Pierre Monteux, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky began his term in 1924. The great Russian leader has brought new beauties to the Boston Symphony concerts, a fresh importance and distinction reflected in the greatly enlarged public, the festivals and special choral concerts, the broadened repertoire—new and old—of the regular concerts, and the qualities of performance which are as indefinable as the genius which directs them.

The full chronology of the conductors follows:

George Henschell	1881-1884
Wilhelm Gericke	1884-1889
Arthur Nikisch	1889-1893
Emil Pauer	1893-1898
Wilhelm Gericke	1898-1906
Karl Muck	1906-1908
Max Fiedler	1908 1912
Karl Muck	1912-1918
Henri Rabaud	1918-1919
Pierre Monteux	1919-1924
Serge Koussevitzky	1924-....

THE CAREER OF SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY

It is particularly fitting that Serge Koussevitzky should lead the Boston Symphony Orchestra into its fiftieth year—which was introduced by a special broadcast concert on October 4.

The brilliant Russian leader came to America and his present position in 1924. The new heights of virtuosity, the broadened horizon, the wider public which the traditionally famous orchestra has found in the last six seasons are attributable to the rare genius of Koussevitzky. The orchestra which has come to be his is expected to add an illustrious chapter to its history in the anniversary season, for which Doctor Koussevitzky has announced a number of important features.

Serge Koussevitzky was born in Tver, in northern Russia, in 1874. He conducted the town theater orchestra at the age of 12, and at 14 entered the Moscow Conservatory. He was required by the rules of the institution to study, for the orchestral class, either a brass instrument or the double-bass. Koussevitzky chose the latter and then later became a pupil of the celebrated Fambaussec. He developed an extraordinary proficiency and for the first 10 years of his professional career toured Europe, east and west, giving recitals upon this unusual instrument. He even composed a Concerto for it, which he played with the leading orchestras of the time.

Koussevitzky keeps his beautiful old Amati instrument always close at hand, and has given remarkable recitals in America on those few occasions which the rigors of conducting the Boston Symphony Orchestra have left him.

It was in 1909 that Koussevitzky organized his own orchestra which was to give such notable concerts in Moscow and Petrograd. There were symphonic, choral concerts, festivals in the spring. And in the summer he would hire a steamer and take his orchestra 2500 miles up the Volga, carrying the gospel of symphonic music to the rural villages where such a thing was absolutely unknown.

It was in 1921 that he left Russia and first became known as a conductor in western Europe. He established his "Concerts Koussevitzky" in Paris, which became so famous. He conducted concerts and opera in other cities and appeared notably as guest conductor of the London Symphony Orchestra on numerous occasions.

Thus he was revealed as the most striking and dominant figure in the concert halls of that part of the world. America had heard many tales of the astonishing powers of the Russian leader; of his ability to make a classical symphony glow with fresh life—to electrify an audience with an impassioned performance of a score by Tschaikowsky or Scriabin.

Doctor Koussevitzky's first season with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1924 even exceeded anticipations. And in succeeding seasons, conductor and orchestra have touched new heights of executive perfection, tonal splendor and interpretive vision.

Thus a transcendant chapter is being added to the illustrious history of what has been these many years, the finest symphony orchestra in the entire world. To the forward looking and distinguished leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, its fiftieth season—the present one—is the next horizon.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
ROCHESTER, N. Y.
Democrat Chronicle

OCT 26 1930

37

New Symphony by Howard Hanson To Be Played in Boston Nov. 28

DR. HOWARD HANSON

Composer Will Conduct It in Rome on Dec. 14; and Here in January

Dr. Howard Hanson, director of the Eastman School of Music, is faced with conditions that bid fair to compel him to test to the full the possibilities or rapid transit. On Nov. 28 he must be in Boston to hear the first performance of his new symphony, Symphony No. 2, "The Romantic," which Dr. Serge Koussevitski, conductor of the Boston Symphony, requisitioned to make one of the new works to be played by that famous orchestra in its fiftieth anniversary year. And on Dec. 14 Dr. Hanson must be in Rome, Italy, where he is to conduct the first concert of American compositions at the Augusteo, sponsired by the Italian government. The invitation which calls Dr. Hanson to Rome was extended to him last year in Rochester by Major Lamond, head of the American Academy in Rome.

Rochester is to hear the new symphony in January; that the first performance is to be given in Boston due to the fact that the work was written at the request of Dr. Koussevitski as a special program number for the Boston Symphony's anniversary year, an honor to be appreciated.

The European first appearance of Dr. Hanson's symphony will be at the concert in Rome. The Augusteo Orchestra is not an unknown body of players to Dr. Hanson; while he was a Fellow of the American Academy in Rome, resident in that city, he conducted a number of his compositions with that orchestra, among these the "Nordic" Symphony and Lux Aeterna.

In extending the invitation to Dr. Hanson to come to Rome, Major Lamond made the point that as the first Fellow in Music of the American Academy in Rome, as one of the prominent American composers of the day, and as sponsor and conductor of concerts given to promote the interest of American composers, Dr. Hanson was the logical choice for conductor of the Rome concert.

Dr. Hanson expects to leave Rochester late in November and will return to the United States immediately after the Rome concert to preside at the annual meeting of the Music Teachers' National Association, of which he is president, which meeting will be conducted this year at St. Louis from Dec. 29 to 31.

THIS CLIPPING FROM PITTSBURG, PA.
PRESS

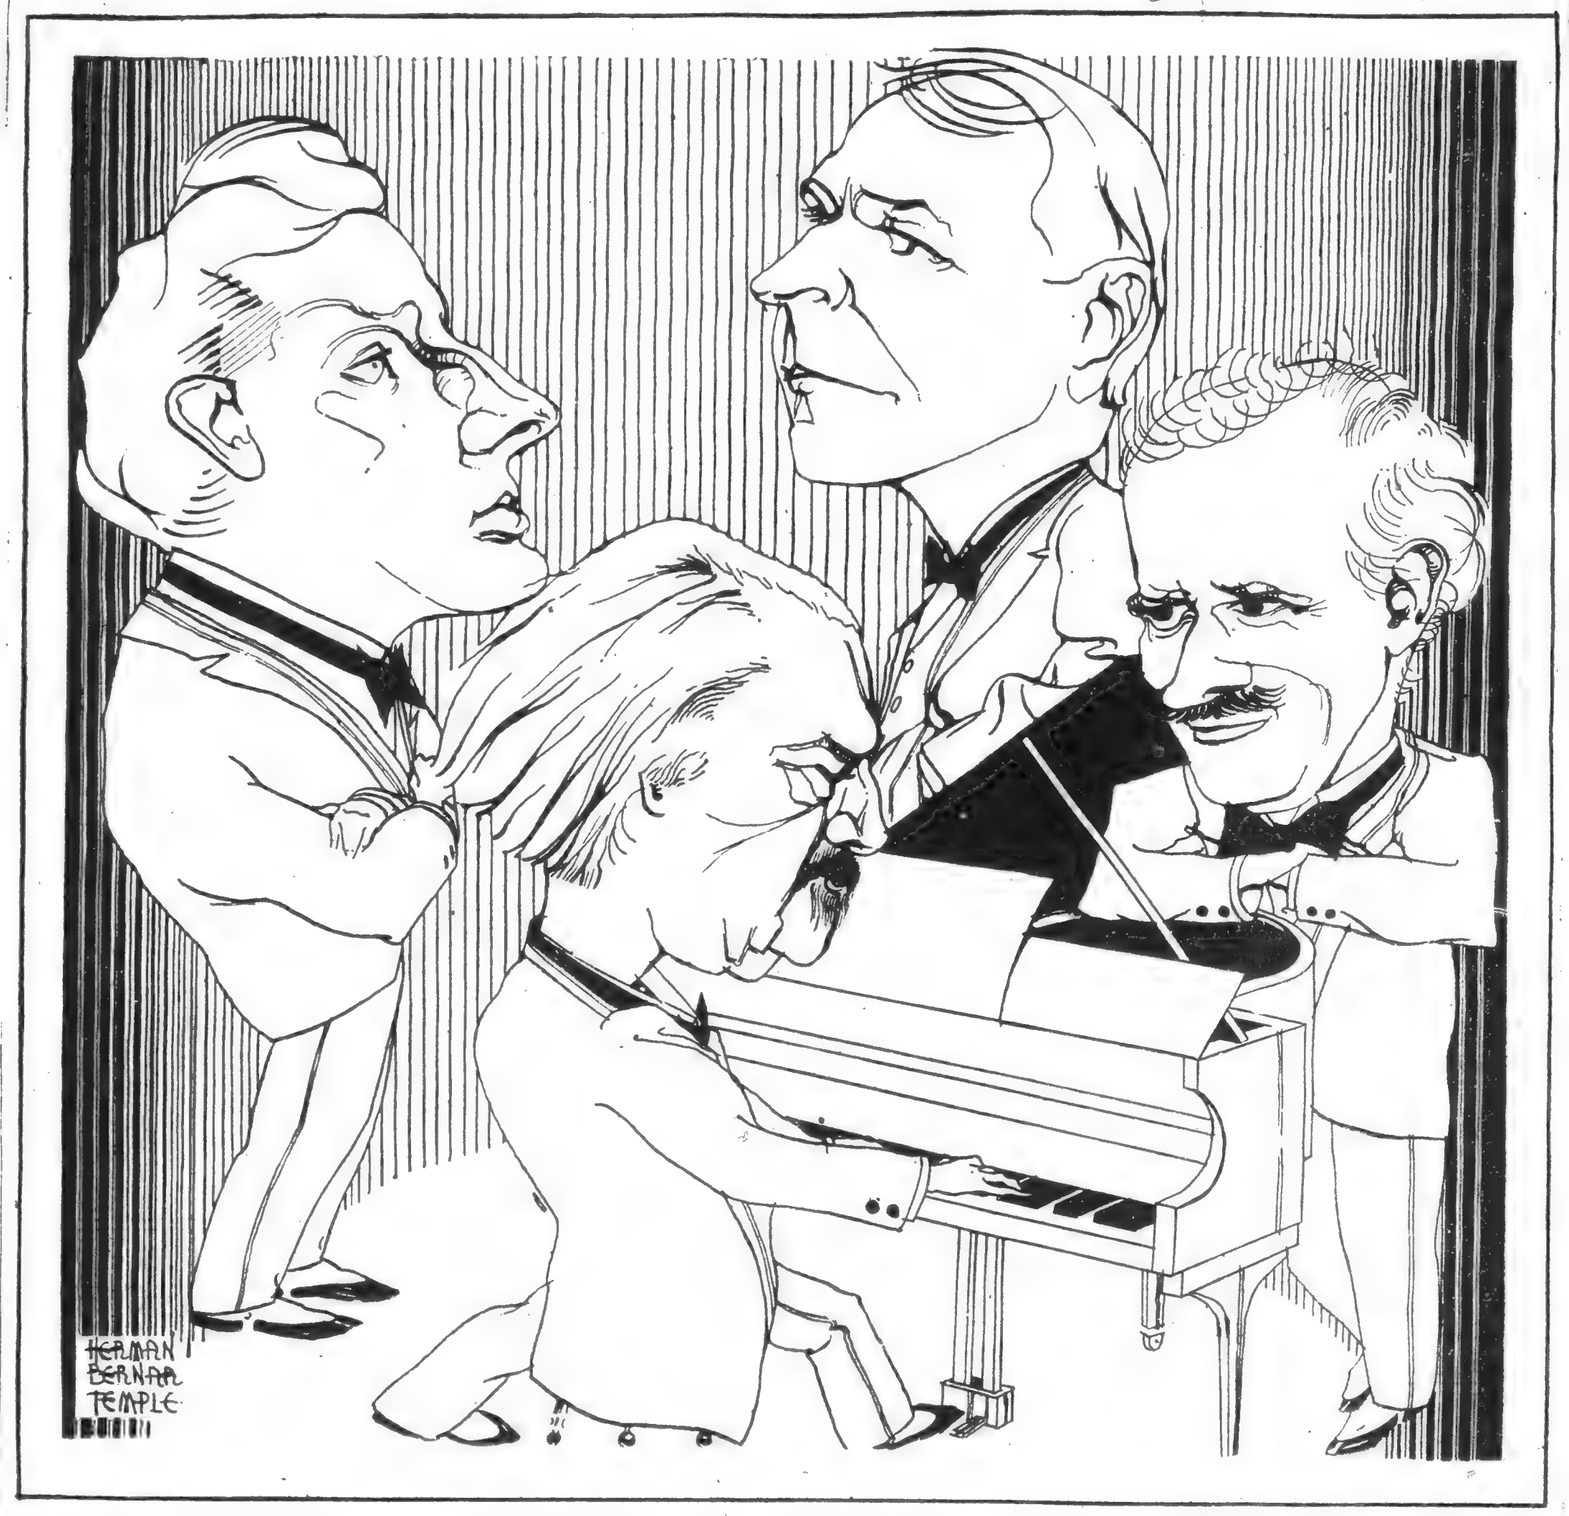
Serge Koussevitsky's double is here in Pittsburgh the counterpart being none other than Lee Hess Barnes, conducter of the Male Chorus.

38

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. Herald Tribune

OCT 26 1930

Three Prominent Conductors and the Dean of Pianists



Mr. Paderewski reappears here next Saturday afternoon in Carnegie Hall. Leopold Stokowski, Serge Koussevitzky and Arturo Toscanini, who form the audience of the imaginary piano recital depicted above, will appear here in November with their respective organizations, the Philadelphia Orchestra, Boston Symphony and Philharmonic-Symphony

39

Afternoon Of The French at Symphony Hall

Roussel's Notable Symphony, Debussy, Ravel, Rameau, To Keep Him Company

Trans. Oct. 25

THE EXPERIENCE of Friday afternoon at the Symphony Concert was the first performance anywhere of a new Symphony, in G, by Albert Roussel. Unusual circumstance attended the occasion. By invitation of Mrs. Elizabeth Shurtleff Coolidge, Mr. Roussel came from Paris to the United States to be guest at her festival of chamber-music in Chicago. A journey thence to Boston, for the production of the new Symphony, was easy and inevitable. Since the visit of Ravel, the Symphony Orchestra has entertained no composer of such eminence. It paid him, indeed, exceptional homage when, with one accord, at the end of the performance, it rose in its place to salute him. By that time Dr. Koussevitzky had called him from his seat in the balcony and escorted him in friendly fashion to the stage. There, once, twice and three times over, the audience heaped him with quick, honest, hearty applause. Within memory "at these concerts," no new symphony had made such instant and glowing impression upon audience and orchestra. For once professional judgment and laymen's notions went hand in hand.

No wonder Mr. Roussel betrayed an emotion as genuine as the plaudits. Now he shook Dr. Koussevitzky's or Mr. Burgin's hand; again he turned to the orchestra, himself applauding; or else bowed in warm acknowledgment to the eager audience. There was time, indeed, to observe him—a slender, dark, olive-skinned gentleman, looking less than his sixty years, free from any affectation, wearing none of the musician's earmarks. Yet again a few elderly romantics, scattered about the house, deplored the failure of modern eminence in the arts to look its distinction. In these days, the simpler the better.

The new Symphony commends itself, first, by brevity, filling less than half an hour in performance, albeit four movements long. Mr. Roussel writes with truly Gallic precision of matter and economy of means. Not a purposeless, and therefore superfluous, note encumbers his staves. Yet from the pages flows a clear impression of completeness. He has wrought his design; released his musical thought; set out his skill, fancy, imagination, emotion. And all this with another eminently Gallic quality—lucid and luminous clearness. The motto-motiv, pervading the whole Symphony in quasi-Franckian fashion, seizes the ear when in full panoply the orchestra first proclaims it. Thereafter, whatever the transmutation, however spacious the development, it seldom escapes the following mind. In the slow movement, built upon it, Mr. Roussel ventures fugal and other departure from orthodox precedent. As usual, when he chooses a course of his own, it seems the significant expression of underlying thought and compelling mood, as clear as it is persuasive. In parts of the first movement, again in the scherzo, Mr. Roussel writes a music of exceeding lightness of texture. Not a blur clouds it. Often there are measures at swift pace—unflecked. Again measures of mounting vigor, but never huddled or thickened. Throughout, indeed, a master of timbres, transparently distributing and interweaving instrumental voices.

There is no avowed program to Mr. Roussel's Symphony; no token, after two hearings, of programmatic intent at the back of the composer's mind. The most imaginative listener may hardly fit to the music any literary or pictorial vesture, discover in it any delineative suggestion. We of the audience hear the pervading motiv and follow it, in new flowering after new flowering, to the end. Enough that it is a musical thought released with warm invention, touched by emotion, inviting the play of harmonies and timbres, vital and fertile as source; means both to contemplation and to ardor. We hear other motivs, for the most part contained within single movements; discover them as fountain-heads of melodies, one close upon another, imparting to this Symphony in G immediate and ingratiating appeal. They kindle the mind: warm the heart; surprise and delight by felicity of substance, progress and vesture. They may be as light and flowing as those of the scherzo; as active and vigorous as those of the finale. They may expand and ascend, more and more luminous, as in the first movement, until the motto-motiv emerges lustrous. Almost everywhere a poetry of tones tinges them. It gilds with charm or fancy; lingers for a moment beside beauty; quickens into ardor fine and high.

For the Roussel of this new Symphony is not the Roussel of the harsh timbres, piercing harmonies, grating progressions, preoccupied, sombre and grim, through the Symphony in B-flat, heard six years ago. No more is he the sumptuous craftsman, the sensuous tone-poet, of "Evocations," first heard at Symphony Hall in 1929. He is not finding "very personal" procedures to express "very personal" sensations as he did in the compact audacity of "Pour une Fête de Printemps." Rather through the present Symphony goes the Roussel of what the French call "douceur," of what we in another language might name, after Matthew Arnold, sweetness and light. Needless to say the old Adam in him will not quite down. In the fugal treatment of the slow movement, in the whole strange course of it, he is again the Roussel who will find expression, in his own way, for the thought and the mood within him. They shall quicken as well as deepen into instensity. Yet the quiet of the end unmistakably suggests this new "douceur."

A few harsh chords to show us the cloven hoof of the old Roussel, and the first movement ascends into sweetness and light. Fancy wings the scherzo; while a supple hand directs the flight. A fine ardor, rather than a bold sweep of power, upbuilds the finale. As often as not, the more lyrical measures, throughout the symphony, are gentle. Only the motto-motiv at full expansion proclaims the loftier Roussel. Upon the latter days of poets—recall the Shakspeare of "Cymbeline" and "The Tempest"; upon the latter days of sensitive actresses—remember La Duse—this "douceur," this mood of sweetness and light, often descended. Mr. Roussel, embracing it, keeps good company.

It was the pleasure of the composer, at the final rehearsal, to hail as "perfect" the performance of his Symphony by Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra. This single word, which the reviewer may modestly repeat, was just reward for three weeks of sympathetic care, unflagging pains and quick sensibility to Mr. Roussel's few suggestions. In this jubilee year, with confidence and a touch of pride, composers may dedicate the works of their hands to such a conductor, and to such musicians doing his and their will. Companion-pieces, in point of performance, were Debussy's "La Mer" and Ravel's "La Valse," filling the second half of the concert.

Ravel's "choreographic poem" has been played so often at Symphony Hall within the past ten years, has served so many times as conductor's convenience, that one listener at least was prepared to find it threadbare. Instead, if one must hear program-music of its particular day after Mr. Roussel's Symphony unalloyed, here was a sombre, fantastical scheme, worked out graphically in the manipulation of a familiar rhythm, in the usage of sensuous or acrid instrumental voices. Here, too, were the moods of 1920, only two years after the end of the German war—an old civilization crumbled, its suavities torn to tatters; the anguish and, as it seemed, the threat of a new world. These implications hardly signify in 1930. We listen to "La Valse" for the skill of Ravel, whatever his matter or his means; for the responsive skill of conductor and orchestra.

Once upon a time hearers debated the "impressionism" of Debussy's sea-pieces. How wonderful it was—the very curl of the waves, falling and rising; the spray that topped them; the lights that traversed them, the winds that blew upon them; the voices imaginative ears might hear, all transmuted into the contours of musical speech, the motion of manifold rhythms; the chords, the colorings, what not? On every page the tone-poet whence these inventions sprang, diffusing suggestion and illusion. Now, a quarter of a century afterward, "La Mer" is a classic of the concert-hall. We listen to it for the Debussy of scope and power who transcended mere sensibility; who was not all "impressionistic" strokes, who could compose, as in the sonorities of "Dialogue between Wind and Sea" out of large imagination and full resource. Or we hear the virtuosi of the orchestra—wood-winds, strings, brass—doing each their marvels; speculate between whiles whether Dr. Koussevitzky, spell-bound by this Debussyan masterpiece, does not sometimes slow the pace, etch in too precisely this or that detail. The times change and we change with them. Back two centuries to three dances from Rameau's pages had the conductor to go to find the pure sonorities, the pervading "douceur," that should be fit prelude to Mr. Roussel's Symphony.

H. T. P.

The Sea Sang to Him

Reverse of Medal Struck in Paris to mark Roussel's Sixtieth Birthday (1929)

Trans. Oct 25

...de story of Liza Jane.
How she died ridin' on a railroad train.
Train was a-rattlin' and a-roarin' like sin.
And Liza was ridin' right behind dat engine.
My railroad-ridin' mama caught dat south-bound train.
But when dose rattlers bumped, it was de end of Liza Jane.

Engineer said he had a dream dat wuz bad.
Fireman said, "Mister, don't sing so sad!"
Engineer said his knees wuz weak.
Fireman said, "Mister, I'm too scared to speak!"
And Liza was a-ridin' near and far,
Makin' her home in a railroad car.

Engineer said his water wuz low.
Fireman looked out and said, "My watch is slow."
Engineer said, "If we bump a freight,
Everybody better jump before it's too late."
Now if you ever love a woman never tell her so,
'Cause if you do, she'll simply pack her stuff and go.

Now Liza sat quiet and didn't say a thing,
'Cause it warn't no time for talkin', no time to sing.
Death was a-ridin' at Liza's side,
But Liza didn't know it until after she died.
I bought dat gal a ticket on de C. & O.,
But she said, "I'm south-bound, I simply got to go."

So po' Liza, po' gal, po' Liza Jane,
Died while she wuz ridin' on a railroad train.
Went up to hebben wid her stockin's in her hand,
And now she's up yonder in dat promised land.
I tole her when she left me, "Baby, don't you go,"
But she said, "Honey man, I love my ridin' so."

Yellow Hammer could neither read nor write. And back in 1912, in Lexington, Kentucky, there were no night-clubs where a shouting Negro could take in handsomely for his hire. He was fed, housed, given a few dollars a week and allowed to take up a free-will offering. If his income amounted to ten dollars a week he counted himself lucky, because he belonged to the older school of black men who didn't expect too much of life.

Up North the modern Negro has been considerably educated and unfortunately refined. Even so, he still loves his shoutin'. This statement includes the flappers and the jazz-bo-bell-bottomed-trouser-legged-ukele-strummers.

In Englewood, New Jersey, there is a Negro church where I witnessed the per-

Down Distances He Looks

Obverse of Medal Struck in Paris to mark Roussel's Sixtieth Birthday (1929)

40

MUSIC

SYMPHONY CONCERT

By PHILIP HALE

The third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Koussevitzky, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. It had been announced that the opening number would be the overture to Berlioz's "Benvenuto Cellini." At the last moment it was put aside, to the regret of many. A Ballet Suite arranged by Felix Mottl, from Rameau's "Platee" (menuet) and "Les Fetes d'Hebe" (Musette and Tambourin) was substituted. There was a certain fitness in the selection, for Debussy's fondness for Rameau is well known—he was never weary of urging young composers to hark back to that French composer—and he would have been pleased to see his name associated with Rameau on a program.

Then followed Albert Roussel's new Symphony in G Minor composed expressly for the 50th anniversary of the orchestra; Debussy's "La Mer" and Ravel's "La Valse." Mr. Roussel was present. He acknowledged modestly the hearty applause of orchestra and audience that followed the performance of his symphony. This applause was by no means only courtesy: the composer richly deserved it. The symphony, it is true, is a "piece d'occasion," but it bids fair to be a piece of many occasions. Eight of his more important symphonic works had been performed in Boston since 1912, six of them at concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra; no one of them excited such genuine admiration on the part of the general public or even among musicians, who, gladly acknowledging the technical skill of Roussel, his contrapuntal and harmonic mastery, his knowledge of orchestration, his high ideals, yet found much of his music purely cerebral, lacking warmth, emotional inspiration, sensuous color and ravishing tints.

But the Roussel of the symphony seems to be another man. This symphony has frankly a festival character. More than one page, especially in the Scherzo and the Finale, is a triumphant, exultant hymn, chanting sonorously the glorious life of the orchestra now in its full and splendid maturity; but as a Festival Symphony, it is as free from bombast as it is from that which by its obviousness would appeal to those delighting chiefly in the thunder of the captains and the shouting.

Again Mr. Roussel displays, as he has displayed before, his admirable musicianship. Note the fugue in the slow movement—an unusual place to find a fugue—a fugue that is not merely a perfunctory scholastic section to serve by way of contrast to the contemplative pages—but one that is dramatic in its evolution and in its contrapuntal treatment. The opening movement by its themes and their development does more than to arouse favorable expectation of what is to follow. Here is warmth as well as dignity. Mark also the conciseness of the work, how firmly knit it is. The Scherzo dazzles by its brilliance. And in this symphony there is an elasticity, a spontaneity of musical thought that many had not been able to find in the composer's previous compositions.

The performance was of the finest quality as was that of Debussy's Three Sketches. It is a curious fact that Mr. Roussel though for some years an officer in the French navy has never looked to the ocean for musical suggestion, while Debussy merely crossed the English channel. (And so deep-sea sailors of Cape Cod when they retired to their villages often dwelt in houses inland far from salt winds.) Perhaps some find Debussy's ocean too gentle; they miss the "spasms of the sky and the shatter of the sea." But each composer, each poet has his own ocean. To Bryant it was a gray and melancholy waste; to Aeschylus and Milton it laughed; Laforgue was impressed because it had no other name. Now Debussy loved the ocean, even as he saw it from seaside resorts, where he found that men and women did not sufficiently respect it. He knew it could be savage—witness the ending of the second Sketch—he also knew that its sunlit gaiety was beautiful. He had his own ocean and he expressed vividly what it had said to him. Some who are pleased to think that Ravel is always an ironist, in music as in speech, say that in "La Valse" he was ironical at the expense of the Viennese masters, especially Johann Strauss. Tush! Likewise piffle! Likewise, go to! He certainly would not have taken the trouble to "parody" Metra or Waldteufel, demigods at the Parisian Opera balls. The Viennese dance forms naturally made the greater appeal to him. It should be remembered that when he sketched the music he thought of a production on the stage.

A most interesting concert; one that was not too long. Mr. Roussel, for example, knew what he had to say, and having said it well, did not fritter away its force.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program for next week will be—i.e., is announced as, Overture by an anonymous composer (first performance); Symphony by Nobokov (first time in the United States; Tchaikovsky's Symphony No. 4.

COMPOSER IS GUEST AT SYMPHONY

By MOSES SMITH

The principal interest of this week's concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra lies in a Symphony in G minor, composed by the Frenchman, Albert Charles Paul Roussel, for the 50th anniversary of the orchestra, and played yesterday for the first time, with the composer as honored guest. The other numbers of an all-French program are Rameau's "Ballet Suite," arranged by Felix Mottl, Debussy's "La Mer" and Ravel's "La Valse."

The performance of the Roussel symphony had been preceded by elaborate expectations A veritable materpiece had been predicted. Perhaps that reason, and also the fact that we were hearing an involved work for the first time, accounted for this writer's disappointment.

In form and in emotional content and style the symphony is akin to that of Cesar Franck. In the uncompromising abruptness of statement of many of the pages, however, the work is at the very opposite extreme. In other words, it is ultra-modern. Harmonically the score is free, not in the latest atonal fashion, but free in the sense, at least, that the composer uses chords and combinations of chords as he needs them, not by academic prescription.

The orchestration is ingenious, the form and treatment masterly. And the musical ideas—on which a work stands or falls, in the last analysis—are arresting. Our disappointment, despite all these things, lies largely in the pallid and anemic quality of this musical emotion. While the symphony is Franckian, it is a Franck either over-sentimental or—at the opposite pole—world-weary.

The performance, brilliant in many respects, may not have reflected the true character of the work. We speak with reservations about so ticklish a point.

ROUSSEL'S NEWEST BY SYMPHONY

French Composer's G Minor Work Written for Jubilee

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

A programme of French music which included a symphony in G minor by Albert Roussel, especially composed for the 50th anniversary of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, made the third Friday afternoon concert of this jubilee season. Monsieur Roussel, who is now making his initial visit to this country, heard his music from a seat in the hall and, called afterwards to the stage, he was warmly acclaimed, the players standing in tribute.

THE NEW SYMPHONY

Although one listener may have come away yesterday chiefly impressed by the singularly revealing, glamorous and poetic performance of Debussy's "The Sea" and another have had ears only for Ravel's "The Waltz," conducted by Dr. Koussevitzky, and played by his men, with more than usual seductiveness, it is the new symphony that deserves first and most extensive mention.

When Dr. Koussevitzky gave out the imposing list of composers who had written pieces for the Symphony Orchestra's 50th season there was reason to fear that many, if not most of these commemorative works, would prove merely dutiful and perfunctory. And so they may. But the symphony of yesterday, at least, bears witness to a genuine fervor of creation, a labor not of respect but of love. It is not necessary to discuss whether or not Roussel has wrought a masterpiece; for the present it is enough to say that his music gave pleasure and that it aroused a desire for further and deeper acquaintance with it.

Roussel has prevailingly seemed a reserved, deatched, austere and cerebral maker of music, in this respect a later counterpart of Vincent d'Indy, though without the latter's loftiness and breadth of utterance. The immediate predecessor of the symphony of yesterday, the one in B-flat played here six years ago, at once attracted and repelled. The composer's thoughts arrested but the expression of them irritated; there was an avoidance of all geniality and sensuousness, there was a hint of crabbedness and perversity.

Per contra, the new symphony, after an acidulous opening which sets a key that many no doubt were relieved not to find maintained, sounds spontaneous, is almost gay, is here and there frankly tuneful. And the slow movement has melody that is warmly emotional, a richness of texture and not infrequently a sheer beauty of orchestral sound that would seem to signify a change of heart. Not that Roussel has anywhere achieved the magical sonorities, at once rich and luminous, that succeed each other kaleidoscopically throughout the course of Debussy's "The Sea," but at least he has admitted that the ear has its claims as well as the mind.

Agreeable and Distinctive

In short, an agreeable symphony, not too long and not too involved, yet with enough that is individual and distinctive to give it a quality and flavor of its own and make of it something more than a piece to be heard once, politely applauded and as politely dismissed The performance yesterday bore witness to great pains in the preparation and Dr. Koussevitzky conducted with enthusiasm and, as it seemed, with sympathy and understanding. The wonder of it was that there was still time during the week to work the miracle with "The Sea" to add a few finishing touches to the already scintillant version of "The Waltz."

The familiar Rameau-Motti ballet suite began the concert, and in playing this delightful music Dr. Koussevitzky wisely employed a reduced string orchestra.

ROUSSEL ATTENDS SYMPHONY CONCERT

French Composer Hears His G Minor Symphony

First Performance of Modern Work Rouses Unusual Enthusiasm

Albert Roussel, the noted French composer, heard at yesterday's Boston Symphony concert the first public performance of his new Symphony in G Minor, one of the many important new works commissioned by the Boston Symphony Orchestra for its 50th anniversary season. Seldom does the first performance of a new symphony win or deserve such an outburst of enthusiasm as came from players and audience yesterday. The composer was called from his place in the audience to the stage. The orchestra stood to applaud him. He was repeatedly called back to bow his acknowledgment. Even before the audience realized that the composer was present the clapping was loud and eager.

Roussel, born in 1869, began life as a naval officer, but from the age of 25 devoted himself to music. He studied under Gigout and under d'Indy at the Schola Cantorum. His "Evocations," symphony in B flat, suite from "Padmavati," and suite in F major have been previously heard at Boston Symphony concerts. In France his reputation as one of the chief composers of the day is firmly established. Not long ago the Revue Musicale devoted an entire issue to Roussel, an honor it has given to very few others, among them Debussy and Liszt.

Yesterday's audience saw Roussel as a slender, erect, dignified man, with a black mustache and bearded chin, not looking nearly his real age, and acknowledging an ovation with an obviously genuine modesty and simplicity.

Twenty years of concert going make one a bit wary of new symphonies. This of Roussel yesterday is the only one out of a large number heard and promptly forgotten of which one would venture a heartfelt wish to hear it often, and a prophecy that it may in fact become part of the standard repertory.

That Roussel has heard and been influenced by the music of many of his contemporaries and some of his juniors is obvious. The first movement of this G minor symphony begins with rhythms and instrumentation that recall Stravinsky and Prokofieff. One thought, listening to the whole work of composers as diverse as Honegger and Ravel, Debussy and d'Indy.

Yet, despite this eclecticisms of manner, the substance of the music is wholly original. Roussel's musical ideas are ingratiating, his treatment of them plays on one's emotions. To most modern symphonies one's first reaction is the thought, how well, or perhaps, how poorly they are written. This one is certainly well written, but one is too much carried away by its emotional appeal to note the fact carefully at a first hearing.

What really matters is not the use of cyclical forms and germinating motives, as recommended by d'Indy in his "Course of Musical Composition," not the ingenuity and clarity of the instrumentation, but the vitality, the imaginative energy of Roussel's music. On the evidence of this symphony, which to one hearer yesterday represented an immeasurable advance over the composer's earlier work, one would class Roussel as a composer who, like Cesar Franck, has at last found his true musical utterance at an age when most others grow stale and repetitious.

The musical and imaginative character of this G minor Symphony would strengthen the faith of those who believe the French a Nation apart from the others. It has the lightness of heart, the smiling gayety and grace of Couperin and Rameau and Gretry, with not a few touches of the genuine and heartfelt pathos that touches so much of their best work. But then one thinks of Mozart, who also wrote a Symphony in G minor, a symphony with which this one is not wholly unworthy to be named, immortal though the classic may be. If one is to go back as many composers now try to do to the purity of form, the clarity and grace of style of the 18th century it ought certainly to be done as Roussel has done it here, with an unforced spontaneity and charm, and no conscious attempt to revive the idioms of a vanished age. Mozart, writing in 1925, would probably have produced something not so very different in kind, though greater in quality, than this G minor Symphony of Roussel.

Mr. Koussevitzky conducted with the utmost eloquence and zeal in the rest of an all-French program, which included a suite by Rameau, substituted at the last moment for the announced Berlioz overture, Debussy's "La Mer" and Ravel's "La Valse." His interpretations were, as always, highly personal and open to strictures on that account. To his conducting must go not a little of the credit for the great success of the new symphony.

For the next week an overture by an anonymous composer, the first anonymous work ever to be played at these concerts; a new symphony by a Russian named Nabokoff, unknown here, and Tschaikovsky's Fourth Symphony are the works announced for performance.

P. R.

formances.

Concert-Chronicle

Trans. Oct 27

Better Late Than Never

SAID the old hand to the young beginner: "Don't try too hard. It's possible to over-strain yourself." The reviewer, in Saturday's Transcript, of Mr. Roussel's new Symphony is no neophyte; but then and there he fell into the pit dug for the inexperienced. He was so eager to explore the "in'nards" of a notable music that he forgot to mention its salient trait to the casual hearer. That trait, moreover, was conspicuous in the repetition at the Symphony Concert of Saturday—the rhythmic animation, the propulsive power pervading the whole. Mr. Roussel has not written ten measures before he sets the Symphony in active motion: only at the formal pauses does it halt until he has drawn the final double-bar. His first movement drives forward and upward to the proclamation of the motto-motiv. The rhythms are short, sharp, reiterated: if the hearer likes, rather Stravinskian. The impetus of the fugued slow movement is irresistible. Before and after the songful trio, the scherzo is a dance of figures. The finale resumes and heightens the rhythmic energy of the beginning. Again the sense of motion is sharp, decisive, persistent.

Were it humanly possible to write a symphony at a sitting, Mr. Roussel might have done the feat over these pages, so vitalizing, tireless, compact and sure-handed are his invention and procedure. It is as though the exhilaration he is communicating to his audience possessed him no less. Every transition springs warm into the matter that is to come. Every ascent is unflagging to an equal climax of matter and of mood. Long ago a Parisian reviewer found the phrase for Roussel in such vein—"élan winged with heart." Once more this new symphony justifies it. . . . Needless to say, conductor, orchestra and audience fell not a whit short on Saturday in tribute to the composer.

Incidents and Prospects

The manuscript of Stravinsky's "Symphony of Psalms," writen for the jubilee year of the orchestra, is in hand at Symphony Hall. It belongs to these, the religious, days of the composer and is inscribed 'To the Glory of God." Production is likely in December with a choir from Mr. Fiedler's Cecilia to sing the Psalms in a Latin text.

In Paine Hall at Harvard this evening, the Brosa Quartet and Miss Cohen, the pianist, both brought from London by Mrs. Coolidge, will be heard in Beethoven's Quartet in C-sharp minor (Op. 131); the English Bridge's new Trio for Piano, Violin and Violoncello; a Quartet of Mozart in C major.

Dr. Koussevitzky has already assembled the programs for the four concerts of the Beethoven Festival, at Washington in December, by the Symphony Orchestra. They traverse the third "Leonora" overture, the overtures to "Egmont" and to "Coriolanus"; the third and the fourth piano-concertos, with Miss Hess and Mr. Hofmann in the solo-parts; the violin-concerto with Mr. Zimbalist; the first, third, fifth, seventh and ninth symphonies. A chorus trained in Washington will asist in the ninth.

H. T. P.

CONCERT NOTES

Herald Oct. 30

Another composition written expressly for the 50th anniversary of the Boston Symphony orchestra will be performed at the concerts next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. This time it is on overture by an undoubtedly Great Unknown; by a gentleman—presumably a man, though in these days a female composer is like Voltaire's characterization of Habakkuk "Capable de tout"—who, wishing to have an unprejudiced judgment on his musical achievement, does not wish his name to be mentioned. (It is barely possible that on Saturday night after the hoped for "roaring and the wreaths," he will step gaily on the stage, and look around him: "Yes, I did it. I'm the man." The main theme of the overture is taken or adapted from a tune in Glinka's "Life for the Tsar," a tune which Mr. Anonymous thinks most appropriate for the occasion; the second theme is his own.

A symphony by Nicolas Nabokov will be performed for the first time in this country. The composer is a young man, who, born at Leningrad, went to Berlin after the revolution, and studied there at the Hochschule fuer Musik. It is said that he also studied at Stuttgart. For some years he has lived at Paris, where his curious "Ode," a ballet-oratorio, was produced by Diaghilev's Ballet Russe [illegible] excited no end of comment. "Ode" was afterward performed at London. The symphony to be heard this week was produced at Paris by the Orchestre Symphonique de Paris, conducted by Mr. Monteux on Feb. 16 of this year. It is said to be melodious and short. Tchaikovsky's Fourth Symphony is also on the program, the symphony for which he supplied an elaborate description for the benefit of Mme. Meck who had befriended him by granting a handsome yearly allowance when he was in debt and discouraged.

The program of the concert for Nov. 7-8 comprises Handel's Concerto for strings No. 12 (B minor), the seventh symphony of Sibelius; Mozart's clarinet concerto to be played by the excellent new clarinetist of the orchestra, Mr. Polatschek, and "Metamorphoson"—theme and 12 variations written this year by Mr. Respighi for the 50th anniversary. The performance will be the first.

Next Saturd[illegible]

Trans. Oct. 30 Plays and P

41

Two Russians Come Fresh to Symphony Hall

Tempting Guess-Work Around An Unsigned Overture for The Jubilee Year

AT Symphony Hall on Friday and Saturday half the program goes to novel music. First there is the overture of the composer who wishes to remain unnamed, but who is evidently a well-wisher of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. It is one more of the series of works for the Golden Anniversary. Next there is the new symphony by the new composer, Nabokov, produced by Pierre Monteux last February at the concerts of the Paris Symphony Orchestra; as yet unheard on this side of the Atlantic

No doubt many frequenters of the Symphony Concerts are indulging in a guessing-game as to the identity of the unnamed composer. At present there is no authorized solution of the puzzle. The analyst can only submit certain meager evidence from which all who choose may draw conclusions. First, Dr. Koussevitzky said in so many words a few weeks ago that the composer is a Russian. Next, the instrumentation of the overture may be significant. For it is exactly the instrumentation of the Boston Symphony Orchestra as it was constituted last season—down to the eight horns and five trombones. It is hardly a far-fetched deduction that this Russian composer, setting to his work a few months ago, had an exact and familiar knowledge of the orchestral resources at his disposal. There, for the while, conjecture stops—say at a secret of Polichinelle.

Back to Glinka

The overture, which is not lengthy, proceeds through three main divisions: an introductory Adagio, a main portion, "Molto Allegro Energico," and a concluding Maestoso. All three are based upon a single theme, frankly borrowed by the composer—from the Russian "Slavsya" or "Hymn of Triumph," composed as such by Glinka and used by him in the epilogue to his opera "A Life for the Tsar." Concerning the origin and use of this theme an unidentified clipping pasted in front of one of the scores of Glinka's opera at the Public Library, gives significant information. The occasion of the article is the coronation of Tsar Alexander III (1882). Certain festivities took place in the Red Square before the Kremlin and included a performance of the operatic epilogue. The article says that the epilogue "represents the triumphal entry into Moscow of the Tsar Michael Fedorovitch, first of the Romanovs, after the defeat of the Poles, who having occupied the Russian capital, were driven from it by a general rising of the inhabitants." The article suggests that the use of this scene for the coronation festivities will be only a re-enactment of the events which the opera celebrates. Discussing the music, it continues:

"In notes to the program to a concert of Russian music, the late Prince George Galitzin, a good authority on the subject, some twenty years ago [i. e. twenty years before the crowning of Alexander III] had this to say about the origin of the hymn. According to Prince Galitzin, the Emperor Nicholas determined one day that Russia must no longer employ on State occasions the 'God Save the Queen' of the English which is also the 'Heil dir im Siegerkrantz' of the Prussians [yes, and the 'America' of the United States], but that she must have a National Anthem of her own. . . . He called upon Russian composers to furnish specimens of national and patriotic music; and from the various hymns, marches and anthems sent in, selected two compositions, one by Glinka, the other by Lvov, for performance in presence of a chosen assembly of courtiers and dilettanti.

"Glinka's hymn and march produced a good effect, though the fact of its being characteristically Russian was not calculated to help it in those days, when to be Russian was with most persons, and especially those of the court, equivalent to being vulgar. But Lvov, in the orchestral accompaniment to his (God Save the Emperor), introduced such a number of trumpets and drums that Nicholas, touched in his military instincts by this excess of sonority, was quite carried away, and in a moment of enthusiasm awarded the palm to Lvov. . . .

"Glinka's hymn did not please the Emperor, above all other hymns, for the Slavophiles and the malcontents generally to attach the highest importance to it; which, however, they were justified in doing on Slavic and national grounds. Glinka's 'Hymn of Triumph,' with its thoroughly popular character, came in any case to be looked upon as the national anthem of Russia in opposition to the State Anthem." It is hardly to be wondered at that this piece of music, esteemed as it is by Russians, used by them for joyous and festive occasions, should be taken as a theme for a work celebrating an equally festive occasion in the life of the orchestra to whom the composer dedicated it.

In the Adagio of the new overture the organ alone, in notes of even rhythm and neutral color, with utmost simplicity, gives out this theme. Other instruments take it up. The introduction completes the ascent which is preparation for the overture proper, and the theme is launched in full martial energy by the whole orchestra. A single contrast (conventional "second theme") ensues, taken by strings lyrically. There is much development of the principal theme, with episodes "fugato." It returns in even greater force, but the second theme does not recur; instead there is further development, leading up to the climactic Maestoso, which gives final utterance to the theme at broadest and most sonorous—an apotheosis.

A Singing Symphony

With attention divided between two scores, and the time limited in which those scores could be seen, it was impossible to give more than a hasty glance at Nabokov's symphony. Nicolas Nabokov is one of the expatriate Russians residing in Paris. He comes of a high-placed Russian family and was hardly more than a lad when he was taken from his native land. Probably his Parisian environment more than his Russian birth enters into his work as composer, though he is reported as having a fondness for archaic Russian melody. The foreign press records one work of large proportion from the pen of Nabokov, written previous to the symphony. It was an "Ode," performed variously in 1928, set for orchestra, chorus, ballet and cinematograph — the latter to provide forms in motion in addition to those of the ballet. "Ode" won favorable comment, though certain immaturities in style were noted.

The new symphony is in E minor and runs through three movements—Allegro, Largo, and final Allegro, which is also scherzo. It is perhaps significant that when Mr. Monteux played the symphony in Paris, Parisian papers referred to it as a "Symphonie Lyrique," though the title-page of the score does not give it any designation beyond the single word "Symphonie." The most hasty glance at the score bears witness to its essentially lyrical character. As in Mr. Roussel's symphony, the chief theme of the first movement is a melody of considerable sweep rather than a reiteration of crisp rhythmical motives suitable for rhythmic development. The second theme is marked "cantando," and is played by singing strings. A closing theme alone shows predominantly rhythmic characteristics. In the Largo a slow and long-dawn-out duet between high and low strings furnishes the principal theme and sets the character of the movement. Lyricism redoubled. Not even an independent scherzo is allowed to break this spell; for Nabokov tries the experiment of combining in a single movement scherzo and finale. The scherzo-rhythm beats now and again, but gives way, often to sterner and also to more songful stuff. To conclude, the symphony has an epilogue, "Andante Moderato," in which the composer uses a broadened version of the third theme of the first movement.

With a Moral

All this emphasis upon lyric, that is to say upon melodious, quality, is cause for thought. Nabokov's symphony is dubbed "lyrique' even he did not call it so. Roussel's symphony was laden with melodies, though underlying them were buoyant rhythms. The morning of the day on which this article was written, the conductor, rehearsing the anonymous overture, said repeatedly, "It must sing; every note in every part must sing." Recall the new music of only two years ago. Was "every note" singing then? To ask the question is to answer it. In that recent past every new thing was peppered with rhythm. We had "scherzos mécaniques," and a variety of forms that glorified the god of vigorous accentuation. Can it be that the rhythmic period has lived its short-lived course, and that a new dispensation is upon us?

A. H. M.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TIMES
OCT 31 1930

MUSIC NOTES.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will play a symphony by Nabokoff, modern Russian composer, who is expatriated, at its concert in Symphony Hall in Boston this afternoon, under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky. An overture by a composer who prefers to be anonymous and Tchaikovsky's Fourth Symphony are also on the program.

"La Traviata" will be presented at the President Theatre on Sunday evening at 8:30 o'clock by the Grand Opera Intime Company.

42

SYMPHONY HONORED BY CONDUCTOR

Koussevitzky's Overture Scores Tremendous Hit

Post Nov. 1

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Neither Anonymous, that versatile and prolific writer, nor Serge Koussevitzky had appeared as composer upon a programme of a Symphony Concert until yesterday afternoon when they made their bow as authors of the same piece; an overture, written, so the programme-book stated, for the 50th anniversary of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

RISES TO COMPOSER

That programme book, to be sure, gave all the credit to Anonymous. But it was Dr. Koussevitzky who received and acknowledged the swelling, long-continued plaudits of an orchestra and audience standing in spontaneous tribute.

Had not the orchestra, with Mr. Burgin at its head, risen first, no doubt many in the audience might be wondering to this minute who Anonymous was. But when the players stood and began to clap or, if they were suitably equipped, to strike the wood of their bows against the backs of their fiddles, everyone must have realized that Anonymous and Dr. Koussevitzky were one.

Effectively Written

"The author," so read the programme-notes, "seldom composes, and for this reason does not wish to make known his identity." But "the author" was far too modest. His piece does him credit. It is workmanlike and effective; it is well put together and well written for the instruments; it sounds; it breathes both a solemn and a festal note. The end is exciting, and the audience would most surely have applauded the piece had its authorship remained an unsolved riddle or had some name other than that of a well-beloved figure been signed to it.

For the chief theme of his Overture Dr. Koussevitzky went to his countryman, Glinka, specifically to that composer's masterwork, the opera, "A Life for the Tzar," which yielded him a melody that he believed to be ideally suited to his conception of a solemn overture on the Boston Symphony's Jubilee

The second theme bears a striking resemblance to one in Dr. Koussevitzky's own highly effective concerto for the double bass that he has twice played in Boston. Indeed, it was this resemblance that confirmed the suspicions of certain members of the orchestra when the overture was first put in rehearsal last Monday. Instead of the conventional development, Dr. Koussevitzky has written a fugue—and a good one—and there is a jubilant coda. Incidentally, the piece is scored for an orchestra exactly the size of the Boston Symphony, so that every man had a part to play.

New Symphony Pleases

The remaining numbers on an all-Russian programme were a new Symphony by Nicolas Nabokov, a young man of 27, one of the numerous Russian expatriates who have found a home in Paris, and the Fourth Symphoney of Tchaikovsky.

The Symphony of Nabokov reveals a graceful and agreeable talent. The piece is, in fact, entitled "Symphonie Lyrique," and it proved in the hearing not only fluently but pleasantly melodious.

There were even Kagernian hints and suggestions, if not actual reminiscences. Have our young men then become again romantic and emotional? Are they turning their backs on the Stravinsky of "Le Sacre" and going unashamedly to "Tristan," that storehouse from which their fathers helped themselvesso liberally% By the evidence of Mr. Nabokov, that is exactly what they are doing, but we must wait and see whether he is typical of his generation or is merely satisfying an individual lyric impulse in defiance of existing musical tendencies. But if, as Vincent d' Indy has suggested, art moves ever in a spiral, romanticism and melody should some day come back. There will be those who will not complain if they do.

The performance of Tchaikovsky's Symphony was one in which all the salient features, the most characteristic qualities of this intensely personal music, were brought out, and hence one that did not disguise or minimize its occasional blatant vulgarity.

MUSIC

Herald Nov 1

SYMPHONY CONCERT

By PHILIP HALE

The program of the fourth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Koussevitzky conductor, given in Symphony hall yesterday afternoon, was as follows: Anonymous, Overture. (Written for the 50th anniversary of the orchestra. First performance.) Nabokov, symphonie lyrique (first time in the United States). Tchaikovsky, symphony No. 4, F minor.

A good many years ago a German prince was addicted to musical composition. Of course some of his works were performed. There was discussion of them among musicians. One said: "It is never prudent to speak lightly of music by a prince, for no one knows who wrote it." This remark has been attributed to Brahms, who had a faculty of saying disagreeable, bitter words. It has also been attributed to Hans von Buelow, who like Mr. Brown in Bret Harte's poem, "was a most sarcastic man."

It was not necessary to speak thus about the overture performed yesterday. The identity of the composer was not revealed by the management of Symphony hall. There were rumors; there was natural curiosity. It was known that the composer had made a graceful "gesture," to use the jargon of the newspapers, by thus paying homage to the orchestra. A short account of the work was sent out from Symphony hall, in which it was stated that the author of the overture seldom composes; that the chief theme was taken from Glinka's opera "A Life for the Tsar," because to the composer this theme "one of the most solemn and glorifying themes existing in musical literature," responded to the idea he had of a stately overture for this orchestra's jubilee; that the second theme was original.

The overture, for the most part following conventional form, begins quietly with the chief theme announced by the organ. This theme is worked with ever increasing intensity. The second theme, one of a sentimental nature, is slightly developed. A figure of an exciting nature takes the place of the repetition section and rushes into a long, sonorous coda in which the first theme is used for the apotheosis.

The overture was enthusiastically received. The allusion to Glinka's opera and the wording of the statement made by the composer aroused suspicion as to his identity. When the orchestra stood, during the long continued applause, and joined in it, suspicion was turned to certainty. Dr. Koussevitzky acknowledged modestly the tribute paid him.

Nicholas Nabokov, born at Leningrad in 1903, was driven out of Russia by the revolution. With other musicians, victims of the revolution, he lives in Paris, where some of them attempt to be revolutionary in composition. It is said that he is of a high-born family, some members of which held honrobale positions before the upsetting storm; that he studied at the Hoch Schule in Berlin, and also at Stuttgart. He became prominent in Paris and in London by his music for an extraordinary, spectacular ballet-oratorio entitled "Ode," produced by the Ballet Russe in 1928.

The symphony heard yesterday is in three movements, not irritatingly contemporaneous in its harmonic scheme; not orchestrally far fetched. The first allegro has more or less of the wildness expected from a member of the young Russian school, but the movement has vitality, also individuality, although it has been said in Paris that he is strongly influenced by Stravinsky and Prokofieff. This influence is not too apparent, if it is felt to be at all. The slow movement contains passages of genuine beauty, with touches of the melancholy, or the wistfulness that is not displeasing. The finale has much of a scherzo character. It is to us the most maturely wrought, the most definitely planned and executed, the most constantly interesting of the three movements. The impetuous rhythm, the headlong rush ends with a long pause, after which a few impressive chords for the full orchestra bring an unexpectedly dramatic ending. The symphony was well received; a reception unusual for a work by a composer of whom little or nothing was known.

Dr. Koussevitzky with the orchestra gave an amazingly effective interpretation of Tchaikovsky's symphony for which the composer wrote an extended program to aid Mme. Meck in full appreciation of the musical contents. This symphony may be called a "human document," to use the phrase dear to Zola and the Goncourts; the autographic music of a self-torturer. There have been of late explanations, perhaps unnecessary, of early circumstances that gave this composer a sad and troubled outlook on life; that as a young man he fell in with Nihilists who had no belief in humanity or God. (But has not the Russian for years been constitutionally melancholy; now superstitiously religious; now exercised, as Dostoievsky's heroes, about the possibility of individual survival and the existence of an all-knowing God?) And in the later years of Tchaikovsky there was a reason for his self-torturing. Modest Tchaikovsky, a devoted brother, did not in writing Peter's life tell all that he might have told. It was reserved for Richard Specht in his life of Johannes Brahms, recently translated into English, to give a personal reason for Brahms's dislike of Tchaikovsky and his music.

But how could Brahms appreciate Peter? How could Peter enjoy the music of Johannes? Peter in his sadness, in his mental agony sometimes shrieks; but Brahms in his pessimistic mood, even in his forced gaiety, often whines.

It was an experience to hear the fourth symphony performed as it was yesterday; interpreted with understanding, national spirit, artistic gusto by Dr. Koussevitzky; performed so eloquently and with as phenomenal a display of technical proficiency, by this incomparable orchestra.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program of next week comprises Handel's Concerto Grosso for strings, B minor No. 12; Mozart's Clarinet concerto (Mr. Polatschek, clarinetist); the seventh Symphony of Sibelius; and Respighi's "Metamorphoseon" (theme and 12 variations written for the 50th anniversary of the orchestra.

SARG'S MARIONETTES TODAY

Last opportunities to see Tony Sarg's Marionettes in "Alice in Wonderland" come today, when two performances, morning and afternoon, will be given in Tremont Temple. The hours are 10:30 and 2:15. A novel feature is the introduction of the human element in the person of Elise Dvorak in the role of Alice in the scenes in which Lewis Carroll's heroine has grown up.

RUSSIAN MUSIC AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

"Anonymous" Overture Is by Koussevitzky

New "Lyric Symphony," by Nabokov, in First American Performance

Globe Nov. 1

The program of yesterday's Boston Symphony concert began with an overture, "First time: Written for the 50th anniversary of the Boston Symphony Orchestra." In place of the composer's name stood, for the first time in 50 seasons, the word "Anonymous." A program note stated "The author seldom composes, and for this reason does not wish to make known his identity."

But at the end of the piece the players in the orchestra gave the secret away by standing in a body and applauding their conductor. The audience, grasping the situation, also, for the most part, rose, and clapped Dr Koussevitzky loud and long. So gossip and newspaper reporters turned out to be accurate in indicating who wrote the much talked of "anonymous" piece.

If a malicious rumor, more than once published in recent years, that Dr Koussevitzky "cannot read an orchestral score," had reached his ears, he took an ingenious way of refuting it. Plainly, a man able to write an orchestral score can read one written by somebody else. It ought to have been obvious that nobody unable to read score could conduct with any approximation to the conspicuous success of Dr Koussevitzky. So absurd a story would not deserve mention here had it not recently been revived by a periodical with national circulation.

For the principal theme of his overture. Dr Koussevitzky turned to Glinka's opera "A Life for the Tzar," and borrowed one which seemed to him, rightly enough, to have the imaginative quality appropriate to a solemn commemoration of the orchestra's jubilee. This theme is worked out contrapuntally. For a contrasting episode there is a slow melody, of Dr Koussevitzky's own. This is not developed.

The instrumentation of the overture is ingenious. It begins with a passage for organ alone, and eventually works up to a climax for full orchestra and organ. The counterpoint, like the form of the work, is free rather than orthodox. The whole piece has the mounting sonorities, the heaped-up rhythms one expects of a festival overture. It is frankly an "occasional piece" and as such serves its purpose adequately.

Another novelty on the program was a "Symphonie Lyrique" by Nicolas Nabokov, a young Russian living in Paris. This work, first performed by the Orchestre Symphonique de Paris, Pierre Monteux, conductor, last February, is in three relatively brief movements. Its style recalls Tchaikovsky and Glazunov rather than Stravinsky and Prokofieff, though there are, especially in the first movement, passages relatively modern in harmony.

Nabokov's themes are often frankly, not to say conventionally, melodious. Like most Russians, he repeats them in alternation without much effort at the kind of development that has dominated German music since Beethoven. This work is mildly agreeable at a first hearing, but in no way memorable. Its brevity is its outstanding merit.

Tchaikovsky's Fourth Symphony, the remaining number on an all-Russian program, brought out Dr Koussevitzky's best powers. No other conductor known here approaches his eloquence and emotional intensity in this music. He shapes its melodies with the utmost subtlety and tact. He builds up its climaxes with an amazing virtuosity. Yesterday's performance was, like others he has given, memorable. It is improbable that we shall ever hear Tchaikovsky so magnificently interpreted by anyone else. In his music, at all events, Dr Koussevitzky's supremacy cannot now be challenged. After each movement there were bursts of applause, promptly suppressed. At the end there was no mistaking the fervor of the audience.

A listener who has always disliked what seems to him the vulgarity, the bombast, the not infrequent triviality of Tchaikovsky was forced yesterday to admit that this Fourth Symphony, rightly interpreted, is a masterpiece of its kind. Its hysterical outbursts may be offensive, its sins against good taste manifold. But one cannot listen to it unmoved, and a certain reluctant admiration mingles with one's irritations. After all, it says something for this symphony that after 50 years fastidious listeners are still arguing heatedly over Tchaikovsky's qualities and defects as a composer, and average audiences are being deeply stirred by his eloquence.

Next week the new first clarinet of the Boston Symphony, Victor Polatschek, from Vienna, will play a Mozart concerto. The other numbers are Sibelius' Seventh Symphony, a Handel concerto grosso in B minor, and a new work by Respighi, entitled "Metamorphoseon," a set of variations written especially for the 50th anniversary of the orchestra.

P. R.

42

SYMPHONY HONORED BY CONDUCTOR

Koussevitzky's Overture Scores Tremendous Hit

Post Nov. 1

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Neither Anonymous, that versatile and prolific writer, nor Serge Koussevitzky had appeared as composer upon a programme of a Symphony Concert until yesterday afternoon when they made their bow as authors of the same piece; an overture, written, so the programme-book stated, for the 50th anniversary of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

RISES TO COMPOSER

That programme book, to be sure, gave all the credit to Anonymous. But it was Dr. Koussevitzky who received and acknowledged the swelling, long-continued plaudits of an orchestra and audience standing in spontaneous tribute.

Had not the orchestra, with Mr. Burgin at its head, risen first, no doubt many in the audience might be wondering to this minute who Anonymous was. But when the players stood and began to clap or, if they were suitably equipped, to strike the wood of their bows against the backs of their fiddles, everyone must have realized that Anonymous and Dr. Koussevitzky were one.

Effectively Written

"The author," so read the programme-notes, "seldom composes, and for this reason does not wish to make known his identity." But "the author" was far too modest. His piece does him credit. It is workmanlike and effective; it is well put together and well written for the instruments; it sounds; it breathes both a solemn and a festal note. The end is exciting, and the audience would most surely have applauded the piece had its authorship remained an unsolved riddle or had some name other than that of a well-beloved figure been signed to it.

For the chief theme of his Overture Dr. Koussevitzky went to his countryman, Glinka, specifically to that composer's masterwork, the opera, "A Life for the Tzar," which yielded him a melody that he believed to be ideally suited to his conception of a solemn overture on the Boston Symphony's Jubilee

The second theme bears a striking resemblance to one in Dr. Koussevitzky's own highly effective concerto for the double bass that he has twice played in Boston. Indeed, it was this resemblance that confirmed the suspicions of certain members of the orchestra when the overture was first put in rehearsal last Monday. Instead of the conventional development, Dr. Koussevitzky has written a fugue—and a good one—and there is a jubilant coda. Incdentally, the piece is scored for an orchestra exactly the size of the Boston Symphony, so that every man had a part to play.

New Symphony Pleases

The remaining numbers on an all-Russian programme were a new Symphony by Nicolas Nabokov, a young man of 27, one of the numerous Russian expatriates who have found a home in Paris, and the Fourth Symphoney of Tchaikovsky.

The Symphony of Nabokov reveals a graceful and agreeable talent. The piece is, in fact, entitled "Symphonie Lyrique," and it proved in the hearing not only fluently but pleasantly melodious.

There were even Kagernian hints and suggestions, if not actual reminiscences. Have our young men then become again romantic and emotional? Are they turning their backs on the Stravinsky of "Le Sacre" and going unashamedly to "Tristan," that storehouse from which their fathers helped themselvesso liberally? By the evidence of Mr. Nabokov, that is exactly what they are doing, but we must wait and see whether he is typical of his generation or is merely satisfying an individual lyric impulse in defiance of existing musical tendencies. But if, as Vincent d' Indy has suggested, art moves ever in a spiral, romanticism and melody should some day come back. There will be those who will not complain if they do.

The performance of Tchaikovsky's Symphony was one in which all the salient features, the most characteristic qualities of this intensely personal music, were brought out, and hence one that did not disguise or minimize its occasional blatant vulgarity.

MUSIC

Herald Nov 1

SYMPHONY CONCERT

By PHILIP HALE

The program of the fourth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Koussevitzky conductor, given in Symphony hall yesterday afternoon, was as follows: Anonymous, Overture. (Written for the 50th anniversary of the orchestra. First performance.) Nabokov, symphonie lyrique (first time in the United States). Tchaikovsky, symphony No. 4, F minor.

A good many years ago a German prince was addicted to musical composition. Of course some of his works were performed. There was discussion of them among musicians. One said: "It is never prudent to speak lightly of music by a prince, for no one knows who wrote it." This remark has been attributed to Brahms, who had a faculty of saying disagreeable, bitter words. It has also been attributed to Hans von Buelow, who like Mr. Brown in Bret Harte's poem, "was a most sarcastic man."

It was not necessary to speak thus about the overture performed yesterday. The identity of the composer was not revealed by the management of Symphony hall. There were rumors; there was natural curiosity. It was known that the composer had made a graceful "gesture," to use the jargon of the newspapers, by thus paying homage to the orchestra. A short account of the work was sent out from Symphony hall, in which it was stated that the author of the overture seldom composes; that the chief theme was taken from Glinka's opera "A Life for the Tsar," because to the composer this theme "one of the most solemn and glorifying themes existing in musical literature," responded to the idea he had of a stately overture for this orchestra's jubilee; that the second theme was original.

The overture, for the most part following conventional form, begins quietly with the chief theme announced by the organ. This theme is worked with ever increasing intensity. The second theme, one of a sentimental nature, is slightly developed. A figure of an exciting nature takes the place of the repetition section and rushes into a long, sonorous coda in which the first theme is used for the apotheosis.

The overture was enthusiastically received. The allusion to Glinka's opera and the wording of the statement made by the composer aroused suspicion as to his identity. When the orchestra stood, during the long continued applause, and joined in it, suspicion was turned to certainty. Dr. Koussevitzky acknowledged modestly the tribute paid him.

Nicholas Nabokov, born at Leningrad in 1903, was driven out of Russia by the revolution. With other musicians, victims of the revolution, he lives in Paris, where some of them attempt to be revolutionary in composition. It is said that he is of a high-born family, some members of which held honrobale positions before the upsetting storm; that he studied at the Hoch Schule in Berlin, and also at Stuttgart. He became prominent in Paris and in London by his music for an extraordinary, spectacular ballet-oratorio entitled "Ode," produced by the Ballet Russe in 1928.

The symphony heard yesterday is in three movements, not irritatingly contemporaneous in its harmonic scheme; not orchestrally far fetched. The first allegro has more or less of the wildness expected from a member of the young Russian school, but the movement has vitality, also individuality, although it has been said in Paris that he is strongly influenced by Stravinsky and Prokofieff. This influence is not too apparent, if it is felt to be at all. The slow movement contains passages of genuine beauty, with touches of the melancholy, or the wistfulness that is not displeasing. The finale has much of a scherzo character. It is to us the most maturely wrought, the most definitely planned and executed, the most constantly interesting of the three movements. The impetucus rhythm, the headlong rush ends with a long pause, after which a few impressive chords for the full orchestra bring an unexpectedly dramatic ending. The symphony was well received; a reception unusual for a work by a composer of whom little or nothing was known.

Dr. Koussevitzky with the orchestra gave an amazingly effective interpretation of Tchaikovsky's symphony for which the composer wrote an extended program to aid Mme. Meck in full appreciation of the musical contents. This symphony may be called a "human document," to use the phrase dear to Zola and the Goncourts; the autographic music of a self-torturer. There have been of late explanations, perhaps unnecessary, of early circumstances that gave this composer a sad and troubled outlook on life; that as a young man he fell in with Nihilists who had no belief in humanity or God. (But has not the Russian for years been constitutionally melancholy; now superstitiously religious; now exercised, as Dostoievsky's heroes, about the possibility of individual survival and the existence of an all-knowing God?) And in the later years of Tchaikovsky there was a reason for his self-torturing. Modest Tchaikovsky, a devoted brother, did not in writing Peter's life tell all that he might have told. It was reserved for Richard Specht in his life of Johannes Brahms, recently translated into English, to give a personal reason for Brahms's dislike of Tchaikovsky and his music.

But how could Brahms appreciate Peter? How could Peter enjoy the music of Johannes? Peter in his sadness, in his mental agony sometimes shrieks; but Brahms in his pessimistic mood, even in his forced gaiety, often whines.

It was an experience to hear the fourth symphony performed as it was yesterday; interpreted with understanding, national spirit, artistic gusto by Dr. Koussevitzky; performed so eloquently and with as phenomenal a display of technical proficiency, by this incomparable orchestra.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program of next week comprises Handel's Concerto Grosso for strings, B minor No. 12; Mozart's Clarinet concerto (Mr. Polatschek, clarinetist); the seventh Symphony of Sibelius; and Respighi's "Metamorphoseon" (theme and 12 variations written for the 50th anniversary of the orchestra.

SARG'S MARIONETTES TODAY

Last opportunities to see Tony Sarg's Marionettes in "Alice in Wonderland" come today, when two performances, morning and afternoon, will be given in Tremont Temple. The hours are 10:30 and 2:15. A novel feature is the introduction of the human element in the person of Elise Dvorak in the role of Alice in the scenes in which Lewis Carroll's heroine has grown up.

RUSSIAN MUSIC AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

"Anonymous" Overture Is by Koussevitzky

New "Lyric Symphony," by Nabokov, in First American Performance

Globe Nov. 1

The program of yesterday's Boston Symphony concert began with an overture, "First time: Written for the 50th anniversary of the Boston Symphony Orchestra." In place of the composer's name stood, for the first time in 50 seasons, the word "Anonymous." A program note stated "The author seldom composes, and for this reason does not wish to make known his identity."

But at the end of the piece the players in the orchestra gave the secret away by standing in a body and applauding their conductor. The audience, grasping the situation, also, for the most part, rose, and clapped Dr Koussevitzky loud and long. So gossip and newspaper reporters turned out to be accurate in indicating who wrote the much talked of "anonymous" piece.

If a malicious rumor, more than once published in recent years, that Dr Koussevitzky "cannot read an orchestral score," had reached his ears, he took an ingenious way of refuting it. Plainly, a man able to write an orchestral score can read one written by somebody else. It ought to have been obvious that nobody unable to read score could conduct with any approximation to the conspicuous success of Dr Koussevitzky. So absurd a story would not deserve mention here had it not recently been revived by a periodical with national circulation.

For the principal theme of his overture. Dr Koussevitzky turned to Glinka's opera "A Life for the Tzar." and borrowed one which seemed to him, rightly enough, to have the imaginative quality appropriate to a solemn commemoration of the orchestra's jubilee. This theme is worked out contrapuntally. For a contrasting episode there is a slow melody, of Dr Koussevitzky's own. This is not developed.

The instrumentation of the overture is ingenious. It begins with a passage for organ alone, and eventually works up to a climax for full orchestra and organ. The counterpoint, like the form of the work, is free rather than orthodox. The whole piece has the mounting sonorities, the heaped-up rhythms one expects of a festival overture. It is frankly an "occasional piece" and as such serves its purpose adequately.

Another novelty on the program was a "Symphonie Lyrique" by Nicolas Nabokov, a young Russian living in Paris. This work, first performed by the Orchestre Symphonique de Paris, Pierre Monteux, conductor, last February, is in three relatively brief movements. Its style recalls Tchaikovsky and Glazunov rather than Stravinsky and Prokofieff, though there are, especially in the first movement, passages relatively modern in harmony.

Nabokov's themes are often frankly, not to say conventionally, melodious. Like most Russians, he repeats them in alternation without much effort at the kind of development that has dominated German music since Beethoven. This work is mildly agreeable at a first hearing, but in no way memorable. Its brevity is its outstanding merit.

Tchaikovsky's Fourth Symphony, the remaining number on an all-Russian program, brought out Dr Koussevitzky's best powers. No other conductor known here approaches his eloquence and emotional intensity in this music. He shapes its melodies with the utmost subtlety and tact. He builds up its climaxes with an amazing virtuosity. Yesterday's performance was, like others he has given, memorable. It is improbable that we shall ever hear Tchaikovsky so magnificently interpreted by anyone else. In his music, at all events, Dr Koussevitzky's supremacy cannot now be challenged. After each movement there were bursts of applause, promptly suppressed. At the end there was no mistaking the fervor of the audience.

A listener who has always disliked what seems to him the vulgarity, the bombast, the not infrequent triviality of Tchaikovsky was forced yesterday to admit that this Fourth Symphony, rightly interpreted, is a masterpiece of its kind. Its hysterical outbursts may be offensive, its sins against good taste manifold. But one cannot listen to it unmoved, and a certain reluctant admiration mingles with one's irritations. After all, it says something for this symphony that after 50 years fastidious listeners are still arguing heatedly over Tchaikovsky's qualities and defects as a composer, and average audiences are being deeply stirred by his eloquence.

Next week the new first clarinet of the Boston Symphony, Victor Polatschek, from Vienna, will play a Mozart concerto. The other numbers are Sibelius' Seventh Symphony, a Handel concerto grosso in B minor, and a new work by Respighi, entitled "Metamorphoseon," a set of variations written especially for the 50th anniversary of the orchestra.

P. R.

TH
O

VOLUM

BULLETIN OF THE BROOKLYN INSTITUTE OF ARTS AND SCIENCES

pp. 88-89, 103

NOVEMBER 1, 1930

VOLUME XXXV

NUMBER 5

ABRAHAM & STRAUS
FULTON ST. at HOYT · BROOKLYN

Fashions in Flowers

IS THE THEME SONG OF

A&S New Flower Shop

WHAT is your fancy? Table decorations? There's an artist who makes them a specialty. Japanese gardens? Two Japanese are ready to create them to order. Weddings? We know all about them. And if you're pining for the girl long loved and lost, we might even be able to fix that up! We'll fill your own vases. We'll telegraph orders. We'll start you a rock garden. We'll tell you the new tricks in back yards. And because we're pretty modern, we'll do it all at fashionably low prices! - - -

Separate Entrance on Fulton Street—Next Door to A&S Central Building Entrance

41 Years in Brooklyn— 41 Years of Growth!

In the center of the city, convenient to all Brooklyn—and officered by men old in bank-experience—The Kings County Trust Company has come to occupy an increasingly dominant position in this city's commerce and finance.

An interested, personal service offering every modern banking facility has earned and retained a wide patronage throughout our 41 years of growth.

Capital - - - - - - - $500,000.00
Surplus and Undivided Profits Over - $6,410,000.00

Kings County Trust Company
342 to 346 Fulton St., Cor. Court Sq., Borough of Brooklyn, City of New York

Four Blocks South of - BOROUGH HALL

Interest from the first of every month.

THE SOUTH BROOKLYN SAVINGS INSTITUTION
ATLANTIC AVENUE & COURT STREET
Brooklyn-New York

THE DIME SAVINGS BANK OF BROOKLYN
DE KALB AVENUE AND FULTON STREET
Incorporated 1859

Resources Sept. 1, 1930 . . . . $163,700,000.00
Surplus " " " 23,000,000.00

Now Pays Interest Quarterly
AT THE RATE OF 4½%
PER ANNUM

Deposits made on or before the 10th business day of January and July or the 3rd business day of any other month draw interest from the first of such months.

Most cosmopolitan of all games. "Invented in the East, introduced into the West and now domiciled in every part of the world."

The Institute Chess Club
Announces
FRANK J. MARSHALL of New York
United States Chess Champion for Twenty-one Years
in Simultaneous Exhibition
Saturday Evening, November 1, at 8:00
Roof Room — Academy of Music
Admission Free to Chess Club Members only
General Admission, $1

These Plays are attracting at the Institute the greatest audiences of children to be found anywhere for a Play for children.

THE
CLARE TREE MAJOR COMPANY
Presents for the Second of its Series of Six Plays for Children
One of the most fascinating tales of adventure childhood knows
"Aladdin and His Wonderful Lamp"
Saturday Afternoon, November 22,
at 3 o'clock

Opera House — Academy of Music

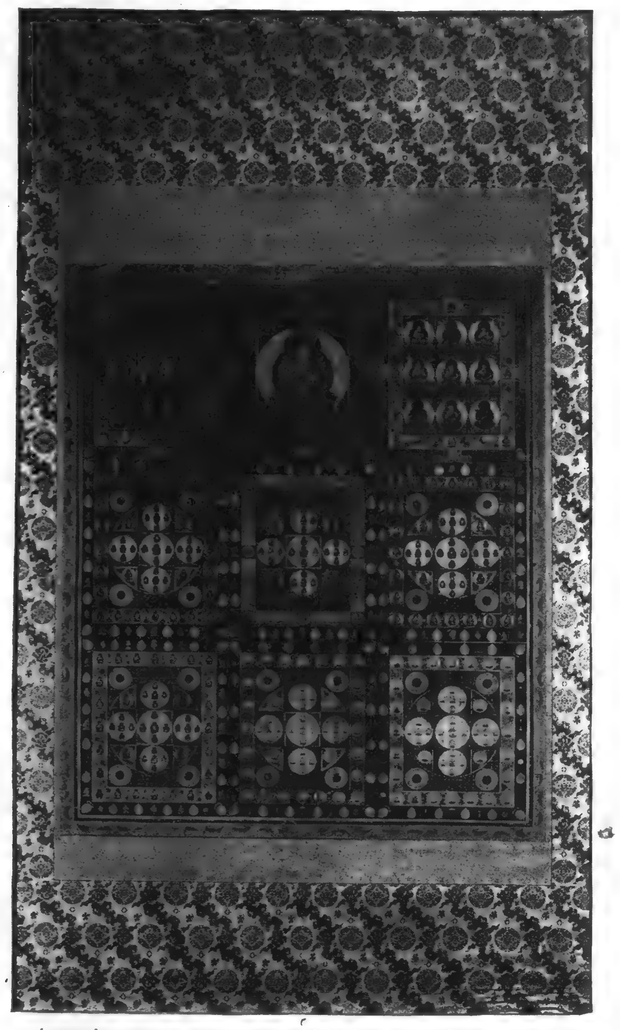
Tickets on Sale Saturday, November 8, at 8:30 a.m.

To Members 25c, 50c, 75c, $1.00, $1.50
Boxes $1.00, $1.50
To Non-Members $1.00, $1.25, $1.50, $1.75, $2.00
Boxes $1.75, $2.00



Among the treasures recently discovered in the Museum Collections—one of the religious paintings called Ryokai Mandara of the Shingon Sect of Buddhism.

JAPANESE SECTION OF THE BROOKLYN MUSEUM

The newly-arranged Japanese section of the Brooklyn Museum was officially opened on Thursday evening, October 30, with a program of dances, an address by Mr. SETSUZO SAWADA, Consul-General of Japan, before the members of the Japan Society, the Nippon Club, members of the Japanese colony and members of the Museum and their guests.

Since his connection with the Brooklyn Museum, Mr. TASSILO ADAM has been busy with his installation of the Japanese Gallery and has achieved a marked success in giving the galleries an entirely different and highly interesting aspect. Many treasures which have been in the storeroom for some time have been brought out and given the proper setting. The present plan of the gallery, which is a wide mezzanine around the court of Ethnology, begins with religious art; proceeds on to a collection of toys and games, about which the late STEWART CULIN, the former Curator, was such an authority; to fine arts including lacquer and prints, and a collection of armor. Mr. TERUWO AKIYAMA from the Imperial Household Museum at Tokio called four of these objects national treasures.

THE BULLETIN OF THE BROOKLYN INSTITUTE OF ARTS AND SCIENCES

CONTENTS

	Page
FRONTISPIECE, "WALT WHITMAN," BY ALFEO FAGGI	84
LIFE'S BOUNTIES	85
A DEBATE (GILBERT K. CHESTERTON-COSMO HAMILTON)	85, 95
LA ARGENTINA	85, 87, 102
BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA	88, 89, 103
ANGNA ENTERS	90, 100
ACCEPTING THE UNIVERSE (PROFESSOR H. A. OVERSTREET)	90
VICTOR CHENKIN	91, 101
CARL SANDBURG	91
BRYCE CANYON (DR. FRANK R. OASTLER)	92
RACE PROBLEMS IN INDIA (PROFESSOR H. G. KRIBS)	92
TSCHAIKOWSKY (DR. DANIEL GREGORY MASON)	93
ENJOYING POETRY (JESSIE B. RITTENHOUSE)	93
ROLAND HAYES	93, 99
A. A. MILNE	95
EVENTS FROM NOVEMBER 19 TO DECEMBER 3	96, 97, 98
DICKENS (ELSIE KISSAM EASTON)	98
EDWIN B. FROST	98
ARTIFICIAL DAYLIGHT (DR. M. LUCKIESH)	99
THE GOLDEN EAST (H. C. OSTRANDER)	104
SPENGLER (DR. G. F. BECK)	104
FASHIONS (MARJORIE KINNEY)	104

COPYRIGHTED BY THE BROOKLYN INSTITUTE OF ARTS AND SCIENCES, 1930

VOLUME XXXV NUMBER 5

NOVEMBER 1, 1930

PUBLISHED BY

THE BROOKLYN INSTITUTE OF ARTS AND SCIENCES

BROOKLYN-NEW YORK CITY

BI-WEEKLY, EXCEPT DURING MAY, JUNE, JULY AND AUGUST

SINGLE NUMBER, 15 CENTS

POSTAGE (IF SENT BY MAIL) THREE CENTS A NUMBER

ANNUAL SUBSCRIPTION, $2.00

TO MEMBERS OF THE INSTITUTE FREE

TOLLEFSEN

STUDIOS OF MUSICAL ART

946 President St., Brooklyn, N. Y. (Near Prospect Park West)

TELEPHONE, STERLING 3730

A School for the Thorough Training of Serious Music Students

Augusta Tollefsen, Piano; Carl H. Tollefsen, Violin; Robert Thrane, 'Cello; Felix Deyo, Harmony and Composition

Preparatory Instrumental Courses for Beginners

Circular mailed on application—Apply to Secretary

The Brooklyn Daily Eagle

Commercial Printing Department

Offers Its Services

to

Discriminating Buyers of Printing

A representative will co-operate in the preparation of your copy

305 Washington Street, Brooklyn

Phone, Main 7400

Courtesy of the Ferargil Galleries

"WALT WHITMAN" (Bronze)
By ALFEO FAGGI

The work of Alfeo Faggi, Italian-American sculptor, has been hailed widely as ranking with the foremost of contemporary sculpture. For the first time in nine years, in this country, Faggi is giving an exhibition at the Ferargil Galleries where some of his most recent sculpture as well as a collection of his drawings may be seen until November 8. Among them is his interesting study of Walt Whitman, done in bronze, as are the majority of his works, although plaster proves to be a surprisingly sensitive medium in his hands. Faggi, born in Florence, Italy, came to this country in 1913 to execute important commissions in Chicago. There he did the fourteen "Stations of the Cross" and a "Pieta" for the Church of St. Thomas the Apostle, which are regarded among his outstanding works in this country. Other notable items now on exhibition are his portraits of Padraic Colum, and the American poet Robert Frost.

The BULLETIN of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences

Brooklyn, New York City, November 1, 1930

VOLUME XXXV NUMBER 5

LIFE'S BOUNTIES

A few days ago a letter was received from a MEMBER, giving the address of a friend and requesting that an invitation to become a MEMBER be sent her. The writer thus concluded her letter:

"I know she would enjoy it as much as I do. When I die, and sum up life's bounties to me, what I received from the Institute will be the largest item."

That is a magnificent tribute to the Institute. One wonders how many there are who in summing up the bounties and satisfactions received in the years on earth would place privileges of Institute Membership above all others. And it is gratifying to see the MEMBER attempt to repay in part the debt by widening the circle of Membership. As the Institute's life is in its Membership, that life becomes more abundant through each new accession. Thus the MEMBER who brings in a friend adds to the power of the Institute and opens the door of opportunity to the one admitted. This mutual give-and-take establishes the vital current necessary to the doing of such a work as that undertaken by the Institute. The organization provides the opportunity; the MEMBERS provide the response. An opportunity without the response is as meaningless as sound without the receiving ear.

And the more abundant the response the greater the opportunities which may be offered. There is no limit to the possibilities of growth. Already the Institute has expanded beyond the dream of its founders. Its future rests with its MEMBERS as much as with its Trustees, its Directors, and the eminent men and women who appear upon its various platforms and direct its study courses.

Professor WILLIAM LYON PHELPS will discuss the following books in his lecture Sunday afternoon, November 9: "Swift," CARL VAN DOREN; "Cakes and Ale," by SOMERSET MAUGHAM; "New England's Vista," by WALTER PRITCHARD EATON; "Mysterious Waye," by P. C. WREN; "The Edwardians," V. SACKVILLE-WEST; "Doctor Serocold," by HELEN ASHTON.

One reason for the great popularity of Professor PHELPS' lectures is that his style, both in speaking and in writing, has that simplicity and directness which results from clearness of thought and mastery of the medium of expression. Whatever the subject chosen, he instantly irradiates it with charm and vitality.

The test of a lecturer's influence is the abiding character of the illumination he brings. Among platform teachers few meet this test better than Professor PHELPS, for he is among the most frequently quoted, showing that he leaves upon the minds of his hearers an impression that is not quickly overlaid.

A DEBATE

The debate Tuesday evening, November 25, on the question "Is Immorality in Modern Books Justified?" brings to the Institute two distinguished men of letters. COSMO HAMILTON, who supports the affirmative, has given to the reading world such diversified work in the field of playwriting as "The Blindness of Virtue,"

GILBERT K. CHESTERTON

"The Silver Fox," "Pickwick," "Scandal," "Parasites," "The New Door." He is the son of the late distinguished English Government official, HENRY GIBBS, of the Board of Education, who was born in Windsor Castle during his own father's term of service with Queen VICTORIA as a Royal Messenger. COSMO HAMILTON adopted his mother's name by legal process and is the brother of Sir PHILIP GIBBS and Major A. HAMILTON GIBBS and the uncle of ANTHONY GIBBS. He is thus the oldest member of the most remarkable literary family of our time.

Americans have a warm feeling for GILBERT K. CHESTERTON, the celebrated English writer. Mr. CHESTERTON is not merely a brilliant and paradoxical epigrammatist. He is a philosopher who puts things with a pungent, concise wit, and one whose epigrams are racy with the flavor of suddenly perceived, and hitherto unsuspected truth. This is why he keeps his readers and his hearers so keenly alert; and this is why every flash of light, with its revelations, begets the desire for another flash and more revelations. His essays and stories reach thousands of readers every year through the English newspapers, journals and magazines, and are read by other thousands in book form. He is one of the most conspicuous and colorful figures in the literary world today.

LA ARGENTINA

The hands in the picture below are those of LA ARGENTINA, Spain's greatest dancer and the acknowledged world's greatest castanet player.

Castanets may be made of ivory, mahogany, walnut or lignum-vitæ, and they get their name from their shape, which is that of a chestnut, or in Spanish castanea, when the two parts are united.

To a Spaniard, these shell-like concavities are voices endowed with sex, the left hand (larger one) being the male, and the slightly smaller set used on the right hand, the female. Woe betide a Spanish dancer who inadvertently appears with two pairs of the same sex! Such a dancer would be hooted and hissed from the stage.

ARGENTINA is known as the "queen of the castanets" and, according to SAMUEL CHOTZINOFF in the New York World, she can make these little wooden things "purr like a cat or sing like a cricket. She can rattle them with the rhythmic recurrence of a machine-gun, or simulate the lazy beats of a sea-gull. She can hammer out a thousand graduations of significant noises, rising to startling climaxes and sinking to whispers of percussion."

LA ARGENTINA, the world's queen of dance, has returned to America for another season and is again dancing to packed houses. New York, which last season crowded to see her eighteen times in the space of seven weeks, and would have continued to do so had the itinerary of the dancer permitted, is as avid as ever, it appears, to experience the entrancing spell of her dancing.

She brings this season new dance creations, but has retained many of the favorites of last season. In the six trunks that accompany her on tour are new costumes designed by leading European painters.

LA ARGENTINA takes her name from the South American republic where she was born; by heritage, however, she is of pure Spanish blood—Castilian on the father's side, on the mother's, Andalusian. Her father, a premier danseur at the Opera House in Madrid, taught her her first steps. At eleven, she was already first dancer in the ballet at the Royal Theatre of Madrid. A few years later, leaving the Opera House, she appeared in various music-halls, presenting her own ideas of the ballet, interpreted in terms of spontaneous beauty, and following the traditions of the Spanish and Oriental dance, the very antithesis of the stilted French and Italian schools.

It was Paris, however, that discovered her and gave to her name the significance of a great interpretative artist. Her reputation once secured, she toured Europe, South and Central America, and as the paths of glory lead inevitably to this country, she finally came to the United States. Here her triumph was spectacular.

LA ARGENTINA is not alone a dancer and an interpreter, she is primarily a creator, giving us the two-fold joy of visual and spiritual beauty, and a new meaning to the plastic and dynamic character of the Spanish dance.

ANDRÉ LEVINSON, French litterateur, and today the foremost authority on the dance, in his monograph on LA ARGENTINA, writes as follows:

"What is the miracle accomplished by this dancer of boleros and allegrias? That of having braved modern barbarism and made the sense of quality prevail. Her rise to fame has been slow and difficult, because her delicate and intense art, expressed in exquisite shadings, has been a standing challenge to the period. In a kind of art limited to a very few formulas, supported but also restricted by popular tradition, she has developed an incredible fullness and variety. Her intelligence has worked a subtle transformation of those curves, spirals, and ellipses, those interlaced Moorish ornaments, and sinuous calligrams, which are the foundation of all Iberian dancing. In her the spirit of the Occident triumphs over the lure of the Orient. She has once more reconquered Andalusia from the Arabs and by that sign has triumphed."

The BURTON HOLMES 1931 Travelogues will be: "Rejuvenated Rome," "Oberammergau—The 1930 Passion Play," "The North African Tour," "The Grand Tour of Europe" and "Imperial Abyssinia." They will be given Wednesday evenings in January.

ARGENTINA NOW

LA ARGENTINA as she appears today, the idol of three continents and a world-wide drawing card. She appears in the costume of "Iberienne," wonderful choreographic drama created by ARGENTINA to the music of JOAQUIN NIN, which she presented in New York and Boston last week for the first time. The composer wrote this music specially for ARGENTINA and dedicated it to her with the words "TO ANTONIA MERCE, LA ARGENTINA, incarnation of the very soul of the Spanish dance."

ARGENTINA is now in her third American tour, with an unbroken record of over thirty sold-out appearances in New York City alone. She is acknowledged the queen of the castanets, the greatest dancer since PAVLOWA, and the biggest drawing card in her field. With a gorgeous parade of costumes to the exotic rhythms of GRANADOS, ALBENIZ, SARASATE, NIN, DE FALLA, and other great Spanish composers, this dazzling dancer will give one of her recitals at the Institute on Wednesday evening, November 19.

ARGENTINA THEN

LA ARGENTINA, the famous Spanish dancer, at the age of twenty, when she first visited America to dance in GRANADOS' opera "El Goyescas" at the Metropolitan Opera House. The dancer was touring South America when the great Spanish composer cabled her to meet him in New York, whither he sailed to be present at the American début of his opera. Unfortunately, Signor GRANADOS failed to inform the Metropolitan Opera Company of his plans regarding ARGENTINA, and they had already engaged and rehearsed a dancer, so ARGENTINA never appeared on that stage. Perhaps, on this account, the opera never achieved success and is now chiefly known for its beautiful Intermezzo.

The Spanish impresario VALVERDE was presenting in New York a musical extravaganza entitled "The Land of Joy" and he induced the young ARGENTINA to dance the first three performances of this production, which marked her American début in the year 1916. Subsequently she appeared in recital at a New York theatre with small response from public or critics.

"Like every great art, dancing and music must have a content, an inner allegorical spark, if they are to live," Mme. ARGENTINA is quoted as saying. "Most of our so-called modern compositions are empty novelties, written for effect and business by superficial minds that have the technical, but not the cultural grasp of their work. What our modernists need in music, art, and the drama is more thinking, more feeling, more vision—not fire cracking and surprise at any price. For that reason, I cannot dance the so-called ultra-modern compositions of an international type. I am a nationalist and believe that nationalism is a great factor in æsthetic thought." And for that reason LA ARGENTINA reigns supreme in the realm of the dance.

The program for ARGENTINA's recital on Wednesday evening, November 19, will be given in the BULLETIN of November 15.

Few things are more unsettling to lecturer or audience than the late-comer who insists on occupying a front row chair.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

The Boston Symphony Orchestra was firmly established as an enduring institution by Colonel HENRY L. HIGGINSON, in 1881. Thus the present season will carry its career past the half century mark. While it was not the pioneer organization—Dr. LEOPOLD DAMROSCH founded the New York Symphony Society in 1878 and was the first real pathfinder for symphonic music in America—the Boston Symphony has always been in the front rank and at more than one period of the past fifty years it has been the acknowledged leader.

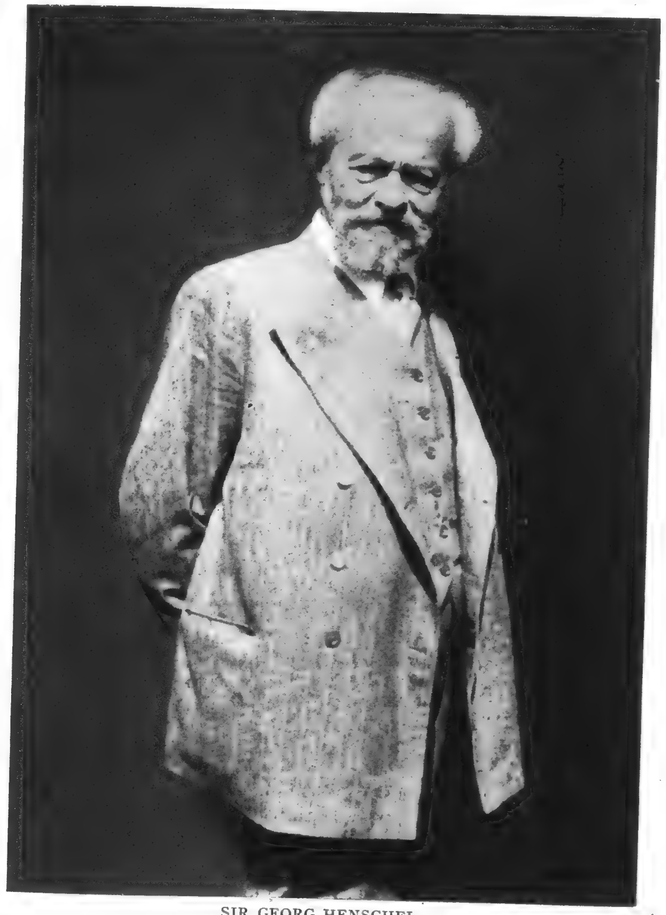
Today, if a Philadelphian were asked to name the greatest orchestra, he would probably reply, "The Philadelphia Orchestra." A Bostonian would support with equal enthusiasm the Boston Symphony, while many local admirers would name the Philharmonic-Symphony. With the vast increase in wealthy urban populations and the great improvement in musical taste and culture other highly competent, admirable orchestras have also been established, of such quality that supremacy can no longer be definitely attributed to any particular organization. Nevertheless, if one were forced to choose, probably most musical judges would place the Boston Symphony at the head of any American list.

HENRY LEE HIGGINSON
Founder of The Boston Symphony Orchestra

Much of the success of a symphony orchestra depends upon the conductor—who needs to be more than a competent musician. He must indeed be a born leader of men, a compelling personality in addition to being the leader of the orchestra itself. In SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY the Boston Symphony found such a leader. It has had other great conductors in the past but never one better able to carry his audience as well as his orchestra with him in whatever direction he prefers. The opening concert of this season's Brooklyn series, with KOUSSEVITZKY conducting, will take place on Friday evening, November 21.

HENRY L. HIGGINSON, knowing in the seventies that musical conditions in Boston were in a bad way, planned for some years a new scheme of symphony concerts. He was prepared to subsidize them, but he waited till he could find a conductor in whom he had confidence. On March 3, 1881, Mr. HIGGINSON heard GEORG HENSCHEL conduct his Concert Overture at the eighth and last concert of the Harvard Musical Association. HENSCHEL, then known only as a singer, pianist, vocal teacher, and composer, had in the previous year arrived in Boston with his pupil and betrothed, Miss LILLIAN BAILEY, for a concert tour of the United States. They sang for the first time in Boston at a concert of the Old Bay State Course, November 1, 1880. Mr. HIGGINSON thought he had found his man. In April, 1881, an announcement was made in Boston's newspapers "In The Interest of Good Music." Mr. HENSCHEL was then named conductor.

Mr. HENSCHEL conducted for three seasons. WILHELM GERICKE of Vienna succeeded him. Then followed, in turn, Messrs. NIKISCH, PAUR, GERICKE, MUCK, FIEDLER, MUCK, RABAUD, MONTEUX, and KOUSSEVITZKY.



SIR GEORG HENSCHEL
First Conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra

The annual social of the Department of Botany was held at the Brooklyn Botanic Garden on Tuesday evening, October 14. In spite of rain there was a good attendance and the party seemed to be more than usually enthusiastic. The program included botanical games and a lecture by Mr. H. S. SVENSON on the Galápagos Islands.

ANGNA ENTERS

Almost over night ANGNA ENTERS, who will be seen in her "Episodes" and "Compositions in Dance Form" on Tuesday evening, November 4, woke and found herself famous. A little over five years ago she gave her first concert in New York and the literati and cognoscenti immediately surrendered. Since then her path to fame has led straight upward. More appearances in New York, a trip to London, where she knew no one, an appearance there and conquest. An audience with REBECCA WEST, HUMBERT WOLFE, VIRGINIA WOOLF, among many other distinguished men and women of letters and art, was won at once. Six more concerts, a hurried trip to the United States to fulfill a contracted tour, back to England two years ago, with a schedule of six performances which stretched out into a solid five weeks' engagement, finally with two shows a day, another American tour, then Europe once more with further London successes and new Paris triumphs. This summer she played her third season in London, again repeating her former success. Now she has returned to this country and begins her third transcontinental tour, Canada included.

And fairy-tale-like also the mystery which surrounds this modest and unassuming person. Born in this country, she was taken to France immediately. Her name, she says, is not assumed. ANGNA ENTERS is half-French, which may well account for the quality of her intellectual conceptions, their beautiful clarity and firmness of outline, their realism and penetration. Her first name, incidentally, is pronounced with the French "g," "Anzhna"; and the root is the French word "Ange"—"angel."

Although Miss ENTERS has been dancing only five years, that time has been long enough for critics to hail her as a pioneer, as the founder of a new school of dancing, as the liberator of a beautiful art. All agree that she has brought something new into the dance. The tumult of debate that her performances have aroused indicates the vigor of the response she has awakened.

"Composition in dance form" is the technical name Miss ENTERS has given her work. It is in the mass effect of her presentations, their totality of expression, that her dances find their charm. She plans her lighting, music, scenery and costumes to meet the demand she conceives. Each contributes its proportionate bit to the sum which is the composition in dance form. No one factor predominates unless there is a definite reason for it so doing. Music is never interpreted; it merely reinforces the mood of the dance, and affords a tempo and audible rhythm. Light is used only to accentuate movements and portions of the body. The costume is never more or less than a medium of expression.

These parts, intermingled and synthesized by Miss ENTERS, create new boundaries in the realm of the dance. Its disciples, catching a glimpse of a revolt from the old forms of the ballet or the newer ones of interpretive dancing, view this new arrangement with all the ardor of revolutionists.

ACCEPTING THE UNIVERSE

JOHN BURROUGHS' last important writing was his book, "Accepting the Universe,"—a title based on an anecdote of CARLYLE, who, when told that a certain young woman had "decided to accept the universe," replied—"Egad! She'd better!" Indeed, one must;—though acceptance need not be uncritical or approving, one cannot escape. The outcome of acceptance, in fact, constitutes one's religion, for religion can most accurately be defined as the sum of a man's beliefs and emotions toward the universe and toward himself as a part of it, as such beliefs and emotions affect conduct.

One's acceptance of the universe is thus the ultimate, unescapable problem, for even if it be met by negation or attempted evasion that attitude is, in itself, an admission of the existence of the problem. Life does not go on in a vacuum. The universe is stubbornly there, to be accepted, somehow. The course of six lectures on "Ourselves and the Universe," to be given by Professor HARRY ALLEN OVERSTREET, head of the Department of Philosophy of the College of the City of New York, will take up certain phases of this problem. The opening lecture, on Monday evening, November 10, will consider "The Puzzle of Evolution." Professor OVERSTREET lectures every summer at the University of California, of which he is an alumnus, and is widely sought as a lecturer by institutions of the East.

"We have loved the stars too fondly to be fearful of the night." Inscription marking the urn of JOHN A. BRASHEAR, Astronomer, and his wife.

VICTOR CHENKIN

The astonishing success in America of VICTOR CHENKIN, renowned European diseur, who is coming to the Institute Thursday evening, November 13, is as much of a surprise to him as the fact that Americans have found time to pause and listen to him sing songs placidly in seven foreign languages.

"I never thought it was in Americans to give me a hearing," he admitted in an interview. "When I first landed here and took note of the hustle and bustle of the people, a condition so unnatural to my own land and the foreign lands I have visited and sung about, I was really worried. Who, I said to myself, will find time to stop and listen to me?

"To my intense surprise an audience appeared at my première performance. What has happened since has convinced me of the fact that cultural America is vastly minimized in Europe. I have found America responsively warm to foreign talent and when I get back I plan to spread the gospel to other actors who have expressed fearful concern when approached about an American tour.

"My American experiences," continued CHENKIN, "have taught me there is a universality of art that hurdles the barrier of languages. Particularly in song where moods and tempo can be expressed so satisfactorily that it runs the gamut of the human emotions."

CHENKIN is not the usual diseur in that he merely sings songs of foreign countries. His are real character studies and reveal the traits, habits and customs of the people. And in his rendition of them he brings dramatic emphasis to his studies, acting the various characters he brings to life through the medium of his picturesque melodies. MEMBERS should mark CHENKIN's evening. He is in the forefront of the greatest artists of the world, and is conceded the greatest of his particular genre. His program for November 13 is on the WEEKLY TICKET.

CARL SANDBURG

CARL SANDBURG has one distinction above many of our poets whose reputations may, possibly, exceed his, in that his poems are actually read, digested, and remembered. One may not like some of his work, but it is not forgotten. It does not leave one cold or uninterested, and it gains the ear of many readers who are deaf to the more conventional. When he chooses, SANDBURG can use conventional forms skilfully. He can write even delicately, on occasion. But the keynote of his message was struck in the opening line of the first poem in his first published volume ("Chicago Poems," 1916) which apostrophizes his city as "Hog Butcher for the World," and defiantly challenges:—

> Come and show me another city with lifted head > singing so proud to be alive and coarse and > strong and cunning.

It is strong meat, yet always honestly offered and free of pose. He is tremendously in earnest, and therefore potent. As he makes "Truth" say (in the poem, "Who Am I?")—

> I dabble in the blood and guts of the terrible.
> I know the passionate seizure of beauty
> And the marvelous rebellion of man at all signs > reading "Keep Off."

He is a product of the Middle West, born in Illinois, and one time secretary to the Mayor of Milwaukee, but chiefly busied with newspaper work until about 1920. He won the Levinson prize of the Poetry Magazine in 1914 and twice thereafter shared the annual award. Mr. SANDBURG comes to the Institute to lecture on Tuesday evening, November 11, in the "Enjoyment of Poetry" course.

Mr. H. C. OSTRANDER'S lecture on "Seeing the Elephant" in the Young Members' Course Saturday afternoon, November 8, will tell about all there is to know of this great and intelligent animal. Mr. OSTRANDER has met the elephant in its home environment many times during his travels in Eastern lands. The lecture will be illustrated by motion pictures and slides.

BRYCE CANYON

Few people realize that there is a part of our country, the southwestern section, where the surface of the earth's crust is exposed to a depth of about 35,000 feet. That is to say, if we could look directly through the crust of the earth for 35,000 feet, we might see the same rocks that are exposed on the surface of the earth in this region. There is, therefore, open to those who wish to read, a book of the past ages written in the rock tablets of time detailing in order the history of the earth.

Beginning at the high plateau region of Utah, extending southward to the bottom of the Grand Canyon of the Colorado River, and finally terminating in the Colorado Desert, this great area might well be called the book of the ages. Here sedimentary rocks, born of ancient seas or sand-blown deserts, are piled up one upon the other telling the story of millions of years of geologic history. Here may be found in these rocks fossils of shells, fish, amphibians, forests, reptiles, birds and mammals, buried in proper sequence according to geologic time.

Photo by Dr. Frank R. Oastler

A VIEW OF BRYCE CANYON

The great plateau regions of Utah belong to the last pages of this interesting book. These plateaus occur in terraces, one below the other receding in a generally southern direction.

The Paunsagunt Plateau is one of these regions and part of the corresponding cliff area includes one of the most remarkable examples of erosion the world has ever seen. This is called Bryce Canyon. Like a lost city of the past, it stands clothed in all the magnificent colors of a savage prehistory. In Bryce Canyon the traveler forgets the present and is borne on the wings of time into a beautiful fairyland of the far distant past. Here he finds himself surrounded by castles, fortifications, cathedrals, towers and courts, magnificent, majestic, even grotesque. Dr. FRANK R. OASTLER will take his audience on Wednesday evening, November 12, to this land of fantasy by the message of many beautiful lantern views in color.

RACE PROBLEMS IN INDIA

No other governmental division of the globe presents such a bewildering complexity of inter-racial problems as that to be found in India where the mass of 320,000,000 people contains an astonishing diversity of races, languages and religions. India has been overrun by various migrations since an era long before the dawn of history; indeed, since Palæolithic times. The recently discovered remains of the so-called Indus civilization, at Mohenjo Daro and Harappa, disclose a highly sophisticated culture (including quite modern plumbing) in the fourth millenium B.C., showing that India was then already old. And nearly all of these waves have left still discernible and still persisting remnants, ranging from the almost white to the negro in color. Today the population is mainly dark Caucasian, but there are Mongolian elements, and in the south there are black men, and hidden away in the still little known hills peoples of nearly primitive savagery. And the three great religions, Hinduism, Jainism and Mohammedanism are radically irreconcilable.

An illustrated lecture on "Racial Distinctions in India" will be given on Thursday evening, November 13, by Professor HERBERT GUY KRIBS, Zoologist, of the University of Pennsylvania, who speaks from first-hand acquaintance with India. After teaching for fifteen years at the University of Pennsylvania and the Hahneman School of Science, DR. KRIBS went in 1923 to the staff of Ewing College at Allahabad, which happens to be one of the best points for observation of racial distinctions as it is one of the chief resorts of Hindu pilgrimages. The "bathing festival" annually brings about 250,000 to the city, and every twelfth year a million or more of devotees crowd in, coming from all over India.

A MEMBER may purchase two tickets at Members' rates for LA ARGENTINA'S recital. Reservations should be made early.

TSCHAIKOWSKY

Dr. DANIEL GREGORY MASON will discuss "Tschaikowsky, The Man of Sentiment," at the fourth of his lecture-recitals on "Great Modern Symphonists" Sunday afternoon, November 16. "The Unvanquishable Tschaikowsky," as the composer has been called recently, has outlasted a good deal of adverse criticism from self-appointed censors of music who consider him banal and sentimental. In spite of them his Fifth Symphony, as well as the famous "Pathétique" (No. 6), are still among the most widely loved of all modern orchestral works. Dr. MASON will discuss and play movements from both of them. Those who would like to know TSCHAIKOWSKY as a man would do well to read the "Life and Letters," edited by his brother, from which emerges a delightful impression of his shy and sensitive yet intelligent and generous personality.

On Sunday, November 2, immediately after his lecture-recital on BRAHMS, Dr. MASON will leave for Cincinnati, where he will remain a week attending rehearsals and first performances of his own Second Symphony, to be played by the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra under FRITZ REINER. Dr. MASON'S first symphony was played for the first time in 1916 by the Philadelphia Orchestra under LEOPOLD STOKOWSKI, and has since been one of the most frequently played of American symphonies.

ENJOYING POETRY

JESSIE B. RITTENHOUSE (Mrs. CLINTON SCOLLARD) is finely qualified both by temperament and by experience to discuss the poetry of the day. First of all, she is herself a poetess, with three volumes of graceful verse to her credit. Secondly, she has been critically concerned for many years with the appraisal of current poetry, having prepared and edited no less than six anthologies of American verse since the first "Little Book of Modern American Verse" was published in 1913. She also edited the "Poems of Edith M. Thomas" in 1926, and long before that she brought out an edition of Omar Khayyam. In 1904 she published a volume of critical essays on "The Younger American Poets." She has also been a lecturer on poetry in Columbia University's extension courses. And, finally, she married a poet. She taught Latin and English literature at the beginning of her career but abandoned teaching for newspaper work and book reviewing. Mrs. SCOLLARD will give the next lecture on Thursday evening, November 6, in the course on "The Enjoyment of Poetry."

Professor JACOB WITTMER HARTMANN, head of the Department of Germanic Languages at Long Island University, is conducting courses in German at the Institute this season. Professor HARTMANN is known as a translator of standard works in German and Danish Literature, and as a contributor to periodicals and encyclopædias on topics connected with these fields. He has traveled much and was for a period of one year professor of English Literature at the University of Kobé, Japan.

ROLAND HAYES

The American public may be fickle about certain subjects, bestowing quick fame and quick oblivion in quick succession. But when there comes a singer of the calibre of ROLAND HAYES, who gives his Brooklyn recital, under the auspices of the Institute, on Friday evening, November 28, the enduring qualities of his art are met in just measure by the constancy of the public.

ROLAND HAYES is touring America now for the seventh time. His public is at least as large as the capacity of the auditoriums in each of our cities, and is rivaled in number only by his host of European admirers.

The secret is not far to seek. This negro tenor has found a subtlety in voice shading which begins where others leave off. He can produce a tone of utter loveliness, which is a unique experience as singing goes. And these achievements he uses to express the human emotions which lie in a song, with a poignancy and yet with a fine restraint which holds his audience marveling.

The songs which ROLAND HAYES chooses are those which endure. The way he sings them is a way which will go down in history. A recital of ROLAND HAYES touches the deeper, more permanent sort of response which is something quite apart from the fashion of the day.

The dances and folk songs of each country in which a play is laid are given to the children by the CLARE TREE MAJOR Children's Theatre Company in each production of the international series it is presenting at the Institute.

Miss MARY NEWELL, who has just completed a two-year world tour, giving dance recitals and studying Oriental dances among the peoples of the Orient, will be one of the dancers in "Aladdin," which will be given in the Opera House of the Academy on Saturday afternoon, November 22. Mystery and magic and all of the rich color of Arabia are woven into this delightful play, dear to the hearts of children everywhere, and the Opera House is certain to be filled again to capacity by "Aladdin."

DEPARTMENT OF PHOTOGRAPHY

Exhibit of Photographs in the Kallitype Process

On Monday evening, November 3, there will open in the Studio of the Department of Photography an exhibition of photographs in the Kallitype process by Mr. HARRY A. NEUMAN, a member of the Department. Mr. NEUMAN has pursued photography as a hobby for over a decade, studying both its artistic and technical phases under the late CLARENCE WHITE, WM. H. ZERBE, NICHOLAS HÁZ, MORRIS GREENBERG, and other lecturers and teachers who have conducted classes in the Institute. His prints have been exhibited extensively in this country and abroad and have won prizes in several competitions. He and the late EUGENE P. HENRY were for years this country's leading exponents of the Kallitype process and Mr. NEUMAN remains today its most consistent user. His subject matter is confined mostly to architecture and still-life, rendered in brilliant contrast and interesting arrangements of pattern, which lend themselves particularly to the beauties of this process by which artistic prints may be produced on the worker's choice of paper in lovely warm tones through an image of pure silver.

Photo by Harry A. Neuman

PORTRAIT, JAMES W. AUGHILTREE

An interesting study of a former President of the Department of Photography. Mr. Aughiltree has long been one of the Department's most active and constructive workers.

Photo by Harry A. Neuman

HARKNESS QUADRANGLE, YALE UNIVERSITY

A. A. MILNE

Few English writers possess such flexible versatility of talent as that shown by ALAN ALEXANDER MILNE, whose play "The Perfect Alibi" has been chosen by the Institute Players for their first bill of the season, to be given Friday and Saturday evenings and Saturday afternoon, November 14 and 15. MILNE has scintillated for over a quarter of a century as editor (he was assistant editor of Punch from 1906 to 1914 when he went into the army), as novelist, and above all as playwright. He has written fifteen volumes of fiction, of wide range, including one of the very best of modern detective-mystery tales, and altogether delightful presentations for children, as well as conventional novels.

One thinks of him first, however, as dramatist. He has been very fertile in production since his first play, "Wurzel-Flummery," in 1917. Each year thereafter up to 1925 saw at least one new MILNE play, and in 1918 and 1923 there were two. The reason for their steady success, and the continuance of many of them on the boards is not far to seek. It lies partly in deft workmanship, admirable dramatic construction, and good dialogue, but far more in the genial, understanding humor that underlies the plots. Other dramatists surpass him in power; few of his contemporaries equal him in the understanding of everyday, normal humanity. In "The Perfect Alibi" Mr. MILNE is seen in his best mood. It is extremely entertaining and should not be overlooked by lovers of good drama. Mr. BENNETT KILPACK is directing the production.

WOMEN AND POETRY

In attendance upon the popular course on the "Enjoyment of Poetry" women far outnumber men. This fact might easily engender some misleading generalizations. Do women care more for poetry than men? If so, is it because they are more emotional, more readily moved by sentiment and sensuous appeal? It is often asserted that in this day, culture, especially the arts, including literature, is the province of the women. Superficially there is foundation for that assertion.

Analysis is not so simple, however, as it might seem. It is doubtful whether women are greater consumers of poetry than men. It may rather be that most of the current poetic output is addressed more to feminine than to masculine minds, though one could easily point to noteworthy exceptions—such as STEPHEN BENÉT'S work, or DON MARQUIS' serious poems. Moreover, at bottom, it is man who is the sentimentalist, though he may try to conceal it.

Another point worth noting is that the thoroughly modern, educated woman is no more "emotional" than her brother; perhaps less so. Her grandmother, generally speaking, was not allowed to use her mind; custom and religious taboo forbade her to think. But with freedom women have developed—or are developing—a more completely rounded mentality, which tends to check sentimentalism and to sharpen the critical faculties.

DEBATE

"Is Immorality In Modern Books Justified?"

Affirmative

Cosmo Hamilton

Dramatist and Novelist

Author of "The Blindness of Virtue," "A Plea for the Younger Generation," "The Door That Has No Key," "The Rustle of Silk," etc.

TUESDAY EVE., NOVEMBER 25,

at 8:15 o'clock

OPERA HOUSE ACADEMY OF MUSIC

Negative

Gilbert K. Chesterton

World-Famous English Essayist, Novelist, Dramatist and Poet

"When Gilbert K. Chesterton, the most versatile of English writers and master of paradox, delivered his lecture . . . every seat was filled and many stood files deep. His sage utterances and witty comments were greeted with frequent bursts of laughter and applause."—N.Y. Telegraph.

Tickets on Sale Saturday, November 8, at 8:30 a.m.

To Members: 50 cents, 75 cents, $1.00, $1.50, $2.00; Boxes, $1.00, $1.50, $2.00.

To Non-Members: $1.00, $1.25, $1.50, $2.00, $2.50; Boxes, $1.50, $2.00, $2.50.

The INSTITUTE BULLETIN

PUBLISHED BY

THE DEPARTMENT OF EDUCATION

The Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences

Annual Subscription, $2.00 To Members, Free
Single Numbers, 15 cents Postage, extra, 3 cents

Life Membership in the Institute.....$500.00
Sustaining Members, Annual Dues..... 25.00

DEPARTMENT OF EDUCATION

Associate Membership, Registration Fee.....$5.00
Associate Membership, Annual Dues.....10.00

Officers of the Board of Trustees

FRANK L. BABBOTT.....Honorary President

EDWARD C. BLUM.....President
WALTER H. CRITTENDEN.....First Vice-President
WILLIAM A. PUTNAM.....Second Vice-President
ADRIAN VAN SINDEREN.....Third Vice-President
G. FOSTER SMITH.....Treasurer
JOHN H. DENBIGH.....Secretary

Officers of the Council

HON. WILLIAM R. BAYES.....President
STANSBURY HAGAR.....Secretary

Director

CHARLES D. ATKINS

"Give me the liberty to know, to utter, and to argue freely according to conscience, above all liberties."—JOHN MILTON.

EVENTS FROM WEDNESDAY, NOVEMBER 19, TO WEDNESDAY, DECEMBER 3, 1930

WED., Nov. 19. Department of Geography. Current History Travelogue (All Talking Motion Pictures, including latest News Releases). Music Hall, 3:30 p.m. WEEKLY TICKET admits one. Guest Ticket, 50 cents.

WED., Nov. 19. Department of Geography. Travel Lecture, by H. C. OSTRANDER, Traveler. Subject: Magic Islands of the South Seas (illustrated by lantern views in color and motion pictures). Lecture Hall, 8:15 p.m.

WED., Nov. 19. Department of Dramatic Art. Dance Recital, by LA ARGENTINA, Spain's Greatest Dancer, assisted by MIGUEL BERDION at the Piano. Opera House, 8:15 p.m. For conditions of admission, see BULLETIN and WEEKLY TICKET.

THURS., Nov. 20. Department of Home Economics. Last in a Series of four Lecture-Demonstrations on "Home Cookery," by EMMA F. HOLLOWAY, Supervisor of Institutional Courses, School of Household Science and Arts, Pratt Institute. Subject: Inexpensive Meals for Two or Three. Lecture Hall, 4 p.m.

THURS., Nov. 20. Department of Philosophy. Lecture, by Dr. WILL DURANT. Subject: Is Progress Real? Music Hall, 8:15 p.m.

FRI., Nov. 21. Department of Geography. First of two illustrated Oriental Travel Talks (in costume), by Mrs. BARNUM BROWN, of New York. Subject: Behind the Veil (India and Kashmir). Lecture Hall, 4 p.m.

FRI. Nov. 21. Department of Astronomy. Illustrated Lecture, by Professor HARLOW T. STETSON, Director, Perkins Observatory, Ohio Wesleyan University. Subject: What are the Stars? Lecture Hall, 8:15 p.m.

FRI., Nov. 21. Department of Music. First in a Series of five Philharmonic Concerts, by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, Conductor. Opera House, 8:15 p.m. For conditions of admission, see BULLETIN and WEEKLY TICKET.

SAT., Nov. 22. Chess Club. Members of Brooklyn Institute Chess Club will meet for play from 2 to 6 p.m. and from 8 to 11 p.m. Art Room.

SAT., Nov. 22. Department of Dramatic Art. The CLARE TREE MAJOR Company in "Aladdin and His Wonderful Lamp" (Arabia). Opera House, 3 p.m. For conditions of admission, see BULLETIN and WEEKLY TICKET.

SAT., Nov. 22. Department of Ethnology. Illustrated Lecture, by Dr. MELVILLE J. HERSKOVITS, of the Department of Sociology and Anthropology, University of Wisconsin. Subject: The Bush Negroes of South America. Lecture Hall, 8:15 p.m.

SAT., Nov. 22. Department of Geography. Current History Travelogue (All Talking Motion Pictures, including latest News Releases). Music Hall, 8:15 p.m. WEEKLY TICKET admits one. Guest Ticket, 50 cents.

SUN., Nov. 23. Department of Philology. The A. AUGUSTUS HEALY Foundation. Fourth in a Course of fourteen Lectures on "Contemporary Books Worth Reading," by Dr. WILLIAM LYON PHELPS, Lampson Professor of English Literature, Yale University. Music Hall, 3 p.m. WEEKLY TICKET admits one. Reserved Seat Tickets for front section of Parquet may be purchased by presenting WEEKLY TICKET and 50 cents at Institute Box Office. Guest Ticket, 50 cents.

MON., Nov. 24. Department of Dramatic Art. Third of four Dramatic Dickens Readings (in costume), by ELSIE KISSAM EASTON, Reader, of Brooklyn. Subject: Scenes from "Martin Chuzzlewit." Lecture Hall, 4 p.m.

MON., Nov. 24. Department of Psychology. Third in a Course of six Lectures on "Ourselves and the Universe," by Professor H. A. OVERSTREET, Head of Department of Philosophy, College of the City of New York. Subject: Preparing for the Unborn Future. Music Hall, 8:15 p.m. WEEKLY TICKET admits one.

TUES., Nov. 25. Department of Political Science. Second in a Series of three Lectures on "Nationalism in the Far East," by KIRBY PAGE, Editor of The World Tomorrow. Subject: Japan's Amazing Record. Lecture Hall, 4 p.m.

TUES., Nov. 25. Department of Geography. Current History Travelogue (All-Talking Motion Pictures, including latest News Releases). Music Hall, 8:15 p.m. WEEKLY TICKET admits one. Guest Ticket, 50 cents.

TUES., Nov. 25. Department of Education. Debate. Question: Is Immorality in Modern Books Justified? Affirmative: COSMO HAMILTON, Dramatist, Novelist. Negative: GILBERT K. CHESTERTON, English Essavist and Critic. Opera House, 8:15 p.m. For conditions of admission, see BULLETIN and WEEKLY TICKET.

WED., Nov. 26. Department of Geography. Current History Travelogue (All Talking Motion Pictures, including latest News Releases). Music Hall, 3:30 p.m. WEEKLY TICKET admits one. Guest Ticket, 50 cents.

WED., Nov. 26. Department of Geography. Illustrated Lecture, by HORACE E. COLEMAN, of Chicago. Subject: Picturesque Japan. Lecture Hall, 8:15 p.m.

FRI., Nov. 28. Department of Home Economics. Lecture, by Dr. GRACE MACLEOD, Associate Professor of Nutrition, Teachers College, Columbia University. Subject: Diet and Health. Lecture Hall, 4 p.m.

FRI., Nov. 28. Department of Botany. Illustrated Lecture, by HORACE E. COLEMAN, of Chicago. Subject: Japanese Landscapes and Gardens. Lecture Hall, 8:15 p.m.

FRI., Nov. 28. Department of Music. Recital, by ROLAND HAYES, Tenor. Opera House, 8:15 p.m. For conditions of admission, see BULLETIN and WEEKLY TICKET.

SAT., Nov. 29. Department of Political Science. Fifth in a Course of six Lectures on "Current History," by Dr. GEORGE EARLE RAIGUEL, Publicist, of Philadelphia. Lecture Hall, 11 a.m.

SAT., Nov. 29. Chess Club. Members of Brooklyn Institute Chess Club will meet for play from 2 to 6 p.m. and from 8 to 11 p.m. Art Room.

SAT., Nov. 29. Department of Geography. Last in a Course of six illustrated Travel Lectures, by BRANSON DE COU. Subject: Dream Pictures of North African Wonderlands (illustrated by 300 beautifully colored lantern views with musical settings). Music Hall, 2:30 p.m. WEEKLY TICKET admits one. Guest Ticket, 25 cents. Tickets used this afternoon will not admit to Lecture Saturday evening, November 29.

SAT., Nov. 29. Department of Zoology. Illustrated Lecture, by Dr. G. KINGSLEY NOBLE, Curator, Department of Herpetology and Experimental Biology, American Museum of Natural History. Subject: The Biology of Animal Courtship. Lecture Hall, 8:15 p.m.

SAT., Nov. 29. Department of Geography. Last in a Course of six illustrated Travel Lectures, by BRANSON DE COU. Subject: Dream Pictures of North African Wonderlands (illustrated by 300 beautifully colored lantern views with musical settings). Music Hall, 8:15 p.m. WEEKLY TICKET admits one. Guest Ticket, 50 cents.

SAT., Nov. 29. Department of Astronomy. Round Table Conference. JOHN G. STEFFEE, Chairman. Subject: Symposium — Experiences and Observations by Junior Members. ROBERT BECKMAN, Leader. Science Room, 8:15 p.m.

SUN., Nov. 30. Department of Philology. The A. AUGUSTUS HEALY Foundation. Fifth in a Course of fourteen Lectures on "Contemporary Books Worth Reading," by Dr. WILLIAM LYON PHELPS, Lampson Professor of English Literature, Yale University. Music Hall, 3 p.m. WEEKLY TICKET admits one. Reserved Seat Tickets for front section of Parquet may be purchased by presenting WEEKLY TICKET and 50 cents at Institute Box Office. Guest Ticket, 50 cents.

MON., DEC. 1. Department of Dramatic Art. Last of four Dramatic Dickens Readings (in costume), by ELSIE KISSAM EASTON, Reader, of Brooklyn. Subject: Scenes from "Little Dorrit" and "The Christmas Carol." Lecture Hall, 4 p.m.

MON., DEC. 1. Department of Psychology. Fourth in a Course of six Lectures on "Ourselves and the Universe," by Professor H. A. OVERSTREET, Head of Department of Philosophy, College of the City of New York. Subject: Psychological Perspectives. Music Hall, 8:15 p.m. WEEKLY TICKET admits one.

TUES., DEC. 2. Department of Home Economics. Lecture, by Dr. LOUIS C. SCHROEDER, of New York. Subject: Balancing a Child's Diet. Lecture Hall, 2:30 p.m.

TUES., DEC. 2. Department of Geography. Current History Travelogue (All Talking Motion Pictures, including latest News Releases). Music Hall, 3:30 p.m. WEEKLY TICKET admits one. Guest Ticket, 50 cents.

TUES., DEC. 2. Department of Geography. Illustrated Lecture, by CHARLES C. BATCHELDER, Publicist, of New York. Subject: Life in China Today. Lecture Hall, 4 p.m.

Intelligent Investing!

The intelligence of the investor is easily sensed by the character of his investment. . . .

If we are to gauge investing intelligence by investing results, it is evident that those investors holding Home Title Guaranteed First Mortgages, or Certificates, may be said to rate a very high I.Q.*

For their Home Title Guaranteed First Mortgages and Certificates are worth "par" this year—just as they were worth "par" the year before, and every year since the Home Title was organized in 1906.

Twenty-four years of Home Title Guaranteed Safety are surely more appealing to the intelligent investor than promises of rapid price rises—which give way to rapid declines—and dividends which are sometime disappointments!

We are selling monthly between one and two million dollars in Guaranteed First Mortgages and Certificates to conservative institutions, such as life insurance companies and savings banks; and we offer similarly sound investing facilities to the intelligent man or woman who may have as little as $100 to invest.

Write for details today—

HOME·TITLE·INSURANCE·COMPANY 1906

51 WILLOUGHBY STREET
BROOKLYN, NEW YORK

* Intelligence Quotient. . . .

"The complete effect is almost uncanny in its power to bring his audience to the countries on which he concentrates."
—Atlantic City Daily Press.

BRANSON DE COU

TRAVELOGUES

Illustrated by 300 Lantern Views, Marvels of Photography and Color, with Musical Settings

Sunset After Hopi Indian Snake Dance, Grand Canyon, Arizona.

Wednesday Afternoon and Evening, November 5; Thursday Evening, November 6

"Motor Cruising through Unusual Western Wonderlands" (Death Valley, Indian Country, the Cliff Dwellings, Mesa Verde National Park, Chaco Canyon, etc.)

Remaining Travelogue
Saturday Afternoon and Evening, November 29

"Dream Pictures of North African Wonderlands"

Music Hall Academy of Music
4 p.m. and 8:15 p.m.

WEEKLY TICKET admits one Wednesday Afternoon and Evening and Saturday Afternoon and Evening. Guest Ticket for Saturday Afternoon, 25 cents; for Saturday Evening, 50 cents.

Thursday Evening All Seats Reserved
Tickets now on Sale
To Members .....25 cents, 50 cents, 75 cents, $1.00
To Non-Members $1.00, $1.25, $1.50, $1.75

TUES., DEC. 2. Department of Political Science. First of two Lectures, by RANDOLPH CHURCHILL, of London, England. Subject: The British Empire and World Progress. Lecture Hall, 8:15 p.m.

DICKENS

A recent number of the critical Saturday Review of Literature contained a heated letter of protest from a reader who defended DICKENS' pathos—specifically, the death of "Little Nell"—against a remark by ALDOUS HUXLEY that "whenever in his writing he (DICKENS) becomes emotional, he ceases instantly to use his intelligence." However, in an age less sentimental than that of 1842, such passages will find few defenders. That does not at all detract from the lasting value of DICKENS' successful characterizations, in the presentation of which he had not "ceased to use his intelligence." The Fat Boy, Mr. F's Aunt, Mr. Guppy, Micawber, Quilp,—these, and many more, are truly immortals. Nor is it true that DICKENS' pathos is always inept sentimentality. Much of it is genuine and deeply moving,—as could readily be shown from "Great Expectations" or "Bleak House" or "Our Mutual Friend."

Much of the validity of DICKENS' people lies in the dramatic reality of their presentation. That also makes his writings immensely "readable." Indeed, to be fully savored, DICKENS needs to be read aloud, or half-acted by a competent reader like Miss ELSIE KISSAM EASTON, who is to give a series of four DICKENS dramatic readings, in costume, on Monday afternoons, beginning November 10, with "Scenes from 'Bleak House' and 'The Old Curiosity Shop.'" Miss EASTON'S readings at the Hotel Astor and elsewhere have won a steady patronage.

EDWIN B. FROST

Dr. EDWIN B. FROST, Director of the Yerkes Observatory, at Williams Bay, Wisconsin, is one of the most eminent of the older generation of American astronomers, of established international reputation. He is a graduate of Dartmouth, where he taught for some years, and is an Honorary D.Sc. of Cambridge University. Since 1898 he has been professor of astrophysics at the University of Chicago, and since 1905 director of the great Yerkes Observatory. Dr. FROST has specialized in study of the thermal radiation of the sun and sun spots, and also in stellar spectroscopy and spectrographic determination of velocities of stars in the line of sight. He spent some time in study in Germany, at Strassburg, and at the Astrophysical Observatory at Potsdam; he is a member of the Astronomische Gesellschaft.

The Department of Astronomy is fortunate in securing Dr. FROST to open the season's series of lectures in Astronomy. He will speak, on Friday evening, November 14, on "The Drama of the Bursting Star." The lecture will be illustrated by lantern views and should prove of quite exceptional interest, especially as the evolutionary processes of stellar development are still a matter of controversy, or, rather, of speculation based upon differing theories.

ARTIFICIAL DAYLIGHT

Can the physicist manufacture sunlight and create an artificial day:—so to speak, turn on the sunlight when and where it is wanted? For some years Dr. MATTHEW LUCKIESH, Director of the Lighting Research Laboratory of the General Electric Company, at Nela Park, Cleveland, has been attacking this problem with results that may prove revolutionary, in the possibility of producing light from sources that emit biologically active radiant energy as well as light for vision, thus counterfeiting the beneficial effects of natural sunlight. The value of such an achievement needs no demonstration. It would open up a new department of therapeutics. Dr. LUCKIESH will give a lecture-demonstration of his researches on Saturday evening, November 15, under the bold title of " Challenging the Sun," this lecture being given on the PROCTOR Foundation.

Dr. LUCKIESH has been director of the Nela Park Laboratory since 1924 and for fourteen years before that he was research physicist for the General Electric Company. He is a native of Iowa, and holds degrees, including D.Sc., from the Iowa State University and Iowa College. He taught at the State University before joining the General Electric research staff. He is an unusually voluminous writer, with fourteen volumes and over 200 periodical articles to his credit. Besides the manufacture of artificial daylight and study of psycho-physiological optics he has specialized in heterochromatic photometry and study of visual acuity in light of different spectral characters.

"Everything about 'The Perfect Alibi' is perfect."—N. Y. American.
"It is an unusual kind of detective play, good-humored, literate, ingenious and exciting. As craftsmanship it is superb."—Theatre Arts Monthly.

First Presentation of Season

THE INSTITUTE PLAYERS
in
A. A. MILNE'S
"Detective" Comedy in Three Acts
"The Perfect Alibi"

Friday Evening.....November 14, at 8:15
Saturday Afternoon..November 15, at 2:30
Saturday Evening....November 15, at 8:15

MUSIC HALL ACADEMY OF MUSIC

Reserved Seat Tickets for Front Rows of Parquet and Balcony for Saturday Matinee may now be obtained by presenting Weekly Ticket No. 4 and 25 or 50 cents; for Friday and Saturday evenings, 25 cents, 50 cents or 75 cents, at the Institute Box Office.
A Member may obtain without charge a Reserved Seat Ticket for certain sections of the Parquet and Balcony, up to their capacity, for any performance, by presenting Weekly Ticket No. 5 at the Institute Box Office on or after Saturday, November 8. Additional seats for the Rear Rows of the Parquet or Balcony for any performance may be purchased by a Member at 25 cents.
Reserved Seat Tickets to Non-Members, $1.00, $1.25, $1.50 and $1.75.

"No mere voice, no matter how phenomenal, would ever draw and hold the audiences Roland Hayes has won. . . . He is at once the most genuinely aristocratic artist now before the American public, and the most genuinely emotional singer. . . . If present-day America has produced a genius in music it is Hayes."—Boston Globe.

RECITAL BY

Roland Hayes

Tenor

"Roland Hayes, who has, in the few brief seasons of his artistic career, risen above any barrier of race and color to establish himself securely as one of the first tenors of the concert stage, sang yesterday afternoon to an audience which packed Carnegie Hall almost to the point of suffocation."—N.Y. Herald-Tribune.

Friday Evening, November 28,
at 8:15 o'clock

OPERA HOUSE ACADEMY OF MUSIC

Tickets on Sale Saturday,
November 15, at 8:30 a.m.
To Members: 50 cents, 75 cents, $1.00, $1.50, $2.00. Boxes: $1.00, $1.50, $2.00. To Non-Members: $1.00, $1.25, $1.50, $2.00, $2.50. Boxes: $1.50, $2.00, $2.50.

"She is an artist of the first water. One of lesser rank in the hierarchy of the muses could not hold the enthralled attention of an audience for a whole evening without speaking a word or singing a note."
—San Francisco Call and Bulletin.

DANCE RECITAL by

"The interest of the audience never wandered from that tall, quiet, remote yet friendly figure whose mime and dance was fascinating to watch. A magnetic personality."
—London Daily Mirror.

ANGNA ENTERS

"Actress, dancer and supreme mime in one"

"ANTIQUE À LA FRANÇAISE"

Tuesday Evening

November 4

EPISODES AND COMPOSITIONS IN DANCE FORM

MUSIC HALL 8:15 o'clock ACADEMY OF MUSIC

TICKETS NOW ON SALE

To Institute Members ..... 50 cents, 75 cents, $1.00, $1.50
To Non-Members $1.00, $1.50, $2.00, $2.50

"Chenkin is essential, he is definitely on the 'Imperative' list of things to be seen and heard."—N.Y. Telegram.
"Chenkin is without doubt the greatest character singer in the whole world."—Eddie Cantor.

VICTOR CHENKIN

Russian Baritone-Diseur

Thursday Evening, November 13, at 8:15 o'clock

Music Hall, Academy of Music

In A Program Of

Continental Character Songs

"Masterpieces of Characterization"

RESERVED SEAT TICKETS ON SALE
SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 1, 8:30 a.m.

To Members ..... 50 cents, 75 cents, $1.00, $1.50
To Non-Members $1.00, $1.25, $1.50, $2.00

"La Argentina has returned again to dance for us incomparably the dances of her native Spain, to exhibit an art so perfect that it beggars praise."—Brooklyn Daily Eagle, 10/15/30.

"Mme. Argentina, with beautiful costumes, rollicking heels, clicking castanets and, above all, a winning smile, enhancing her art, delighted her spectators."—N.Y. Sun, 10/15/30.

PROGRAM OF SPANISH DANCES BY

Wednesday Evening, November 19, at 8:15

Opera House, Academy of Music

The Greatest Living Spanish Dancer

LA ARGENTINA

Assisted by MIGUEL BERDION at the Piano

TICKETS ON SALE SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 1, at 8:30 a.m.

To Members with Weekly Ticket No. 4: $1.00, $1.50, $2.00, $2.50; Boxes, $1.50, $2.00, $2.50. To Non-Members: $1.50, $2.00, $2.50, $3.00; Boxes, $2.00, $2.50, $3.00.

Note: Tickets for this Recital will be sold at Members' rates through November 7. After November 7 to November 19 inclusive, Tickets for this Recital will be sold at Non-Members' rates only.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY
CONDUCTOR

"Dr. Koussevitzky is of course a great dramatist of the symphony, an artist of true orchestral imagination, a master of color and of contrast in all its myriad inflections, whether instrumental or dynamic."—Chicago Herald & Examiner.

Opera House
Academy of Music

Opening Concert of Season
Friday Evening, November 21,

at 8:15 o'clock

Under the auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences, the Philharmonic Society of Brooklyn, and the following

CITIZENS' COMMITTEE

Chairman
Mr. Adrian Van Sinderen

Vice-Chairmen

Mr. Frank L. Babbott
Mrs. Edward C. Blum
Hon. Frederick E. Crane
Mr. Walter H. Crittenden
Mrs. H. E. Dreier
Mrs. William H. Good
Mr. Frederick T. Aldridge
Dr. Joseph D. Allen
Mr. Juan A. Almirall
Dr. Frank L. Babbott, Jr.
Dr. Nathan T. Beers
Dr. W. B. Brinsmade
Mrs. Charles R. Buckley
Mr. F. A. M. Burrell
Mr. H. F. Gunnison
Mr. Henry A. Ingraham
Mrs. Frederic B. Pratt
Mrs. B. Herbert Smith
Mr. R. Huntington Woodman
Mrs. Glentworth R. Butler
Rev. S. Parkes Cadman, D.D.
Hon. William M. Calder
Mrs. Otis Swan Carroll
Mr. J. Norman Carpenter
Mrs. George W. Chauncey
Mrs. I. Sherwood Coffin
Mrs. Frederick L. Cranford
Hon. James C. Cropsey
Hon. Norman S. Dike
Rev. Samuel M. Dorrance
Mrs. Guy DuVal
Mr. S. Raymond Estey
Mrs. Lewis W. Francis
Mr. Theodore L. Frothingham
Mr. William Peter Hamilton
Mr. Walter Hammitt
Mr. George Hewlett
Miss Amelia B. Hollenback
Dr. Alexander C. Howe
Mr. William T. Hunter
Mr. Darwin R. James
Dr. William A. Jewett
Mr. James H. Jourdan
Mr. Charles D. Lay
Mrs. John Eadie Leech
Miss Hilda Loines
Mrs. Charles J. McDermott
Hon. George V. McLaughlin
Mrs. William W. Marshall
Mr. W. S. Morton Mead
Mr. Frank C. Munson
Mr. Charles F. Murphy
Mrs. George Notman
Mr. Neilson Olcott
Mrs. Frank H. Parsons
Mr. James H. Post
Mr. Charles E. Potts
Mrs. George H. Prentiss
Mrs. Benjamin Prince
Mrs. Clinton L. Rossiter, Jr.
Mr. H. Stavely Sammond
Mrs. Henry Spelman
Mr. Porter Steele
Mrs. Herman Stutzer
Miss Marion J. Terry
Mr. William Armour Thayer
Mr. Carl H. Tollefsen
Mrs. Walter Truslow
Mrs. James P. Warbasse
Mrs. Edwin Carrington Ward
Mrs. Walter F. Wells
Mrs. J. B. Whitney
Mr. Eugene A. Widmann
Dr. Ralph C. Williams
Hon. George A. Wingate
Mr. Cornelius D. Wood
Mrs. W. H. Ziegler

REMAINING DATES

Friday Evening, January 9
Thursday Evening, February 5
Friday Evening, March 6
Friday Evening, April 10

SEASON TICKETS for the Series of Five Concerts: $12.50, $10.00, $8.00, $6.00; Boxes, $15.00, $12.50, $8.00.
SINGLE TICKETS for First Concert Only on Sale Monday, November 10, at 8:30 a.m., $2.75, $2.25, $1.75, $1.25. Boxes, $3.00, $2.50.

THE GOLDEN EAST

In his lecture Saturday evening, November 8, on "Enchanted Bali and Insulinde" and Wednesday evening, November 19, on "Magic Islands of the South Seas" Mr. OSTRANDER will present many of the wonderlands of the Golden East, revealed in their true glory. He has recently returned from another trip to the Far East, bringing back 2500 photographs taken during his tour. Each of the pictures he will show in these lectures is a masterpiece of realism. In addition to the lantern views, motion pictures in color will also be shown. To those who would know something of the wonder places and the charm of far-off lands these lectures are recommended. Mr. OSTRANDER'S life work has been the travel lecture.

Photo by H. C. Ostrander

ISLAND OF BALI. TEMPLE DANCER

Photo by H. C. Ostrander

ISLAND OF BALI. BUDDHIST TEMPLE

SPENGLER

Feeding the philosophical and economic theories, doctrines and criticisms of OSWALD SPENGLER to the uncritical mass of readers naturally produced some mental indigestion. The English translation of his chief book "The Decline of the West" nevertheless reached a rather large audience, with resulting dissent and some not always understanding disapproval. Incidentally, the title of the German original uses a stronger word than "Decline"—it is Untergang, literally going-down, or under, which might be rendered as decay, destruction, or even ruin.

SPENGLER is never successful in the attempt to "write down" to a popular level. He practically presupposes a knowledge of history and sociology—to say nothing of physical science and art—beyond the equipment of most readers. Hence the outcry against him. His attitude is pessimistic, but it can be taken as a warning rather than as a prophecy of unavoidable catastrophe. As such it is worth listening to, even if one disagrees with some of his conclusions. For it is incontrovertible that the Abendland, the Western World, which includes Europe and America, contains much in its social and economic system that threatens destruction. Yet it by no means follows that this time the experiment in civilization is doomed to go the way of its predecessors in the ancient world. On Tuesday evening, November 4, Dr. G. F. BECK, Director of the Labor Temple School, New York, will discuss SPENGLER and his philosophy.

FASHIONS

Women are often teased and sometimes sternly criticized for their herd-like following of changing fashions in dress and for the capricious instability of styles. Yet there is an obvious social value both in conformity to ruling modes and in variety of changes in that mode. Moreover, with increasing freedom of action and extended fields of activity, women tend to refuse the too extravagant or silly tendencies in dress. There can be no doubt, for example, that the short skirt has come to stay for most uses; perhaps somewhat modified from the extreme abbreviation, but effectually established. It is difficult to imagine the modern business woman going to her office or school in the trailing skirts of the '90s.

But there is charm and æsthetic stimulus in variety. It may be a distinct gain if the woman who wears knee length skirts at work dons flowing full length draperies for the evening play time. And whatever the philosopher may think about it there are few subjects of such engrossing interest to women as the fashions. There is likely to be a large attendance at the lecture-demonstration on "The Current Season's Modes" to be given in the Home Economics Department Friday afternooon, November 7, by Miss MARJORIE KINNEY, of the School of Household Science and Arts, Pratt Institute.

Unless otherwise stated on the WEEKLY TICKET, there are no reserved seats at Membership events.

THE BROOKLYN INSTITUTE OF ARTS AND SCIENCES

SCHOOL OF PEDAGOGY

Season 1930-1931

A SPECIAL COURSE on

"The Enjoyment of Poetry"

Fifteen Lectures by Leading Poets

Jessie B. Rittenhouse....Thurs. Eve., Nov. 6

Carl Sandburg.....Tuesday Eve., Nov. 11

Following Poets each to give talk and reading for one session of Course: George William Russell (AE), Louis Untermeyer, Edwin Markham, Padraic Colum, Countee Cullen, Joseph Auslander, Arthur Guiterman, and others. Dr. Mark Van Doren will preside throughout the series.

Tickets of Admission to Single Lectures.....$1.50

"The Visual Arts"

Art Training for Junior Students

(Ages 12 to 20) Through Various Media

Conducted by:

Mrs. Charles McFarland Hunt, Director

The Art Students Guild, Ridgewood, N. J.

Saturdays, 10 a.m., beginning November 8

Free imaginative work is encouraged in order to discover any individual trend or latent ability, the emphasis being laid on release of the creative spirit. The guidance of each student progresses according to ability and personal co-operation.

The Course is supervised by the Art Students Guild and for students of great promise or for special class problem it has the consultative service of the entire Guild Faculty of critics, artists, sculptors and psychologists.

Course Fee, $20.00 to Institute Members; to others, $25.00.

An Additional Series of Units of the "Workshop Class in Interior Decoration" is announced

MR. WATTERSON LOWE will conduct this series which has proved so useful to those interested in Interior Decoration, gift shop work, and home-making.

Each unit will include six sessions of one and one-half hours each to be given on Tuesdays at 4 p.m. The first unit begins Tuesday, November 11.

The first unit includes the proper measuring, actual making and hanging of glass curtains, lined cretonne curtains, box pleated and shaped valance, one quilted pillow, and one model bedspread. Many practical and helpful suggestions are passed on to develop creative ability and to give the professional touch so desired.

Course Fee, Per Unit: $10.00 to Institute Members; to others, $12.50.

Further information supplied on application to Registrar's Office, Room 35, Brooklyn Academy of Music, or telephone Sterling 6700

ANGNA ENTERS

in her

EPISODES AND COMPOSITIONS IN DANCE FORM

KENNETH YOST at the Piano

Tuesday Evening, November 4, at 8:15, Music Hall

PROGRAM

1. Geschichten Aus Dem Wiener Wald.....Johann Strauss
2. Feline.....Claude Debussy
3. Promenade.....Waldteufel
4. Delsarte—With a Not Too Classical Nod to the Greeks
5. Moyen Age.....Frescobaldi

Intermission

6. Antique à la Française (very Directoire).....Gretry
7. Piano Music: A Dance of Adolescence
8. Pavana—Spain, 16th Century
9. Field Day.....Sousa
10. Aphrodisiac—Green Hour
11. Cake Walk—1897

Intermission

12. Queen of Heaven (French Gothic).....Gautier de Coinci
13. Dance of Death No. 1
14. Contra Danse.....Beethoven

Costumes designed and executed by Miss Enters

VICTOR CHENKIN

In a Program of

INTERNATIONAL CHARACTER SONGS

Assisted by

JASHA FISHERMAN, Pianist

Thursday Evening, November 13, at 8:15, Music Hall

Part One

Group 1—SONGS OF A JESTER
- a. The King's Hunting Party
- b. Beware of the Jester
- c. Guinever
- d. Autodafé

Group 2—ITALIAN SONGS
- a. Funiculi, Funicula
- b. Trala, Lari, Lira!
- c. Let's be Friends
- d. Tarantela

Group 3—GYPSY SONGS
- a. Nights Insane
- b. What Sense to Fall In Love?
- c. Sharaban
- d. Two Guitars

Intermission

Group 4—HEBREW SONGS
- a. Dudele
- b. Mai Komashma Lon
- c. When Messiah Comes
- d. Where Do You Come From Jew?
- e. Bim-Bam

Group 5—UKRAINIAN SONGS
- a. The Muzhik Was Yelling
- b. Oh! Jigoon
- c. Come, Wind, Blow at Ukrainia
- d. The Blind Beggar
- e. I Drink Alone

Mr. Fisherman will play incidental solos preceding some of the numbers.

Brooklyn's Distinctive Florist

Wilson

Floral Decorations For All Occasions

Main Store

3 and 5 GREENE AVE. BROOKLYN, N. Y.

Telephone, Nevins 7400-1-2-3

Flowers telegraphed or cabled to all parts of the World

THE PIANO OF PADEREWSKI, OF HOFMANN IS WELL WITHIN YOUR REACH

No matter what the size of your living-room or the decoration of your music-room, there is a Steinway model that will be appropriate. There are the handsome standard cases created in fine woods and ivory, as well as cases inspired by the great periods of art and decoration. • And the owner of one of these beautiful instruments need never buy another piano. For every Steinway, regardless of size, model or price, is a true Steinway, capable of a half century of perfect service. • Visit the nearest Steinway dealer today, where models of the Instrument of the Immortals are on display. Listen to a great composition played on a great piano. It will be a memorable experience.

A new Steinway Upright piano can be bought for a total as low as $875

10% down—balance in three years

This means that the Steinway Upright may be obtained with a cash deposit of only $87.50. Payment of the balance is made in monthly instalments of under $26.00 over a three-year period. Any Steinway may be purchased on the plan of 10% down, balance in three years. Used pianos accepted in partial exchange. Steinway & Sons, Steinway Hall, 109 West 57th Street, New York City, just west of Sixth Avenue.

The Steinway Baby Grand—A Steinway of this size and power . . . at $1375 . . . is an extraordinary value. It may be obtained with a down payment of $137.50. Payment of balance is made in decreasing monthly instalments of under $41.00 over a three-year period. Its beautiful finish harmonizes with any plan of interior decoration. Its size is such as to conserve floor space and still retain that beauty and breadth of tone which a true grand piano ought to have. There are many Steinway sizes, including period models.

STEINWAY

THE INSTRUMENT OF THE IMMORTALS

Part One

Symphony

Conductor Discovered As Composer

Koussevitzky Doubly Heard in His Own Festival Overture, Two Russian Symphonies

From Nov 1

At ten minutes to three yesterday afternoon the mystery-play, acted—none too effectively—at Symphony Hall during the past week, came to an end. At that moment sounded the last chord of the overture contributed anonymously to the current celebration of the orchestra's fiftieth year. Applause swelled quickly after the sonorous close. Dr. Koussevitzky turned to acknowledge it. On the instant, at a pre-concerted signal from Mr. Burgin, the orchestra—at the full strength that the score demanded—rose as one man; with bows and hands made lively sounds of approval; so saluted the conductor as the anonymous composer. Through as many as thirty seconds Dr. Koussevitzky betrayed the irritation of one caught in his own ruse; as speedily forgot it in the clapping before and behind him. By this time excitable ladies were on their feet with more or less of the audience straggling behind them, renewed applause; a warm recall; and it was time to amend the program leaf:

Festival Overture on a Theme from Glinka's Opera, "A Life for the Tsar". S. Koussevitzky (First Performance)

Did one hundred and ten men, in this gossipping town or anywhere else, ever keep a secret? No; outside old legend or newer romance? And at the rehearsal of last Monday, Dr. Koussevitzky had confided his authorship to the orchestra. Did no one believe when our contemporary, The Post, heard and printed as much next day? Not yet is distrust of "the paper" at quite such pitch. He who runs could read when the able analyst for The Transcript cited certain singularities in the score pointing toward Dr. Koussevitzky, and no one else, as the composer. Admittedly a Russian had written the overture—for precisely the number of instruments constituting the orchestra, in exactly the groups into which it is divided. More: he had used as second theme a motiv next of kin to one in a Concerto for Double-Bass not unknown at Symphony Hall. The venerable and learned editor of the program-book had no need to take cover behind an apt quotation from Mr. Shaw's epilogue to "Fanny's First Play." He must have known, like most of us in his trade. The receptivity of the matinée audience is familiar trait. Does it absorb a gossipers' secret less avidly than music? Probably not.

Moreover what more natural and creditable to Dr. Koussevitzky than the will to write such an anniversary piece? He does not merely practice his profession upon the Boston Symphony Orchestra. In its fiftieth year it is the work of his hand, the pride of his heart, the pre-occupation of his mind. He gives no less than he exacts. One after another into his hands were coming the works of composers commissioned to celebrate the jubilee. Was it only to be marked outside the family mansion? Should not the head of the house make also his contribution? Dr. Koussevitzky has impulses as the rest of us; bethought himself of the hymn-theme from "A Life for the Tsar"—to many a Russian, noble and festal both—put pen to music-paper in the leisure of summer. When he finished his holiday-task, the organ had declaimed the theme; the orchestral choirs caught and energized it. To fugal progress and gentler measures interposed had succeeded stately, upswelling climax. Rejoice, be glad; yet remember obligation and keep the artist's honor.

To survey, reviewer-fashion, an anniversary overture so conceived and bestowed would be as impertinent as to send a critical memorandum to the maker of a birthday speech. Do we who listened tell the full-hearted spokesman that in transitions his discourse sagged; that we should have preferred a more spacious and slowly-mounting peroration; that his management of words—or in this instance instruments—might have been clearer and more idiomatic? If we hint as much, we do so in the bosom of the family—in the intimacy that after seven years prevails between conductor and hearers at Symphony Hall. Rather we look behind to the impelling will—the simple, sincere, overflowing desire that the jubilee of the orchestra should be celebrated by composition in its own house. Loyalties made this festival overture, eagerly, earnestly, honestly. Forget a secret of Polichinelle that there was no keeping. Remember, however imperfect, an act of prideful devotion.

Two symphonies divided the remainder of the afternoon. One, new, brief, youthful and lyric, was work of Nicolas Nabokov, Russian exile in Paris, about whom his friend and fellow-composer, Dukelsky, writes elsewhere in this paper. The other was Chaikovsky's Fourth, in F minor, as in annual pilgrimage to a favorite shrine, re-lighted since Dr. Koussevitzky, hereabouts, became high priest. Yesterday the illumination was magnificent. The conductor has his moods with each of the composer's surviving symphonies. Yesterday, with the Fourth, he chose the epic vein. In the introduction he bade the orchestra thunder forth the motiv of overwhelming fate. It sounded as the will of all the gods upon all human kind. The orchestra sang the melancholy waltz-tune and mortals fondled ruefully their sensuous being. The orchestra forsook these measures; tossed about in the restless, importunate, dolorous Chaikovskian mood. The conductor dramatized it until it sounded universal. He hushed the slow movement into a fantasmal music—the sad-eyed phantoms of remembrance. The scherzo of the plucked strings was outwardly the feat of virtuosi; in implication, mankind's fancies coming in troubled wisps, spinning out of nowhere, vanishing no whither. The finale rioted Russian; but most of us have known such desperate flogging of our gayer energies. And now and again the gods' decree sounded through, immutable, unescapable.

So to dramatize this Fourth Symphony is to put out of mind Chaikovsky's shortcomings and mannerisms as symphonist. So to turn him epic is to lift to heroic and universal plane the introspection, the avowals, the self-pitying outcry of a singular and haunted temperament. The Symphony in F minor endured this exaltation above its intrinsic self; gave reason, as it seemed, for this plangent, far-spreading voice. Beside it, so transfigured, even the Fifth—to say nothing of the inferior "Pathetic"—paled. The moral is clear: In these days no conductor can play Chaikovsky objectively, literally, or as "repertory." Even to the Fourth and the Fifth symphonies, there must be new imaginative approach or they fail. Dr. Koussevitzky finds it variously. The ghost of Chaikovsky, wandering, no doubt restless and mournful-eyed among the shades, should warm as it hears him.

Mr. Nobokov's symphony is brief and rhythmic, as becomes his time and surroundings. It traverses only three movements; the last a scherzo-finale, mostly scherzo until, after pause, a few chords bring the end, deeper-toned and grave, in a moment of firm imagination. Elsewhere scherzo-like motivs and rhythmic figures play about, directed with skill, sped by fancy, owing little in casual hearing to the usually unescapable Stravinsky or Prokofiev. Expose a romantic composer of the middle of the nineteenth century to the influence of the current musical air and he might have written so, with his undercurrent of melody. Old feeling, new expression go hand in hand. The listener cannot choose but hear. The first movement is as buoyantly and impetuously rhythmed. Above or piercing through, firmly outlined motivs yield an ardent but not too obvious melody. The changeful mood is the mood of romantic fantasia.

The listener begins to suspect a young composer with a personal will, inventing his own matter, choosing his own manner. The slow movement is confirmation. The darker and the lighter strings persist in songful measures. They flow firm and warm, musing-melancholy. At moments they sound strange, and Mr. Nobokov's countrymen say that old Russian melody haunts them. The harmonic and instrumental color accords, yet partakes of this immediate day. New and old again and once more the romantic vein. Believably, Mr. Nabokov has a future.

H. T. P.

Part Four

From Nov 1

Friendship's Tribute, Dukelsky to Nabokov

One Young Russian Composer Introduces Another Newly Come Into Symphony Hall

I MET Nicholas Nabokov (Nika to his friends) in the summer of 1924, shortly after my arrival in Paris from overseas. I then stayed with Paul Chelitchev—one of the few really important young Russian painters—in a truly "Murgerian" studio at 150 Blvd. Montparnasse. The place was full of stray cats, empty bottles, sheets of manuscript paper and decidedly underfed painters and musicians. Chelitchev and I had daily arguments on the eternal subjects of music and sex (since I was a complete and self-confessed ignoramus on the art of painting) which invariably ended in the well-known Russian manner; that is a violent and wholly harmless quarrel. One day a tall, dark youth walked in and, rather apologetically, prevented us from again indulging in our favorite pastime. There was a suggestion of extreme sobriety, almost asceticism, about his pleasant, long face. He was a young composer, admitted to studying under Juon and Rebikov (which made me unnecessarily suspicious and arrogant) and Nabokov was his name.

The Nabokovs were a noble, highly progressive and esteemed family. Several of its members have distinguished themselves in one way or another. Nika's uncle (now dead) was one of the leaders of the C. D. (constitutionalist-democratic) party of old Russia. A cousin of his writes fiction under the name of Sirine.

I must confess that much as I admired Nabokov (only a year older than myself) as a person, I developed a positive distaste to his compositions. Those first efforts were, in reality, rather pointless and dry and extremely imitative. They consisted—so far as I remember—of some piano-pieces, songs on words by Omar Khayyam and an unorchestrated overture. The prevailing influence seemed to be Satie—which in itself was strange in so Russian a person as Nabokov- and the music was so harsh and unlovely as to bring me to a hasty conclusion, that our sober friend was no composer at all.

Nika, on the contrary, developed a great liking for my music—"Zephyr and Flora" was then being composed—and was far more intelligent about it than myself. My departure for London brought our friendship to a temporary end. On my return to France in 1926, I found myself in Nice and came face to face with Nabokov on the Promenade des Anglais. He told me about a piano sonata he had recently completed and we hurried to my hotel to look it over. The music was still dry but one or two passages showed real and unexpected promise.

I was happy to point out these passages to the author adding that, as I was invited to dine with Stravinsky that night, I would take the sonata along and show it to the master. Nabokov seemed enchanted and, shortly afterwards, left for his mother's little country place near Nice, where he then lived.

Having arrived at Stravinsky's house in Montbozon (part of Nice), I was greeted by his two sons, one of whom is now a painter of promise. Dinner was not ready and I was invited to play. My own music and some bad jazz (politely ridiculed by Stravinsky) were followed by excerpts from Nabokov's work, which I played atrociously.

Igor Feodorovitch was visibly interested; the only comment he made, if my memory serves me right, was that the work was "far from silly." From then on it "became a steady crescendo" with Nabokov. Shortly afterwards some of his songs (to Pouchkine words) were sung by Vera Vajeerska at a concert of Russian music in Paris. The songs were no longer merely promising; they contained a rich and real warmth, a satisfyingfulness that left no doubts as to the talent of the composer.

I often wondered whether the sudden expansion of Nika's talent wasn't due to his religious self-discipline. Nika was always extremely religious and the great lyrical charm of the rites and chants of the old Greek Church began to exert a profound influence on his work. This influence had little to do with the hysterical sectarianism of Oboukhov, so startlingly manifested in the latter's "Book of Life." Nabokov's growing talent found little or no encouragement until his meeting with Diaghilev (1927), of which I learned from Boris Kochno, the erstwhile librettist of the Russian Ballet and Diaghilev's private secretary. The work that proved the turning point in Nika's career was not commissioned by Diaghilev, however. I am speaking of the "Ode," which, although known in its ballet form, was originally a sort of an oratorio to words by Lomonossov. This was composed in Alsace and played to Diaghilev in Paris. The great Serge had engaged Chelitchev to do the décor and costumes and their joint effort was produced in Paris in 1928.

The result, to quote, Henri Sauguet, was an æsthetic "mésalliance," the monumental, square-shouldered music having nothing in common with the entirely abstract and peculiarly fragile mise-en-scène. But this should not detract from the value of the score, which was never really meant to be a ballet; the few dances that Nabokov had inserted in his work were of poor quality.

The rest—the "Ode" itself—contains much splendid music. The very beginning with its sonorous fanfares and a pleasant archaic flavor is indicative of immediate directness of purpose. The melancholy E-minor duet (the so-called "String Dance") is probably the best thing in the Ode; this plaintive little pastorale has a curiously striking and unforgettable pathos about it. Worthy of mention is also the double choir. Certain details in the workmanship betray a slight influence of Sauguet, who was very friendly with Nabokov at the time. It was he, I believe, who brought Nika in touch with Eluard, Cocteau and the celebrated Catholic erudite, Maritain.

To a careful student, it would appear that Nabokov owes more to Musorgsky than Chaikovsky; that of the moderns he is closer to Stravinsky than Prokofiev or Hindemith; that his strength lies in vocal rather than instrumental music.

The Symphony (originally called "Symphonie Lyrique") that Boston is hearing this week-end already had a substantial success in Europe. Nabokov is now at work on a piano concerto, performances of which are already announced in Paris.

VLADIMIR DUKELSKY

Music

Nov 1

43

Koussevitzky as Composer

On the fourth program of the jubilee season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra (Oct. 31-Nov. 1) stood an Overture by one who preferred to be listed as "Anonymous," an overture written expressly for the fiftieth anniversary of the orchestra and at this time given its first hearing. There followed a Symphony by Nicolas Nabokov and the Tchaikovsky Symphony No. 4 in F minor.

Despite the effort of the composer of the anniversary overture to maintain his anonymity, his hand betrayed him. Not only his hand, but his thematic material as well. And if that were not sufficient evidence, one must be dull indeed who could not guess his identity when, upon the completion of the number, the orchestra rose as one man and saluted its conductor. With orchestra standing, the audience felt need for more complete outlet to its enthusiasm, and also rose, the while it gave vigorous approval of a composition which, after all, Dr. Koussevitzky need not be modest in acknowledging. It is based upon two themes, the principal one of which, from "A Life for the Tzar," was chosen by the composer as peculiarly befitting the occasion. The opening lines are given out by the organ. There follows an excellent piece of contrapuntal writing in which the entire orchestra is utilized. The second theme is avowedly Dr. Koussevitzky's own, yet it has a strangely haunting melody, which persistently recalls the Concerto for double-bass which this virtuoso of the instrument has made familiar to Boston audiences. The principal theme is worked out at considerable length, and the overture is brought to a smashing close with fortissimi in all the choirs—the sort of close calculated to bring one up standing, if one has projected oneself into the piece. In all a brilliantly sonorous composition, worthy the name of its composer, who after all, was a musical virtuoso before he became a conductor, a fact which we are sometimes prone to overlook in the light of his more recent accomplishments.

Sharing the program, by way of novelty, came the symphony by Nabokov, given its first performance in the United States. This composer is widely recognized as the author of a ballet-oratorio which he named "Ode," and numerous other works for piano and orchestra. Built upon thematic material of singular beauty, the symphony is well knit. The form is clear, in fact, extremely orthodox, and the movements, of which there are three, all hold the attention. One might express a preference for the second, a Largo, and in no wise deprecate the remaining two. Although the composer had not so indicated it, the program contained the additional word "Lyric" in announcing the number. The word is correctly descriptive, yet in each movement come passages as virile as any penned by even the great Tchaikovsky himself. The symphony was extraordinarily well received.

A masterly performance of the Tchaikovsky Fourth Symphony once more brought to our attention that the plinth upon which this tonal giant stands is firmly grounded upon the whole-hearted approbation of an appreciative public. Dr. Koussevitzky and his men richly deserved the storm of applause at the conclusion of the symphony, which closed one more all-Russian program of distinction.

G. M. S.

time in the history of the orchestra, the program-book listed the composer "Anonymous." After the performance of the work (an Overture) yesterday, the men of the orchestra rose en masse to applaud Mr. Koussevitzky, who had put his whole heart into having it well rendered. And the audience knew then, if it did not before, that the conductor had written the score.

It was really a touching spectacle, the more so in that the music indicated that great conductors are necessarily no better composers than are great composers great interpreters of their own works. It is true that Mr. Koussevitzky's score is quite obviously sincere, written from the heart. But need we cite the proverb about good intentions?

There was another novelty, heard for the first time in the United States—a symphony by one Nicholas Nabokov, ex-patriate Russian, now living in Paris. His music seemed to us light and lyric, unaffected and generally pleasing. We shall probably forget that we had ever heard it, within a fortnight.

Chaikovsky's Fourth Symphony closed the all-Russian program. Despite its frequent recurrence on symphonic programs, the Symphony might well have been labelled "First Time," so engrossed was Mr. Koussevitzky in the performance, so earnestly and mightily did he and his musicians labor. The result, of course, was a rendering that can probably not be matched elsewhere on this planet.

Throughout the concert the orchestra was riotously brilliant. Yet one missed again, as during the preceding concerts, the sensitiveness evident in season's past.

Part One

Symphony

Conductor Discovered As Composer

Koussevitzky Doubly Heard in His Own Festival Overture, Two Russian Symphonies

From Nov. 1

After ten minutes to three yesterday afternoon the mystery-play, acted—none too effectively—at Symphony Hall during the past week, came to an end. At that moment sounded the last chord of the overture contributed anonymously to the current celebration of the orchestra's fiftieth year. Applause swelled quickly after the sonorous close. Dr. Koussevitzky turned to acknowledge it. On the instant, at a pre-concerted signal from Mr. Burgin, the orchestra—at the full strength that the score demanded—rose as one man; with bows and hands made lively sounds of approval; so saluted the conductor as the anonymous composer. Through as many as thirty seconds Dr. Koussevitzky betrayed the irritation of one caught in his own ruse; as speedily forgot it in the clapping before and behind him. By this time excitable ladies were on their feet with more or less of the audience straggling behind them, renewed applause; a warm recall; and it was time to amend the program leaf:

Festival Overture on a Theme from Glinka's Opera, "A Life for the Tsar" ..... S. Koussevitzky
(First Performance)

Did one hundred and ten men, in this gossipping town or anywhere else, ever keep a secret? No: outside old legend or newer romance? And at the rehearsal of last Monday, Dr. Koussevitzky had confided his authorship to the orchestra. Did no one believe when our contemporary, The Post, heard and printed as much next day? Not yet is distrust of "the paper" at quite such pitch. He who runs could read when the able analyst for The Transcript cited certain singularities in the score pointing toward Dr. Koussevitzky, and no one else, as the composer. Admittedly a Russian had written the overture—for precisely the number of instruments constituting the orchestra, in exactly the groups into which it is divided. More: he had used as second theme a motiv next of kin to one in a Concerto for Double-Bass not unknown at Symphony Hall. The venerable and learned editor of the program-book had no need to take cover behind an apt quotation from Mr. Shaw's epilogue to "Fanny's First Play." He must have known, like most of us in his trade. The receptivity of the matinée audience is familiar trait. Does it absorb a gossipers' secret less avidly than music? Probably not.

Moreover what more natural and creditable to Dr. Koussevitzky than the will to write such an anniversary piece? He does not merely practice his profession upon the Boston Symphony Orchestra. In its fiftieth year it is the work of his hand, the pride of his heart, the pre-occupation of his mind. He gives no less than he exacts. One after another into his hands were coming the works of composers commissioned to celebrate the jubilee. Was it only to be marked outside the family mansion? Should not the head of the house make also his contribution? Dr. Koussevitzky has impulses as the rest of us; bethought himself of the hymn-theme from "A Life for the Tsar"—to many a Russian, noble and festal both—put pen to music-paper in the leisure of summer. When he finished his holiday-task, the organ had declaimed the theme; the orchestral choirs caught and energized it. To fugal progress and gentler measures interposed had succeeded stately, upswelling climax. Rejoice, be glad; yet remember obligation and keep the artist's honor.

To survey, reviewer-fashion, an anniversary overture so conceived and bestowed would be as impertinent as to send a critical memorandum to the maker of a birthday speech. Do we who listened tell the full-hearted spokesman that in transitions his discourse sagged; that we should have preferred a more spacious and slowly-mounting peroration; that his management of words—or in this instance instruments—might have been clearer and more idiomatic? If we hint as much, we do so in the bosom of the family—in the intimacy that after seven years prevails between conductor and hearers at Symphony Hall. Rather we look behind to the impelling will—the simple, sincere, overflowing desire that the jubilee of the orchestra should be celebrated by composition in its own house. Loyalties made this festival overture, eagerly, earnestly, honestly. Forget a secret of Polichinelle that there was no keeping. Remember, however imperfect, an act of prideful devotion.

Two symphonies divided the remainder of the afternoon. One, new, brief, youthful and lyric, was work of Nicolas Nabokov, Russian exile in Paris, about whom his friend and fellow-composer, Dukelsky, writes elsewhere in this paper. The other was Chaikovsky's Fourth, in F minor, as in annual pilgrimage to a favorite shrine, re-lighted since Dr. Koussevitzky, hereabouts, became high priest. Yesterday the illumination was magnificent. The conductor has his moods with each of the composer's surviving symphonies. Yesterday, with the Fourth, he chose the epic vein. In the introduction he bade the orchestra thunder forth the motiv of overwhelming fate. It sounded as the will of all the gods upon all human kind. The orchestra sang the melancholy waltz-tune and mortals fondled ruefully their sensuous being. The orchestra forsook these measures; tossed about in the restless, importunate, dolorous Chaikovskian mood. The conductor dramatized it until it sounded universal. He hushed the slow movement into a fantasmal music—the sad-eyed phantoms of remembrance. The scherzo of the plucked strings was outwardly the feat of virtuosi; in implication, mankind's fancies coming in troubled wisps, spinning out of nowhere, vanishing no whither. The finale rioted Russian: but most of us have known such desperate flogging of our gayer energies. And now and again the gods' decree sounded through, immutable, unescapable.

So to dramatize this Fourth Symphony is to put out of mind Chaikovsky's shortcomings and mannerisms as symphonist. So to turn him epic is to lift to heroic and universal plane the introspection, the avowals, the self-pitying outcry of a singular and haunted temperament. The Symphony in F minor endured this exaltation above its intrinsic self; gave reason, as it seemed, for this plangent, far-spreading voice. Beside it, so transfigured, even the Fifth—to say nothing of the inferior "Pathetic"—paled. The moral is clear: In these days no conductor can play Chaikovsky objectively, literally, or as "repertory." Even to the Fourth and the Fifth symphonies, there must be new imaginative approach or they fail. Dr. Koussevitzky finds it variously. The ghost of Chaikovsky, wandering, no doubt restless and mournful-eyed among the shades, should warm as it hears him.

Mr. Nobokov's symphony is brief and rhythmic, as becomes his time and surroundings. It traverses only three movements; the last a scherzo-finale, mostly scherzo until, after pause, a few chords bring the end, deeper-toned and grave, in a moment of firm imagination. Elsewhere scherzo-like motivs and rhythmic figures play about, directed with skill, sped by fancy, owing little in casual hearing to the usually unescapable Stravinsky or Prokofiev. Expose a romantic composer of the middle of the nineteenth century to the influence of the current musical air and he might have written so, with his undercurrent of melody. Old feeling, new expression go hand in hand. The listener cannot choose but hear. The first movement is as buoyantly and impetuously rhythmed. Above or piercing through, firmly outlined motivs yield an ardent but not too obvious melody. The changeful mood is the mood of romantic fantasia.

The listener begins to suspect a young composer with a personal will, inventing his own matter, choosing his own manner. The slow movement is confirmation. The darker and the lighter strings persist in songful measures. They flow firm and warm, musing-melancholy. At moments they sound strange, and Mr. Nobokov's countrymen say that old Russian melody haunts them. The harmonic and instrumental color accords, yet partakes of this immediate day. New and old again and once more the romantic vein. Believably, Mr. Nabokov has a future.

H. T. P.

Part Four

From Nov. 1

Friendship's Tribute, Dukelsky to Nabokov

One Young Russian Composer Introduces Another Newly Come Into Symphony Hall

I MET Nicholas Nabokov (Nika to his friends) in the summer of 1924, shortly after my arrival in Paris from overseas. I then stayed with Paul Chelitchev—one of the few really important young Russian painters—in a truly "Murgerian" studio at 150 Blvd. Montparnasse. The place was full of stray cats, empty bottles, sheets of manuscript paper and decidedly underfed painters and musicians. Chelitchev and I had daily arguments on the eternal subjects of music and sex (since I was a complete and self-confessed ignoramus on the art of painting) which invariably ended in the well-known Russian manner; that is a violent and wholly harmless quarrel. One day a tall, dark youth walked in and, rather apologetically, prevented us from again indulging in our favorite pastime. There was a suggestion of extreme sobriety, almost asceticism, about his pleasant, long face. He was a young composer, admitted to studying under Juon and Rebikov (which made me unnecessarily suspicious and arrogant) and Nabokov was his name.

The Nabokovs were a noble, highly progressive and esteemed family. Several of its members have distinguished themselves in one way or another. Nika's uncle (now dead) was one of the leaders of the C. D. (constitutionalist-democratic) party of old Russia. A cousin of his writes fiction under the name of Sirine.

I must confess that much as I admired Nabokov (only a year older than myself) as a person, I developed a positive distaste to his compositions. Those first efforts were, in reality, rather pointless and dry and extremely imitative. They consisted—so far as I remember—of some piano-pieces, songs on words by Omar Khayyam and an unorchestrated overture. The prevailing influence seemed to be Satie—which in itself was strange in so Russian a person as Nabokov- and the music was so harsh and unlovely as to bring me to a hasty conclusion, that our sober friend was no composer at all.

Nika, on the contrary, developed a great liking for my music—"Zephyr and Flora" was then being composed—and was far more intelligent about it than myself. My departure for London brought our friendship to a temporary end. On my return to France in 1926, I found myself in Nice and came face to face with Nabokov on the Promenade des Anglais. He told me about a piano sonata he had recently completed and we hurried to my hotel to look it over. The music was still dry but one or two passages showed real and unexpected promise.

I was happy to point out these passages to the author adding that, as I was invited to dine with Stravinsky that night, I would take the sonata along and show it to the master. Nabokov seemed enchanted and, shortly afterwards, left for his mother's little country place near Nice, where he then lived.

Having arrived at Stravinsky's house in Montbozon (part of Nice), I was greeted by his two sons, one of whom is now a painter of promise. Dinner was not ready and I was invited to play. My own music and some bad jazz (politely ridiculed by Stravinsky) were followed by excerpts from Nabokov's work, which I played atrociously.

Igor Feodorovitch was visibly interested; the only comment he made, if my memory serves me right, was that the work was "far from silly." From then on it "became a steady crescendo" with Nabokov. Shortly afterwards some of his songs (to Pouchkine words) were sung by Vera Vajeerska at a concert of Russian music in Paris. The songs were no longer merely promising; they contained a rich and real warmth, a satisfying fulness that left no doubts as to the talent of the composer.

I often wondered whether the sudden expansion of Nika's talent wasn't due to his religious self-discipline. Nika was always extremely religious and the great lyrical charm of the rites and chants of the old Greek Church began to exert a profound influence on his work. This influence had little to do with the hysterical sectarianism of Oboukhov, so startlingly manifested in the latter's "Book of Life." Nabokov's growing talent found little or no encouragement until his meeting with Diaghilev (1927), of which I learned from Boris Kochno, the erstwhile librettist of the Russian Ballet and Diaghilev's private secretary. The work that proved the turning point in Nika's career was not commissioned by Diaghilev, however. I am speaking of the "Ode," which, although known in its ballet form, was originally a sort of an oratorio to words by Lomonossov. This was composed in Alsace and played to Diaghilev in Paris. The great Serge had engaged Chelitchev to do the décor and costumes and their joint effort was produced in Paris in 1928.

The result, to quote, Henri Sauguet, was an æsthetic "mésalliance," the monumental, square-shouldered music having nothing in common with the entirely abstract and peculiarly fragile mise-en-scène. But this should not detract from the value of the score, which was never really meant to be a ballet; the few dances that Nabokov had inserted in his work were of poor quality.

The rest—the "Ode" itself—contains much splendid music. The very beginning with its sonorous fanfares and a pleasant archaic flavor is indicative of immediate directness of purpose. The melancholy E-minor duet (the so-called "String Dance") is probably the best thing in the Ode; this plaintive little pastorale has a curiously striking and unforgettable pathos about it. Worthy of mention is also the double choir. Certain details in the workmanship betray a slight influence of Sauguet, who was very friendly with Nabokov at the time. It was he, I believe, who brought Nika in touch with Milhaud, Cocteau and the celebrated Catholic erudite, Maritain.

To a careful student, it would appear that Nabokov owes more to Musorgsky than Chaikovsky; that of the moderns he is closer to Stravinsky than Prokofiev or Hindemith; that his strength lies in vocal rather than instrumental music.

The Symphony (originally called "Symphonie Lyrique") that Boston is hearing this week-end has already had a substantial success in Europe. Nabokov is now at work on a piano concerto, performances of which are already announced in Paris.

VLADIMIR DUKELSKY

Music

From Nov. 1

43

Koussevitzky as Composer

On the fourth program of the jubilee season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra (Oct. 31-Nov. 1) stood an Overture by one who preferred to be listed as "Anonymous," an overture written expressly for the fiftieth anniversary of the orchestra and at this time given its first hearing. There followed a Symphony by Nicolas Nabokov and the Tchaikovsky Symphony No. 4 in F minor.

Despite the effort of the composer of the anniversary overture to maintain his anonymity, his hand betrayed him. Not only his hand, but his thematic material as well. And if that were not sufficient evidence, one must be dull indeed who could not guess his identity when, upon the completion of the number, the orchestra rose as one man and saluted its conductor. With orchestra standing, the audience felt need for more complete outlet to its enthusiasm, and also rose, the while it gave vigorous approval of a composition which, after all, Dr. Koussevitzky need not be modest in acknowledging. It is based upon two themes, the principal one of which, from "A Life for the Tzar," was chosen by the composer as peculiarly befitting the occasion. The opening lines are given out by the organ. There follows an excellent piece of contrapuntal writing in which the entire orchestra is utilized. The second theme is avowedly Dr. Koussevitzky's own, yet it has a strangely haunting melody, which persistently recalls the Concerto for double-bass which this virtuoso of the instrument has made familiar to Boston audiences. The principal theme is worked out

By VOLNEY

What Is the Idea

LUNCHEON 12-2 TEA 4-5
STEAK, CHOP or CHICKEN DINNER 5:45-8 $1.25
Open Sundays Tea 4-5 Dinner 5:45-8
GIFT SHOP OF IMPORTATIONS
For reservations in Horse Stalls Telephone HAY. 4335

SYMPHONY IN ALL-RUSSIAN PROGRAM

From Nov. 1

By MOSES SMITH

The program and performance of this week's Symphony concerts emphasize, as have the three previous pairs, that ceremony is going to overshadow music throughout this jubilee year of the orchestra.

For the third successive week there is a piece written especially for the orchestra's 50th anniversary, now played for the first time. And for the first time in the history of the orchestra, the program-book listed the composer "Anonymous." After the performance of the work (an Overture) yesterday, the men of the orchestra rose en masse to applaud Mr. Koussevitzky, who had put his whole heart into having it well rendered. And the audience knew then, if it did not before, that the conductor had written the score.

It was really a touching spectacle, the more so in that the music indicated that great conductors are necessarily no better composers than are great composers great interpreters of their own works. It is true that Mr. Koussevitzky's score is quite obviously sincere, written from the heart. But need we cite the proverb about good intentions?

There was another novelty, heard for the first time in the United States—a symphony by one Nicholas Nabokov, ex-patriate Russian, now living in Paris. His music seemed to us light and lyric, unaffected and generally pleasing. We shall probably forget that we had ever heard it, within a fortnight.

Chaikovsky's Fourth Symphony closed the all-Russian program. Despite its frequent recurrence on symphonic programs, the Symphony might well have been labelled "First Time," so engrossed was Mr. Koussevitzky in the performance, so earnestly and mightily did he and his musicians labor. The result, of course, was a rendering that can probably not be matched elsewhere on this planet.

Throughout the concert the orchestra was riotously brilliant. Yet one missed again, as during the preceding concerts, the sensitiveness evident in season's past.

REDUCTION RATIO 16x

2.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

2.0 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

200 mm

150 mm

100 mm

1.0 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

2.0 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

2.5 mm

A5

A4

A3

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century

A&P

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

4.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

3.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

3.0 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
STAR

Myra Hess to Be Soloist At Beethoven Festival

FINAL details of the fiftieth anniversary Beethoven Festival which the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, will give at Constitution Hall on Tuesday, Wednesday and Friday evenings and on Saturday afternoon, December 2, 3, 5 and 6, respectively, were completed late in the past week at a conference between Mrs. Wilson-Greene, and W. H. Brennan and George Judd, manager and assistant manager of the Boston Symphony.

Those final details included a revision of the program, the addition of a third soloist to the festival in the person of Myra Hess, pianist, and arrangements for the use of a local chorus of 200 singers, with four additional soloists, at the Saturday afternoon presentation of Beethoven's famous "Ninth Symphony."

The revised program as announced yesterday follows:

First program, Tuesday evening, December 2, at 8:15 o'clock: Overture to Goethe's "Egmont," Opus 84; Pianoforte concerto No. 3 in C minor, Opus 37 (Myra Hess, pianist, soloist); Symphony No. 3 in E flat major, "Eroica," Opus 55.

Second program, Wednesday evening, December 3, at 8:15 o'clock: Overture to "Leonore," No. 3, Opus 72; violin concerto in D major, Opus 61 (Efrem Zimbalist, violinist, soloist); Symphony No. 5 in C minor, Opus 67.

Third program, Friday evening, December 5, at 8:15 o'clock: Overture to "Coriolanus," Opus 62; pianoforte concerto No. 4 in G major, Opus 58 (Josef Hofmann, pianist, soloist); Symphony No. 7 in A major, Opus 92.

Fourth program, Saturday afternoon, December 6, at 3 p.m.: Symphony No. 1 in C major, Opus 21; Symphony No. 9 in D minor, with final chorus on Schiller's "Ode to Joy," Opus 125 (chorus of 200, trained by Albert W. Harned; soloists, Jeanette Vreeland, Dan Gridley, Nevada Van Der Veer, Fraser Gange).

This fiftieth anniversary festival of Beethoven's works which the Boston Symphony Orchestra plans to give here at Constitution Hall early next month is in celebration of the fiftieth anniversary of the founding of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, an anniversary which was recently celebrated at Symphony Hall in Boston, where Sir George Henschel, 80-year-old conductor, who first conducted the Boston orchestra, made the trip from England to conduct again the same program he gave in Boston 50 years ago.

Conductor Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony management have selected Washington, the Capital of the United States, as a fitting place to stage what amounts to a national celebration of the Boston Symphony's fiftieth birthday.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
POST

AMONG MUSICIANS

By ELISABETH E. POE.

CHOIRS and choirmasters of Washington are busy with preparations for the festal Thanksgiving programs which will feature the celebration of harvest home in many local churches. Many beautiful anthems have been written for this feast day. The custom has grown in recent years of having elaborate Thanksgiving music on the Sunday following that holiday as well as on the day itself.

Close upon the heels of Thanksgiving will come Christmas, when the music portions of Christmas services rival in brilliancy and interest those of Easter. Encouraging conditions are reported from the choirs this fall. There have been very few changes in the personnel of Washington choirs, and practically all the churches consider "music" one of the most important items on the yearly budget.

Music lovers here are looking forward with eagerness to the Beethoven festival which the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, will give in Constitution Hall December 2 to 6. The festival will be given under the local management of Mrs. Wilson-Greene. A third soloist has been added to the festival in Myra Hess, pianist, and a local chorus of 200 singers, with four additional soloists, will appear at the afternoon presentation of Beethoven's famous "Ninth Symphony."

The revised program for the festival is as follows:

First program, Tuesday evening, December 2, at 8:15 o'clock: Overture to Goethe's "Egmont," Opus 84; Pianoforte concerto No. 3 in C minor, Opus 37 (Myra Hess, pianist, soloist); Symphony No. 3 in E flat major, "Eroica," Opus 55.

Second program, Wednesday evening, December 3, at 8:15 o'clock: Overture to "Leonore," No. 3, Opus 72; violin concerto in D major, Opus 61 (Efram Zimbalist, violinist, soloist); Symphony No. 5 in C minor, Opus 67.

Third program, Friday evening, December 5, at 8:15 o'clock: Overture to "Coriolanus," Opus 62; pianoforte concerto No. 4 in G major, Opus 58 (Josef Hofmann, pianist, soloist); Symphony No. 7 in A major, Opus 92.

Fourth program, Saturday afternoon, December 6, at 3 p. m.: Symphony No. 1 in C major, Opus 21; Symphony No. 9 in D minor, with final chorus on Schiller's "Ode to Joy," Opus 125 (chorus of 200, trained by Albert W. Harned; soloists, Jeanette Vreeland, Dan Gridley, Nevada Van Der Veer, Fraser Gange).

This fiftieth anniversary festival of Beethoven's works which the Boston Symphony Orchestra plans to give here at Constitution Hall early next month is in celebration of the fiftieth anniversary of the founding of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, an anniversary which was recently celebrated most elaborately at Symphony Hall in Boston, where Sir George Henschel, 80-year-old conductor, who first conducted the Boston orchestra, made the trip from England to conduct again the same program he gave in Boston 50 years ago.

Conductor Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony management have selected Washington, the Capital of the United States, as a fitting place to stage what amounts to a national celebration of the Boston Symphony's fiftieth birthday.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. Herald Tribune

Boston Symphony To Hold Festival In Washington

Will Give Four Beethoven Programs in December, Including 9th Symphony

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, will hold a Beethoven festival in Constitution Hall, Washington, from December 2 to 6. The first program, Tuesday evening, December 2, offers the "Egmont" overture, C minor piano concerto, with Myra Hess as soloist, and "Eroica" symphony. The second concert, Wednesday evening, December 4, has a program of the third "Leonore" overture, violin concerto, with Efrem Zimbalist as soloist, and the fifth symphony. Friday evening offers the "Coriolanus" overture, G major piano concerto, with Josef Hofmann as soloist, and the seventh symphony. The last festival program, Saturday afternoon, December 6, presents the first and ninth symphonies, the latter with a chorus of 200 trained by Albert W. Harned and Jeannette Vreeland, with Nevada Van der Veer and Fraser Gange as soloists.

In Boston, Dr. Koussevitzky will conduct a Bach Festival in the latter part of March.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TIMES

Concert-Chronicle

Symphonic Saturday

[illegible] and woman, as it seemed [illegible] the Symphonic Concert of Saturday, December 3, 1932. The audience knew. To it came Mr. Koussevitzky as both conductor and composer. Talking over the orchestra in a modest, human way, he did what was done [illegible] the orchestral concert [illegible] should be. Sophisticated [illegible] "Symphonie Fantastique" [illegible] seemed to beg [illegible] as [illegible] people and [illegible] those of today, while the [illegible] heard the counterpoint in [illegible] and knew that it was [illegible]

Next the symphony of young Mr. Sanborn [illegible] and depressingly [illegible] ensemble did. Someone said quite that they could not have been written before the [illegible]. Yet there is no [illegible] in them; only its influence caught out of the air and transfused into [illegible] music. Turn to the [illegible] and [illegible] merely rhythmic, what remains have shape and significance. The romantic feeling that was [illegible] so [illegible] manly, conducts itself along the way; chooses and colors the harmonic and instrumental vestures. Through the slow movement in particular, we hear nothing less than a "song without words" by no means tamely Mendelssohnian. Rather, it has even individual stamp. If it be [illegible] as one informed [illegible] and [illegible] Russky, [illegible] has Mr. Sanborn [illegible] a gift for a real speech of his own, at moments, [illegible]

GERMAN "ZEITGEIST"

A Mutilated "Barber"—Revival of Paisiello —Muck Conducts Greatly

By HERBERT F. PEYSER.

BERLIN, Oct. 12, 1930.

AFTER witnessing the incredible exhibition described on the Platz der Republik as a "Neuinscenierung" of the "Barber of Seville" I can only feel that the artistically minded music lovers of Berlin are to be congratulated on the prospective passing of the Kroll Opera. Small wonder that Intendant Heinz Tietjen, upon attending the dress rehearsal some weeks ago, was so shocked at what his subordinates had put over on him that he sternly compelled an eleventh-hour postponement. A more tasteless, vulgar and wantonly misrepresentative treatment of a masterpiece has rarely been hazarded on a modern stage, and in assuming this impudent privilege the Kroll management has carried to a preposterous climax the scenic and interpretative enormities it has at one time or another practiced on works like "Don Giovanni," "The Tales of Hoffmann" and "The Flying Dutchman."

Taking a leaf out of the book of those who a few seasons ago made of "The Mikado" a "modernized" nightmare and turned "The Beggar's Opera" into the dreadful "Dreigroschenoper," two aggressive young people, by name Arthur Maria Rabenalt and Wilhelm Reinking, have now offered up Rossini's deathless comedy body and soul on the altar of the insatiable "Zeitgeist." Give them the chance and they will probably put Siegfried and Tristan in plus fours and cutaways and invoke the "spirit of the time" for all justification and defense.

* * *

THE details of it would fill a newspaper column. It was not enough, for instance, that the dress of the characters should be as 1930 as possible; all the "Kitsch" and nonsense of Kurfürstendamm cabarets and Friedrichstrasse "Dielen" had to be injected into the proceedings in the witless effort to align the humors and ironies of Beaumarchais and Rossini with a spirit to which they are profoundly alien. If Bartolo were rigged out like a Grand Street pawnbroker, Rosina like a trained nurse (Bartolo, you see, being a "doctor" and Rosina living more or less as a "garde-malade" in his "office"), Almaviva like a younger brother of Julien, in "Louise," and Figaro like a compromise between a Palace Theatre comedian and a Terminal Barber Shop hair trimmer—if these things were so, the logic of the enterprise made it imperative that Figaro should run a highly visible hairdressing parlor facing Bartolo's Sevillian residence, its show-window adorned with two brightly bewigged female busts of wax; and also that Bartolo's roofless "medical office," set off against what looked like an architect's geometrical dream of a perpendicular Seville, should sport a white enamel examination chair of the latest clinical model, flanked by glass tables of surgical instruments intended to be poked into the throats and noses of various characters at the height of certain "comic" situations!

For the Italian buffoonery of tradition the arch-modernizers of the Kroll Theatre have substituted a compound of heavy clownishness and nauseous vulgarity that moves on feet of lead. What they truly imagine themselves to be doing by all this ghastly business they are careful not to state. Perhaps they simply wish to be "different" from the conscript fathers, to act the little bulls in the lyric china shop, or to demonstrate that in this blessed generation one can play the fool without inviting thunderbolts from on high. At all events, things of this kind bear sorry witness to the creative condition of the age in the musical life of Germany. It would have been better by far and in every way more consistent had some one thought of inviting Paul Hindemith or Egon Wellesz to rewrite and modernize the venerable score. Then one might have been spared the astounding spectacle of the insensibility of the German public and critics to the shrieking impropriety of style involved. Most German music critics are born lisping the words "Stilreinheit" and "Stilgerechtheit," and their preoccupation with these matters makes them continue even at this stage of the game to prefer Wagner's immature "Dresden version" of "Tannhäuser" to his gorgeous "Paris" one.

* * *

MEANWHILE, for those who may have been cast down by this deplorable experience, there is comfort and compensation of a sort in the announcement of an organization for popular culture called the "Grossberliner Vertrags-Rund," that it will produce on Nov. 23 nothing less than the pre-Rossinian "Barber of Seville," by Paisiello, which Francesco d'Andrade sang in Berlin many, many years ago, but which today is little more that one of the legendary names of musical history.

In producing for the first time in Berlin Borodine's "Prince Igor" (which was brought forward at the house Unter den Linden on the evening of Oct. 11) the heads of the Staatsoper seem to have been largely moved by the desire to give their new ballet master, Rudolf von Laban, the opportunity to get under way in a glory of exotic spectacle. Herr von Laban made the most of his chance, and if the Polovetzian dances effaced no memories of the sainted Diaghileff, they went with a pretty splendid wildness and ingenuity of barbaric abandon, at that. He got far more of a whirlwind bravura into these Tartar and Mongolian frolics than he was able to coax out of the voluptuous frenzies and revels of Wagner's Venusberg at Baireuth this past Summer. He and his dancing crew harvested the principal, indeed, almost the only real enthusiasm. The rest of the evening was largely sad and civil, though the management had put some of its best singers into the undertaking, and Leo Blech, who conducted, held together the weak-jointed structure with such unrelaxing grip that it seemed less diffuse and trailingly episodic than when we heard it at the Metropolitan fifteen years ago.

The concert season opened with a rush of recitals, most of them by Americans and most of them dismal. Outstanding among the singers were Jeanette Vreeland, who squandered a great deal of excellent vocalism on a singularly inept and trivial program; the unique Marguerite D'Alvarez, who seems to have added Berlin to her roster of conquests, and the colored contralto, Marian Anderson, who, by her amazing plenitude of voice and gift of spontaneous expression, celebrated a resounding triumph, and who promises speedily to become one of the popular idols of the German metropolis.

A full-blooded performance of Haydn's "Seasons" by the Bruno Kittle Chorus, under the guidance of Oscar Fried (who celebrated his reentry into Berlin after an absence of years from its concert halls), profited in such episodes as the tremendous storm scene and the gorgeous hunting and drinking choruses by Mr. Fried's familiar weight of hand and breadth of effect, but, by the same token, suffered from them in the more idyllic pages of this incomparable work. Of the soloists, the tenor, Helge Roswaenge, and the baritone, Hermann Schey, commanded unstinted admiration, which is more than can be said of the soprano, a lady of breathy and tremulous voice by name Edith Wolf.

* * *

BUT the hero of the season's opening month has been, first and last, the veteran Karl Muck, who brought his superfine Hamburg Philharmonic Orchestra to the Philharmonie on the evening of Oct. 9 and gave a performance of Bruckner's Seventh symphony so gorgeously unapproachable as almost to persuade one that Bruckner is verily—as the Germans claim him to be—of the race of Beethoven. At threescore and twelve this grayed and Mephistophelian wonder-worker has developed riches of heart and warmth of soul that were not his even in his greatest Boston Symphony days. And the supernal technic and musicianship of the man! What an eternal reproach to the whole rout of poseurs and conjurers that berattle our podiums, in this man's awsome tranquility of manner, his stern economy of gesture, his sometimes almost imperceptible timebeating, the devastating power of a glance or the move of a finger to unchain effects that crush and shatter! They say that poor Bruckner was overwhelmed when, in 1893, he heard Muck introduce this same symphony to Berlin. And small wonder, for by a singular power of divination, Muck approaches the work of this master in a way that sweeps it clean of most of its obvious detail. His treatment of the score this time was of the sort that, with the all-seeing eye of a creative imagination, bridges gaps and weaknesses of structure by an extraordinarily sentient choice of tempi and a general tightening and concentration of the symphonic texture. The most difficult thing about this symphony—success in sustaining a continuity of interest after the second movement—Muck triumphantly accomplished. And he has trained his Hamburg instrumentalists till they play very nearly like the Boston Symphony of old.

* * *

AT this concert Albert Spalding gave the most memorable performance of the Beethoven violin concerto I have ever heard from him. He has spiritualized his reading of this work till a new radiance emanates from it. And as he played the solo part so did Dr. Muck and his Hamburgers glorify the accompaniment.

The first production on Oct. 3 of Othmar Schoeck's operas, "Vom Fischer un syner Fru" and "Don Ranudo," was officially described as a festival specialty in honor of the German music teachers and tone poets now gathered here in solemn congress. No doubt one excuse is as good as another.

I am not aware that this Swiss composer the was born in Brunnen, on the Lake of Lucerne, forty-four years ago) has enjoyed extensive circulation in America, and if I have heard in our concert halls any of his songs, choral writings or chamber music the event has escaped my memory. It is certain, on the other hand, that the American public has not yet been exposed to any of Mr. Schoeck's operas, which today number half a dozen.

"Vom Fischer un syner Fru," the ripest fruit of Mr. Schoeck's labors, is an almost bodily transcript (the text is by Ph. O. Runge) of Grimm's familiar "Low German" nursery tale of the humble fisherman who, as a reward for having thrown back into the sea a flounder caught in his net, receives from the grateful fish a promise that his dearest wishes will be fulfilled, only to end mending nets as a result of insatiable human greed and vanity.

INFORMATION OBSCURED

44

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
STAR

Myra Hess to Be Soloist At Beethoven Festival

FINAL details of the fiftieth anniversary Beethoven Festival which the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, will give at Constitution Hall on Tuesday, Wednesday and Friday evenings and on Saturday afternoon, December 2, 3, 5 and 6, respectively, were completed late in the past week at a conference between Mrs. Wilson-Greene, and W. H. Brennan and George Judd, manager and assistant manager of the Boston Symphony.

These final details included a revision of the program, the addition of a third soloist to the festival in the person of Myra Hess, pianist, and arrangements for the use of a local chorus of 200 singers, with four additional soloists, at the Saturday afternoon presentation of Beethoven's famous "Ninth Symphony."

The revised program as announced yesterday follows:

First program, Tuesday evening, December 2, at 8:15 o'clock: Overture to Goethe's "Egmont," Opus 84; Pianoforte concerto No. 3 in C minor, Opus 37 (Myra Hess, pianist, soloist); Symphony No. 3 in E flat major, "Eroica," Opus 55.

Second program, Wednesday evening, December 2 at 8:15 o'clock: Overture to "Leonore," No. 3, Opus 72; violin concerto in D major, Opus 61 (Efrem Zimbalist, violinist, soloist); Symphony No. 5 in C minor, Opus 67.

Third program, Friday evening, December 5, at 8:15 o'clock: Overture to "Coriolanus," Opus 62; pianoforte concerto No. 4 in G major, Opus 58 (Josef Hofmann, pianist, soloist); Symphony No. 7 in A major, Opus 92.

Fourth program, Saturday afternoon, December 6, at 3 p.m.: Symphony No. 1 in C major, Opus 21; Symphony No. 9 in D minor, with final chorus on Schiller's "Ode to Joy," Opus 125 (chorus of 200, trained by Albert W. Harned; soloists: Jeanette Vreeland, Dan Gridley, Nevada Van Der Veer, Fraser Gange).

This fiftieth anniversary festival of Beethoven's works which the Boston Symphony Orchestra plans to give here at Constitution Hall early next month is in celebration of the fiftieth anniversary of the founding of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, an anniversary which was recently celebrated most elaborately at Symphony Hall in Boston, where Sir George Henschel, 80-year-old conductor, who first conducted the Boston orchestra, made the trip from England to conduct again the same program he gave in Boston 50 years ago.

Conductor Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony management have selected Washington, the Capital of the United States, as a fitting place to stage what amounts to a national celebration of the Boston Symphony's fiftieth birthday.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
POST

DEC 1 1930

AMONG MUSICIANS

By ELISABETH E. POE.

CHOIRS and choirmasters of Washington are busy with preparations for the festal Thanksgiving programs which will feature the celebration of harvest home in many local churches. Many beautiful anthems have been written for this feast day. The custom has grown in recent years of having elaborate Thanksgiving music on the Sunday following that holiday as well as on the day itself.

Close upon the heels of Thanksgiving will come Christmas, when the music portions of Christmas services rival in brilliancy and interest those of Easter. Encouraging conditions are reported from the choirs this fall. There have been very few changes in the personnel of Washington choirs, and practically all the churches consider "music" one of the most important items on the yearly budget.

Music lovers are looking forward with eagerness to the Beethoven festival which the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, will give in Constitution Hall December 2 to 6. The festival will be given under the local management of Mrs. Wilson-Greene. A third soloist has been added to the festival in Myra Hess, pianist, and a local chorus of 200 singers, with four additional soloists, will appear at the afternoon presentation of Beethoven's famous "Ninth Symphony."

The revised program for the festival is as follows:

First program, Tuesday evening, December 2, at 8:15 o'clock: Overture to Goethe's "Egmont," Opus 84; Pianoforte concerto No. 3 in C minor, Opus 37 (Myra Hess, pianist, soloist); Symphony No. 3 in E flat major, "Eroica," Opus 55.

Second program, Wednesday evening, December 3, at 8:15 o'clock: Overture to "Leonore," No. 3, Opus 72; violin concerto in D major, Opus 61 (Efram Zimbalist, violinist, soloist); Symphony No. 5 in C minor, Opus 67.

Third program, Friday evening, December 5, at 8:15 o'clock: Overture to "Coriolanus," Opus 62; pianoforte concerto No. 4 in G major, Opus 58 (Josef Hofmann, pianist, soloist); Symphony No. 7 in A major, Opus 92.

Fourth program, Saturday afternoon, December 6, at 3 p. m.: Symphony No. 1 in C major, Opus 21; Symphony No. 9 in D minor, with final chorus on Schiller's "Ode to Joy," Opus 125 (chorus of 200, trained by Albert W. Harned; soloists, Jeannette Vreeland, Dan Gridley, Nevada Van Der Veer, Fraser Gange).

This fiftieth anniversary festival of Beethoven's works which the Boston Symphony Orchestra plans to give here at Constitution Hall early next month is in celebration of the fiftieth anniversary of the founding of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, an anniversary which was recently celebrated most elaborately at Symphony Hall in Boston, where Sir George Henschel, 80-year-old conductor, who first conducted the Boston orchestra, made the trip from England to conduct again the same program he gave in Boston 50 years ago.

Conductor Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony management have selected Washington, the Capital of the United States, as a fitting place to stage what amounts to a national celebration of the Boston Symphony's fiftieth birthday.

Other members of the cast will be Ivan Steschenko as Raymond, Albert Mahler as Sir Arthur, Rose Bampton as Alice, and Daniel Healy as Norman.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. Herald Tribune

Boston Symphony To Hold Festival In Washington

Will Give Four Beethoven Programs in December, Including 9th Symphony

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, will hold a Beethoven festival in Constitution Hall, Washington, from December 2 to 6. The first program, Tuesday evening, December 2, offers the "Egmont" overture, C minor piano concerto, with Myra Hess as soloist, and "Eroica" symphony. The second concert, Wednesday evening, December 4, has a program of the third "Leonore" overture, violin concerto, with Efrem Zimbalist as soloist, and the fifth symphony. Friday evening offers the "Coriolanus" overture, G major piano concerto, with Josef Hofmann as soloist, and the seventh symphony. The last festival program, Saturday afternoon, December 6, presents the first and ninth symphonies, the latter with a chorus of 200 trained by Albert W. Harned and Jeannette Vreeland, with Nevada Van der Veer and Fraser Gange as soloists.

In Boston, Dr. Koussevitzky will conduct a Bach Festival in the latter part of March.

Concert-Chronicle

Symphonic Saturday Nov 3'30

TO a man and woman, as it seemed at the Symphony Concert of Saturday, the audience knew. To it came Dr. Koussevitzky as both conductor and composer. Taking cue, the orchestra rose in salute before the deed was done. Forthwith the celebrated "Festival Overture"—or should it be "Solemn" on a "Theme from Glinka" was played to hearers no less receptive and applaudive than those of Friday; while the connoisseurs heard the counterpoint in the fugal measures and knew that it was good.

Next the symphony of young Mr. Nabokov to renew and deepen impression. In the first Allegro and the Scherzo-Finale, the rhythms are unmistakably of this modernistic day. Someone said aptly that they could not have been written before the jazz age. Yet there is no jazz in them; only its influence caught out of the air and transfused into symphonic music. Turn to the motivs; put by those that are merely rhythmic—what remain have shape and significance. The romantic feeling that we associate, say with Schumann, conducts them along the way; chooses and colors the harmonic and instrumental vesture. Through the slow movement in particular, we hear nothing less than a "song without words"; by no means tamely Mendelssohnian. Rather, it has clear individual stamp. If it is born, as one informed hearer hinted, out of a whale Russia, then again has Mr. Nabokov transfused it into a musical speech of his own, at moments, as in the solo-measures for violin close to beauty. With reason—to repeat Parisian gossip—Stravinsky may have admired his songs. There is true progress—he says so—when the old impulses and [illegible] occupations of music [illegible] ov-

GERMAN "ZEITGEIST"

A Mutilated "Barber"—Revival of Paisiello —Muck Conducts Greatly

By HERBERT F. PEYSER.

BERLIN, Oct. 12, 1930.

AFTER witnessing the incredible exhibition described on the Platz der Republik as a "Neuinscenierung" of the "Barber of Seville" I can only feel that the artistically minded music lovers of Berlin are to be congratulated on the prospective passing of the Kroll Opera. Small wonder that Intendant Heinz Tietjen, upon attending the dress rehearsal some weeks ago, was so shocked at what his subordinates had put over on him that he sternly compelled an eleventh-hour postponement. A more tasteless, vulgar and wantonly misrepresentative treatment of a masterpiece has rarely been hazarded on a modern stage, and in assuming this impudent privilege the Kroll management has carried to a preposterous climax the scenic and interpretative enormities it has at one time or another practiced on works like "Don Giovanni," "The Tales of Hoffmann" and "The Flying Dutchman."

Taking a leaf out of the book of those who a few seasons ago made of "The Mikado" a "modernized" nightmare and turned "The Beggar's Opera" into the dreadful "Dreigroschenoper," two aggressive young people, by name Arthur Maria Rabenalt and Wilhelm Reinking, have now offered up Rossini's deathless comedy body and soul on the altar of the insatiable "Zeitgeist." Give them the chance and they will probably put Siegfried and Tristan in plus fours and cutaways and invoke the "spirit of the time" for all justification and defense.

* * *

THE details of it would fill a newspaper column. It was not enough, for instance, that the dress of the characters should be as 1930 as possible; all the "Kitsch" and nonsense of Kurfürstendamm cabarets and Friedrichstrasse "Dielen" had to be injected into the proceedings in the witless effort to align the humors and ironies of Beaumarchais and Rossini with a spirit to which they are profoundly alien. If Bartolo were rigged out like a Grand Street pawnbroker, Rosina like a trained nurse, Basilio, you see, being a "doctor" and Rosina living more or less as a "garde-malade" in his "office"!), Almaviva like a younger brother of Jullen, in "Louise," and Figaro like a compromise between a Palace Theatre comedian and a Terminal Barber Shop hair trimmer—if these things were so, the logic of the enterprise made it imperative that Figaro should run a highly visible hairdressing store facing Bartolo's Sevillian residence, its show-window adorned with two brightly bewigged female busts of wax; and also that Bartolo's roofless "medical office," set off against what looked like an architect's geometrical dream of a perpendicular Seville, should sport a white enamel examination chair of the latest clinical model, flanked by glass tables of surgical instruments intended to be poked into the throats and noses of various characters at the height of certain "comic" situations!

For the Italian buffoonery of tradition the arch-modernizers of the Kroll Theatre have substituted a compound of heavy clownishness and nauseous vulgarity that moves on feet of lead. What they truly imagine themselves to be doing by all this ghastly business they are careful not to state. Perhaps they simply wish to be "different" from the conscript fathers, to act the little bulls in the lyric china shop, or to demonstrate that in this blessed generation one can play the fool without inviting thunderbolts from on high. At all events, things of this kind bear sorry witness to the creative condition of the age in the musical life of Germany. It would have been better by far and in every way more consistent had some one thought of inviting Paul Hindemith or Egon Wellesz to rewrite and modernize the venerable score. Then one might have been spared the astounding spectacle of the insensibility of the German public and critics to the shrieking improprieties of style involved. Most German music critics are born lisping the words "Stilreinheit" and "Stilgerechtheit," and their preoccupation with these matters makes them continue even at this stage of the game to prefer Wagner's immature "Dresden version" of "Tannhäuser" to his gorgeous "Paris" one.

* * *

MEANWHILE, for those who may have been cast down by this deplorable experience, there is comfort and compensation of a sort in the announcement of an organization for popular culture called the "Grossberliner Vortrags-Bund," that it will produce on Nov. 23 nothing less than the pre-Rossinian "Barber of Seville," by Paisiello, which Francesco d'Andrade sang in Berlin many, many years ago, but which today is little more than one of the legendary names of musical history.

In producing for the first time in Berlin Borodine's "Prince Igor" (which was brought forward at the house Unter den Linden on the evening of Oct. 11) the heads of the Staatsoper seem to have been largely moved by the desire to give their new ballet master, Rudolf von Laban, the opportunity to get under way in a glory of exotic spectacle. Herr von Laban made the most of his chance, and if the Polovetzian dances effaced no memories of the sainted Diaghileff, they went with a pretty splendid wildness and ingenuity of barbaric abandon, at that. He got far more of a whirlwind bravura into these Tartar and Mongolian frolics than he was able to coax out of the voluptuous frenzies and revels of Wagner's Venusberg at Baireuth this past Summer. He and his dancing crew harvested the principal, indeed, almost the only real enthusiasm. The rest of the evening was largely sad and civil, though the management had put some of its best singers into the undertaking, and Leo Blech, who conducted, held together the weak-jointed structure with such unrelaxing grip that it seemed less diffuse and trailingly episodic than when we heard it at the Metropolitan fifteen years ago.

The concert season opened with a rush of recitals, most of them by Americans and most of them dismal. Outstanding among the singers were Jeanette Vreeland, who squandered a great deal of excellent vocalism on a singularly inept and trivial program; the unique Marguerite D'Alvarez, who seems to have added Berlin to her roster of conquests, and the colored contralto, Marian Anderson, who, by her amazing plenitude of voice and gift of spontaneous expression, celebrated a resounding triumph, and who promises speedily to become one of the popular idols of the German metropolis. A full-blooded performance of Haydn's "Seasons" by the Bruno Kittle Chorus, under the guidance of Oscar Fried (who celebrated his reentry into Berlin after an absence of years from its concert halls), profited in such episodes as the tremendous storm scene and the gorgeous hunting and drinking choruses by Mr. Fried's familiar weight of hand and breadth of effect, but, by the same token, suffered from them in the more idyllic pages of this incomparable work. Of the soloists, the tenor, Helge Roswaenge, and the baritone, Hermann Schey, commanded unstinted admiration, which is more than could be said of the soprano, a lady of breathy and tremulous voice named Edith Wolf.

* * *

BUT the hero of the season's opening month has been, first and last, the veteran Karl Muck, who brought his superfine Hamburg Philharmonic Orchestra to the Philharmonic on the evening of Oct. 9 and gave a performance of Bruckner's Seventh symphony so gorgeously unapproachable as almost to persuade one that Bruckner is verily—as the Germans claim him to be—of the race of Beethoven. At threescore and twelve this grayed and Mephistophelian wonder-worker has developed riches of heart and warmth of soul that were not his even in his greatest Boston Symphony days. And the supernal technic and musicianship of the man! What an eternal reproach to the whole rout of poseurs and conjurers that berattle our podiums, in this man's awsome tranquility of manner, his stern economy of gesture, his sometimes almost imperceptible time-beating, the devastating power of a glance or the move of a finger to unchain effects that crush and shatter! They say that poor Bruckner was overwhelmed when, in 1893, he heard Muck introduce this same symphony to Berlin. And small wonder, for by a singular power of divination, Muck approaches the work of this master in a way that sweeps it clean of most of its obvious defects. His treatment of the score this time was of the sort that, with the all-seeing eye of a creative imagination, bridges gaps and weaknesses of structure by an extraordinarily sentient choice of tempi and a general tightening and concentration of the symphonic texture. The most difficult thing about this symphony—success in sustaining a continuity of interest after the second movement—Muck triumphantly accomplished. And he has trained his Hamburg instrumentalists till they play very nearly like the Boston Symphony of old.

AT this concert Albert Spalding gave the most memorable performance of the Beethoven violin concerto I have ever heard from him. He has spiritualized his reading of this work till a new radiance emanates from it. And as he played the solo part so did Dr. Muck and his Hamburgers glorify the accompaniment.

The first production on Oct. 3 of Othmar Schoeck's operas, "Vom Fischer un syner Fru" and "Don Ranudo," was officially described as a festival specialty in honor of the German music teachers and tone poets now gathered here in solemn congress. No doubt one excuse is as good as another.

I am not aware that this Swiss composer (he was born in Brunnen, on the Lake of Lucerne, forty-four years ago) has enjoyed extensive circulation in America, and if I have heard in our concert halls any of his songs, choral writings or chamber music the event has escaped my memory. It is certain, on the other hand, that the American public has not yet been exposed to any of Mr. Schoeck's operas, which today number half a dozen.

"Vom Fischer un syner Fru," the ripest fruit of Mr. Schoeck's labors, is an almost bodily transcript (the text is by Ph. O. Runge) of Grimm's familiar "Low German" nursery tale of the humble fisherman who, as a reward for having thrown back into the sea a flounder caught in his net, receives from the grateful fish a promise that his dearest wishes will be fulfilled, only to end mending nets as a result of insatiable human greed and vanity.

REDUCTION RATIO 14x

PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

200 mm

150 mm

100 mm

A3

A4

A5

1.0 mm

1.5 mm

2.0 mm

2.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century

A&P

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

44

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
STAR

Myra Hess to Be Soloist At Beethoven Festival

FINAL details of the fiftieth anniversary Beethoven Festival which the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, will give at Constitution Hall on Tuesday, Wednesday and Friday evenings and on Saturday afternoon, December 2, 3, 5 and 6, respectively, were completed late in the past week at a conference between Mrs. Wilson-Greene, and W. H. Brennan and George Judd, manager and assistant manager of the Boston Symphony.

Those final details included a revision of the program, the addition of a third soloist to the festival in the person of Myra Hess, pianist, and arrangements for the use of a local chorus of 200 singers, with four additional soloists, at the Saturday afternoon presentation of Beethoven's famous "Ninth Symphony."

The revised program as announced yesterday follows:

First program, Tuesday evening, December 2, at 8:15 o'clock: Overture to Goethe's "Egmont," Opus 84; Pianoforte concerto No. 3 in C minor, Opus 37 (Myra Hess, pianist, soloist); Symphony No. 3 in E flat major, "Eroica," Opus 55.

Second program, Wednesday evening, December 3 at 8:15 o'clock: Overture to "Leonore," No. 3, Opus 72; violin concerto in D major, Opus 61 (Efrem Zimbalist, violinist, soloist); Symphony No. 5 in C minor, Opus 67.

Third program, Friday evening, December 5, at 8:15 o'clock: Overture to "Coriolanus," Opus 62; pianoforte concerto No. 4 in G major, Opus 58 (Josef Hofmann, pianist, soloist); Symphony No. 7 in A major, Opus 92.

Fourth program, Saturday afternoon, December 6, at 3 p.m.: Symphony No. 1 in C major, Opus 21; Symphony No. 9 in D minor, with final chorus on Schiller's "Ode to Joy," Opus 125 (chorus of 200, trained by Albert W. Harned; soloists: Jeanette Vreeland, Dan Gridley, Nevada Van Der Veer, Fraser Gange).

This fiftieth anniversary festival of Beethoven's works which the Boston Symphony Orchestra plans to give here at Constitution Hall early next month is in celebration of the fiftieth anniversary of the founding of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, an anniversary which was recently celebrated at Symphony Hall in Boston, where Sir George Henschel, 80-year-old conductor, who first conducted the Boston orchestra, made the trip from England to conduct again the same program he gave in Boston 50 years ago.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
POST
NOV 2 1930

AMONG MUSICIANS

By ELISABETH E. POE.

CHOIRS and choirmasters of Washington are busy with preparations for the festal Thanksgiving programs which will feature the celebration of harvest home in many local churches. Many beautiful anthems have been written for this feast day. The custom has grown in recent years of having elaborate Thanksgiving music on the Sunday following that holiday as well as on the day itself.

Close upon the heels of Thanksgiving will come Christmas, when the music portions of Christmas services rival in brilliancy and interest those of Easter. Encouraging conditions are reported from the choirs this fall. There have been very few changes in the personnel of Washington choirs, and practically all the churches consider "music" one of the most important items on the yearly budget.

Music lovers here are looking forward with eagerness to the Beethoven festival which the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, will give in Constitution Hall December 2 to 6. The festival will be given under the local management of Mrs. Wilson-Greene. A third soloist has been added to the festival in Myra Hess, pianist, and a local chorus of 200 singers, with four additional soloists, will appear at the afternoon presentation of Beethoven's famous "Ninth Symphony."

The revised program for the festival is as follows:

First program, Tuesday evening, December 2, at 8:15 o'clock: Overture to Goethe's "Egmont," Opus 84; Pianoforte concerto No. 3 in C minor, Opus 37 (Myra Hess, pianist, soloist); Symphony No. 3 in E flat major, "Eroica," Opus 55.

Second program, Wednesday evening, December 3, at 8:15 o'clock: Overture to "Leonore," No. 3, Opus 72; violin concerto in D major, Opus 61 (Efram Zimbalist, violinist, soloist); Symphony No. 5 in C minor, Opus 67.

Third program, Friday evening, December 5, at 8:15 o'clock: Overture to "Coriolanus," Opus 62; pianoforte concerto No. 4 in G major, Opus 58 (Josef Hofmann, pianist, soloist); Symphony No. 7 in A major, Opus 92.

Fourth program, Saturday afternoon, December 6, at 3 p. m.: Symphony No. 1 in C major, Opus 21; Symphony No. 9 in D minor, with final chorus on Schiller's "Ode to Joy," Opus 125 (chorus of 200, trained by Albert W. Harned; soloists, Jeannette Vreeland, Dan Gridley, Nevada Van Der Veer, Fraser Gange).

This fiftieth anniversary festival of Beethoven's works which the Boston Symphony Orchestra plans to give here at Constitution Hall early next month is in celebration of the fiftieth anniversary of the founding of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, an anniversary which was recently celebrated most elaborately at Symphony Hall in Boston, where Sir George Henschel, 80-year-old conductor, who first conducted the Boston orchestra, made the trip from England to conduct again the same program he gave in Boston 50 years ago.

Conductor Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony management have selected Washington, the Capital of the United States, as a fitting place to stage what amounts to a national celebration of the Boston Symphony's fiftieth birthday.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. Herald Tribune

Boston Symphony To Hold Festival In Washington

Will Give Four Beethoven Programs in December, Including 9th Symphony

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, will hold a Beethoven festival in Constitution Hall, Washington, from December 2 to 6. The first program, Tuesday evening, December 2, offers the "Egmont" overture, C minor piano concerto, with Myra Hess as soloist, and "Eroica" symphony. The second concert, Wednesday evening, December 4, has a program of the third "Leonore" overture, violin concerto, with Efrem Zimbalist as soloist, and the fifth symphony. Friday evening offers the "Coriolanus" overture, G major piano concerto, with Josef Hofmann as soloist, and the seventh symphony. The last festival program, Saturday afternoon, December 6, presents the first and ninth symphonies, the latter with a chorus of 200 trained by Albert W. Harned and Jeannette Vreeland, with Nevada Van der Veer and Fraser Gange as soloists.

In Boston, Dr. Koussevitzky will conduct a Bach Festival in the latter part of March.

will be the Sir Henry Ashton. Other members of the cast will be Ivan Steschenko as Raymond, Albert Mahler as Sir Arthur, Rose Bampton as Alice, and Daniel Healy as Norman.

Concert-Chronicle

Symphonic Saturday Nov 3'30

TO a man and woman, as it seemed at the Symphony Concert of Saturday, the audience knew. To it came Dr. Koussevitzky as both conductor and composer. Taking cue, the orchestra rose in salute before the deed was done. Forthwith the celebrated "Festival Overture"—or should it be "Solemn"—on a "Theme from Glinka" was played to hearers no less receptive and applausive than those of Friday; while the connoisseurs heard the counterpoint in the fugal measures and knew that it was good.

Next the symphony of young Mr. Nabokov to renew and deepen impression. In the first Allegro and the Scherzo-Finale, the rhythms are unmistakably of this modernistic day. Someone said aptly that they could not have been written before the jazz age. Yet there is no jazz in them; only its influence caught out of the air and transfused into symphonic music. Turn to the motivs; put by those that are merely rhythmic; what remain have shape and significance. The romantic feeling that we associate, say with Schumann, conducts them along the way; chooses and colors the harmonic and instrumental vesture. Through the slow movement in particular, we hear nothing less than a "song without words"; by no means tamely Mendelssohnian. Rather, it has clear individual stamp. If it is born, as one informed hearer hinted, out of archaic Russia, then again has Mr. Nabokov transfused it into a musical speech of his own, at moments, as in the solo-measures for violin [illegible] reason—sky may is true the old f music kov, un- ge

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TIMES
NOV 2 1930

GERMAN "ZEITGEIST"

A Mutilated "Barber"—Revival of Paisiello —Muck Conducts Greatly

By HERBERT F. PEYSER.

BERLIN, Oct. 12, 1930.

AFTER witnessing the incredible exhibition described on the Platz der Republik as a "Neuinscenierung" of the "Barber of Seville" I can only feel that the artistically minded music lovers of Berlin are to be congratulated on the prospective passing of the Kroll Opera. Small wonder that Intendant Heinz Tietjen, upon attending the dress rehearsal some weeks ago, was so shocked at what his subordinates had put over on him that he sternly compelled an eleventh-hour postponement. A more tasteless, vulgar and wantonly misrepresentative treatment of a masterpiece has rarely been hazarded on a modern stage, and in assuming this impudent privilege the Kroll management has carried to a preposterous climax the scenic and interpretative enormities it has at one time or another practiced on works like "Don Giovanni," "The Tales of Hoffmann" and "The Flying Dutchman."

Taking a leaf out of the book of those who a few seasons ago made of "The Mikado" a "modernized" nightmare and turned "The Beggar's Opera" into the dreadful "Dreigroschenoper," two aggressive young people, by name Arthur Maria Rabenalt and Wilhelm Reinking, have now offered up Rossini's deathless comedy body and soul on the altar of the insatiable "Zeitgeist." Give them the chance and they will probably put Siegfried and Tristan in plus fours and cutaways and invoke the "spirit of the time" for all justification and defense.

* * *

THE details of it would fill a newspaper column. It was not enough, for instance, that the dress of the characters should be as 1930 as possible; all the "Kitsch" and nonsense of Kurfürstendamm cabarets and Friedrichstrasse "Dielen" had to be injected into the proceedings in the witless effort to align the humors and ironies of Beaumarchais and Rossini with a spirit to which they are profoundly alien. If Bartolo were rigged out like a Grand Street pawnbroker, Rosina like a trained nurse (Bartolo, you see, being a "doctor" and Rosina living more or less as a "garde-malade" in his "office"!), Almaviva like a younger brother of Julien, in "Louise," and Figaro like a compromise between a Palace Theatre comedian and a Terminal Barber Shop hair trimmer—if these things were so, the logic of the enterprise made it imperative that Figaro should run a highly visible hairdressing parlor facing Bartolo's Sevillian residence, its show-window adorned with two brightly bewigged female busts of wax; and also that Bartolo's roofless "medical office," set off against what looked like an architect's geometrical dream of a perpendicular Seville, should sport a white enamel examination chair of the latest clinical model, flanked by glass tables of surgical instruments intended to be poked into the throats and noses of various characters at the height of certain "comic" situations!

For the Italian buffoonery of tradition the arch-modernizers of the Kroll Theatre have substituted a compound of heavy clownishness and nauseous vulgarity that moves on feet of lead. What they truly imagine themselves to be doing by all this ghastly business they are careful not to state. Perhaps they simply wish to be "different" from the conscript fathers, to act the little bulls in the lyric china shop, or to demonstrate that in this blessed generation one can play the fool without inviting thunderbolts from on high. At all events, things of this kind bear sorry witness to the creative condition of the age in the musical life of Germany. It would have been better by far and in every way more consistent had some one thought of inviting Paul Hindemith or Egon Wellesz to rewrite and modernize the venerable score. Then one might have been spared the astounding spectacle of the insensibility of the German public and critics to the shrieking improprieties of style involved. Most German music critics are born lisping the words "Stilreinheit" and "Stilgerechtheit," and their preoccupation with these matters makes them continue even at this stage of the game to prefer Wagner's immature "Dres-far more of a whirlwind bravura into these Tartar and Mongolian frolics than he was able to coax out of the voluptuous frenzies and revels of Wagner's Venusberg at Baireuth this past Summer. He and his dancing crew harvested the principal, indeed, almost the only real enthusiasm. The rest of the evening was largely sad and civil, though the management had put some of its best singers into the undertaking, and Leo Blech, who conducted, held together the weak-jointed structure with such unrelaxing grip that it seemed less diffuse and trailingly episodic than when we heard it at the Metropolitan fifteen years ago.

The concert season opened with a rush of recitals, most of them by Americans and most of them dismal. Outstanding among the singers were Jeanette Vreeland, who squandered a great deal of excellent vocalism on a singularly inept and trivial program; the unique Marguerite D'Alvarez, who seems to have added Berlin to her roster of conquests, and the colored contralto, Marian Anderson, who, by her amazing plenitude of voice and gift of spontaneous expression, celebrated a resounding triumph, and who promises speedily to become one of the popular idols of the German metropolis. A full-blooded performance of Haydn's "Seasons" by the Bruno Kittle Chorus, under the guidance of Oscar Fried (who celebrated his reentry into Berlin after an absence of years from its concert halls), profited in such episodes as the tremendous storm scene and the gorgeous hunting and drinking choruses by Mr. Fried's familiar weight of hand and breadth of effect, but, by the same token, suffered from them in the more idyllic pages of this incomparable work. Of the soloists, the tenor, Helge Roswaenge, and the baritone, Hermann Schey, commanded unstinted admiration, which is more than can be said of the soprano, a lady of breathy and tremulous voice by name Edith Wolf.

* * *

BUT the hero of the season's opening month has been, first and last, the veteran Karl Muck, who brought his superfine Hamburg Philharmonic Orchestra to the Philharmonic on the evening of Oct. 9 and gave a performance of Bruckner's Seventh symphony so gorgeously unapproachable as almost to persuade one that Bruckner is verily—as the Germans claim him to be—of the race of Beethoven. At threescore and twelve this grayed and Mephistophelian wonder-worker has developed riches of heart and warmth of soul that were not his even in his greatest Boston Symphony days. And the supernal technic and musicianship of the man! What an eternal reproach to the whole rout of poseurs and conjurers that berattle our podiums, in this man's awsome tranquillity of manner, his stern economy of gesture, his sometimes almost imperceptible time-beating, the devastating power of a glance or the move of a finger to unchain effects that crush and shatter! They say that poor Bruckner was overwhelmed when, in 1893, he heard Muck introduce this same symphony to Berlin. And small wonder, for by a singular power of divination, Muck approaches the work of this master in a way that sweeps it clean of most of its obvious defects. His treatment of the score this time was of the sort that, with the all-seeing eye of a creative imagination, bridges gaps and weaknesses of structure by an extraordinarily sentient choice of tempi and a general tightening and concentration of the symphonic texture. The most difficult thing about this symphony—success in sustaining a continuity of interest after the second movement—Muck triumphantly accomplished. And he has trained his Hamburg instrumentalists till they play very nearly like the Boston Symphony of old.

AT this concert Albert Spalding gave the most memorable performance of the Beethoven violin concerto I have ever heard from him. He has spiritualized his reading of this work till a new radiance emanates from it. And as he played the solo part so did Dr. Muck and his Hamburgers glorify the accompaniment.

The first production on Oct. 3 of "Eroica," Opus 55.

Second program, Wednesday evening, December 3 at 8:15 o'clock: Overture

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
POST

made the trip from England to conduct again the same program he gave in Boston 50 years ago.

AMONG MUSICIANS

By ELISABETH E. POE.

CHOIRS and choirmasters of Washington are busy with preparations for the festal Thanksgiving programs which will feature the celebration of harvest home in many local churches. Many beautiful anthems have been written for this feast day. The custom has grown in recent years of having elaborate Thanksgiving music on the Sunday following that holiday as well as on the day itself.

Close upon the heels of Thanksgiving will come Christmas, when the music portions of Christmas services rival in brilliancy and interest those of Easter. Encouraging conditions are reported from the choirs this fall. There have been very few changes in the personnel of Washington choirs, and practically all the churches consider "music" one of the most important items on the yearly budget.

Music lovers here are looking forward with eagerness to the Beethoven festival which the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, will give in Constitution Hall December 2 to 6. The festival will be given under the local management of Mrs. Wilson-Greene. A third soloist has been added to the festival in Myra Hess, pianist, and a local chorus of 200 singers, with four additional soloists, will appear at the afternoon presentation of Beethoven's famous "Ninth Symphony."

The revised program for the festival is as follows:

First program, Tuesday evening, December 2, at 8:15 o'clock: Overture to Goethe's "Egmont," Opus 84; Pianoforte concerto No. 3 in C minor, Opus 37 (Myra Hees, pianist, soloist); Symphony No. 3 in E flat major, "Eroica," Opus 55.

Second program, Wednesday evening, December 3, at 8:15 o'clock: Overture to "Leonore," No. 3, Opus 72; violin concerto in D major, Opus 61 (Efram Zimbalist, violinist, soloist); Symphony No. 5 in C minor, Opus 67.

Third program, Friday evening, December 5, at 8:15 o'clock: Overture to "Coriolanus," Opus 62; pianoforte concerto No. 4 in G major, Opus 58 (Josef Hofmann, pianist, soloist); Symphony No. 7 in A major, Opus 92.

Fourth program, Saturday afternoon, December 6, at 3 p. m.: Symphony No. 1 in C major, Opus 21; Symphony No. 9 in D minor, with final chorus on Schiller's "Ode to Joy," Opus 125 (chorus of 200, trained by Albert W. Harned; soloists, Jeannette Vreeland, Dan Gridley, Nevada Van Der Veer, Fraser Gange).

This fiftieth anniversary festival of Beethoven's works which the Boston Symphony Orchestra plans to give here at Constitution Hall early next month is in celebration of the fiftieth anniversary of the founding of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, an anniversary which was recently celebrated most elaborately at Symphony Hall in Boston, where Sir George Henschel, 80-year-old conductor, who first conducted the Boston orchestra, made the trip from England to conduct again the same program he gave in Boston 50 years ago.

Conductor Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony management have selected Washington, the Capital of the United States, as a fitting place to stage what amounts to a national celebration of the Boston Symphony's fiftieth birthday.

will be the Sir Henry Ashton. Other members of the cast will be Ivan Steschenko as Raymond, Albert Mahler as Sir Arthur, Rose Bampton as Alice, and Daniel Healy as Norman.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. Herald Tribune

Boston Symphony To Hold Festival In Washington

Will Give Four Beethoven Programs in December, Including 9th Symphony

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, will hold a Beethoven festival in Constitution Hall, Washington, from December 2 to 6. The first program, Tuesday evening, December 2, offers the "Egmont" overture, C minor piano concerto, with Myra Hess as soloist, and "Eroica" symphony. The second concert, Wednesday evening, December 4, has a program of the third "Leonore" overture, violin concerto, with Efrem Zimbalist as soloist, and the fifth symphony. Friday evening offers the "Coriolanus" overture, G major piano concerto, with Josef Hofmann as soloist, and the seventh symphony. The last festival program, Saturday afternoon, December 6, presents the first and ninth symphonies, the latter with a chorus of 200 trained by Albert W. Harned and Jeannette Vreeland, with Nevada Van der Veer and Fraser Gange as soloists.

In Boston, Dr. Koussevitzky will conduct a Bach Festival in the latter part of March.

own, at moments, as in the solo-measures reason— sky may is true the old f music kov, un- ge

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TIMES

GERMAN "ZEITGEIST"

A Mutilated "Barber"—Revival of Paisiello —Muck Conducts Greatly

By HERBERT F. PEYSER.

BERLIN, Oct. 12, 1930.

AFTER witnessing the incredible exhibition described on the Platz der Republik as a "Neuinscenierung" of the "Barber of Seville" I can only feel that the artistically minded music lovers of Berlin are to be congratulated on the prospective passing of the Kroll Opera. Small wonder that Intendant Heinz Tietjen, upon attending the dress rehearsal some weeks ago, was so shocked at what his subordinates had put over on him that he sternly compelled an eleventh-hour postponement. A more tasteless, vulgar and wantonly misrepresentative treatment of a masterpiece has rarely been hazarded on a modern stage, and in assuming this impudent privilege the Kroll management has carried to a preposterous climax the scenic and interpretative enormities it has at one time or another practiced on works like "Don Giovanni," "The Tales of Hoffmann" and "The Flying Dutchman."

Taking a leaf out of the book of those who a few seasons ago made of "The Mikado" a "modernized" nightmare and turned "The Beggar's Opera" into the dreadful "Dreigroschenoper," two aggressive young people, by name Arthur Maria Rabenalt and Wilhelm Reinking, have now offered up Rossini's deathless comedy body and soul on the altar of the insatiable "Zeitgeist." Give them the chance and they will probably put Siegfried and Tristan in plus fours and cutaways and invoke the "spirit of the time" for all justification and defense.

* * *

THE details of it would fill a newspaper column. It was not enough, for instance, that the dress of the characters should be as 1930 as possible; all the "Kitsch" and nonsense of Kurfürstendamm cabarets and Friedrichstrasse "Dielen" had to be injected into the proceedings in the witless effort to align the humors and ironies of Beaumarchais and Rossini with a spirit to which they are profoundly alien. If Bartolo were rigged out like a Grand Street pawnbroker, Rosina like a trained nurse (Bartolo, you see, being a "doctor" and Rosina living more or less as a "garde-malade" in his "office"!), Almaviva like a younger brother of Julien, in "Louise," and Figaro like a compromise between a Palace Theatre comedian and a Terminal Barber Shop hair trimmer—if these things were so, the logic of the enterprise made it imperative that Figaro should run a highly visible hairdressing parlor facing Bartolo's Sevillian residence, its show-window adorned with two brightly bewigged female busts of wax; and also that Bartolo's roofless "medical office," set off against what looked like an architect's geometrical dream of a perpendicular Seville, should sport a white enamel examination chair of the latest clinical model, flanked by glass tables of surgical instruments intended to be poked into the throats and noses of various characters at the height of certain "comic" situations!

For the Italian buffoonery of tradition the arch-modernizers of the Kroll Theatre have substituted a compound of heavy clownishness and nauseous vulgarity that moves on feet of lead. What they truly imagine themselves to be doing by all this ghastly business they are careful not to state. Perhaps they simply wish to be "different" from the conscript fathers, to act the little bulls in the lyric china shop, or to demonstrate that in this blessed generation one can play the fool without inviting thunderbolts from on high. At all events, things of this kind bear sorry witness to the creative condition of the age in the musical life of Germany. It would have been better by far and in every way more consistent had some one thought of inviting Paul Hindemith or Egon Wellesz to rewrite and modernize the venerable score. Then one might have been spared the astounding spectacle of the insensibility of the German public and critics to the shrieking improprieties of style involved. Most German music critics are born lisping the words "Stilreinheit" and "Stilgerechtheit," and their preoccupation with these matters makes them continue even at this stage of the game to prefer Wagner's immature "Dresden version" of "Tannhäuser" to his gorgeous "Paris" one.

* * *

MEANWHILE, for those who may have been cast down by this deplorable experience, there is comfort and compensation of a sort in the announcement of an organization for popular culture called the "Grossberliner Vortrags-Bund." that it will produce on Nov. 23 nothing less than the pre-Rossinian "Barber of Seville," by Paisiello, which Francesco d'Andrade sang in Berlin many, many years ago, but which today is little more that one of the legendary names of musical history.

In producing for the first time in Berlin Borodine's "Prince Igor" (which was brought forward at the house Unter den Linden on the evening of Oct. 11) the heads of the Staatsoper seem to have been largely moved by the desire to give their new ballet master, Rudolf von Laban, the opportunity to get under way in a glory of exotic spectacle. Herr von Laban made the most of his chance, and if the Polovetzian dances effaced no memories of the sainted Diaghileff, they went with a pretty splendid wildness and ingenuity of barbaric abandon, at that. He got far more of a whirlwind bravura into these Tartar and Mongolian frolics than he was able to coax out of the voluptuous frenzies and revels of Wagner's Venusberg at Baireuth this past Summer. He and his dancing crew harvested the principal, indeed, almost the only real enthusiasm. The rest of the evening was largely sad and civil, though the management had put some of its best singers into the undertaking, and Leo Blech, who conducted, held together the weak-jointed structure with such unrelaxing grip that it seemed less diffuse and trailingly episodic than when we heard it at the Metropolitan fifteen years ago.

The concert season opened with a rush of recitals, most of them by Americans and most of them dismal. Outstanding among the singers were Jeanette Vreeland, who squandered a great deal of excellent vocalism on a singularly inept and trivial program; the unique Marguerite D'Alvarez, who seems to have added Berlin to her roster of conquests, and the colored contralto, Marian Anderson, who, by her amazing plenitude of voice and gift of spontaneous expression, celebrated a resounding triumph, and who promises speedily to become one of the popular idols of the German metropolis. A full-blooded performance of Haydn's "Seasons" by the Bruno Kittle Chorus, under the guidance of Oscar Fried (who celebrated his reentry into Berlin after an absence of years from its concert halls), profited in such episodes as the tremendous storm scene and the gorgeous hunting and drinking choruses by Mr. Fried's familiar weight of hand and breadth of effect, but, by the same token, suffered from them in the more idyllic pages of this incomparable work. Of the soloists, the tenor, Helge Roswaenge, and the baritone, Hermann Schey, commanded unstinted admiration, which is more than can be said of the soprano, a lady of breathy and tremulous voice by name Edith Wolf.

* * *

BUT the hero of the season's opening month has been, first and last, the veteran Karl Muck, who brought his superfine Hamburg Philharmonic Orchestra to the Philharmonic on the evening of Oct. 9 and gave a performance of Bruckner's Seventh symphony so gorgeously unapproachable as almost to persuade one that Bruckner is verily—as the Germans claim him to be—of the race of Beethoven. At threescore and twelve this grayed and Mephistophelian wonder-worker has developed riches of heart and warmth of soul that were not his even in his greatest Boston Symphony days. And the supernal technic and musicianship of the man! What an eternal reproach to the whole rout of poseurs and conjurers that berattle our podiums, in this man's awsome tranquillity of manner, his stern economy of gesture, his sometimes almost imperceptible time-beating, the devastating power of a glance or the move of a finger to unchain effects that crush and shatter! They say that poor Bruckner was overwhelmed when, in 1893, he heard Muck introduce this same symphony to Berlin. And small wonder, for by a singular power of divination, Muck approaches the work of this master in a way that sweeps it clean of most of its obvious defects. His treatment of the score this time was of the sort that, with the all-seeing eye of a creative imagination, bridges gaps and weaknesses of structure by an extraordinarily sentient choice of tempi and a general tightening and concentration of the symphonic texture. The most difficult thing about this symphony—success in sustaining a continuity of interest after the second movement—Muck triumphantly accomplished. And he has trained his Hamburg instrumentalists till they play very nearly like the Boston Symphony of old.

* * *

AT this concert Albert Spalding gave the most memorable performance of the Beethoven violin concerto I have ever heard from him. He has spiritualized his reading of this work till a new radiance emanates from it. And as he played the solo part so did Dr. Muck and his Hamburgers glorify the accompaniment.

The first production on Oct. 3 of Othmar Schoeck's operas, "Vom Fischer un syner Fru" and "Don Ranudo," was officially described as a festival specialty in honor of the German music teachers and tone poets now gathered here in solemn congress. No doubt one excuse is as good as another.

I am not aware that this Swiss composer (he was born in Brunnen, on the Lake of Lucerne, forty-four years ago) has enjoyed extensive circulation in America, and if I have heard in our concert halls any of his songs, choral writings or chamber music the event has escaped my memory. It is certain, on the other hand, that the American public has not yet been exposed to any of Mr. Schoeck's operas, which today number half a dozen.

"Vom Fischer un syner Fru," the ripest fruit of Mr. Schoeck's labors, is an almost bodily transcript (the text is by Ph. O. Runge) of Grimm's familiar "Low German" nursery tale of the humble fisherman who, as a reward for having thrown back into the sea a flounder caught in his net, receives from the grateful fish a promise that his dearest wishes will be fulfilled, only to end mending nets as a result of insatiable human greed and vanity.

45

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
HERALD
NOV

PLAN COMPLETE FOR BEETHOVEN FESTIVAL HERE

Final details of the fiftieth anniversary Beethoven Festival which the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, will give at Constitution Hall on Tuesday, Wednesday and Friday evenings and on Saturday afternoon, December 2, 3, 5 and 6, respectively, were completed last week at a conference between Mrs. Wilson-Greene, who will locally manage the Beethoven Festival, and W. H. Brennan and George Judd, manager and assistant manager, respectively, of the Boston Symphony, at Mrs. Wilson-Greene's offices.

These final details included a revision of the program, the addition of a third soloist to the festival in the person of Myra Hess, pianist, and arrangements for the use of a local chorus of 200 singers with four additional soloists at the Saturday afternoon presentation of Beethoven's famous Ninth Symphony. The revised program as announced yesterday by Mrs. Wilson-Greene, follows:

First program, Tuesday evening, December 2, at 8:15 o'clock: Overture to Goethe's "Egmont." Opus 84; Pianoforte concerto No. 3 in C minor, Opus 37 (Myra Hess, pianist, soloist); Symphony No. 3 in E flat major, "Eroica," Opus 55.

Second program, Wednesday evening, December 3, at 8:15 o'clock: Overture to Leonore, No. 3, Op. 72; violin concerto in D major, Op. 61 (Efrem Zimbalist, violinist, soloist); Symphony No. 5, in C minor, Opus 67.

Third program, Friday evening, December 5, at 8:15 o'clock: Overture to "Coriolanus," Op. 62; pianoforte concerto No. 4 in G major, Op. 58 (Josef Hofmann, pianist, soloist); Symphony No. 7 in A major, Op. 92.

Fourth program, Saturday afternoon, December 8, at 3 p. m.: Symphony No. 1 in C major, Op. 21; Symphony No. 9 in D minor, with final chorus on Schiller's "Ode to Joy," Op. 125 (Chorus of 200, trained by Albert W. Harned; soloists, Jeannette Vreeland, Dan Gridley, Nevada Van Der Veer, Fraser Gange).

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TRENTON, N. J.
TIMES

Boston Symphony in Beethoven Festival

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, will hold a Beethoven festival in Constitution Hall, Washington, from December 2 to 6. The first program, Tuesday evening, December 2, offers the "Egmont" overture, C minor piano concerto, with Myra Hess as soloist, and "Eroica" symphony. The second concert, Wednesday evening, December 4, has a program of the third "Leonore" overture, violin concerto, with Efrem Zimbalist as soloist, and the fifth symphony. Friday evening offers the "Coriolanus" overture, G. major piano concerto, with Josef Hofmann as soloist, and the seventh symphony. The last festival program, Saturday afternoon, December 6, presents the first and ninth symphonies, the latter with a chorus of 200 trained by Albert W. Harned and Jeannete Vreeland, with Nevada Van der Veer and Fraser Gange as

THIS CLIPPING FROM
LAWRENCE, MASS.
TRIBUNE
NOV 5 - 1930

* * * * * *

Sergei Alexandrovitch Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, whose disregard when on foot for traffic lights was given national prominence recently in a sketch appearing in the magazine Time, has brought down on himself the wrath of safety experts who see in this habit not only a personal menace, but a dangerous example to other less distinguished pedestrians. The famous musician, according to the article, paying no attention to traffic signals, strides across the busiest streets, stopping the onrush of automobiles with much the same gesture that he uses to get a pianissimo from his bandsmen. The governor's committee on street and highway safety points out that more than 400 pedestrians are killed by automobiles in Massachusetts each year and that pedestrians comprise more than half of all motor victims in the state.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
LOWELL, MASS.
COURIER-CITIZEN
NOV 5 1930
(1)

SOUTHBRIDGE, MASS.
NEWS
NOV 6 - 1930

MUSIC CONDUCTOR
CE

MOMENTS MUSICAL

By SIDNEY R. FLEET

To Whom Announcements and Communications on Musical Matters May Be Addressed at This Office.

ON THE CALENDAR

Nov. 14—Claire Dux, Memorial Auditorium, 8 p. m.

Nov. 15—Compinsky Trio, Rogers Hall, 8 p. m.

Nothing but favorable comments have reached us upon the concert by the United States Army Band in the Parker Lecture Course last Sunday afternoon. While the program was designed for a general audience, it included distinctive music by Latin-American composers that were interesting musically and pleasant to hear. And it was the more enjoyable for those who are at all sensitive because the conductor so evidently realized the difference between playing in a fine concert hall and the presentation of a program out of doors. The band had good reason to be gratified at the interest shown in its appearance and performance and the attention it gave to the program.

The only other musical program in the Parker Course will be the song recital on Friday evening, Nov. 14, by Mme. Claire Dux, formerly of the Chicago Civic Opera. In Lowell by this time she does not need the services of a press agent. One of the most notable of her more recent engagements was at the music festival at Ann Arbor, Mich., where her singing was warmly praised.

Fortunately, as has already been announced, it has been possible through the co-operation of the Boston management, for Miss Parsons to arrange for the appearance of the Compinsky Trio at Rogers Hall on Saturday evening, Nov. 15 instead of on the previous evening, thus avoiding any conflict with the recital by Claire Dux in the Memorial Auditorium. This was feasible as the trio is playing in Boston on the following Sunday. Owing to the fact that Mr. Koussevitzky desires his services with the Boston Symphony orchestra, it has also been found necessary to change the date for the program of pianoforte music to be given by Mr. Sanroma at Rogers Hall from Feb. 6 to Feb. 13.

Oscar Paquet, baritone from Quebec, who is to give a series of five concerts in New England, will come to Lowell to open his tour with a return engagement in St. Joseph's hall on Nov. 11. On his last appearance here he revealed a rich and powerful voice. He sings both classical songs and folk-songs and some of the latter, sung in appropriate costume in the Marchand fashion, will be included in his program here. Mrs. Edith H. Pepin will be assisting artist and Rodolphe E. Pepin will be at the piano.

Mr. Paquet's selections will include songs by Doret, Georges, Lemaire, Widor, Salvator Rosa, Godard, Litaurneau, Missa and others. For Mrs. Pepin's share of the program will be songs by Massenet, Franck, Staub and Fourdrain. Mr. Pepin will give pianoforte compositions by Schubert, Chopin and Grainger.

Boston Programs.

As finally revised the programs for the regular concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra this week Friday and Saturday will include the Concerto Grosso for strings, in B minor, No. 12, Handel; Metamorphoseon (theme and 12 variations), Respighi; Symphony, No. 2, Brahms. The Mozart Concerto for flute will be given later on.

As has been conjectured the anonymous composer of the Festival Overture, written for the Symphony orchestra and played at the concerts last week, turned out to be from the hand of Mr. Koussevitzky himself, who based it on a hymn theme from "A Life for the Czar." The theme was proclaimed by the organ, there were contrasting passages in gentle mood and an upswelling climax that by all report was more than ordinarily effective.

national prominence recently in a sketch appearing in the magazine Time, has brought down on himself the wrath of safety experts who see in this habit not only a personal menace, but a dangerous example to other less distinguished pedestrians. The famous musician, according to the article, paying no attention to traffic signals, strides across the busines streets stopping the onrush of automobiles with much the same gesture that he uses to get a pianissimo from his bandsmen.

Koussekitsky has indeed been fortunate to escape injury or death thus far, according to the governor's committee on street and highway safety, which points out that more than 500 pedestrians are killed by automobiles in Massachusetts each year and that pedestrians comprise more than half of all motor victims in the state. If careful pedestrians are mowed down by automobiles, the pedestrian who defies traffic must lead a charmed life, in the opinion of the national safety council, which in a communication to the governor's committee ventures to wonder "how Mr. Koussevitsky would look conducting the Angelic Harp Symphony.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE Old Colony Memorial
Plymouth, Mass.
NOV 7 1930
(2)

Symphony Leader Given Traffic Writeup in Time

Sergei Alexandrovitch Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, whose disregard when on foot for traffic lights was given national prominence recently in a sketch appearing in the magazine Time, has brought down on himself the wrath of safety experts who see in this habit not only a personal menace, but a dangerous example to other less distinguished pedestrians. The famous musician, according to the article, paying no attention to traffic signals, strides across the busiest streets, stopping the onrush of automobiles with much the same gesture that he uses to get a pianissimo from his bandsmen.

Koussevitsky has indeed been fortunate to escape injury or death thus far, according to the governor's committee on street and highway safety, which points out that more than 400 pedestrians are killed by automobiles in Massachusetts each year and that pedestrians comprise more than half of all motor victims in the state. If careful pedestrians are mowed down by automobiles, the pedestrian who defies traffic must lead a charmed life, in the opinion of the national safety council, which in a communication to the governor's committee ventures to wonder "how Mr. Koussevitsky would look conducting the Angelic Harp Symphony."

THIS CLIPPING FROM NORTHAMPTON, MASS.
GAZETTE
NOV 7 1930

HOW TO JOIN THE 400

Serge Alexandrovitch Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, has brought down on himself the wrath of safety experts by his disregard when on foot for traffic lights. The famous musician is said to pay no attention to traffic signals, but strides across the busiest streets whenever he wishes to, stopping the onrush of automobiles with much the same gesture he uses to get a pianissimo from his orchestra. The governor's committee sees in his habit not only a personal menace, but a dangerous example to other less distinguished pedestrians. The committee points out that more than 400 pedestrians are killed by autos in this state each year, and that they comprise more than half of all motor victims in Massachusetts.

The National Safety Council also has taken cognizance of the famous conductor's attitude toward autos, and declares the pedestrian who defies traffic must lead a charmed life, when careful people are mowed down by machines nearly every day. The safety council ventures to wonder "how Mr. Koussevitsky would look conducting the Angelic Harp Symphony," implying he may join the

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HANOVER, PA.
SUN

Music

NEWS OF MUSIC WORLD

Final details of the fiftieth anniversary Beethoven Festival which the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, will give at Constitution Hall, Washington, on Tuesday, Wednesday and Friday evenings and on Saturday afternoon, December 2, 3, 5 and 6, respectively, were completed last week at a conference between Mrs. Wilson-Greene, and W. H. Brennan and George Judd, manager and assistant manager of the Boston Symphony.

The programs follows:

Tuesday evening, December 2, at 8:15 o'clock: Overture to Goethe's "Egmont," Pianoforte concerto No. 3 in C minor, (Myra Hess, pianist, soloist); Symphony No. 3 in E flat major, "Eroica."

Wednesday evening, December 3 at 8:15 o'clock: Overture to "Leonore," No. 3, violin concerto in D major, (Efrem Zimbalist, violinist, soloist); Symphony No. 5 in C minor, Opus 67.

Friday evening, December 5, at 8:15 o'clock: Overture to "Coriolanus," pianoforte concerto No. 4 in G major, (Josef Hofmann, pianist, soloist); Symphony No. 7 in A major.

Saturday afternoon, December 6, at 3 p. m.: Symphony No. 1 in C major; Symphony No. 9 in D minor, with final chorus on Schiller's "Ode to Joy," (chorus of 200, trained by Albert W. Harned; soloists: Jeanette Vreeland, Dan Gridley, Nevada Van Der Veer, Fraser Gange).

* * *

The German Grand Opera Com-

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TELEGRAM

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is to open the New York series of its fiftieth season in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, November 20, and Saturday afternoon, November 22. Serge Koussevitzky will then introduce the new symphony of Albert Roussel, which is one of the numerous scores especially composed for the orchestra's anniversary.

The composer, visiting America for the first time, was present when Dr. Koussevitzky gave this score its initial performance in Boston last month.

Another new score to be introduced to New York will be the "Symphonie Lyrique," by Nicolas Nabokov. This symphony has had a considerable success in Europe and more recently in Boston.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
PAWTUCKET, R. I.
TIMES
NOV 8 1930
(1)

Boston Symphony

The Boston Symphony orchestra is shortly to open its season of Providence concerts in the Albee Theatre, the first of which will take place on Tuesday evening, Nov 18. This series will be a part of the 50th jubilee season of the great orchestra, which has numerous special features of interest, and in the high state of perfection which the orchestra has reached may well prove the most notable in its illustrious history.

The semi-centennial year began with the original programme of 1881, conducted again by Sir George Henschel, who was the orchestra's first leader. Other features of the anniversary season are a Beethoven festival of national import to be given in Washington, D. C., through the first week of December; a Bach festival in Boston, to be given next spring in memory of Henry L. Higginson, the orchestra's founder and sole sustainer for many years, and a number of new scores written especially for the orchestra in its 50th season by the foremost living composers of Europe—Stravinsky, Ravel, Hindemith, Sibe-, Roussel, Copland, Carpenter, Hill and Hanson. Of these, a symphony of Roussel and "Metamorphoseon" of Respighi, have been performed, together with an "anonymous" overture which has since been discovered to have been written by the conductor himself.

THIS CLIPPING FROM PAWTUCKET, R. I.
TIMES
NOV 8 - 1930

Boston Symphony

The Boston Symphony orchestra is shortly to open its season of Providence concerts in the Albee Theatre, the first of which will take place on Tuesday evening, Nov 18. This series will be a part of the 50th jubilee season of the great orchestra, which has numerous special features of interest, and in the high state of perfection which the orchestra has reached may well prove the most notable in its illustrious history.

The semi-centennial year began with the original programme of 1881, conducted again by Sir George Henschel, who was the orchestra's first leader. Other features of the anniversary season are a Beethoven festival of national import to be given in Washington, D. C., through the first week of December; a Bach festival in Boston, to be given next spring in memory of Henry L. Higginson, the orchestra's founder and sole sustainer for many years, and a number of new scores written especially for the orchestra in its 50th season by the foremost living composers of Europe—Stravinsky, Ravel, Hindemith, Sibe-, Roussel, Copland, Carpenter, Hill and Hanson. Of these, a symphony of Roussel and "Metamorphoseon" of Respighi, have been performed, together with an "anonymous" overture which has since been discovered to have been written by the conductor himself.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
HERALD

PLAN COMPLETE FOR BEETHOVEN FESTIVAL HERE

Final details of the fiftieth anniversary Beethoven Festival which the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, will give at Constitution Hall on Tuesday, Wednesday and Friday evenings and on Saturday afternoon, December 2, 3, 5 and 6, respectively, were completed last week at a conference between Mrs. Wilson-Greene, who will locally manage the Beethoven Festival, and W. H. Brennan and George Judd, manager and assistant manager, respectively, of the Boston Symphony, at Mrs. Wilson-Greene's offices.

These final details included a revision of the program, the addition of a third soloist to the festival in the person of Myra Hess, pianist, and arrangements for the use of a local chorus of 200 singers with four additional soloists at the Saturday afternoon presentation of Beethoven's famous Ninth Symphony. The revised program as announced yesterday by Mrs. Wilson-Greene, follows:

First program, Tuesday evening, December 2, at 8:15 o'clock: Overture to Goethe's "Egmont," Opus 84; Pianoforte concerto No. 3 in C minor, Opus 37 (Myra Hess, pianist, soloist); Symphony No. 3 in E flat major, "Eroica," Opus 55.

Second program, Wednesday evening, December 3, at 8:15 o'clock: Overture to Leonore, No. 3, Op. 72; violin concerto in D major, Op. 61 (Efrem Zimbalist, violinist, soloist); Symphony No. 5, in C minor, Opus 67.

Third program, Friday evening, December 5, at 8:15 o'clock: Overture to "Coriolanus," Op. 62; pianoforte concerto No. 4 in G major, Op. 58 (Josef Hofmann, pianist, soloist); Symphony No. 7 in A major, Op. 92.

Fourth program, Saturday afternoon, December 8, at 3 p. m.: Symphony No. 1 in C major, Op. 21; Symphony No. 9 in D minor, with final chorus on Schiller's "Ode to Joy," Op. 125 (Chorus of 200, trained by Albert W. Harned; soloists, Jeannette Vreeland, Dan Gridley, Nevada Van Der Veer, Fraser Gange).

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TRENTON, N. J.
TIMES

Boston Symphony in Beethoven Festival

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Dr. Serge Koussevitzki, will hold a Beethoven festival in Constitution Hall, Washington, from December 2 to 6. The first program Tuesday evening, December 2, offers the "Egmont" overture, C minor piano concerto, with Myra Hess as soloist, and "Eroica" symphony. The second concert, Wednesday evening, December 3, has a program consisting of the third "Leonore" overture, violin concerto, with Efrem Zimbalist as soloist, and the fifth symphony. Friday evening offers the "Coriolanus" overture, G major piano concerto, with Josef Hofmann as soloist, and the seventh symphony. The last festival program, Saturday afternoon, December 6, presents the first and ninth symphonies, the latter with a chorus of 200 trained by Albert W. Harned and Jeannette Vreeland, with Nevada Van der Veer and Fraser Gange as soloists.

In Boston, Dr. Koussevitzky will conduct a Bach Festival in the latter part of March.

conductor [illegible]
chestra, whose disregard when on foot for traffic lights was given national prominence recently in a sketch appearing in the magazine Time, has brought down on himself the wrath of safety experts who see in this habit not only a personal menace, but a dangerous example to other less distinguished pedestrians. The famous musician, according to the article, paying no attention to traffic signals, strides across the busiest streets, stopping the onrush of automobiles with much the same gesture that he uses to get a pianissimo from his bandsmen. The governor's committee on street and highway safety points out that more than 400 pedestrians are killed by automobiles in Massachusetts each year and that pedestrians comprise more than half of all motor victims in the state.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
LOWELL, MASS.
COURIER-CITIZEN

NOV 5 1930

(1)

ME. COAST GUARD SEARCHES FOR BOD

Bluehill Bay Dragged for M Alice R. Livingston of Pittsburgh, Who Was Ill.

A

BLUEHILL, Me., Nov. 4 (AP)—Coa

Nov. 15—Compline, [illegible] Hall, 8 p. m.

Nothing but favorable comments have reached us upon the concert by the United States Army Band in the Parker Lecture Course last Sunday afternoon. While the program was designed for a general audience, it included distinctive music by Latin-American composers that were interesting musically and pleasant to hear. And it was the more enjoyable for those who are at all sensitive because the conductor so evidently realized the difference between playing in a fine concert hall and the presentation of a program out of doors. The band had good reason to be gratified at the interest shown in its appearance and performance and the attention it gave to the program.

The only other musical program in the Parker Course will be the song recital on Friday evening, Nov. 14, by Mme. Claire Dux, formerly of the Chicago Civic Opera. In Lowell by this time she does not need the services of a press agent. One of the most notable of her more recent engagements was at the music festival at Ann Arbor, Mich., where her singing was warmly praised.

Fortunately, as has already been announced, it has been possible through the co-operation of the Boston management, for Miss Parsons to arrange for the appearance of the Compinsky Trio at Rogers Hall on Saturday evening, Nov. 15 instead of on the previous evening, thus avoiding any conflict with the recital by Claire Dux in the Memorial Auditorium. This was feasible as the trio is playing in Boston on the following Sunday. Owing to the fact that Mr. Koussevitzky desires his services with the Boston Symphony orchestra, it has also been found necessary to change the date for the program of pianoforte music to be given by Mr. Sanroma at Rogers Hall from Feb. 6 to Feb. 13.

Oscar Paquet, baritone from Quebec, who is to give a series of five concerts in New England, will come to Lowell to open his tour with a return engagement in St. Joseph's hall on Nov. 11. On his last appearance here he revealed a rich and powerful voice. He sings both classical songs and folk-songs and some of the latter, sung in appropriate costume in the Marchand fashion, will be included in his program here. Mrs. Edith H. Pepin will be assisting artist and Rodolphe E. Pepin will be at the piano.

Mr. Paquet's selections will include songs by Doret, Georges, Lemaire, Widor, Salvator Rosa, Godard, Litaurneau, Missa and others. For Mrs. Pepin's share of the program will be songs by Massenet, Franck, Staub and Fourdrain. Mr. Pepin will give pianoforte compositions by Schubert, Chopin and Grainger.

Boston Programs.

As finally revised the programs for the regular concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra this week Friday and Saturday will include the Concerto Grosso for strings, in B minor, No. 12, Handel; Metamorphoseon (theme and 12 variations), Respighi; Symphony, No. 2, Brahms. The Mozart Concerto for flute will be given later on.

As has been conjectured the anonymous composer of the Festival Overture, written for the Symphony orchestra and played at the concerts last week, turned out to be from the hand of Mr. Koussevitzky himself, who based it on a hymn theme from "A Life for the Czar." The theme was proclaimed by the organ, there [illegible] symphony of Albert [illegible]ussel, which is one of the numerous scores especially composed for the orchestra's anniversary.

The composer, visiting America for the first time, was present when Dr. Koussevitzky gave this score its initial performance in Boston last month.

Another new score to be introduced to New York will be the "Symphonie Lyrique," by Nicolas Nabokov. This symphony has had a considerable success in Europe and more recently in Boston.

SOUTHBRIDGE, MASS.
NEWS
NOV 6 - 1930

MUSIC CONDUCTOR A TRAFFIC MENACE

Safety Council Ponders How He Would Look As Head Of Angelic Harp Symphony

BOSTON, Nov. 6—Sergei Alexandrovitch Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, whose disregard when on foot for traffic lights was given national prominence recently in a sketch appearing in the magazine Time, has brought down on himself the wrath of safety experts who see in this habit not only a personal menace, but a dangerous example to other less distinguished pedestrians. The famous musician, according to the article, paying no attention to traffic signals, strides across the busiest streets, stopping the onrush of automobiles with much the same gesture that he uses to get a pianissimo from his bandsmen.

Koussevitsky has indeed been fortunate to escape injury or death thus far, according to the governor's committee on street and highway safety, which points out that more than 400 pedestrians are killed by automobiles in Massachusetts each year and that pedestrians comprise more than half of all motor victims in the state. If careful pedestrians are mowed down by automobiles, the pedestrian who defies traffic must lead a charmed life, in the opinion of the national safety council, which in a communication to the governor's committee ventures to wonder "how Mr. Koussevitsky would look conducting the Angelic Harp Symphony."

THIS CLIPPING FROM NORTHAMPTON, MASS.
GAZETTE
NOV 7 1930

HOW TO JOIN THE 400

Serge Alexandrovitch Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, has brought down on himself the wrath of safety experts by his disregard when on foot for traffic lights. The famous musician is said to pay no attention to traffic signals, but strides across the busiest streets whenever he wishes to, stopping the onrush of automobiles with much the same gesture he uses to get a pianissimo from his orchestra. The governor's committee sees in his habit not only a personal menace, but a dangerous example to other less distinguished pedestrians. The committee points out that more than 400 pedestrians are killed by autos in this state each year, and that they comprise more than half of all motor victims in Massachusetts.

The National Safety Council also has taken cognizance of the famous conductor's attitude toward autos, and declares the pedestrian who defies traffic must lead a charmed life, when careful people are mowed down by machines nearly every day. The safety council ventures to wonder "how Mr. Koussevitsky would look conducting the Angelic Harp Symphony," implying he may join the four hundred—not the socially elite, but the men, women and children killed each year in Massachusetts—before his time.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE Old Colony Memorial
Plymouth Mass.
NOV 7 1930

(2)

45

Symphony Leader Given Traffic Writeup in Time

Sergei Alexandrovitch Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, whose disregard when on foot for traffic lights was given national prominence recently in a sketch appearing in the magazine Time, has brought down on himself the wrath of safety experts who see in this habit not only a personal menace, but a dangerous example to other less distinguished pedestrians. The famous musician, according to the article, paying no attention to traffic signals, strides across the busiest streets, stopping the onrush of automobiles with much the same gesture that he uses to get a pianissimo from his bandsmen.

Koussevitsky has indeed been fortunate to escape injury or death thus far, according to the governor's committee on street and highway safety, which points out that more than 400 pedestrians are killed by automobiles in Massachusetts each year and that pedestrians comprise more than half of all motor victims in the state. If careful pedestrians are mowed down by automobiles, the pedestrian who defies traffic must lead a charmed life, in the opinion of the national safety council, which in a communication to the governor's committee ventures to wonder "how Mr. Koussevitsky would look conducting the Angelic Harp Symphony."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HANOVER, PA.
SUN

Music

NEWS OF MUSIC WORLD

Final details of the fiftieth anniversary Beethoven Festival which the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, will give at Constitution Hall, Washington, on Tuesday, Wednesday and Friday evenings and on Saturday afternoon, December 2, 3, 5 and 6, respectively, were completed last week at a conference between Mrs. Wilson-Greene, and W. H. Brennan and George Judd, manager and assistant manager of the Boston Symphony.

The programs follows:

Tuesday evening, December 2, at 8:15 o'clock: Overture to Goethe's "Egmont," Pianoforte concerto No. 3 in C minor, (Myra Hess, pianist, soloist); Symphony No. 3 in E flat major, "Eroica."

Wednesday evening, December 3 at 8:15 o'clock: Overture to "Leonore," No. 3, violin concerto in D major, (Efrem Zimbalist, violinist, soloist); Symphony No. 5 in C minor, Opus 67.

Friday evening, December 5, at 8:15 o'clock: Overture to "Coriclanus," pianoforte concerto No. 4 in G major, (Josef Hofmann, pianist, soloist); Symphony No. 7 in A major.

Saturday afternoon, December 6, at 3 p. m.: Symphony No. 1 in C major; Symphony No. 9 in D minor, with final chorus on Schiller's "Ode to Joy," (chorus of 200, trained by Albert W. Harned; soloists: Jeanette Vreeland, Dan Gridley, Nevada Van Der Veer, Fraser Gange).

* * *

The German Grand Opera Com-

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
PAWTUCKET, R. I.
TIMES

NOV 8 1930

Boston Symphony

The Boston Symphony orchestra is shortly to open its season of Providence concerts in the Albee Theatre, the first of which will take place on Tuesday evening, Nov 1.8. This series will be a part of the 50th jubilee season of the great orchestra, which has numerous special features of interest, and in the high state of perfection which the orchestra has reached may well prove the most notable in its illustrious history.

The semi-centennial year began with the original programme of 1881, conducted again by Sir George Henschel, who was the orchestra's first leader. Other features of the anniversary season are a Beethoven festival (a national import to be given in Washington, D. C., through the first week of December; a Bach festival in Boston, to be given next spring in memory of Henry L. Higginson, the orchestra's founder and sole sustainer for many years, and a number of new scores written especially for the orchestra in its 50th season by the foremost living composers of Europe—Stravinsky, Ravel, Hindemith, Sibe-, Roussel, Copland, Carpenter, Hill and Hanson. Of these, a symphony of Roussel and "Metamorphoseon" of Respighi, have been performed, together with an "anonymous" overture which has since been discovered to have been written by the conductor himself.

THIS CLIPPING FROM PAWTUCKET, R. I.
TIMES

NOV 8 - 1930

Boston Symphony

The Boston Symphony orchestra is shortly to open its season of Providence concerts in the Albee Theatre, the first of which will take place on Tuesday evening, Nov 1.8. This series will be a part of the 50th jubilee season of the great orchestra, which has numerous special features of interest, and in the high state of perfection which the orchestra has reached may well prove the most notable in its illustrious history.

The semi-centennial year began with the original programme of 1881, conducted again by Sir George Henschel, who was the orchestra's first leader. Other features of the anniversary season are a Beethoven festival (a national import to be given in Washington, D. C., through the first week of December; a Bach festival in Boston, to be given next spring in memory of Henry L. Higginson, the orchestra's founder and sole sustainer for many years, and a number of new scores written especially for the orchestra in its 50th season by the foremost living composers of Europe—Stravinsky, Ravel, Hindemith, Sibe-, Roussel, Copland, Carpenter, Hill and Hanson. Of these, a symphony of Roussel and "Metamorphoseon" of Respighi, have been performed, together with an "anonymous" overture which has since been discovered to have been written by the conductor himself.

4-6

THIS CLIPPING FROM RICHMOND, VA.
TIMES DISPATCH

Great Festival Of Beethoven's Music Planned

Boston Symphony Orchestra Will Appear at the Mosque in Artist Series

As the most notable event of its fiftieth anniversary season, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, one of the greatest in the world, is to give a festival of Beethoven's music in Constitution Hall, Washington. The concerts will take place on the evenings of Tuesday, December 2; Wednesday, December 3; Friday, December 5, and Saturday afternoon, December 6. The Boston Symphony will appear at the Mosque here in the artist series.

In the centennial year of Beethoven's death (1927), no orchestra in the world equalled in completeness and grandeur the Beethoven Festival in its own city. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, the illustrious conductor of this orchestra, has since been ambitious to repeat the Beethoven Festival in the capital of the nation. Only in this, the semicentennial year of the orchestra, has it became possible.

Epic Symphonies.

The most epic of the symphonies, the most famous overtures and concertos in which great virtuosos will match their talents with the orchestra, combine to make this festival greater than anything this part of the country has heard. Appropriately given in the capital city, it acquires a special national significance.

The programmes of the festival will be as follows: December 2—"Egmont" overture, third piano concerto, with Myra Hess as soloist, "Erocia" symphony; December 3—third "Leonore" overture, violin concentro, with Efrem Zimbalist as soloist, fifth symphony; December 5—"Coriolanus" overture, fourth pianoforte concerto, with Josef Hofmann as soloist, seventh symphony; December 5—first and ninth symphonies, Beethoven's mighty symphony, in which a great chorus combines with the orchestra singing Schiller's "Ode to Joy," makes a fitting culmination for the festival. The vocal quartet in this choral symphony will comprise: Jeannette Vreeland, Dan Gridley, Nevada Van Der Veer, Fraser Gange.

Jubilee Season.

The jubilee season of this great orchestra is proving one of the most significant in its illustrious fifty years. The season was opened October 10 by Sir George Henschel who led the same program with which he launched the orchestra, as its first conductor in 1881. A number of new scores written especially for the occasion by the foremost living composers are being performed in the course of the season. The Boston Symphony Orchestra was the creation of the late Henry L. Higginson who expended thirty-seven years of his life and the bulk of his fortune in making this the first orchestra in the world. Such conductors as Wilhelm Gericke, Arthur Nikisch, and Karl Muck brought this orchestra to its traditional state of perfection. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, who has been the conductor since 1924, has brought new beauties to the Boston Symphony concerts, a fresh importance and distinction reflected in the enlarged public, the festivals and special choral concerts, the broadened repertory—new and old—of the regular concerts, and the qualities of performance which are as indefinable as the genius which directs them.

The festival is under the local direction of Mrs. Kate Wilson-Greene, 1300 G Street, Washington.

THIS CLIPPING FROM ERIE, PA.
DISPATCH HERALD

NOV 4 - 1930

The Boston Symphony orchestra with Dr. Serge Koussevitzky conducting, will give a Beethoven Festival in Washington in Constitution Hall from December 2 to 6. The soloists will be Myra Hess, Efrem Zimbalist and Josef Hoffman. At the fourth and last concert the Ninth Symphony will be given with chorus and soloists. In Boston Dr. Koussevitzky will conduct a Bach Festival in March.

* * *

N. Y. Herald Tribune

NOV 9 - 1930

In Boston Dr. Serge Koussevitzky is continuing the introduction of the various new works composed for the fiftieth anniversary celebration of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The Symphony Hall programs of October 31 and November 1 began with an overture composed for this occasion by a musician who withheld his name, although it was revealed that the first theme was taken from Glinka's opera "A Life for the Tsar."

When the orchestra, however, applauded Dr. Koussevitzky after the performance of this work it was revealed that the composer was the conductor himself. Mr. H. T. Parker pointed out in "The Boston Evening Transcript" some indications in the music which pointed to its authorship: "Admittedly a Russian had written the overture—for precisely the number of instruments constituting the orchestra in exactly the groups into which it is divided. More, he had used as second theme a motive next of kin to one in a concerto for double bass, not unknown at Symphony Hall."

The other novelty on the program was a symphony by Nicolas Nabokov, a Russian composer who was born in Leningrad in 1903 and now lives in Paris. "The listener," wrote Mr. Parker, "begins to suspect a young composer with a personal will, inventing his own matter, choosing his own manner. . . . Believably, Mr. Nabokov has a future."

For its first New York concerts of the season, Thursday evening, November 20, and Saturday afternoon, November 22, in Carnegie Hall, Mr. Koussevitzky will introduce here the Nabokov symphony and the symphony in G minor by Albert Roussel, which was composed especially for this orchestra's anniversary, and was first played on October 24 in Boston with the composer present.

THIS CLIPPING FROM DENVER, COLO.
POST

* * *

Sir George Henschel, first conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, was brought back from London to conduct the orchestra's fiftieth anniversary concert on Oct. 10. When Henschel, then a young and aggressive musician, first went to Boston he was consistently "panned" by the city's music critics of that day. Gradually he overcame their prejudice and when he resigned to return to Europe, a few years later, he was as highly praised as he had formerly been condemned. On the occasion of his return last month, he was given a rousing reception. In his early days, Henschel was renowned for his versatility. He was a concert pianist, singer, composer and orchestra leader. I recall joint recitals by himself and his wife, a soprano, when the black-bearded Henschel would sit at the piano, play accompaniments and, in duets with his wife, and solos, sing resonantly and well—always out of one side of his mouth!

THIS CLIPPING FROM BALTIMORE, MD.
SUN

Boston Orchestra Jubilee Program

Beethoven Festival Planned For Affair In Washington Next Month

The programs for the fiftieth jubilee celebration of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Washington next month, which will take the form of a Beethoven festival, will be as follows:

December 2, Egmont Overture, Third Piano Concerto with Myra Hess as soloist, Eroica Symphony; December 3, Third Leonore Overture, Violin Concerto with Efrem Zimbalist as soloist, and Fifth Symphony; December 5, Coriolanus Overture, Fourth Pianoforte Concerto with Josef Hofmann as soloist, Seventh Symphony; December 6, First and Ninth Symphonies. Beethoven's mighty symphony, in which a great chorus combines with the orchestra singing Schiller's Ode to Joy, makes a fitting culmination for the festival. The vocal quartet will comprise Jeannette Vreeland, Dan Gridley, Nevada Van Der Veer and Fraser Gange.

THIS CLIPPING FROM HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT

The Observation Post

By Walter Brown, Dramatic Editor

Dr. Kous Anonymitzky.

The music-lovers who ten days ago attended a Friday afternoon concert in Symphony Hall, Boston, found themselves confronted by a program number most unusual. For the composer of the first piece to be played was listed as "Anonymous," the name preceding the single word "Overture"—and in the memory of the oldest inhabitant this hadn't happened. And as a matter of fact it didn't stay happened very long on that Friday afternoon.

A brief description of the work had been given out in advance. It was by one who seldom composes; the chief theme is taken from Glinka's opera "A Life for the Tsar" because this, "one of the most solemn and glorifying themes existing in musical literature," responded to the composer's idea of a stately overture for the orchestra's jubilee; that the second theme is original.

And this is the way Philip Hale sizes up the new work in his review of the concert in the Transcript:

"The overture, for the most part following conventional form, begins with the chief theme announced by the organ. This theme is worked with ever increasing intensity. The second theme, one of a sentimental nature, is slightly developed. A figure of an exciting nature takes the place of the repetition section and rushes into a long, sonorous coda in which the first theme is used for the apotheosis."

✣ ✣ ✣

The overture proved most pleasing to the audience and there was enthusiastic applause—which was augmented after Dr. Koussevitzky summoned the members of the orchestra to rise, by the applause of said members of the orchestra. Which naturally could mean only one thing about the identity of the composer. And Dr. Koussevitzky took a bow as composer as well as conductor of the "Anonymous" overture.

✣ ✣ ✣

It is not in my knowledge that Serge Koussevitzky's name has previously been known as a composer's, though it is more than probable that in his early career as double-bass virtuoso he may have used some of his own compositions for that huge instrument—which, I am told at first hand, Dr. Koussevitzky is able to make sing with the sweetness of the 'cello as well as roar in its own proper power.

I do not take the slightest stock in the gossipy Time's assertion that the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is unable to read orchestra scores and has to employ a pianist to "teach" them to him, though I bow to the thought of the pianist's skill inherent in him who could really "teach" an orchestral score from any piano arrangement. And somehow I am even more inclined to doubt the Time tale now that Dr. Koussevitzky has seen fit to emerge, in some measure, as a composer for orchestra. For it doesn't seem at all likely that he would descend from his high place as a conductor to become a mere sketcher of theme for someone else to orchestrate as so many of the alleged "composers" of the so-called popular music are.

✣ ✣ ✣

I have heard directly from players in the orchestra, that Dr. Koussevitzky never comes to the orchestra with new music with which he does not seem entirely familiar, and certain of the effects he wishes attained. He is not a conductor who makes his musicians teach him his scores, certainly—though many orchestra men aver that that trait is a not uncommon one on the part of conductors.

✣ ✣ ✣

The new overture that was played to Boston audiences on that Friday or Saturday may, or may not take its place in the regular repertory of the orchestra. If it is played later I presume it may be given under the composer's name rather than as "Anonymous"; and naturally I think audiences will be interested in the work as a composition by a great conductor of a great orchestra. But I think I can see Dr Koussevitzky's reason—or two reasons—for giving it as he did in Boston on the occasion of its first performance. The novelty of an anonymous work was certain to make an appeal to the interest of his typically Boston Symphony audience; it would be listened to with keen attention; its merits would be recognized—and so would its defects if it had them. And he would have one chance, at least, at a reaction on the part of an audience not concerned primarily in considering a Serge Koussevitzky composition but rather a new composition that Serge Koussevitzky was willing to countenance for rendition by his orchestra.

On the whole that Friday concert must have been most interesting. I wish I might have heard it. But then—I'm inclined to wish I might hear all the big orchestral concerts anyway. They're one of my weaknesses!

✣ ✣ ✣

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA TO PLAY HERE TUESDAY

Beethoven's Seventh Symphony will be the feature of the program which the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give on Tuesday evening, one week from tonight, in opening its series of four concerts in this city during the 1930-1931 season. These four concerts, presented under the auspices of the Music Association of Providence, will be held in the Albee Theatre, as in recent years.

Bach and Moussorgsky are other composers on whom the conductor, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, draws for the first Providence concert. The program will open with two Bach preludes in the Pick-Mangiagilla arrangement.

In addition to the Seventh Symphony, in A, by Beethoven, the program will also include Moussorgsky's "Pictures in an Exhibition." The latter, it is believed, has never been played in Providence before as an orchestral work. It was originally written as a series of 10 pianoforte sketches, whose subjects were taken from pictures in a gallery by the celebrated Russian architect, Hartmann, a friend of the composer. Maurice Ravel the Basque modernist, arranged the sketches for symphonic production.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
New York Eve. World

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, will play for the first time in New York this season at Carnegie Hall Thursday evening, and again there Saturday afternoon.

Thursday will be introduced the new symphony Albert Roussel wrote for the Boston organization's fiftieth anniversary, which it is celebrating this year. It was performed last month in Boston. The program will open with Berlioz's "Roman Carnival" and close with the Brahms Second Symphony.

At the Saturday afternoon concert, an all-Russian program will be given and Nicholas Nabokov will be introduced to America through his "Symphonie Lyrique." The other numbers will be Glinka's overture to "Russland and Ludmilla" and Tschaikovsky's Fourth Symphony.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TELEGRAM

Albert Roussel, the French composer, wrote a symphony specially for the recent fiftieth anniversary of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. It will be introduced to New York by the Bostonians next Thursday evening at their Carnegie Hall concert.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. SUN

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is to open the New York series of its fiftieth season in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, November 20, and Saturday afternoon, November 22. Serge Koussevitzky will introduce on Thursday the new symphony of Albert Roussel, which is one of the numerous scores especially composed for the orchestra's anniversary.

Another new score to be introduced to New York on Saturday will be the Symphonie Lyrique by Nicholas Nabokov.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
TIMES

PADEREWSKI TO FEATURE CHOPIN

Announcement is made by Mrs. Wilson-Greene, under whose management Paderewski will play here at Constitution Hall on Wednesday afternoon, November 26, of the program the great Polish virtuoso has selected for this, his first concert locally, but one, since before the world war.

Chopin compositions will dominate the program, a fact that should be of much interest to local music-lovers in view of the accepted tradition that Paderewski remains the foremost interpreter of Chopin, who, like Paderewski, was an intensely patriotic pole.

The program opens with the Bach-Liszt prelude and Fugue in G minor. Beethoven's Sonata in F minor, opus 57, follows, with its movements, Allegro assai, Andante, allegro ma non troppo, Presto, while Schumann's "Carnaval" completes the first part of the program. The rest of the afternoon will be devoted entirely to Chopin—the ballade in F major; the nocturne in C sharp minor, opus 27; two Mazurkas, No. 4, op. 24, and No. 2, op. 59; three etudes, Nos. 8 and 9, op. 10, and No. 12, op. 25; Polonaise, E flat minor, opus 26; valse brilliant, E flat major, op. 18, and the B, flat minor Scherzo.

Seats are now on sale at Mrs. Wilson-Greene's concert bureau, in Droop's 1300 G Street.

Although it is admitted that the festival of Beethoven music which the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, gave in its home city of Boston in 1927 exceeded in completeness and grandeur all other centennial celebrations of the composer's death, it is also true that the Beethoven festival which the same orchestra will give here at Constitution Hall on December 2, 3, 5, and 6, will offer one feature which the Boston celebration lacked, i. e., the presentation of three of Beethoven's great concertos in which foremost virtuosi of the present day will match their talents with the orchestra.

First announcement of the program which Clare Clairbert, the fascinating new Belgian coloratura soprano, will present at her Washington concert debut at Constitution Hall on Saturday evening, November 29, at 8:30 o'clock, has been made by Mrs. Wilson-Greene, local concert manager who will present Clairbert as the second attraction of her Saturday evening concert series at that place.

Clairbert will be assisted by Francis de Bourguignon, noted French composer-pianist, and Eugene Lion, flutist.

Seats are on sale at Mrs. Wilson-Greene's Concert Bureau, in Droop's, 1300 G St. N. W., and will be available at Constitution Hall on the evening of the concert after 7 p. m.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN

SYMPHONY TO OPEN SEASON HERE TUESDAY

The Providence season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky conducting, will be opened with a concert in the Albee Theatre next Tuesday evening.

A striking program has been announced by Dr. Koussevitzky, opening with two Preludes by Bach. The symphony will be Beethoven's Seventh, in A major, composed in 1812, when the noted composer's deafness already had reached troubling proportions. It was first performed in the following year.

The Two Preludes of Bach, written for organ and violin, respectively, have been scored for string orchestra by Pick-Mangiagalli.

The closing number will be Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition," as scored for full orchestra by Maurice Ravel. The "Pictures" are a series of humorous sketches, conceived by the Russian composer for the pianoforte, and describe certain pictures by his friend, the artist, Hartman.

The pictures to be described are Promenade, Gnomes, Tuileries, Bydlo, Ballet of Chickens in Their Shells, Samuel Goldenberg and Schmuyle, Limoges, The Market Place, Catacombs (con mortuis in lingua mortua), The Hut on Fowls' Legs, and The Great Gate of Kiev.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

IN TERMS OF MUSIC, Comment in Season

Beethoven's Favorite Symphony, Two Bach Preludes and Ravel's Transcription of a Moussorgsky Suite Open the Boston's Season.—Program Notes

For 125 years Beethoven's symphonies have endeared themselves to the music-thinking people of the world, not because the name of the great Master is attached to them, but because of their great intrinsic value.

And so we welcome the chance to hear the Seventh of his nine next Tuesday evening during the Boston Symphony Orchestra's first Providence concert this season, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky conducting. This Albee Theatre program under the auspices of the Music Association is a part of the orchestra's 50th anniversary year and includes two Bach preludes and Ravel's arrangement of Moussorgsky's suite, "Pictures in an Exhibition."

No other class of works are so well known as the Beethoven symphonies, so popular or so much beloved. They are acclaimed not only by the rank and file of music lovers but by the greatest of musicians. Richard Wagner tells in his autobiography of his affection for these symphonies and of the delight he experienced whenever he conducted them. Brahms not only admired them but was profoundly influenced by them in his musical life.

Which, the question is often asked, is the greatest of the Beethoven symphonies? This is not easily answered as they are so different. As it is said in the Scripture "there is one glory of the stars and one of the moon and one star differeth from another in glory." So also with these glorious symphonies. The ninth or choral symphony is of course in a class by itself because of its chorus. In the third symphony in E flat there is enough thematic material for a dozen symphonies—or for a hundred as short termed and perhaps short lived compositions now go. Some delight in the second symphony.

But many consider this Seventh as one of the greatest exposition of Beethoven's genius. Not only are its melodies exquisite, its forms broad and large-minded but there are in it such notable departures from the methods of composition used before its time as to be almost revolutionary in character. They caused the theorists to wonder and the so-called classicists to arise and declaim with astonishment and offence. Many of the rapid changes of key, style and mood savor of a modernity almost of our time.

We know that Beethoven himself was particularly inclined towards the Seventh. And we must remember that Beethoven's deafness was already alarming at the time of its composition in 1812. The first performance was the following year.

It begins with a forte piano chord followed by the oboe sostenuto. The oboe appears prominently in the symphony, as does all of the wood wind which is played with consummate skill in strict imitation of and contrast to the full orchestra. Rapid changes in mood and key startling and unusual at that time, and even in this, are heard frequently throughout the work. The sostenuto of the introduction with its noble upbuilding of the basses soon gives way to the simple notes of the flute which builds up the common chord of a Major E in a sharply accented vivace piano, with rapid crescendi and numerous sforzandi which increase the rhythmic accent adding marked character to the style.

The allegretto is well known and particularly effective because it is so simple. A counter theme in the celli enters while the strings continue their uninterrupted tappings only to give way to a beautiful melody by the clarinet, while the kettledrums continue the rhythm with the strings. Perhaps Tschaikowski thought of this in the five-four movement of the Pathetique: at all events it was quite unique in music. The movement illustrates the remarkable things that can be done with a simple melodic figure and rhythm.

In the Presto the wood wind feature prominently in contrast with the full orchestra followed by the full brass choir in triumphal chords. Then come soft strings under which are heard the bassoons in a very effective dissonant insistence which throw the re-entrance of the band into high relief. The haunting beauty of the brass lingers only to be interrupted by a fortissimo presto which abruptly terminates the movement.

The final movement is a whirlwind interrupted by light airy skipping of the violins alternating with answering flutes. Noisy contrasts interrupt and never-before-heard key changes (such as F major to E major to A and then to B major) used by no other composer to this day furnish an interest to the musician and a striking novelty to any hearer. It is difficult to imagine anything more brilliant and effective than this finale with its insistent bass, contrary motion, massive chords and powerful climax.

There is no "program" to this symphony, rather is it an exposition of the active workings of a colossal musical mind fighting against the inevitable deafness soon to come, expressing a diversity of melodic and massive thoughts of noble and singularly effective musical emotions.

The orchestra has already proven its liking for Bach. To it Koussevitzky gives crisp diction, sounding sonorities and fleetness of articulation so necessary to proper rendition of Bach. This illustrates the Bach of the orchestra, by no means as familiar to us as the man of the organ, an interesting, absorbing and pleasing comparison without which we fail to appreciate the extent of his genius.

Moussorgsky's "Pictures In An Exhibition" will be an interesting experience—the composer reacting in terms of music to what he sees on the gallery wall. One must be indeed a musician to attempt this and equally great to relate what the music tells. Modern musical thought has some peculiar idioms, its thoughts sometimes diverge into strange bypaths, and perhaps this suite will prove that the impossible is possible after all and that music is more nearly allied to pictorial art than we have supposed. An interesting and perhaps an instructive experiment.

These impressions resulted from a visit to an exhibition of drawing by V. Hartman held a year after the gifted architect's death.

Since we are advised only that "Two Preludes" of Bach will be played, we cannot discuss them or relate whether they are harpsichord, organ or orchestral preludes. The modernizing of Bach is a good thing, bringing him more than ever before the people and opening up another medium of expression. Too much Bach we cannot have nor will it fail in interest and fascination.

DR. W. LOUIS CHAPMAN.

(Dr. Chapman is to comment in detail on the Symphony program in a talk tomorrow afternoon at the Providence Public Library at 4:30. His music chat under the auspices of the Monday Morning Music Club will be accompanied with theme-identification and other illustration at the piano.)

BOSTON SYMPHONY PROGRAM

Bach.....Two Preludes
(Arranged for String Orchestra by Pick-Mangiagalli.)
I. Adagio.
II. Vivace.

Beethoven.....
Symphony No. 7 in A major, Op. 92.
I. Poco sostenuto: Vivace.
II. Allegretto.
III. Presto; Assai meno presto: Tempo primo.
IV. Allegro con brio.

Moussorgsky.....
"Pictures at an Exhibition," Pianoforte Pieces, arranged for Orchestra by Maurice Ravel.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE

Brooklyn to Hear Boston Symphony

OPENING their New York season in Carnegie Hall on Thursday night of this week, the Boston Symphony and its conductor, Serge Koussevitsky, will appear at the Academy of Music on Friday evening, to give the first of the five concerts which are their annual contribution to the Brooklyn musical season. The program will be as follows:

Mozart....Overture to the "Magic Flute"
Beethoven.....Seventh Symphony
Bach.....Two Preludes
(Transcribed for strings by Pick-Mangiagalli.)
Wagner.....Prelude to "Lohengrin"
Rimsky-Korsakow.....Spanish Caprice

The concert will be given under the auspices of the Institute of Arts and Sciences.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, now in its fiftieth anniversary season, will open the New York series of concerts at Carnegie Hall Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon.

Serge Koussevitzky will introduce at the Thursday concert the new symphony of Albert Roussel which has been especially written for the anniversary of the orchestra and which was performed last month in Boston in the composer's presence. This program will open with Berlioz's "Roman Carnival" and close with the second symphony of Brahms in D major.

The Symphonie Lyrique of Nicolas Nabokov will be the new piece of the Saturday afternoon concert, which will have an all-Russian program. Nabokov, a young composer who has received considerable attention in Europe recently, is being introduced to America by this symphony. The program also will include Glinka's overture to "Russian and Ludmilla" and the fourth symphony of Tchaikovsky.

N. Y. MORN. WORLD

NOV 15 1930

PAWTUCKET, R. I.
TIMES

Symphony Orchestra to Give Concert in Providence Tuesday

The Boston Symphony orchestra will open its Providence season as part of the 50th anniversary jubilee, playing in the Albee Theatre next Tuesday evening. Dr. Serge Koussevitsky announces a striking programme for the occasion. It will open with two preludes of Bach, written for the organ and violin respectively, which have been scored for string orchestra by Pick-Mangiagalli. The symphony of the evening will be the seventh of Beethoven, in A major. The closing number, to be heard for the first time in Providence, will be Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition," as scored for full orchestra by Maurice Ravel. This little series of humorous sketches, conceived by the Russian composer for the pianoforte, describes in a series of sketches certai pictures by his friend, the artist, Hartman. The pictures described are as follows: Promenade, Gnomes, Tuileries, Bydlo, Ballet of Chickens in Their Shells, Samuel Goldenberg and Schmuyle, Limoges; the Market Place, Catacombs (con mortuis in lingua mortua), The Hut on Fowl's Legs, The Great Gate at Kiev.

BOSTON SYMPHONY'S OPENING CONCERT

With Beethoven's Seventh, sometimes called the "Dance Symphony," for the body of the program, flanked by two works new to Providence, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, led by Serge Koussevitzky, advances on Providence for its opening concert of the season Tuesday night in the Albee Theatre.

The concert will open with two Bach preludes, arranged for string orchestra by Pick-Mangiagalli, Adagio and Vivace, played recently for the first time by the orchestra. Next comes Beethoven, Symphony No. 7 in A-major, opus 92, Poco sostenuto—Vivace, Allegretto, Presto—Assai meno presto—Tempo primo, Allegro con brio. Then, for the second part, Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition," pianoforte pieces, scored for full orchestra by Maurice Ravel especially for Dr. Koussevitzky.

The latter is a series of humorous sketches in which Moussorgsky interpreted musically certain pictures of his friend, the artist Hartman. The pictures are described as follows: Promenade—Gnomes — Tuileries — Bydlo — Ballet of Chickens in Their Shells—Samuel Goldenberg and Schmuyle—Limoges; The Marketplace—Catacombs (Con mortuis in lingua mortua)—The Hut on Fowls' Legs—The Great Gate at Kiev.

Following the opening of the Providence season the orchestra will journey to New York for the first concerts of its Carnegie Hall series. The first week in December it will hold a Beethoven festival in Washington, D. C., one of the outstanding features of the orchestra's golden jubilee, and giving it a national significance. There it will offer the first, third, fifth, seventh and ninth symphonies; the "Egmont," third "Leonore" and "Coriolanus" overtures, the Fourth Piano Concerto, with Myra Hess; the "Emperor" Concerto, with Josef Hofmann, and the Violin Concerto, with Efrem Zimbalist. A Washington chorus of 200 will combine with the orchestra to close the festival in a performance of the Ninth Symphony.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TIMES

WITH ORCHESTRAS HERE AND THERE

BRINGING gifts of composers on its fiftieth jubilee year, the Boston Symphony Orchestra comes to town for the first time this season with a sold-out subscription next Thursday at Carnegie Hall and large audiences Friday in Brooklyn and Saturday again in Manhattan.

Serge Koussevitzky will introduce at the Thursday concert the new symphony of Albert Roussel which has been especially written for the anniversary of the orchestra and was performed last month in Boston in the presence of the composer.

The "Symphonie Lyrique" of Nicolas Nabokoff will be the new piece of the Saturday afternoon concert, which will have an all-Russian program. Nabokoff, a young composer who has received considerable attention in Europe recently, is introduced by this symphony to America.

Works New to Providence Feature Symphony Concert

Pick-Mangiagalli's Arrangement of Bach Preludes and Ravel Transcription of Moussorgsky's "Pictures" Listed With Beethoven's Familiar "Seventh"

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, to be heard in the Albee Theatre next Tuesday evening, is now in its fiftieth season. In recognition of this half-century of notable achievement many composers of prominence have written pieces escpecially for the orchestra or have assigned to it the first performance of their latest scores. At the second pair of concerts in Boston Dr. Koussevitzky placed at the head of the program two Preludes of Bach arranged for string orchestra by Pick-Mangiagalli and never previously performed. These Preludes will be heard this week in Providence and with them, as in Boston, will come the Seventh Symphony of Beethoven and Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition" as transcribed for orchestra by Maurice Ravel.

The making of orchestral arrangements of the organ and other instrumental works of Bach is a favorite pastime of composers great and small. Sometimes these transcriptions are for the full modern orchestra: sometimes they are for strings alone, thus preserving a better balance between thought and expression since the orchestra, as we understand it, was a thing unknown to the Cantor of Leipzig. These transcriptions by Pick-Mangiagalli, a gifted composer who enjoys a double musical heritage, Czech and Italian, belong to the latter class, and hence are not calculated to arouse the ire of the purists as did, for example, Schoenberg's flamboyant orchestration of the "Saint Anne'e" organ fugue heard in Boston last season. For one of his Preludes Pick-Mangiagalli has gone to the rich mine of Bach's organ music, taking the slow and solemn introduction to an organ fugue in D minor, that numbered 9 in the Bach Gesellschaft edition, transposing it a tone higher. Its companion piece is a brilliant Prelude in E major from the Third Partita for violin alone, a favorite piece with concert violinists. The music as it stands Pick-Mangiagalli has made his first violin part, adding parts for the remaining strings in the contrapuntal manner of the great master. It is a brilliant achievement, and nowhere does the music as it now stands go outside the Bachian frame.

Likewise new to Providence will be the other orchestral transcription, that of Moussorgsky's extraordinarily graphic piano suite made by Ravel at Dr. Koussevitzky's request some eight years ago and first performed at a Koussevitzky concert in Paris. Many musicians, although not all, have felt that Moussorgsky's vivid tonal impressions of the drawings and water-colors by Victor Hartmann, which he saw in Leningrad (it was then St. Petersburg) in the spring of 1874, need for their full effectiveness a more resourceful instrument than the piano. Ravel was not the first to supply this need by transcribing the Pictures for orchestra, but it is doubtful whether any other has or could have accomplished the task with such triumphant success. As the work now stands the music and its instrumental dress might have emanated from the same brain. Yet Ravel, able and imaginative composer that he is, could never have written the piano suite, for Moussorgsky had a gift for musical characterization altogether unique; and on the other hand the wayward, half-untutored Russian, who scored as an amateur, would have been utterly incapable of doing orchestral justice to his ten tonal sketche. Moreover this Frenchman who yields to none of his contemporaries in his understanding of orchestral possibilities has manifested a peculiar sympathy with Moussorgsky's point of view, his highly individual musical ideas.

The remaining number on the program, Beethoven's Seventh Symphony, is familiar to all who attend orchestral concerts. As to the relative worth and importance of this Symphony commentators and critics are divided, as they have ever been divided regarding the possible poetic ideas that may have underlain Beethoven's musical conceptions. The various theories of what the Seventh Symphony "means" will be duly set forth in Mr. Philip Hale's program-notes on the concert. For most concert-goers, however, it is enough to enjoy the Seventh Symphony as pure music, and if it seems here and there over-repetitious, if the last movement seems to stand on a lower plane than certain others of Beethoven's finales, there is still in the work enough of a peculiar and satisfying beauty to make it indispensable to us. The Seventh is first of all a joyous symphony. Even the marvellous Allegretto, though it runs for the most part in the minor mode, breathes contentment rather than melancholy. Vincent d'Indy has taken issue with Wagner's dictum that the Seventh Symphony is the apotheosis of the dance, but for many that characterization holds as final.

Boston Symphony Season Opens Tuesday Evening

Beethoven's Seventh and Two Works New to Providence On Program Selected by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky.—Three Concerts This Afternoon

To the Albee Theatre Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony come Tuesday night for the first of the orchestra's 50th anniversary concerts to be played in this city. The celebration of the semi-centennial is being attended by such notable events as a concert conducted by the band's first leader, Sir George Henschel, special programs and the introduction of works written in tribute to the organization by some of the foremost composers of the day. Providence will hear one of these new compositions Tuesday, and in the three concerts to follow is likely to hear others.

MINNEAPOLIS, MINN.
JOURNAL

NOV 16 1930

Plays Own Work, Admits It Later

In Boston Dr. Serge Koussevitzky is continuing the introduction of the various new works composed for the fiftieth anniversary celebration of the Boston Symphony orchestra. The Symphony hall programs of October 31 and November 1 begin with an overture composed for this occasion by a musician who withheld his name, although it was revealed that the first theme was taken from Glinka's opera "A Life for the Tsar."

When the orchestra, however, applauded Dr. Koussevitzky after the performance of this work it was revealed that the composer was the conductor himself. Mr. H. T. Parker pointed out in "The Boston Evening Transcript" some indications in the music which pointed to its authorship: "Admittedly a Russian had written the overture—for precisely the number of instruments constituting the orchestra in exactly the groups into which it is divided. More, he had used as second theme a motive next of kin to one in a concerto for double bass, not unknown at Symphony hall."

The other novelty on the program was a symphony by Nicolas Nabokov, a Russian composer who was born in Leningrad in 1903 and now lives in Paris. "The listener," wrote Mr. Parker, "begins to suspect a young composer with a personal will, inventing his own matter, choosing his own manner. . . . Believably, Mr. Nabokov has a future."

THE PROVIDENCE SUNDAY

Serge Koussevitzky
Russian Conductor and Boston Symphony return Tuesday for opening concert of the orchestra's 50th anniversary series.

THIS CLIPPING FROM ERIE, PA.
DISPATCH HERALD

NOV 16 1930

Nicolas Nabokov is to become one of the scintillant names in the world of musical works according to comments heard after the performance of this young Russian's wooks at the fiftieth anniversary celebration of the Boston Symphony orchestra under Dr. Koussevitzky.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

IN TERMS OF MUSIC, Comment in Season

Beethoven's Favorite Symphony, Two Bach Preludes and Ravel's Transcription of a Moussorgsky Suite Open the Boston's Season.—Program Notes

For 125 years Beethoven's symphonies have endeared themselves to the music-thinking people of the world, not because the name of the great Master is attached to them, but because of their great intrinsic value.

And so we welcome the chance to hear the Seventh of his nine next Tuesday evening during the Boston Symphony Orchestra's first Providence concert this season, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky conducting. This Albee Theatre program under the auspices of the Music Association is a part of the orchestra's 50th anniversary year and includes two Bach preludes and Ravel's arrangement of Moussorgsky's suite, "Pictures in an Exhibition."

No other class of works are so well known as the Beethoven symphonies, so popular or so much beloved. They are acclaimed not only by the rank and file of music lovers but by the greatest of musicians. Richard Wagner tells in his autobiography of his affection for these symphonies and of the delight he experienced whenever he conducted them. Brahms not only admired them but was profoundly influenced by them in his musical llife.

Which, the question is often asked, is the greatest of the Beethoven symphonies? This is not easily answered as they are so different. As it is said in the Scripture "there is one glory of the stars and one of the moon and one star differeth from another in glory." So also with these glorious symphonies. The ninth or choral symphony is of course in a class by itself because of its chorus. In the third symphony in E flat there is enough thematic material for a dozen symphonies—or for a hundred as short termed and perhaps short lived compositions now go. Some delight in the second symphony.

But many consider this Seventh as one of the greatest exposition of Beethoven's genius. Not only are its melodies exquisite, its forms broad and large-minded but there are in it such notable departures from the methods of composition used before its time as to be almost revolutionary in character. They caused the theorists to wonder and the so-called classicists to arise and declaim with astonishment and offence. Many of the rapid changes of key, style and mood savor of a modernity almost of our time.

We know that Beethoven himself was particularly inclined towards the Seventh. And we must remember that Beethoven's deafness was already alarming at the time of its composition in 1812. The first performance was the following year.

It begins with a forte piano chord followed by the oboe sostenuto. The oboe appears prominently in the symphony, as does all of the wood wind which is played with consummate skill in strict imitation of and contrast to the full orchestra. Rapid changes in mood and key startling and unusual at that time, and even in this, are heard frequently throughout the work. The sostenuto of the introduction with its noble upbuilding of the basses soon gives way to the simple notes of the flute which builds up the common chord of a Major E in a sharply accented vivace piano, with rapid crescendi and numerous sforzandi which increase the rhythmic accent adding marked character to the style.

The allegretto is well known and particularly effective because it is so simple. A counter theme in the celli enters while the strings continue their uninterrupted tappings only to give way to a beautiful melody by the clarinet, while the kettledrums continue the rhythm with the strings. Perhaps Tschaikowski thought of this in the five-four movement of the Pathetique; at all events it was quite unique in music. The movement illustrates the remarkable things that can be done with a simple melodic figure and rhythm.

In the Presto the wood wind feature prominently in contrast with the full orchestra followed by the full brass choir in triumphal chords. Then come soft strings under which are heard the bassoons in a very effective dissonance insistence which throw the re-entrance of the band into high relief. The haunting beauty of the brass lingers only to be interrupted by a fortissimo presto which abruptly terminates the movement.

The final movement is a whirlwind interrupted by light airy skipping of the violins alternating with answering flutes. Noisy contrasts interrupt and never-before-heard key changes (such as F major to E major to A and then to B major) used by no other composer to this day furnish an interest to the musician and a striking novelty to any hearer. It is difficult to imagine anything more brilliant and effective than this finale with its insistent bass, contrary motion, massive chords and powerful climax.

There is no "program" to this symphony, rather is it an exposition of the active workings of a colossal musical mind fighting against the inevitable deafness soon to come, expressing a diversity of melodic and massive thoughts of noble and singularly effective musical emotions.

The orchestra has already proven its liking for Bach. To it Koussevitzky gives crisp diction, sounding sonorities and fleetness of articulation so necessary to proper rendition of Bach. This illustrates the Bach of the orchestra, by no means as familiar to us as the man of the organ, an interesting, absorbing and pleasing comparison without which we fail to appreciate the extent of his genius.

Moussorgsky's "Pictures In An Exhibition" will be an interesting experience—the composer reacting in terms of music to what he sees on the gallery wall. One must be indeed a musician to attempt this and equally great to relate what the music tells. Modern musical thought has some peculiar idioms, its thoughts sometimes diverge into strange bypaths, and perhaps this suite will prove that the impossible is possible after all and that music is more nearly allied to pictorial art than we have supposed. An interesting and perhaps an instructive experiment.

These impressions resulted from a visit to an exhibition of drawing by V. Hartman held a year after the gifted architect's death.

Since we are advised only that "Two Preludes" of Bach will be played, we cannot discuss them or relate whether they are harpsichord, organ or orchestral preludes. The modernizing of Bach is a good thing, bringing him more than ever before the people and opening up another medium of expression. Too much Bach we cannot have nor will it fail in interest and fascination.

DR. W. LOUIS CHAPMAN.

(Dr. Chapman is to comment in detail on the Symphony program in a talk tomorrow afternoon at the Providence Public Library at 4:30. His music chat under the auspices of the Monday Morning Music Club will be accompanied with theme-identification and other illustration at the piano.)

BOSTON SYMPHONY PROGRAM

Bach.....Two Preludes
(Arranged for String Orchestra by Pick-Mangiagalli.)
I. Adagio.
II. Vivace.
Beethoven.....
Symphony No. 7 in A major, Op. 92.
I. Poco sostenuto; Vivace.
II. Allegretto.
III. Presto; Assai meno presto; Tempo primo.
IV. Allegro con brio.
Moussorgsky.....
"Pictures at an Exhibition," Pianoforte Pieces, arranged for Orchestra by Maurice Ravel.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE

Brooklyn to Hear Boston Symphony

OPENING their New York season in Carnegie Hall on Thursday night of this week, the Boston Symphony and its conductor, Serge Koussevitsky, will appear at the Academy of Music on Friday evening, to give the first of the five concerts which are their annual contribution to the Brooklyn musical season. The program will be as follows:

Mozart....Overture to the "Magic Flute"
Beethoven.....Seventh Symphony
Bach.....Two Preludes
(Transcribed for strings by Pick-Mangiagalli.)
Wagner.....Prelude to "Lohengrin"
Rimsky-Korsakow.....Spanish Caprice

The concert will be given under the auspices of the Institute of Arts and Sciences.

N. Y. MORN. WORLD
NOV 16 1930

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, now in its fiftieth anniversary season, will open the New York series of concerts at Carnegie Hall Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon.

Serge Koussevitsky will introduce at the Thursday concert the new symphony of Albert Roussel which has been especially written for the anniversary of the orchestra and which was performed last month in Boston in the composer's presence. This program will open with Berlioz's "Roman Carnival" and close with the second symphony of Brahms in D major.

The Symphonie Lyrique of Nicolas Nabokov will be the new piece of the Saturday afternoon concert, which will have an all-Russian program. Nabokov, a young composer who has received considerable attention in Europe recently, is being introduced to America by this symphony. The program also will include Glinka's overture to "Russian and Ludmilla" and the fourth symphony of Tchaikowsky.

PAWTUCKET, R. I.
TIMES
NOV 15 1930

Symphony Orchestra to Give Concert in Providence Tuesday

The Boston Symphony orchestra will open its Providence season as part of the 50th anniversary jubilee, playing in the Albee Theatre next Tuesday evening. Dr. Serge Koussevitsky announces a striking programme for the occasion. It will open with two preludes of Bach, written for the organ and violin respectively, which have been scored for string orchestra by Pick-Mangiagalli. The symphony of the evening will be the seventh of Beethoven, in A major. The closing number, to be heard for the first time in Providence, will be Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition," as scored for full orchestra by Maurice Ravel. This little series of humorous sketches, conceived by the Russian composer for the pianoforte, describes in a series of sketches certai pictures by his friend, the artist, Hartman. The pictures described are as follows: Promenade, Gnomes, Tuileries, Bydlo, Ballet of Chickens in Their Shells, Samuel Goldenberg and Schmuyle, Limoges; the Market Place, Catacombs (con mortuis in lingua mortua), The Hut on Fowl's Legs, The Great Gate at Kiev.

BOSTON SYMPHONY'S OPENING CONCERT

Prov. Journal Nov 16

With Beethoven's Seventh, sometimes called the "Dance Symphony," for the body of the program, flanked by two works new to Providence, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, led by Serge Koussevitzky, advances on Providence for its opening concert of the season Tuesday night in the Albee Theatre.

The concert will open with two Bach preludes, arranged for string orchestra by Pick-Mangiagalli, Adagio and Vivace, played recently for the first time by the orchestra. Next comes Beethoven, Symphony No. 7 in A-major, opus 92, Poco sostenuto—Vivace, Allegretto, Presto—Assai meno presto—Tempo primo, Allegro con brio. Then, for the second part, Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition," pianoforte pieces, scored for full orchestra by Maurice Ravel especially for Dr. Koussevitzky.

The latter is a series of humorous sketches in which Moussorgsky interpreted musically certain pictures of his friend, the artist Hartman. The pictures are described as follows: Promenade—Gnomes — Tuileries — Bydlo — Ballet of Chickens in Their Shells—Samuel Goldenberg and Schmuyle—Limoges; The Marketplace—Catacombs (Con mortuis in lingua mortua)—The Hut on Fowls' Legs—The Great Gate at Kiev.

Following the opening of the Providence season the orchestra will journey to New York for the first concerts of its Carnegie Hall series. The first week in December it will hold a Beethoven festival in Washington, D. C., one of the outstanding features of the orchestra's golden jubilee, and giving it a national significance. There it will offer the first, third, fifth, seventh and ninth symphonies; the "Egmont," third "Leonore" and "Coriolanus" overtures, the Fourth Piano Concerto, with Myra Hess; the "Emperor" Concerto, with Josef Hofmann, and the Violin Concerto, with Efrem Zimbalist. A Washington chorus of 200 will combine with the orchestra to close the festival in a performance of the Ninth Symphony.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TIMES
NOV 16 1930

WITH ORCHESTRAS HERE AND THERE

BRINGING gifts of composers on its fiftieth jubilee year, the Boston Symphony Orchestra comes to town for the first time this season with a sold-out subscription next Thursday at Carnegie Hall and large audiences Friday in Brooklyn and Saturday again in Manhattan.

Serge Koussevitzky will introduce at the Thursday concert the new symphony of Albert Roussel which has been especially written for the anniversary of the orchestra and was performed last month in Boston in the presence of the composer.

The "Symphonie Lyrique" of Nicolas Nabokoff will be the new piece of the Saturday afternoon concert, which will have an all-Russian program. Nabokoff, a young composer who has received considerable attention in Europe recently, is introduced by this symphony to America.

Works New to Providence Feature Symphony Concert

Prov. Journal Nov 16

Pick-Mangiagalli's Arrangement of Bach Preludes and Ravel Transcription of Moussorgsky's "Pictures" Listed With Beethoven's Familiar "Seventh"

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, to be heard in the Albee Theatre next Tuesday evening, is now in its fiftieth season. In recognition of this half-century of notable achievement many composers of prominence have written pieces escpecially for the orchestra or have assigned to it the first performance of their latest scores. At the second pair of concerts in Boston Dr. Koussevitzky placed at the head of the program two Preludes of Bach arranged for string orchestra by Pick-Mangiagalli and never previously performed. These Preludes will be heard this week in Providence and with them, as in Boston, will come the Seventh Symphony of Beethoven and Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition" as transcribed for orchestra by Maurice Ravel.

The making of orchestral arrangements of the organ and other instrumental works of Bach is a favorite pastime of composers great and small. Sometimes these transcriptions are for the full modern orchestra; sometimes they are for strings alone, thus preserving a better balance between thought and expression since the orchestra, as we understand it, was a thing unknown to the Cantor of Leipzig. These transcriptions by Pick-Mangiagalli, a gifted composer who enjoys a double musical heritage, Czech and Italian, belong to the latter class, and hence are not calculated to arouse the ire of the purists as did, for example, Schoenberg's flamboyant orchestration of the "Saint Anne'e" organ fugue heard in Boston last season. For one of his Preludes Pick-Mangiagalli has gone to the rich mine of Bach's organ music, taking the slow and solemn introduction to an organ fugue in D minor, that numbered 9 in the Bach Gesellschaft edition, transposing it a tone higher. Its companion piece is a brilliant Prelude in E major from the Third Partita for violin alone, a favorite piece with concert violinists. The music as it stands Pick-Mangiagalli has made his first violin part, adding parts for the remaining strings in the contrapuntal manner of the great master. It is a brilliant achievement, and nowhere does the music as it now stands go outside the Bachian frame.

Likewise new to Providence will be the other orchestral transcription, that of Moussorgsky's extraordinarily graphic piano suite made by Ravel at Dr. Koussevitzky's request some eight years ago and first performed at a Koussevitzky concert in Paris. Many musicians, although not all, have felt that Moussorgsky's vivid tonal impressions of the drawings and water-colors by Victor Hartmann, which he saw in Leningrad (it was then St. Petersburg) in the spring of 1874, need for their full effectiveness a more resourceful instrument than the piano. Ravel was not the first to supply this need by transcribing the Pictures for orchestra, but it is doubtful whether any other has or could have accomplished the task with such triumphant success. As the work now stands the music and its instrumental dress might have emanated from the same brain. Yet Ravel, able and imaginative composer that he is, could never have written the piano suite, for Moussorgsky had a gift for musical characterization altogether unique; and on the other hand the wayward, half-untutored Russian, who scored as an amateur, would have been utterly incapable of doing orchestral justice to his ten tonal sketche. Moreover this Frenchman who yields to none of his contemporaries in his understanding of orchestral possibilities has manifested a peculiar sympathy with Moussorgsky's point of view, his highly individual musical ideas.

The remaining number on the program, Beethoven's Seventh Symphony, is familiar to all who attend orchestral concerts. As to the relative worth and importance of this Symphony commentators and critics are divided, as they have ever been divided regarding the possible poetic ideas that may have underlain Beethoven's musical conceptions. The various theories of what the Seventh Symphony "means" will be duly set forth in Mr. Philip Hale's program-notes on the concert. For most concert-goers, however, it is enough to enjoy the Seventh Symphony as pure music, and if it seems here and there over-repetitious, if the last movement seems to stand on a lower plane than certain others of Beethoven's finales, there is still in the work enough of a peculiar and satisfying beauty to make it indispensable to us. The Seventh is first of all a joyous symphony. Even the marvellous Allegretto, though it runs for the most part in the minor mode, breathes contentment rather than melancholy. Vincent d'Indy has taken issue with Wagner's dictum that the Seventh Symphony is the apotheosis of the dance, but for many that characterization holds as final.

Boston Symphony Season Opens Tuesday Evening

PROV JOUR. Nov. 16

Beethoven's Seventh and Two Works New to Providence On Program Selected by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky.—Three Concerts This Afternoon

To the Albee Theatre Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony come Tuesday night for the first of the orchestra's 50th anniversary concerts to be played in this city. The celebration of the semi-centennial is being attended by such notable events as a concert conducted by the band's first leader, Sir George Henschel, special programs and the introduction of works written in tribute to the organization by some of the foremost composers of the day. Providence will hear one of these new compositions Tuesday, and in the three concerts to follow is likely to hear others. As in the past few years the orchestra's local engagements are under the auspices of the Music Association of Provi-

Nov. 16

THE PROVIDENCE SUNDAY

Serge Koussevitzky
Russian Conductor and Boston Symphony return Tuesday for opening concert of the orchestra's 50th anniversary series.

In Boston Dr. Serge Koussevitzky is continuing the introduction of the various new works composed for the fiftieth anniversary celebration of the Boston Symphony orchestra. The Symphony hall programs of October 31 and November 1 begin with an overture composed for this occasion by a musician who withheld his name, although it was revealed that the first theme was taken from Glinka's opera "A Life for the Tsar."

When the orchestra, however, applauded Dr. Koussevitzky after the performance of this work it was revealed that the composer was the conductor himself. Mr. H. T. Parker pointed out in "The Boston Evening Transcript" some indications in the music which pointed to its authorship: "Admittedly a Russian had written the overture—for precisely the number of instruments constituting the orchestra in exactly the groups into which it is divided. More, he had used as second theme a motive next of kin to one in a concerto for double bass, not unknown at Symphony hall."

The other novelty on the program was a symphony by Nicolas Nabokov, a Russian composer who was born in Leningrad in 1903 and now lives in Paris. "The listener," wrote Mr. Parker, "begins to suspect a young composer with a personal will, inventing his own matter, choosing his own manner. . . . Believably, Mr. Nabokov has a future."

THIS CLIPPING FROM ERIE, PA.
DISPATCH HERALD
NOV 16 1930

Nicolas Nabokov is to become one of the scintillant names in the world of musical works according to comments heard after the performance of this young Russian's wooks at the fiftieth anniversary celebration of the Boston Symphony orchestra under Dr. Koussevitzky.

NOV 1 61930

48

MUSIC NOTES

Boston Symphony Season Opens Tuesday Evening

Beethoven's Seventh and Two Works New to Providence On Program Selected by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky.—Three Concerts This Afternoon

To the Albee Theatre Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony come Tuesday night for the first of the orchestra's 50th anniversary concerts to be played in this city. The celebration of the semi-centennial is being attended by such notable events as a concert conducted by the band's first leader, Sir George Henschel, special programs and the introduction of works written in tribute to the organization by some of the foremost composers of the day. Providence will hear one of these new compositions Tuesday, and in the three concerts to follow is likely to hear others. As in the past few years the orchestra's local engagements are under the auspices of the Music Association of Providence.

Of interest to students and other symphony-goers will be the talk by Dr. W. Louis Chapman at the Providence Public Library this afternoon at 4:30 o'clock on the music to be played by the orchestra, illustrated by piano excerpts. It will be the first of a series by Dr. Chapman to be given at the library on the Sundays preceding the symphony concerts, and has been arranged, in co-operation with the library, by the Music Students' loan fund committee of the Monday Morning Musical Club of which Mrs. Ada Holding Miller is chairman. The other members are Mrs. Eugene A. Kingman, Mrs. Paul C. DeWolf, Mrs. Harrie E. McGregor, Miss Edith Nichols and Mrs. Harold J. Gross.

In inaugurating these lectures the Monday Morning Musical Club is providing a music appreciation course such as has been conducted in Boston for many years in connection with the symphony programs. Some years ago Dr. Chapman gave a similar series here. Whether symphony subscribers or not, all interested are invited to attend and listen to a talk which will deal particularly with the items of the coming concert.

◈ ◈ ◈

Making his bow in public for the season, Giuseppe Camilloni will appear this afternoon at 3:15 o'clock in a violin recital in the Plantations auditorium, assisted by Ciro Sacco as accompanist. His program includes three longer works by Mozart, Viotti and Bach and a group of shorter pieces, among which are one of his arrangements for the violin and an original composition for that instrument. As a composer Mr. Camilloni has written much for the piano and organ as well as the violin and is an accomplished pianist.

LOUIS KRASNER AT ART CLUB

The Providence Art Club announces a violin recital this afternoon at 4 o'clock by Louis Krasner who has returned from Europe to make his home in this city. He was formerly of Boston. He made his debut two years ago in Berlin, followed by recitals in Paris where he played in the Salle Gaveau and with the Pasdeloup Orchestra. He then went to London, repeating the success he had made on the continent. Engagements succeeded with the Berlin Philharmonic and the Vienna Symphony. Then he came to this country to be soloist with the Boston Symphony with which he gave the first audition in this country of a Concerto by Casella, with the composer conducting.

Last winter he repeated the Concerto at the Augusteo in Rome, with Molinari conducting. He gave 20 concerts in Italy and was made an honorary member of the Academica Filarmonica of the title of "Romances and Legends of the Harp," will be as follows:

Traditional Irish tunes, played on Irish harps, "My Cow and James's Cow," "Donnell a Boo" (Irish war tune), Gladys Custance; harp duo, Waltz in A-flat, Brahms; "Theme Ancient Style," V. V. Rogers; Gavotte in B-flat, Handel, arr. by Gebhard. Soprano solos, "On Wings of Song," Mendelssohn; "I Am Thy Harp," H. Woodman, harp accompaniment, Kenneth Custance, Gladys Custance. Irish harp due, "Impromptu," "Eccentric Dance," Rogers; harp solo, "Minuet," Mozart; "Bagatelle," Verdalle, Gladys Custance; harp duo, "Song of the Volga Boatman," arr. by Gebhard.

Van Veachton Rogers is president of the Founders Chapter and vice president of the national association. The hostesses for the evening will be Miriam Doran, Kathleen Miller, Hope Robinson, Helene Alper, Vivian Place, Frances Calder, Helen Williamson and Marianne Channon.

◈ ◈ ◈

The Symphonic Club will give a concert under the auspices of the Men's Community Club of Washington Park for the annual ladies' night tomorrow. Arthur Hyde is the conductor. The club will be assisted by Elmira Overbeck, soprano. Following is the program:

March, "Pride of the Wolverines," Sousa; overture, "Fest," Leutner; "Entrance and Dance of the Goblins," Schertzinger; song, "Springtime of Youth," Eggett, Elmira Overbeck; "Viennese Melody," Kriesler; Allegro di Motto ("Surprise Symphony"), Haydn; tango Argentino, "El Choclo," Villoldo; waltz, "Naila," Delibes; song, "Thine Alone" from "Eileen," Herbert, Elmira Overbeck; "The Mouse and the Clock," Whitney; "Atlantis, the Lost Continent," Safranck.

BOSTON SYMPHONY'S OPENING CONCERT

With Beethoven's Seventh, sometimes called the "Dance Symphony," for the body of the program, flanked by two works new to Providence, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, led by Serge Koussevitzky, advances on Providence for its opening concert of the season Tuesday night in the Albee Theatre.

The concert will open with two Bach preludes, arranged for string orchestra by Pick-Mangiagalli, Adagio and Vivace, played recently for the first time by the orchestra. Next comes Beethoven, Symphony No. 7 in A-major, opus 92, Poco sostenuto—Vivace, Allegretto, Presto—Assai meno presto—Tempo primo, Allegro con brio. Then, for the second part, Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition," pianoforte pieces, scored for full orchestra by Maurice Ravel especially for Dr. Koussevitzky.

The latter is a series of humorous sketches in which Moussorgsky interpreted musically certain pictures of his friend, the artist Hartman. The pictures are described as follows: Promenade—Gnomes — Tuileries — Bydlo — Ballet of Chickens in Their Shells—Samuel Goldenberg and Schmuyle—Limoges; The Marketplace—Catacombs (Con mortuis in lingua mortua)—The Hut on Fowls' Legs—The Great Gate at Kiev.

Following the opening of the Providence season the orchestra will journey to New York for the first concerts of its Carnegie Hall series. The first week in December it will hold a Beethoven festival in Washington, D. C., one of the outstanding features of the orchestra's

Giuseppe Camilloni
Providence virtuoso gives violin recital in Plantations auditorium this afternoon.

golden jubilee, and giving it a national significance. There it will offer the first, third, fifth, seventh and ninth symphonies; the "Egmont," third "Leonore" and "Coriolanus" overtures, the Fourth Piano Concerto, with Myra Hess; the "Emperor" Concerto, with Josef Hofmann, and the Violin Concerto, with Efrem Zimbalist. A Washington chorus of 200 will combine with the orchestra to close the festival in a performance of the Ninth Symphony.

◈ ◈ ◈

A recital will be given by members of the Palestrina Choral Society and pupils of Frank Barone Tuesday evening at 8:30 o'clock in their studio, room 49, Conrad building.

◈ ◈ ◈

For its second musicale of the season the Chopin club announces the following program, as arranged by Marguerite Watson Shiftoe, to take place Thursday morning at 10:45 o'clock in the Plantations auditorium:

Two pianos, "Sicilienne," Bach; "Perpetual Motion," Weber; "The Arkansas Traveller," Lee Pattison, Lydia Bell, Christine Gladhill; songs, "One the Wild Rose Tree," Rotoli; "For Music," Franz; "Stormy Night," Franz, Marjorie Allison Atkinson, contralto; Christine Gladhill, accompanist. Violin, Sonata opus 30 No. 3, First Movement, Beethoven; "Ocean Zephyrs," opus 41, No. 2, G. Camilloni; Romanza et Rondo Elegante, opus 9, Wieniawski, Guiseppe Camilloni, violinist; Ciro Sacco, accompanist. Songs, "Nom so piu cosa son," "Le Nozze di Figaro," Mozart; "Wie Melodien zieht es mir," Brahms; "Vale" (Farewell) Kennedy Russell; "Will o' the Wisp," Spross, Ivy Hustler Whitehead, soprano; Christine Gladhill, accompanist. Two pianos, "Silhouettes," Arensky, "La Savant," "Polichinelle," "La Coquette," "La Reveur," "La Danseuse," Christine Gladhill, Lydia Bell.

MUSIC ASSOCIATION SERIES OF CONCERTS

Important engagements have lately been added to the concert-goers' datebook in the annual series of Infantry Hall concerts of the Music Association of Providence. There are three in all, the first to be a joint program on Dec. 2 by John Charles Thomas, baritone, and Erika Morini, violinist. Mr. Thomas is remembered as a singer in operetta, from which he turned, with increasing success, to grand opera and the concert platform. Miss Morini, heard in Providence several years ago as a young player of remarkable talent and promise, has returned this season from abroad, now as an artist grown in fulfillment of early predictions.

The Cleveland Orchestra, coming on

Serge Koussevitzky
Russian Conductor and Boston Symphony return Tuesday for opening concert of the orchestra's 50th anniversary series.

Feb. 17, is a standard attraction on the association's programs as it has been included in each of the previous series. Nikolai Sokoloff will conduct and there will be a soloist to be announced later. The final event is another joint recital in which Sigrid Onegin, mezzo-contralto and Myra Hess, pianist, will appear.

UNIVERSITY GLEE CLUB'S OPENER

The University Glee Club initiates its 20th season with a concert on the night of Dec. 5 in Memorial Hall, conducted by Berrick Schloss, and with Horace Britt, 'cellist, as assisting soloist. Special preparations have been going on to make the customary series of three concerts fitting celebrations of the arrival of a year in the club's existence that comes within the class of outstanding anniversaries.

The programs have been planned to emphasize the high standard which the singers have attained in their 20 years together, and through the new and ambitious works to be offered will run a reminiscent strain in the revival of some of the memorable successes of the past. The soloists engaged are expected to add to the festival nature of the concerts. Mr. Britt, the first, has been acclaimed a master of the 'cello abroad and in this country and has played with leading orchestras in Europe as well as in this country and in solo recital.

◈ ◈ ◈

The second musicale of the season under the auspices of the Beethoven Club will be held in Harris Hall, Woonsocket, Thursday night, with a program presented by Reina Frechette, contralto; Charles H. Wagner, tenor; Leonora Boulay Hebert, violin; Evelyn Fellows Offers, viola and Corena Clegg Scattergood, piano.

Miss Frechette will sing a group of six numbers including the "Habanera," from "Carmen," a song by Bohm, "Bonjour Suzon," by Delibes and modern pieces. Her accompanist will be A. Plant. Mr. Wagner's numbers are "O Paradiso," from Meyerbeer's "L'Africana;" "Love is Mine," by Gartner, and another operatic aria, chosen from Halevy's "La Juive." He will be accompanied by Rene Viau. The instrumental trio will play the Andante Largetto and Allegro from the seldom heard Trio by the German composer and 'cellist, Klengel. The program has been arranged by the program committee of which Annie Mason Francis is chairman. The musicale is open to active members and their guests. Others interested in attending should communicate with Mrs. Florence Mulvey Vanasse, 103 Prospect street, Woonsocket.

LIBRARY'S MUSICAL LECTURE AND BOOKS

With the lecture by Dr. Chapman on the Boston Symphony program this afternoon, the Providence Public Library is opening its doors as well as offering its volumes of pertinent reference to the concert, not to mention the use of its piano for further audible illustration of the music. The music to be played by the orchestra will be represented as far as possible by pieces from the library's music collection reserved for this occasion. There will also be a helpful selection of books at hand designed to aid in the better understanding and appreciation of the music of the concert.

The library's collection of pianoforte solos includes Moussorgsky's cycle of 10 pieces entitled "Pictures at an Exhibition," arranged by Harold Bauer. This edition contains an explanatory note, describing the pictures portrayed by the music. An excellent analysis of this work is found in Calvocoressi's biography, "Musorgsky, the Russian Musical Nationalist," with musical illustrations in the text. Oskar von Riesemann in his volume, "Moussorgsky," presents them in most interesting fashion. This biography has been translated from the Russian by Paul England and was added to the library within the past year. The author considers the series of pieces as one of the most charming of Moussorgsky's instrumental compositions, masterpieces in which the technical detail, too, seems inspired. A good account of them is also found in Montagu-Nathan's "History of Russian Music."

Beethoven's Seventh Symphony is especially fortunate in having much material in the books about it, and many arrangements among the music scores. There is an arrangement for piano solo, edited by Liszt, in which the parts played by the various instruments are indicated. There are several arrangements for piano duets, and one edition for two pianos, eight hands. Violinists also can acquaint themselves with it, in the arrangement for violin with piano accompaniment. A miniature orchestral score and a conductor's score complete the list.

A full list of books dealing with this seventh symphony is too long to give here, but mention is made of the well-known works on the Beethoven symphonies by Berlioz, Evans, Goepp, Grove and Upton. These books, together with many more dealing with the orchestra and its instruments, will be reserved for consultation this afternoon following Dr. Chapman's lecture.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. Herald Tribune

Two unfamiliar symphonies will be introduced here by the Boston Symphony Orchestra this week under Serge Koussevitzky's direction on its first New York visit of the season. Thursday evening in Carnegie Hall Dr. Koussevitzky will introduce here the symphony in G minor composed by Albert Roussel for the orchestra's anniversary season. This work was first played in Boston on October 24 in the composer's presence.

Dr. Koussevitzky's novelty for Saturday afternoon in Carnegie Hall is a "Symphonie Lyrique," by Nicholas Nabokov, a Russian composer born in Leningrad in 1903. According to Philip Hale's program notes, Nabokov studied at the Hochschule in Berlin and at Stüttgart and has composed a ballet, ballet-oratorio, a piano concerto and a piano sonata. This symphony was first played by the Orchestra Symphonique de Paris under Pierre Monteux on February 16, 1930, and received its American premiere in a Boston Symphony concert on October 31.

---

just now when he started his weekly message to you, that on a Nov. 11 he well remembers a heavy fall of snow, and he remembers too that he made a note of it on the wall at the place of his employment, but he cannot prove it, for that place was destroyed by fire some time ago. Anyway, he does not wish you to rush right off and hunt up your skates in anticipation of early skating, but he said this just to let you know how the seasons have changed in his lifetime. He expects they will change even more in years, and there is possibly some young reader who will see even greater changes, for it is predicted that the time will come when the New England States will change places as far as temperature is concerned, with Florida.

Just around the corner is another holiday for you, and it is called Thanksgiving Day, and Uncle Red wonders how many of his readers really know what the day stands for, and if they do, how many really appreciate as they should what it is all about. It comes to his mind now and a page from history seems to be spread before his eyes, telling of a day in 1620, when a band of Pilgrims seeking refuge in a new country where they could be free from the restrictions placed upon them in their own land, set foot for the first time on American soil, and gave thanks for being saved from perils that threatened to overwhelm them. We should indeed hail this day

Don't take chances.

Providence has been particularly free from this juvenile sport, if it can be called such, much more so than in some other cities we could mention. Let us keep up the good record and have a national reputation as a city where boys and girls enjoy themselves to the full under safe conditions.

Perhaps the most important service which the Junior High school can render will be that of a careful study of the reactions of each pupil to the varied educational experiences made possible in our new buildings. As the records of these reactions accumulate parents and teachers should confer, consider the evidence so far gathered by the school, and in the light of that evidence decide upon the next step in the child's educational career. Sometimes the evidence gathered by the school may not agree with the long cherished desire of the parents, but when the evidence is sufficiently strong, they should not continue to permit their pride to interfere with the child's future welfare. Probably this will not bring in the educational millenium, but for many pupils the spirit of successful achievement will take the place of the depression produced by continual failure, and in the long run the individual pupil will become the more useful, happy and contented citizen.

Champion Stair Climber

For 42 years, since the dedication of the Washington Monument, Walter S. Jones has directed the footsteps of visitors to the great stone pile and answered their thousands of questions concerning it. He recently retired from the service. He is almost 80 years old. For three years he was assigned to duty at the top and was compelled to climb and descend the 900 steps every day.

NOV 1 61930

48

MUSIC NOTES

Boston Symphony Season Opens Tuesday Evening

Beethoven's Seventh and Two Works New to Providence On Program Selected by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky.—Three Concerts This Afternoon

To the Albee Theatre Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony come Tuesday night for the first of the orchestra's 50th anniversary concerts to be played in this city. The celebration of the semi-centennial is being attended by such notable events as a concert conducted by the band's first leader, Sir George Henschel, special programs and the introduction of works written in tribute to the organization by some of the foremost composers of the day. Providence will hear one of these new compositions Tuesday, and in the three concerts to follow is likely to hear others. As in the past few years the orchestra's local engagements are under the auspices of the Music Association of Providence.

Of interest to students and other symphony-goers will be the talk by Dr. W. Louis Chapman at the Providence Public Library this afternoon at 4:30 o'clock on the music to be played by the orchestra, illustrated by piano excerpts. It will be the first of a series by Dr. Chapman to be given at the library on the Sundays preceding the symphony concerts, and has been arranged, in co-operation with the library, by the Music Students' loan fund committee of the Monday Morning Musical Club of which Mrs. Ada Holding Miller is chairman. The other members are Mrs. Eugene A. Kingman, Mrs. Paul C. DeWolf, Mrs. Harrie E. McGregor, Miss Edith Nichols and Mrs. Harold J. Gross.

In inaugurating these lectures the Monday Morning Musical Club is providing a music appreciation course such as has been conducted in Boston for many years in connection with the symphony programs. Some years ago Dr. Chapman gave a similar series here. Whether symphony subscribers or not, all interested are invited to attend and listen to a talk which will deal particularly with the items of the coming concert.

◈ ◈ ◈

Making his bow in public for the season, Giuseppe Camilloni will appear this afternoon at 3:15 o'clock in a violin recital in the Plantations auditorium, assisted by Ciro Sacco as accompanist. His program includes three longer works by Mozart, Viotti and Bach and a group of shorter pieces, among which are one of his arrangements for the violin and an original composition for that instrument. As a composer Mr. Camilloni has written much for the piano and organ as well as the violin and is an accomplished pianist.

LOUIS KRASNER AT ART CLUB

The Providence Art Club announces a violin recital this afternoon at 4 o'clock by Louis Krasner who has returned from Europe to make his home in this city. He was formerly of Boston. He made his debut two years ago in Berlin, followed by recitals in Paris where he played in the Salle Gaveau and with the Pasdeloup Orchestra. He then went to London, repeating the success he had made on the continent. Engagements succeeded with the Berlin Philharmonic and the Vienna Symphony. Then he came to this country to be soloist with the Boston Symphony with which he gave the first audition in this country of a Concerto by Casella, with the composer conducting.

Last winter he repeated the Concerto at the Augusteo in Rome, with Molinari conducting. He gave 20 concerts in Italy and was made an honorary member of the Academica Filarmonica of Bologna, an ancient institution, whose members are scattered all over the world. He began his musical education in Boston under Prof. Gruenberg at the New England Conservatory of Music. This was followed by further study in Paris.

The program which he will present to members of the Art Club and their families is as follows: Concerto in G-minor, Antonio Vivaldi (1660-1743), Allegro, Adagio, Allegro; "Four Charakterstuecke," opus 22, Franz Salmofer (1902—), Allegro un poco grotesco, Andante tragico, Menuetto grazioso, Quasi tarantella (first time in America); "Nigun" (improvisation), Ernest Bloch; "Hymn to the Sun," Rimsky-Korsakoff-Kreisler; "Praeludium and Allegro," Pugnani-Kreisler. Paul Bregor will be accompanist.

◈ ◈ ◈

Helen Hogan Coome presents this afternoon at 4:30 o'clock the second of her series of three Sunday organ recitals at the Central Congregational Church, with the following program: "Elevation," Frescobaldi; "Aria," "Allegro Quasi Presto," Handel; "Allegretto Gracieuse," Jensen; "Ave Maria," Schubert (by request); "Miserere Mei Domine," arranged by Widor, Bach; Reverie on the hymn tune, "The God of Love Our Shepherd Is," Grace; "Fugue a la Gigue," Bach.

The MacDowell Club meets tomorrow afternoon at 3 o'clock at the home of Mrs. Raymond W. Perry, with Mrs. Walter P. Pierce and Miss Esther Weeden as assisting hostesses. The following program will be presented: soprano solos, "Sweet Phyllis," Strickland; "Overtones," Rasbach; "The Fushia Tree," Quilter, Miss Esther Weeden, Mrs. Raymond W. Perry, accompanist. Piano solos, "Fantasies," No. 1 and 2, Mendelssohn, Mrs. Perry; vocal duets, "The Autumn Wind," Roeckel; "Underneath the Trees," Newton, Miss Weeden and Miss Lydia Ellis, Mrs. Perry, accompanist. Paper, "Music of Colonial New England," Mrs. Walter B. Dodge.

RUGGLES STREET CHURCH CONCERT

The choir of the Ruggles Street Primitive Methodist Church, Providence, will present FGounod's "Redemption" at the evening service at the Smithfield Avenue Congregational Church in Pawtucket at 7 o'clock tonight. The soloists will be: Sopranos, Mrs. Ruth Ludgate, Mrs. Helen C. Place; alto, Miss Eva McMahon; tenors, William DeRoin, Wallace Barrie; baritone, Arthur Elvin; bass, James King; organist, Miss Medora Lederze; pianist, Charles D. Fiske.

LECTURE-RECITAL BY LOCAL HARP CHAPTER

The Founders Chapter of Providence of the National Association of Harpists, will present the Hayden Duo of Boston at the first of its monthly musicales tomorrow night at 8 o'clock in its Conrad building studio. The duo is composed of Gladys Crockford Custance, solo harpist, and Kenneth Custance, lecturer and harpist. Their program, under the title of "Romances and Legends of the Harp," will be as follows:

Traditional Irish tunes, played on Irish harps, "My Cow and James's Cow," "Donnell a Boo" (Irish war tune), Gladys Custance; harp duo, Waltz in A-flat, Brahms; "Theme Ancient Style," V. V. Rogers; Gavotte in B-flat, Handel, arr. by Gebhard. Soprano solos, "On Wings of Song," Mendelssohn; "I Am Thy Harp," H. Woodman, harp accompaniment, Kenneth Custance, Gladys Custance. Irish harp due, "Impromptu," "Eccentric Dance," Rogers; harp solo, "Minuet," Mozart; "Bagatelle," Verdalle, Gladys Custance; harp duo, "Song of the Volga Boatman," arr. by Gebhard.

Van Veachton Rogers is president of the Founders Chapter and vice president of the national association. The hostesses for the evening will be Miriam Doran, Kathleen Miller, Hope Robinson, Helene Alper, Vivian Place, Frances Calder, Helen Williamson and Marianne Channon.

◈ ◈ ◈

The Symphonic Club will give a concert under the auspices of the Men's Community Club of Washington Park for the annual ladies' night tomorrow. Arthur Hyde is the conductor. The club will be assisted by Elmira Overbeck, soprano. Following is the program:

March, "Pride of the Wolverines," Sousa; overture, "Fest," Leutner; "Entrance and Dance of the Goblins," Schertzinger; song, "Springtime of Youth," Eggett, Elmira Overbeck; "Viennese Melody," Kriesler; Allegro di Motto ("Surprise Symphony"), Haydn; tango Argentino, "El Choclo," Villoldo; waltz, "Naila," Delibes; song, "Thine Alone" from "Eileen," Herbert, Elmira Overbeck; "The Mouse and the Clock," Whitney; "Atlantis, the Lost Continent," Safranck.

BOSTON SYMPHONY'S OPENING CONCERT

With Beethoven's Seventh, sometimes called the "Dance Symphony," for the body of the program, flanked by two works new to Providence, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, led by Serge Koussevitzky, advances on Providence for its opening concert of the season Tuesday night in the Albee Theatre.

The concert will open with two Bach preludes, arranged for string orchestra by Pick-Mangiagalli, Adagio and Vivace, played recently for the first time by the orchestra. Next comes Beethoven, Symphony No. 7 in A-major, opus 92, Poco sostenuto—Vivace, Allegretto, Presto—Assai meno presto—Tempo primo, Allegro con brio. Then, for the second part, Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition," pianoforte pieces, scored for full orchestra by Maurice Ravel especially for Dr. Koussevitzky.

The latter is a series of humorous sketches in which Moussorgsky interpreted musically certain pictures of his friend, the artist Hartman. The pictures are described as follows: Promenade—Gnomes — Tuileries — Bydlo — Ballet of Chickens in Their Shells—Samuel Goldenberg and Schmuyle—Limoges; The Marketplace—Catacombs (Con mortuis in lingua mortua)—The Hut on Fowls' Legs—The Great Gate at Kiev.

Following the opening of the Providence season the orchestra will journey to New York for the first concerts of its Carnegie Hall series. The first week in December it will hold a Beethoven festival in Washington, D. C., one of the outstanding features of the orchestra's golden jubilee, and giving it a national significance. There it will offer the first, third, fifth, seventh and ninth symphonies; the "Egmont," third "Leonore" and "Coriolanus" overtures, the Fourth Piano Concerto, with Myra Hess; the "Emperor" Concerto, with Josef Hofmann, and the Violin Concerto, with Efrem Zimbalist. A Washington chorus of 200 will combine with the orchestra to close the festival in a performance of the Ninth Symphony.

◈ ◈ ◈

A recital will be given by members of the Palestrina Choral Society and pupils of Frank Barone Tuesday evening at 8:30 o'clock in their studio, room 49, Conrad building.

◈ ◈ ◈

For its second musicale of the season the Chopin Club announces the following program, as arranged by Marguerite Watson Shaftoe, to take place Thursday morning at 10:45 o'clock in the Plantations auditorium:

Two pianos, "Sicilienne," Bach; "Perpetual Motion," Weber; "The Arkansas Traveller," Lee Pattison, Lydia Bell, Christine Gladhill; songs, "One the Wild Rose Tree," Rotoli; "For Music," Franz; "Stormy Night," Franz, Marjorie Allison Atkinson, contralto; Christine Gladhill, accompanist. Violin, Sonata opus 30 No. 3, First Movement, Beethoven; "Ocean Zephyrs," opus 43, No. 2, G. Camilloni; Romanza et Rondo Elegante, opus 9, Wieniawski, Guiseppe Camilloni, violinist; Ciro Sacco, accompanist. Songs, "Nom so piu cosa son," "Le Nozze di Figaro," Mozart; "Wie Melodien zieht es mir," Brahms; "Vale" (Farewell) Kennedy Russell; "Will o' the Wisp," Spross, Ivy Hustler Whitehead, soprano; Christine Gladhill, accompanist. Two pianos, "Silhouettes," Arensky, "La Savant," "Polichinelle," "La Coquette," "La Reveur," "La Danseuse," Christine Gladhill, Lydia Bell.

MUSIC ASSOCIATION SERIES OF CONCERTS

Important engagements have lately been added to the concert-goers' datebook in the annual series of Infantry Hall concerts of the Music Association of Providence. There are three in all, the first to be a joint program on Dec. 2 by John Charles Thomas, baritone, and Erika Morini, violinist. Mr. Thomas is remembered as a singer in operetta, from which he turned, with increasing success, to grand opera and the concert platform. Miss Morini, heard in Providence several years ago as a young player of remarkable talent and promise, has returned this season from abroad, now as an artist grown in fulfillment of early predictions.

The Cleveland Orchestra, coming on Feb. 17, is a standard attraction on the association's programs as it has been included in each of the previous series. Nikolai Sokoloff will conduct and there will be a soloist to be announced later. The final event is another joint recital in which Sigrid Onegin, mezzo-contralto and Myra Hess, pianist, will appear.

UNIVERSITY GLEE CLUB'S OPENER

The University Glee Club initiates its 20th season with a concert on the night of Dec. 5 in Memorial Hall, conducted by Berrick Schloss, and with Horace Britt, 'cellist, as assisting soloist. Special preparations have been going on to make the customary series of three concerts fitting celebrations of the arrival of a year in the club's existence that comes within the class of outstanding anniversaries.

The programs have been planned to emphasize the high standard which the singers have attained in their 20 years together, and through the new and ambitious works to be offered will run a reminiscent strain in the revival of some of the memorable successes of the past. The soloists engaged are expected to add to the festival nature of the concerts. Mr. Britt, the first, has been acclaimed a master of the 'cello abroad and in this country and has played with leading orchestras in Europe as well as in this country and in solo recital.

◈ ◈ ◈

The second musicale of the season under the auspices of the Beethoven Club will be held in Harris Hall, Woonsocket, Thursday night, with a program presented by Reina Frechette, contralto; Charles H. Wagner, tenor; Leonora Boulay Hebert, violin; Evelyn Fellows Offers, viola and Corena Clegg Scattergood, piano.

Miss Frechette will sing a group of six numbers including the "Habanera," from "Carmen," a song by Bohm, "Bonjour Suzon," by Delibes and modern pieces. Her accompanist will be A. Plant. Mr. Wagner's numbers are "O Paradiso," from Meyerbeer's "L'Africana;" "Love is Mine," by Gartner, and another operatic aria, chosen from Halevy's "La Juive." He will be accompanied by Rene Viau. The instrumental trio will play the Andante Largetto and Allegro from the seldom heard Trio by the German composer and 'cellist, Klengel. The program has been arranged by the program committee of which Annie Mason Francis is chairman. The musicale is open to active members and their guests. Others interested in attending should communicate with Mrs. Florence Mulvey Vanasse, 103 Prospect street, Woonsocket.

LIBRARY'S MUSICAL LECTURE AND BOOKS

With the lecture by Dr. Chapman on the Boston Symphony program this afternoon, the Providence Public Library is opening its doors as well as offering its volumes of pertinent reference to the concert, not to mention the use of its piano for further audible illustration of the music. The music to be played by the orchestra will be represented as far as possible by pieces from the library's music collection reserved for this occasion. There will also be a helpful selection of books at hand designed to aid in the better understanding and appreciation of the music of the concert.

The library's collection of pianoforte solos includes Moussorgsky's cycle of 10 pieces entitled "Pictures at an Exhibition," arranged by Harold Bauer. This edition contains an explanatory note, describing the pictures portrayed by the music. An excellent analysis of this work is found in Calvocoressi's biography, "Musorgsky, the Russian Musical Nationalist," with musical illustrations in the text. Oskar von Riesemann in his volume, "Moussorgsky," presents them in most interesting fashion. This biography has been translated from the Russian by Paul England and was added to the library within the past year. The author considers the series of pieces as one of the most charming of Moussorgsky's instrumental compositions, masterpieces in which the technical detail, too, seems inspired. A good account of them is also found in Montagu-Nathan's "History of Russian Music."

Beethoven's Seventh Symphony is especially fortunate in having much material in the books about it, and many arrangements among the music scores. There is an arrangement for piano solo, edited by Liszt, in which the parts played by the various instruments are indicated. There are several arrangements for piano duets, and one edition for two pianos, eight hands. Violinists also can acquaint themselves with it, in the arrangement for violin with piano accompaniment. A miniature orchestral score and a conductor's score complete the list.

A full list of books dealing with this seventh symphony is too long to give here, but mention is made of the well-known works on the Beethoven symphonies by Berlioz, Evans, Goepp, Grove and Upton. These books, together with many more dealing with the orchestra and its instruments, will be reserved for consultation this afternoon following Dr. Chapman's lecture.

Giuseppe Camilloni
Providence virtuoso gives violin recital in Plantations auditorium this afternoon.

Serge Koussevitzky
Russian Conductor and Boston Symphony return Tuesday for opening concert of the orchestra's 50th anniversary series.

Works New to Providence Feature Symphony Concert

Pick-Mangiagalli's Arrangement of Bach Preludes and Ravel Transcription of Moussorgsky's "Pictures" Listed With Beethoven's Familiar "Seventh"

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, to be heard in the Albee Theatre next Tuesday evening, is now in its fiftieth season. In recognition of this half-century of notable achievement many composers of prominence have written pieces escpecially for the orchestra or have assigned to it the first performance of their latest scores. At the second pair of concerts in Boston Dr. Koussevitzky placed at the head of the program two Preludes of Bach arranged for string orchestra by Pick-Mangiagalli and never previously performed. These Preludes will be heard this week in Providence and with them, as in Boston, will come the Seventh Symphony of Beethoven and Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition" as transcribed for orchestra by Maurice Ravel.

The making of orchestral arrangements of the organ and other instrumental works of Bach is a favorite pastime of composers great and small. Sometimes these transcriptions are for the full modern orchestra; sometimes they are for strings alone, thus preserving a better balance between thought and expression since the orchestra, as we understand it, was a thing unknown to the Cantor of Leipzig. These transcriptions by Pick-Mangiagalli, a gifted composer who enjoys a double musical heritage, Czech and Italian, belong to the latter class, and hence are not calculated to arouse the ire of the purists as did, for example, Schoenberg's flamboyant orchestration of the "Saint Anne'e" organ fugue heard in Boston last season. For one of his Preludes Pick-Mangiagalli has gone to the rich mine of Bach's organ music, taking the slow and solemn introduction to an organ fugue in D minor, that numbered 9 in the Bach Gesellschaft edition, transposing it a tone higher. Its companion piece is a brilliant Prelude in E major from the Third Partita for violin alone, a favorite piece with concert violinists. The music as it stands Pick-Mangiagalli has made his first violin part, adding parts for the remaining strings in the contrapuntal manner of the great master. It is a brilliant achievement, and nowhere does the music as it now stands go outside the Bachian frame.

Likewise new to Providence will be the other orchestral transcription, that of Moussorgsky's extraordinarily graphic piano suite made by Ravel at Dr. Koussevitzky's request some eight years ago and first performed at a Koussevitzky concert in Paris. Many musicians, although not all, have felt that Moussorgsky's vivid tonal impressions of the drawings and water-colors by Victor Hartmann, which he saw in Leningrad (it was then St. Petersburg) in the spring of 1874, need for their full effectiveness a more resourceful instrument than the piano. Ravel was not the first to supply this need by transcribing the Pictures for orchestra, but it is doubtful whether any other has or could have accomplished the task with such triumphant success. As the work now stands the music and its instrumental dress might have emanated from the same brain. Yet Ravel, able and imaginative composer that he is, could never have written the piano suite, for Moussorgsky had a gift for musical characterization altogether unique; and on the other hand the wayward, half-untutored Russian, who scored as an amateur, would have been utterly incapable of doing orchestral justice to his ten tonal sketche. Moreover this Frenchman who yields to none of his contemporaries in his understanding of orchestral possibilities has manifested a peculiar sympathy with Moussorgsky's point of view, his highly individual musical ideas.

The remaining number on the program, Beethoven's Seventh Symphony, is familiar to all who attend orchestral concerts. As to the relative worth and importance of this Symphony commentators and critics are divided, as they have ever been divided regarding the possible poetic ideas that may have underlain Beethoven's musical conceptions. The various theories of what the Seventh Symphony "means" will be duly set forth in Mr. Philip Hale's program-notes on the concert. For most concert-goers, however, it is enough to enjoy the Seventh Symphony as pure music, and if it seems here and there over-repetitious, if the last movement seems to stand on a lower plane than certain others of Beethoven's finales, there is still in the work enough of a peculiar and satisfying beauty to make it indispensable to us. The Seventh is first of all a joyous symphony. Even the marvellous Allegretto, though it runs for the most part in the minor mode, breathes contentment rather than melancholy. Vincent d'Indy has taken issue with Wagner's dictum that the Seventh Symphony is the apotheosis of the dance, but for many that characterization holds as final.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. Herald Tribune

Two unfamiliar symphonies will be introduced here by the Boston Symphony Orchestra this week under Serge Koussevitzky's direction on its first New York visit of the season. Thursday evening in Carnegie Hall Dr. Koussevitzky will introduce here the symphony in G minor composed by Albert Roussel for the orchestra's anniversary season. This work was first played in Boston on October 24 in the composer's presence.

Dr. Koussevitzky's novelty for Saturday afternoon in Carnegie Hall is a "Symphonie Lyrique," by Nicholas Nabokov, a Russian composer born in Leningrad in 1903. According to Philip Hale's program notes, Nabokov studied at the Hochschule in Berlin and at Stüttgart and has composed a ballet, ballet-oratorio, a piano concerto and a piano sonata. This symphony was first played by the Orchestra Symphonique de Paris under Pierre Monteux on February 16, 1930, and received its American premiere in a Boston Symphony concert on October 31.

49

MMENT OF THE CURR

Serge Koussevitzky, Who Conducts the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Its Opening Concert of the Season in New York Thursday Evening at Carnegie Hall.

FOUNDED 1900

FLORENCE FRENCH
EDITOR AND PUBLISHER

MUSICAL LEADER

E. F. SMITH
J. DEMERATH
F. M. WARD

TELEPHONE } 4839
HARRISON } 5408
CABLE ADDRESS MUSICLEAD CHICAGO

SUBSCRIPTION: $3.00 FOR YEAR
CANADIAN $4.00 FOR YEAR
FOREIGN $4.50 FOR YEAR

PUBLISHED EVERY THURSDAY

501 McCORMICK BUILDING
332 SO. MICHIGAN AVE.

CHICAGO.

NOV 1 2 1930

YOUR ATTENTION IS CALLED TO THE ATTACHED CLIPPING WHICH APPEARED IN LAST THURSDAY'S ISSUE OF THE MUSICAL LEADER.

Serge Koussevitzky will introduce Albert Roussel's new symphony (one of the many scores composed especially for the orchestra's fiftieth anniversary celebration), at the Boston Symphony Orchestra's concert in New York Nov. 20. The work was given its initial hearing in Boston last month at which time the composer was present.

* * *

Mozart and Prokofiev

At the Symphony Concert Dr. Koussevitzky's Mozart again bore away the palm. Believably he has found the secret in a reduced string choir. Against it Mozart's wind instruments in pairs are not over-balanced. The mere weight of the strings does not impede free, fleet, flexible movement. Transparent themselves, they no longer hide accompanying figures or lightly traced arabesques. When this little orchestra was clustered about Mr. Polatschek for the clarinet-concerto, the illusion of eighteenth-century performance was as complete as it is rare. And how deep and high rang the interposed chords in the overture to "The Magic Flute" when no swarm of strings came before and after them! The tradition is that each conductor of the Symphony Orchestra grows through his term. With Mozart in particular Dr. Koussevitzky has ripened.

A second hearing did not much clarify impressions of Prokofiev's new symphony. Again he abounded in ways and means—to excess in the nearly endless rhythmic figures of the finale. Again he invented melodies, as in the middle movements, then whipped them through unrelated keys or tortured them into dissonant counterpoint. Often he was sparo and simple—only to turn complex and baffling. Measures sounded symphonically as though they were written for the concert-hall; while others smacked as plainly of Diaghilev's stage. Once more, in the energies of the first movement and the finale, in the darkling intrusion of tuba and contrabassoon across the slow movement, perhaps in the alternations of the "Scherzoso," the listener suspected a background of program undisclosed. Once more the whole seemed an austere, sombre, symphony, churning itself into musical being. The composer numbers it Opus 47; yet with all these works, it does not classify. Possibly, it is Prokofiev at a new departure.

MMENT OF THE CURR

Serge Koussevitzky, Who Conducts the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Its Opening Concert of the Season in New York Thursday Evening at Carnegie Hall.

Mozart and Prokofiev

At the Symphony Concert Dr. Koussevitzky's Mozart again bore away the palm. Believably he has found the secret in a reduced string choir. Against it Mozart's wind instruments in pairs are not over-balanced. The mere weight of the strings does not impede free, fleet, flexible movement. Transparent themselves, they no longer hide accompanying figures or lightly traced arabesques. When this little orchestra was clustered about Mr. Polatschek for the clarinet-concerto, the illusion of eighteenth-century performance was as complete as it is rare. And how deep and high rang the interposed chords in the overture to "The Magic Flute" when no swarm of strings came before and after them! The tradition is that each conductor of the Symphony Orchestra grows through his term. With Mozart in particular Dr. Koussevitzky has ripened.

A second hearing did not much clarify impressions of Prokofiev's new symphony. Again he abounded in ways and means—to excess in the nearly endless rhythmic figures of the finale. Again he invented melodies, as in the middle movements, then whipped them through unrelated keys or tortured them into dissonant counterpoint. Often he was sparo and simple—only to turn complex and baffling. Measures sounded symphonically as though they were written for the concert-hall; while others smacked as plainly of Diaghilev's stage. Once more, in the energies of the first movement and the finale, in the darkling intrusion of tuba and contrabassoon across the slow movement, perhaps in the alternations of the "Scherzoso," the listener suspected a background of program undisclosed. Once more the whole seemed an austere, sombre, symphony, churning itself into musical being. The composer numbers it Opus 47; yet with all these works, it does not classify. Possibly, it is Prokofiev at a new departure.

FOUNDED 1900

FLORENCE FRENCH
EDITOR AND PUBLISHER

MUSICAL LEADER

E. F. SMITH
J. DEMERATH
F. M. WARD

TELEPHONE } 4839
HARRISON } 5408
CABLE ADDRESS: MUSICLEAD CHICAGO

SUBSCRIPTION: $3.00 FOR YEAR
CANADIAN $4.00 FOR YEAR
FOREIGN $4.50 FOR YEAR

PUBLISHED EVERY THURSDAY

CHICAGO.

501 McCORMICK BUILDING
332 SO. MICHIGAN AVE.

NOV 16 1930

YOUR ATTENTION IS CALLED TO THE ATTACHED CLIPPING WHICH APPEARED IN LAST THURSDAY'S ISSUE OF THE MUSICAL LEADER.

Serge Koussevitzky will introduce Albert Roussel's new symphony (one of the many scores composed especially for the orchestra's fiftieth anniversary celebration), at the Boston Symphony Orchestra's concert in New York Nov. 20. The work was given its initial hearing in Boston last month at which time the composer was present.

* * *

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

NOV 19 1930

IN TERMS OF MUSIC
Comment in Season

Perfection of Execution of String Choirs and Unsurpassed Wood Wind Section Feature Seventh Symphony as Played by Boston Symphony

There can be no denial of the fact the rare visits to this city of the Boston Symphony Orchestra are occasions, indeed, that these concerts are looked forward to with extraordinary interest and that they are talked of for a long time before and afterwards. So momentous an event may be realized when we find that many persons are sufficiently interested to make themselves familiar with the music beforehand, to attend lectures on the concert and to study the music again after hearing it. This is true musical education.

A knowledge of the thematic material, of the tempo and of the orchestral tone coloring is of immense help in complete enjoyment, for the more one knows about any form of art the greater the pleasure on viewing or hearing it. The advance notice of "two preludes by Bach" did not assist such interested students, for there are many preludes of Bach, some for piano, some for organ and others for orchestra—the orchestra of Bach's time.

It is well that some of them are being arranged for modern orchestras and for modern organs. For we know that Bach's musical soul was most poetic, his a mind of far vision and his musical material highly susceptible of amplification and development.

The Preludes played last night more than ever convinced one of the true value of the contrapuntal methods of tone association. They were played with great breadth and sonority of tone, with the crisp diction and rhythmic swing so characteristic of Bach, and must be considered a valuable addition to the literature of the orchestra. Yet the string bass can never equal the reeds and diapasons of the organ for obvious physical limitations, but only organists can appreciate this and as yet there has been no voice to debate this question or expound these views.

BOSTON SYMPHONY PROGRAM

Bach ..... Two Preludes
(Arranged for String Orchestra by Pick-Mangiagalli.)
I. Adagio.
II. Vivace.
Beethoven .....
Symphony No. 7 in A major, Op. 92.
I. Poco sostenuto: Vivace.
II. Allegretto.
III. Presto: Assai meno presto. Tempo primo.
IV. Allegro con brio.
Moussorgsky .....
"Picturee at an Exhibition," Pianoforte Pieces arranged for Orchestra by Maurice Ravel.

The Preludes were of striking contrast, the first being extremely piano and with the greatest possible legato; the other being toccata-like and of great contrapuntal interest because it is arranged from single violin score. It is therefore obvious that great credit is due Pick-Mangiagalli for his mastery of fugue, counterpoint and their application to the orchestra.

The ever enjoyable Seventh Symphony is always a delight. With its well-known violations of the musical orthodoxy of the time, its rich orchestration, the subdued and serious allegretto and the rapidly moving presto it furnishes a veritable kaleidoscope of ever-changing tone color alternating with serious and contemplative inventions which have taken deep root in the souls of most musicians, who have taken its seeming novelties to themselves and who rejoice whenever they may hear them from a grand orchestra.

There is an individuality to this symphony of Beethoven—none other even of Beethoven is like it, nor is it as easily comprehended and appreciated as are some of the Beethoven symphonies. In last night's presentation we particularly noted with interest the perfection of execution of the string choirs, the unsurpassed wood wind section, the luscious tone of the new clarinet recently added to the orchestra and the traditional tempos so properly adopted by the conductor. A vigorous and fitting reading of the symphony with obvious attention to the superb lyricism demanded by the esthetic portions of the composition.

The "Pictures" of Mussorgsky were of great interest and significance. Whatever may be our views on "program music" we must acknowledge the efforts of those who seek to unify pictorial art with music and we must yield to the spell of music that would be beautiful of itself even if no description sought to make it more easily understood.

Agility of wood wind and strings vied with sonorous brass to make impressive contrasts, the brass choir having things all to itself at times, which is always effective. As to the descriptive character of the music, it may be said that a great variety of subjects might caption the movements without in any way interfering with their plausibility. Of course we liked them, some of them stirring and military. Others almost grotesque, as they were intended to be. Of them all, the Ballet of Chickens has imagination, and of course it was the clarinet that gave the call of chanticleer.

The variety of tonal effects in this suite is almost endless and we venture to say that the orchestration deserves quite as much praise as the composer. So successful were these tone pictures that it was with difficulty that the audience restrained itself from applauding after several of the numbers.

DR. W. LOUIS CHAPMAN.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PAWTUCKET, R. I.
TIMES

NOV 19 1930

Symphony Season Opened at Albee

Koussevitzky Leads Boston Orchestra in First Concert of Course.

There is no abatement in the popularity of the Boston Symphony orchestra concerts in Providence. There is no loosening of their grip on the imagination of music lovers, as the first in the new season's course last night abuntantly proved. Once more the Albee Theatre was crowded, and once more a Providence welcome, hearty and heartfelt, was given Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and his splendid company of musicians. It was an occasion of great interest to all Rhode Island people who are concerned with the best the world of music has to offer.

As usual, the conductor presented a programme which paid its need of recognition to the most highly honored traditions and also to the claims of the present day. The main number, the real feast of the evening, was Beethoven's noble seventh symphony, that magnificent composition without which a symphony season, long or short, would be incomplete. In four concerts it is not possible to present a lengthy list of such monumental compositions; there can be no more than one at each concert, and those who were present last evening should express their whole-souled gratitude to Dr. Koussevitzky for selecting the glorious Beethoven work.

It was played with that beautiful precision characteristic of the Boston organization and interpreted with the art that is born of Koussevitzky's deep appreciation. The audience held in the closest harmony with the players and director throughout the long period broke into unrestrained applause at the close, paying to the orchestra and its leader a tremendous tribute.

The concert opened with two preludes of Bach arranged for strings by Pick-Mangiagalli. It was an excellent first number, inducing in the audience exactly the proper mood for the symphony which followed. As a closing piece Dr. Koussevitzky selected one of his numerous novelties, Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition," for the piano, as arranged for orchestra by Maurice Ravel.

A modern Russian and Ravel are bound to make a combination of interest and bristling with musical humor. But there is more than humor in these pieces; they are interpretive and descriptive in the highest degree, fascinating in their color and highly intefesting from any standpoint.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN

NOV 19 1930

Boston Symphony Program Again Delights Its Hearers

Perfection of Execution by String Choirs and Unsurpassed Wood Wind Section Mark Beethoven's Seventh Symphony, Critic Declares. Bach Preludes Entertain.

There can be no denial of the fact the rare visits to this city of the Boston Symphony Orchestra are occasions, indeed, that these concerts are looked forward to with extraordinary interest and that they are talked of for a long time before and afterwards. So momentous an event may be realized when we find that many persons are sufficiently interested to make themselves familiar with the music beforehand, to attend lectures on the concert and to study the music again after hearing it. This is true musical education.

THE PROGRAM

Bach ..... Two Preludes
(Arranged for String Orchestra by Pick-Mangiagalli.)
I. Adagio.
II. Vivace.
Beethoven .....
Symphony No. 7 in A major, Op. 92.
I. Poco sostenuto. Vivace.
II. Allegretto.
III. Presto. Assai meno presto. Tempo primo.
IV. Allegro con brio.
Moussorgsky .....
Picturee at an Exhibition, "Pianoforte Pieces arranged for Orchestra by Maurice Ravel.

A knowledge of the thematic material, of the tempo and of the orchestral tone coloring is of immense help in complete enjoyment, for the more one knows about any form of art the greater the pleasure on viewing or hearing it. The advance notice of "two preludes by Bach" did not assist such interested students, for there are many preludes of Bach, some for piano, some for organ and others for orchestra—the orchestra of Bach's time.

It is well that some of them are being arranged for modern orchestras and for modern organs. For we know that Bach's musical soul was most poetic, his a mind of far vision and his musical material highly susceptible of amplification and development.

The Preludes played last night more than ever convinced one of the true value of the contrapuntal methods of tone association. They were played with great breadth and sonority of tone, with the crisp diction and rhythmic swing so characteristic of Bach, and must be considered a valuable addition to the literature of the orchestra. Yet the string bass can never equal the reeds and diapasons of the organ for obvious physical limitations, but only organists can appreciate this and as yet there has been no voice to debate this question or expound these views.

The Preludes were of striking contrast, the first being extremely piano and with the greatest possible legato; the other being toccata-like and of great contrapuntal interest because it is arranged from single violin score. It is therefore obvious that great credit is due Pick-Mangiagalli for his mastery of fugue, counterpoint and their application to the orchestra.

The ever enjoyable Seventh Symphony is always a delight. With its well-known violations of the musical orthodoxy of the time, its rich orchestration, the subdued and serious allegretto and the rapidly moving presto it furnishes a veritable kaleidoscope of ever-changing tone color alternating with serious and contemplative inventions which have taken deep root in the souls of most musicians, who have taken its seeming novelties to themselves and who rejoice whenever they may hear them from a grand orchestra.

There is an individuality to this symphony of Beethoven—none other even of Beethoven is like it, nor is it as easily comprehended and appreciated as are some of the Beethoven symphonies. In last night's presentation we particularly noted with interest the perfection of execution of the string choirs, the unsurpassed wood wind section, the luscious tone of the new clarinet recently added to the orchestra and the traditional tempos so properly adopted by the conductor. A vigorous and fitting reading of the symphony with obvious attention to the superb lyricism demanded by the esthetic portions of the composition.

The "Pictures" of Mussorgsky were of great interest and significance. Whatever may be our views on "program music" we must acknowledge the efforts of those who seek to unify pictorial art with music and we must yield to the spell of music that would be beautiful of itself even if no description sought to make it more easily understood.

Agility of wood wind and strings vied with sonorous brass to make impressive contrasts, the brass choir having things all to itself at times, which is always effective. As to the descriptive character of the music, it may be said that a great variety of subjects might caption the movements without in any way interfering with their plausibility. Of course we liked them, some of them stirring and military. Others almost grotesque, as they were intended to be. Of them all, the Ballet of Chickens has imagination, and of course it was the clarinet that gave the call of chanticleer.

The variety of tonal effects in this suite is almost endless and we venture to say that the orchestration deserves quite as much praise as the composer. So successful were these tone pictures that it was with difficulty that the audience restrained itself from applauding after several of the numbers.

DR. W. LOUIS CHAPMAN.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
NEWS TRIBUNE

NOV 19 1930

-:- MUSIC -:-

VERSATILE KOUSSEVITZKY

It is a long way from Bach to Moussorgsky but Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and his Boston Symphony Orchestra took the road on their stride last night. Indeed, as we listened and watched, we wondered whether the stride has not become measurably longer and easier, whether, in other words, Koussevitzky's vision and craftsmanship, are not growing. We think they are; we think he is now a greater leader even than he was when he first came to Boston. If the test of genius is that it should show powers of growing indefinitely Dr. Koussevitzky seems to pass it very easily.

It would be a work of supererogation to praise his playing of Beethoven's "Seventh Symphony" last night. Of all the nine, this one has always, we think, appealed most to Koussevitzky, because of its peculiar content. There is in it almost everything he demands to interest him, psychological trouble, racial distinctiveness and, in the end, musical sublimity.

Naturally Mr. Koussevitzky played the two Bach preludes with distinction, and his men followed him with loving reverence for the amazing subleties of the music. The great reserve power of his orchestra, not only the reserve power of each individual in it, but of the orchestra as a whole, were never better demonstrated than in the playing of these two preludes which Pick-Mangiagalli has arranged.

We have written before now of the Moussorgsky masterpiece, which was played. We need repeat only that its rehearing confirms us in our conviction that the eccentric Russian, with all his "abandoned ways," ranks with the greatest musical creators of all time. It has needed the admirable devotion of Rimsky-Korsakoff and others to show him to us at his best. But none of these will suffer for his devotion. Moussorgsky was a master whose stature is as certain to increase with time as is that of, let us say, El Greco in the world of painting or Baudelaire in the world of literature.

As for Dr. Koussevitzky, to whom we naturally return, we can only say of him as we did in the beginning, that he continues to grow, performing the apparent miracle that what seems perfect can become still more perfect. There are times when he seems to indulge himself in the liberties of the mere virtuoso, but we have come to regard them as merely forerunners of some accomplishment that will reveal new possibilities of his genius. With Toscanini and Stokowski he now rules the world of the orchestra. Among the persons of such an aesthetic trinity, we refuse to express a preference; we pay homage without reservation to Dr. Koussevitzky and his most gallant company of musicians.

X. Y. Z.

N. Y. TIMES

NOV 21 1930

MUSIC

By OLIN DOWNES.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, which seemed never more sensitively adjusted and coordinated, gave its first New York concert of the season under Mr. Koussevitzky's direction last night in Carnegie Hall. The occasion was notable not only for the quality of the playing but for the first New York performance of Albert Roussel's Symphony in G minor, a work recently composed for the fiftieth anniversary of the orchestra, which commenced its ministrations under George Henschel half a century ago.

How will this symphony appear to us, or how would it appear to us, after repeated hearings? No one who has reviewed music for a newspaper fails to realize after a little experience that music at first incomprehensible becomes often significant and beautiful with intimate acquaintance, while it is often that a work hailed as a masterpiece at a first performance is forgotten within a decade. These remarks are made as prelude to the further remark that at a first hearing the symphony impressed this writer as very well and sincerely written, and as a very dry example of modern composition. It is cyclic in form, a central theme serving as the basis for metamorphoses in the four different moments, thus binding the movements together in the fashion practiced especially by Cesar Franck and by Vincent d'Indy, in former years Mr. Roussel's teacher. The style is contemporaneous, "polyharmonic" and "polytonal" devices being employed when the logic of the musical thought justifies combinations of chords and combinations of keys. But this is neither far-fetched nor affected with Roussel. There is no question of his sincerity and the virility of his intention.

Whether this intention is realized in a very thoughtfully written work is another matter. On first acquaintance the most impressive pages in the score are those which occur with the peroration of the fugue in the slow movement. There, by virtue of contrapuntal developments, Roussel hits upon some effective tonal combinations and a very sonorous climax, a climax followed by more sensuous music, perhaps incongrous in point of style with what has preceded, and savoring more of the romantic nineteenth than the linear twentieth century in mood.

But elsewhere there is the impression of paucity of thought, of ideas not in themselves very fruitful. More than one composer, admittedly, has developed undistinguished ideas in an imposing manner, but when this occurs it does so because there is an accumulation of musical material occasioned by the stimulus of the composer's creative nature. There is not the sensation of organic growth in the work heard last night. In the first movement there is already the quality of aridness, and it is betrayed, among other ways, by means of the persistence and finally the monotony of the rhythm. The first movement of a symphony which sets forth rich and varied material for later construction by the composer is not found here. The opening movement is more like a scherzo than the cornerstone of a symphonic edifice.

It can be answered that Roussel is writing a short, concise, highly rhythmical and contrapuntal work, in the unromantic spirit and the linear style so much the fashion now. Perhaps he is. Certainly he is to the point proceeding with economy of means and without padding. This is better than crowding a score with pages of superfluous notes. But if there is a shortage of ideas and of vitality in their treatment it does not matter very much by which way the composer misses his mark. This is for us—we say it with due regard for Roussel's enviable position among contemporaneous French composers—an academic work.

The symphony was very brilliantly played, the performance being a tour de force of technical and interpretive achievement. Berlioz's "Roman Carnival" overture opened the concert. It was played with much finish and technical incisiveness and with too little spontaneity and abandon. For many the climax of the concert was the poetical performance, distinguished also by ravishing tonal beauty, of the Brahms symphony. Was not the first movement of this symphony taken at a more deliberate face than Mr. Koussevitzky adopted when he gave this score a memorable reading at an earlier New York performance? Whether or not that is the case, the music was too "andante" for its best good, while the performance as a whole was one of delightful fancy and pastoral feeling, and in the slow movement more—this slow movement which was such a hard nut for audiences of even a quarter of a century ago to crack, and is now one of the best-beloved pages of the symphonic Brahms—in the singing of grave and noble melodic passages, and the plastic treatment of this movement, in the song of solo instruments, and the vigor and brusqueness which set off the lyrical passages of the symphony Mr. Koussevitzky wrought admirably. At the end the audience applauded for many minutes the work and the performance. Tomorrow afternoon Mr. Koussevitzky and his men will give their second concert of the week in Carnegie Hall, playing Glinka's overture to "Russlan and Ludmilla," a new symphony by Nabokow, and Tschaikowsky's Fourth Symphony.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. JOURNAL

NOV 21 1930

Boston Orchestra Plays a New Symphony

By IRVING WEIL.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, now in the fiftieth year of its existence, has gone in for a perfect orgy of new music, especially ordered and written by the foremost of contemporary composers to celebrate this anniversary. Boston will hear all of it, but our suburb on the Hudson will presumably be regaled with only such of it as the Hub finds most successful. The excitement of this carnival burst forth at once last night at theseason's first visit of the Bostonians to Carnegie Hall.

Serge Koussevitzky, the permanent conductor of the orchestra, whose zeal in providing the men of the day a hearing is responsible for this comprehensive anniversary project, gave it an auspicious start last night; for the first of the new works to be introduced here, a symphony in G-minor by the Frenchman, Albert Roussel, turned out to be one of the most telling pieces of modernistic music that we have yet heard.

STRIKING IN EFFECT.

The symphony in his Opus 42 (he is in his sixty-second year) and is suposedly his most recent work in any of the larger forms. It is in the customary four movements and that, in spite of its modernistic persuasion, is not its only aspect of the traditional. Its sequence of content and expression—in a word, the general idea behind it—follows the progression of this sort of thing in symphonies from Mozart and Beethoven down to Brahms.

A SWIFT PACE.

The first movement, for example, moves almost throughout at a swift and highly rhythmic pace. The effect is that of a ceaseless trot, of creatures endlessly trot-trot-trotting on a treadmill. The slow movement is chiefly the chase of a fugue, with the rhythmic trot again cleverly suggested in the background of the composer's intent. The scherzo is an unexpectedly short bit of enlivening interlude, based on a folkdance (the pleasures of the moderns are pitifully brief). And the finale brings the treadmill back to your mind once more.

AN ERA'S SPIRIT.

But of course rhythm is not his only resource. In his middle age he became converted to polytonality and he makes use of this modernist system of writing in two or more keys at the same time with great skill. In his symphony it fulfills a definite purpose, that of suffusing his music with metallic tone. This harmonic tone enforces his basic idea and makes you know what it is all about. The symphony, indeed, vividly evokes the spirit of a mechanical era.

Mr. Koussevitzky and his orchestra, which in a different way from either the Philharmonic or the Philadelphians is a splendid band, played the Roussel symphony with virtuoso effect. The concert opened with an admirable performance of Berlioz's "Roman Carnival" overture and closed with a typically Koussevitzkyian account of the Brahms Second Symphony.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. AMERICAN

NOV 21 1930

BOSTON ORCHESTRA OPENS N. Y. SEASON WITH KOUSSEVITZKY

By LEONARD LIEBLING.

Additional interest attaches to the home concerts and tours of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this season because of the fact that the organization is celebrating the golden jubilee of its existence.

In Boston the event was marked with festive observances last month, including the invitation appearance, as conductor, of Wilhelm Gericke, eighty-five years old, who led the orchestra during its earlier seasons, from 1884 to 1889. Since then the most famous of its conductors have been the unforgettable Arthur Nikisch, Max Fielder, Pierre Monteux, Dr. Carl Muck, and its present commandant of the baton, Serge Koussevitzky.

The Boston Symphony annual series of concerts here was opened last evening at Carngie Hall with a program consisting of Berlioz's "Carneval Romain," Roussel's symphony in G minor, opus 42, and the second symphony, D major, by Brahms.

In Intensive Mood

Koussevitzky, in his most intensive and electrical mood, gave highly arresting interpretations, rising to his most impressive achievement in the symphony by Brahms. Like many other modern conductors, Koussevitzky has discarded the belief held for so many years that Brahms was primarily intellectual and secondarily melodious, and that the proper representation of his symphonies requires a scholarly rigidity regarded in some quarters as essentially Teutonic.

Of recent years, the great melodic line and the warm humanity of Brahms have been discovered by truly responsive conductors, and the old-fashioned "typical Brahms reading" properly appraised and found wanting, now has gone permanently into the limbo of things outgrown and discarded. For this relief, much thanks.

The Koussevitzky version last night had imagination, warmth, loveliness, and yet the deep seriousness and the tremendous architecture of Brahms were emphasized appropriately by the understanding conductor.

Special Work Heard

To mark the fiftieth birthday of the Boston band, several composers have written special works for its present jubilation season. One of those complimentary creations was heard last evening in the form of the G minor symphony by Albert Roussel, sixty-one-year-old Frenchman.

This Roussel music has venerable form and contents as a basis, but makes some concessions to modern tastes by employing a wider harmonic scope and freer orchestration than were generally in vogue when Roussel (at one time a professor of counterpoint), began to publish his works. He was a composition pupil of D'Indy, but fortunately, did not copy the austere and aloof musical style of his master. The present G minor symphony is smoothly written, fastidious and distinctly agreeable material even if not epochally important or seemingly destined for wide and sustained acceptance.

The orchestra played with fine elan, tonal taste and brilliant technic. A large audience applauded the visitors with unfeigned enthusiasm.

THIS CLIPPING FROM NEW YORK SUN

51

NOV 21 1930

Boston Symphony Concert

Organization Opens Its Forty-fifth Season Here With Albert Roussel Work.

By W. J. HENDERSON.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra began its forty-fifth season in this city with the concert of last evening in Carnegie Hall. It recently ushered in its fiftieth season in Boston with appropriate celebrations, amid the acclamations of the dwellers at the Hub and the hearty congratulations of the entire musical world. Sir George Henschel, first conductor of the orchestra, emerged from his retirement in England to wield the baton once more and famous composers prepared new works to be produced under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky.

After last night's concert had opened with the "Roman Carnival" overture of Berlioz (not quite appropriate to a festival of the modern Athens) it continued with Albert Roussel's G minor symphony, opus 42, written for the fiftieth anniversary of the orchestra. The one remaining number on the list was the second symphony of Brahms, which was composed before the Boston orchestra was born. Mr. Philip Hale, author of the incomparable program notes of the Bostonians, says that he did not get the score in time to make analytical explanations. All he could tell us was that in the slow movement the composer introduced a fugue, using as a subject the first theme of the movement in diminution.

About the anatomical structure of symphonies publics have for years been lamentably apathetic. We fear that a dissection of the novelty heard last night would accomplish nothing profitable. But something may be said about the character of Roussel's art in general and of this composition in particular. Mr. Roussel believes in polytonality, or the counterpoint of keys, but not when so used as to destroy what he calls "the sensation of key." One therefore expects from him music of bold and even aggressive harmonic plan, a structure perhaps unconventional, but logical and virile, and melody individual and generally acrid. It has been said of him that he loves beauty of line and that he is far from being ascetic in style. Robust and healthy his admirers have called his music.

Of the courage and independence of this composer there can be no doubt. His sincerity appears to be equally unquestionable. These brave spiritual possessions had already been revealed in his "Evocations" and even more brightly in his symphony in B flat. In the symphony disclosed to us last night were found also Roussel's delight in those triphammer rhythms with brazen utterance which serve but weakly to disguise poverty of thematic invention. Of the composer's fondness for dissonance there were fewer evidences. Indeed, some of his pages, especially in the slow movement before and after the fugue, lingered sweetly upon the ear. There was a fundamental feeling of tonality and there was a harmonic texture generally solid. But of novelty of conception and emotional quality the work seemed singularly devoid.

Vigorous idioms, an eager and searching pressure on the slenderest of ideas and a skill in the use of orchestral means made a pretentious surface, beneath which there seemed to be nothing of depth or substance. The symphony was more euphonious to old-fashioned ears than most modernist music, but quite as empty. It was more grateful than the violin sonata which Mr. Szigeti introduced to us on January 23, 1928, but no more important.

Mr. Koussevitzky had bestowed on the composition a vast amount of study and rehearsal and his orchestra gave to it a performance which placed it before the audience in the best possible light. There was applause, of course, but it was not jubilant. The conductor was very wise in setting the work before the Brahms symphony instead of after it. It was written much later, but is not nearly so young. The D major symphony of Brahms sheds the falling leaves of each successive autumn and emerges ever fresh and green. We fear that in a dozen winters this new work of Roussel will have grown as feeble and gray and tottering as the "Carnival Romain" of Berlioz, which was played brilliantly, but in vain.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. MORN. WORLD

NOV 21 1930

Music

By Samuel Chotzinoff

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, Carnegie Hall, 8.30.

Overture, Carnival Romain.....Berlioz
Symphony in G Minor, Op. 42.....Roussel
Symphony No. 2 in D.....Brahms

The Boston Symphony Orchestra presented itself for the first time this season for the admiration of its local adherents at Carnegie Hall last night. It came bearing, as usual, a gift of a new composition, Mr. Albert Roussel's new Symphony in G minor, op. 42. Curiously enough, the offering had been originally a present from the composer to the Boston orchestra on the occasion of its fiftieth birthday, a celebration which took place recently and, as you no doubt have heard, was observed with the solemnity it deserved.

I do not know how the Bostonians received the Roussel symphony, but under the circumstances one could hardly blame the gratified city if it took it to its bosom. Not being in the position of looking a gift symphony in the mouth, our own reaction last night was rather lukewarm than joyous, as we applauded at the finish in a manner which might have meant that we bore no ill-will to anyone concerned in it. It seemed, to me at any rate, that the gift hardly measured up to the occasion. Indeed, the Second Symphony of Brahms, which figured on the Boston program as just a piece of music, was, I thought, a finer medium for commemorating the half-century birthday of the celebrated orchestra.

It will give you an idea of how far we have progressed in our assimilation of the modern medium when I confess that Mr. Roussel's symphony sounded like old stuff. A new work is expected to astonish in one way or another, or in all ways. Yet there was no surprise anywhere—not in its thematic material and its development, nor in its emotional content.

There was, to be sure, a great exploitation of rhythm of the steady, insistent, unvarying kind, but we have had innumerable examples of that in the past. The slow movement harbors a fugue (a rather jazzy one), but Beethoven had foreshadowed such a procedure in the funeral march of the "Eroica." Aside from all this, the composition told us nothing that we had not heard before, nor was Mr. Roussel's way of saying it either beautiful or arresting.

Mr. Koussevitzky's playing of the Brahms Symphony extracted genuine enthusiasm from the subscribers. The conductor merited such approbation, for his Brahms was the kind that listeners expect to hear. It was sensuous and very large, and it languished at times, and portrayed heavy sentiment, and sometimes whispered mysterious confidences. It was, in short, the Brahms of popular fancy, the Brahms you can openly give to your mother or your sweetheart.

N. Y. TIMES
NOV 21 1930

MUSIC

By OLIN DOWNES.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, which seemed never more sensitively adjusted and coordinated, gave its first New York concert of the season under Mr. Koussevitzky's direction last night in Carnegie Hall. The occasion was notable not only for the quality of the playing but for the first New York performance of Albert Roussel's Symphony in G minor, a work recently composed for the fiftieth anniversary of the orchestra, which commenced its ministrations under George Henschel half a century ago.

How will this symphony appear to us, or how would it appear to us, after repeated hearings? No one who has reviewed music for a newspaper fails to realize after a little experience that music at first incomprehensible becomes often significant and beautiful with intimate acquaintance, while it is often that a work hailed as a masterpiece at a first performance is forgotten within a decade. These remarks are made as prelude to the further remark that at a first hearing the symphony impressed this writer as very well and sincerely written, and as a very dry example of modern composition. It is cyclic in form, a central theme serving as the basis for metamorphoses in the four different moments, thus binding the movements together in the fashion practiced especially by Cesar Franck and by Vincent d'Indy, in former years Mr. Roussel's teacher. The style is contemporaneous, "polyharmonic" and "polytonal" devices being employed when the logic of the musical thought justifies combinations of chords and combinations of keys. But this is neither far-fetched nor affected with Roussel. There is no question of his sincerity and the virility of his intention.

Whether this intention is realized in a very thoughtfully written work is another matter. On first acquaintance the most impressive pages in the score are those which occur with the peroration of the fugue in the slow movement. There, by virtue of contrapuntal developments, Roussel hits upon some effective tonal combinations and a very sonorous climax, a climax followed by more sensuous music, perhaps incongrous in point of style with what has preceded, and savoring more of the romantic nineteenth than the linear twentieth century in mood.

But elsewhere there is the impression of paucity of thought, of ideas not in themselves very fruitful. More than one composer, admittedly, has developed undistinguished ideas in an imposing manner, but when this occurs it does so because there is an accumulation of musical material occasioned by the stimulus of the composer's creative nature. There is not the sensation of organic growth in the work heard last night. In the first movement there is already the quality of aridness, and it is betrayed, among other ways, by means of the persistence and finally the monotony of the rhythm. The first movement of a symphony which sets forth rich and varied material for later construction by the composer is not found here. The opening movement is more like a scherzo than the cornerstone of a symphonic edifice.

It can be answered that Roussel is writing a short, concise, highly rhythmical and contrapuntal work, in the unromantic spirit and the linear style so much the fashion now. Perhaps he is. Certainly he is to the point proceeding with economy of means and without padding. This is better than crowding a score with pages of superfluous notes. But if there is a shortage of ideas and of vitality in their treatment it does not matter very much by which way the composer misses his mark. This is for us—we say it with due regard for Roussel's enviable position among contemporaneous French composers—an academic work.

The symphony was very brilliantly played, the performance being a tour de force of technical and interpretive achievement. Berlioz's "Roman Carnival" overture opened the concert. It was played with much finish and technical incisiveness and with too little spontaneity and abandon. For many the climax of the concert was the poetical performance, distinguished also by ravishing tonal beauty, of the Brahms symphony. Was not the first movement of this symphony taken at a more deliberate face than Mr. Koussevitzky adopted when he gave this score a memorable reading at an earlier New York performance? Whether or not that is the case, the music was too "andante" for its best good, while the performance as a whole was one of delightful fancy and pastoral feeling, and in the slow movement more—this slow movement which was such a hard nut for audiences of even a quarter of a century ago to crack, and is now one of the best-beloved pages of the symphonic Brahms—in the singing of grave and noble melodic passages, and the plastic treatment of this movement, in the song of solo instruments, and the vigor and brusqueness which set off the lyrical passages of the symphony Mr. Koussevitzky wrought admirably. At the end the audience applauded for many minutes the work and the performance. Tomorrow afternoon Mr. Koussevitzky and his men will give their second concert of the week in Carnegie Hall, playing Glinka's overture to "Russlan and Ludmilla," a new symphony by Nabokow, and Tschaikowsky's Fourth Symphony.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. JOURNAL
NOV 21 1930

Boston Orchestra Plays a New Symphony

By IRVING WEIL.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, now in the fiftieth year of its existence, has gone in for a perfect orgy of new music, especially ordered and written by the foremost of contemporary composers to celebrate this anniversary. Boston will hear all of it, but our suburb on the Hudson will presumably be regaled with only such of it as the Hub finds most successful. The excitement of this carnival burst forth at once last night at theseason's first visit of the Bostonians to Carnegie Hall.

Serge Koussevitzky, the permanent conductor of the orchestra, whose zeal in providing the men of the day a hearing is responsible for this comprehensive anniversary project, gave it an auspicious start last night; for the first of the new works to be introduced here, a symphony in G-minor by the Frenchman, Albert Roussel, turned out to be one of the most telling pieces of modernistic music that we have yet heard.

STRIKING IN EFFECT.

The symphony in his Opus 42 (he is in his sixty-second year) and is suposedly his most recent work in any of the larger forms. It is in the customary four movements and that, in spite of its modernistic persuasion, is not its only aspect of the traditional. Its sequence of content and expression—in a word, the general idea behind it—follows the progression of this sort of thing in symphonies from Mozart and Beethoven down to Brahms.

A SWIFT PACE.

The first movement, for example, moves almost throughout at a swift and highly rhythmic pace. The effect is that of a ceaseless trot, of creatures endlessly trot-trot-trotting on a treadmill. The slow movement is chiefly the chase of a fugue, with the rhythmic trot again cleverly suggested in the background of the composer's intent. The scherzo is an unexpectedly short bit of enlivening interlude, based on a folkdance (the pleasures of the moderns are pitifully brief). And the finale brings the treadmill back to your mind once more.

AN ERA'S SPIRIT.

But of course rhythm is not his only resource. In his middle age he became converted to polytonality and he makes use of this modernist system of writing in two or more keys at the same time with great skill. In his symphony it fulfills a definite purpose, that of suffusing his music with metallic tone. This harmonic tone enforces his basic idea and makes you know what it is all about. The symphony, indeed, vividly evokes the spirit of a mechanical era.

Mr. Koussevitzky and his orchestra, which in a different way from either the Philharmonic or the Philadelphians is a splendid band, played the Roussel symphony with virtuoso effect. The concert opened with an admirable performance of Berlioz's "Roman Carnival" overture and closed with a typically Koussevitzkyian account of the Brahms Second Symphony.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. AMERICAN
NOV 21 1930

BOSTON ORCHESTRA OPENS N. Y. SEASON WITH KOUSSEVITZKY

By LEONARD LIEBLING.

Additional interest attaches to the home concerts and tours of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this season because of the fact that the organization is celebrating the golden jubilee of its existence.

In Boston the event was marked with festive observances last month, including the invitation appearance, as conductor, of Wilhelm Gericke, eighty-five years old, who led the orchestra during its earlier seasons, from 1884 to 1889. Since then the most famous of its conductors have been the unforgettable Arthur Nikisch, Max Fielder, Pierre Monteux, Dr. Carl Muck, and its present commandant of the baton, Serge Koussevitzky.

The Boston Symphony annual series of concerts here was opened last evening at Carngie Hall with a program consisting of Berlioz's "Carneval Romain," Roussel's symphony in G minor, opus 42, and the second symphony, D major, by Brahms.

In Intensive Mood

Koussevitzky, in his most intensive and electrical mood, gave highly arresting interpretations, rising to his most impressive achievement in the symphony by Brahms. Like many other modern conductors, Koussevitzky has discarded the belief held for so many years that Brahms was primarily intellectual and secondarily melodious, and that the proper representation of his symphonies requires a scholarly rigidity regarded in some quarters as essentially Teutonic.

Of recent years, the great melodic line and the warm humanity of Brahms have been discovered by truly responsive conductors, and the old-fashioned "typical Brahms reading" properly appraised and found wanting, now has gone permanently into the limbo of things outgrown and discarded. For this relief, much thanks.

The Koussevitzky version last night had imagination, warmth, loveliness, and yet the deep seriousness and the tremendous architecture of Brahms were emphasized appropriately by the understanding conductor.

Special Work Heard

To mark the fiftieth birthday of the Boston band, several composers have written special works for its present jubilation season. One of those complimentary creations was heard last evening in the form of the G minor symphony by Albert Roussel, sixty-one-year-old Frenchman.

This Roussel music has venerable form and contents as a basis, but makes some concessions to modern tastes by employing a wider harmonic scope and freer orchestration than were generally in vogue when Roussel (at one time a professor of counterpoint), began to publish his works. He was a composition pupil of D'Indy, but fortunately, did not copy the austere and aloof musical style of his master. The present G minor symphony is smoothly written, fastidious and distinctly agreeable material even if not epochally important or seemingly destined for wide and sustained acceptance.

The orchestra played with fine elan, tonal taste and brilliant technic. A large audience applauded the visitors with unfeigned enthusiasm.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK SUN
NOV 21 1930

51

Boston Symphony Concert

Organization Opens Its Forty-fifth Season Here With Albert Roussel Work.

By W. J. HENDERSON.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra began its forty-fifth season in this city with the concert of last evening in Carnegie Hall. It recently ushered in its fiftieth season in Boston with appropriate celebrations, amid the acclamations of the dwellers at the Hub and the hearty congratulations of the entire musical world. Sir George Henschel, first conductor of the orchestra, emerged from his retirement in England to wield the baton once more and famous composers prepared new works to be produced under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky.

After last night's concert had opened with the "Roman Carnival" overture of Berlioz (not quite appropriate to a festival of the modern Athens) it continued with Albert Roussel's G minor symphony, opus 42, written for the fiftieth anniversary of the orchestra. The one remaining number on the list was the second symphony of Brahms, which was composed before the Boston orchestra was born. Mr. Philip Hale, author of the incomparable program notes of the Bostonians, says that he did not get the score in time to make analytical explanations. All he could tell us was that in the slow movement the composer introduced a fugue, using as a subject the first theme of the movement in diminution.

About the anatomical structure of symphonies publics have for years been lamentably apathetic. We fear that a dissection of the novelty heard last night would accomplish nothing profitable. But something may be said about the character of Roussel's art in general and of this composition in particular. Mr. Roussel believes in polytonality, or the counterpoint of keys, but not when so used as to destroy what he calls "the sensation of key." One therefore expects from him music of bold and even aggressive harmonic plan, a structure perhaps uncoventional, but logical and virile, and melody individual and generally acrid. It has been said of him that he loves beauty of line and that he is far from being ascetic in style. Robust and healthy his admirers have called his music.

Of the courage and independence of this composer there can be no doubt. His sincerity appears to be equally unquestionable. These brave spiritual possessions had already been revealed in his "Evocations" and even more brightly in his symphony in B flat. In the symphony disclosed to us last night were found also Roussel's delight in those triphammer rhythms with brazen utterance which serve but weakly to disguise poverty of thematic invention. Of the composer's fondness for dissonance there were fewer evidences. Indeed, some of his pages, especially in the slow movement before and after the fugue, lingered sweetly upon the ear. There was a fundamental feeling of tonality and there was a harmonic texture generally solid. But of novelty of conception and emotional quality the work seemed singularly devoid.

Vigorous idioms, an eager and searching pressure on the slenderest of ideas and a skill in the use of orchestral means made a pretentious surface, beneath which there seemed to be nothing of depth or substance. The symphony was more euphonious to old-fashioned ears than most modernist music, but quite as empty. It was more grateful than the violin sonata which Mr. Szigeti introduced to us on January 28, 1928, but no more important.

Mr. Koussevitzky had bestowed on the composition a vast amount of study and rehearsal and his orchestra gave to it a performance which placed it before the audience in the best possible light. There was applause, of course, but it was not jubilant. The conductor was very wise in setting the work before the Brahms symphony instead of after it. It was written much later, but is not nearly so young. The D major symphony of Brahms sheds the falling leaves of each successive autumn and emerges ever fresh and green. We fear that in a dozen winters this new work of Roussel will have grown as feeble and gray and tottering as the "Carnival Romain" of Berlioz, which was played brilliantly, but in vain.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. MORN. WORLD
NOV 21 1930

Music

By Samuel Chotzinoff

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, Carnegie Hall, 8.30.

Overture, Carnival Romain.....Berlioz
Symphony in G Minor, Op. 42.....Roussel
Symphony No. 2 in D.....Brahms

The Boston Symphony Orchestra presented itself for the first time this season for the admiration of its local adherents at Carnegie Hall last night. It came bearing, as usual, a gift of a new composition, Mr. Albert Roussel's new Symphony in G minor, op. 42. Curiously enough, the offering had been originally a present from the composer to the Boston orchestra on the occasion of its fiftieth birthday, a celebration which took place recently and, as you no doubt have heard, was observed with the solemnity it deserved.

I do not know how the Bostonians received the Roussel symphony, but under the circumstances one could hardly blame the gratified city if it took it to its bosom. Not being in the position of looking a gift symphony in the mouth, our own reaction last night was rather lukewarm than joyous, as we applauded at the finish in a manner which might have meant that we bore no ill-will to anyone concerned in it. It seemed, to me at any rate, that the gift hardly measured up to the occasion. Indeed, the Second Symphony of Brahms, which figured on the Boston program as just a piece of music, was, I thought, a finer medium for commemorating the half-century birthday of the celebrated orchestra.

It will give you an idea of how far we have progressed in our assimilation of the modern medium when I confess that Mr. Roussel's symphony sounded like old stuff. A new work is expected to astonish in one way or another, or in all ways. Yet there was no surprise anywhere—not in its thematic material and its development, nor in its emotional content.

There was, to be sure, a great exploitation of rhythm of the steady, insistent, unvarying kind, but we have had innumerable examples of that in the past. The slow movement harbors a fugue (a rather jazzy one), but Beethoven had foreshadowed such a procedure in the funeral march of the "Eroica." Aside from all this, the composition told us nothing that we had not heard before, nor was Mr. Roussel's way of saying it either beautiful or arresting.

Mr. Koussevitzky's playing of the Brahms Symphony extracted genuine enthusiasm from the subscribers. The conductor merited such approbation, for his Brahms was the kind that listeners expect to hear. It was sensuous and very large, and it languished at times, and portrayed heavy sentiment, and sometimes whispered mysterious confidences. It was, in short, the Brahms of popular fancy, the Brahms you can openly give to your mother or your sweetheart.

52

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. Herald Tribune
37 NOV 21 1930

MUSIC

By LAWRENCE GILMAN

The Boston Symphony Orchestra Celebrates in New York Its Fiftieth Birthday

First New York concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conductor, at Carnegie Hall.

PROGRAM

1. Berlioz..Overture, "The Roman Carnival"
2. Roussel.....Symphony in G, Op. 42 (First time in New York)
3. Brahms.....Symphony in D

THESE are festival days for the Boston Symphony, which came to town last evening for its first New York concert of the season. As all the world of music knows, the Orchestra which has helped to make the East Wind and the Watch and Ward Society bearable is celebrating its fiftieth season of significantly fruitful life. For half a century the name of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has stood for those æsthetic virtues which contribute to the glory of musical art. Other orchestras have sometimes lowered their standards, compromised with expediency; merchants have occasionally trafficked in their souls. We recall no instances of such lapses or perversions in the history of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

* * *

With a singularly constant ideal of rectitude and dignity this great organization combines a liberality of attitude toward the unorthodox and the experimental which has immensely enriched our musical life and stimulated our receptiveness.

Great is the Orchestra's reward. It is recognized today as a tongue of music unsurpassed for eloquence. It is honored as an institution which justifies the civilization that nurtured and perfected it. We drink a somewhat inky toast to the Boston Symphony Orchestra. May it live forever to make glad the hearts of those for whom such triumphs of the spirit outlast the drums and tramplings of a half-century of material conquests.

* * *

Naturally, the B. S. O. has been celebrating, and in a characteristic way.

In olden times composers were commissioned by Princes to supply for this or that occasion such works as inspiration or industry could produce. Today great orchestras have taken over that amiable and often rewarding function, leaving the imperial Mrs. F. S. Coolidge almost alone among those sovereigns of a democratic time who still seek to poke the fires of genius wherever they may be suspected of existence.

The B. S. O.'s addresses to music-makers here and abroad have been of the lordliest kind. The most distinguished contemporary masters have been commissioned or encouraged to write new works for its jubilee. Prokofieff sent a symphony; Respighi proffered a Theme and Variations; the Parisian composer, Albert Roussel, despatched a symphony; an anonymous writer, widely suspected of being no less a personage than the eminent present conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra—who can play the bull fiddle and compose music as ably as he leads—contributed, with profuse blushes, a "Festival Overture." Professor Edward Burlingame Hill, of Harvard, speaking up for Massachusetts, supplied music for an Ode by Robert Silliman Hillyer (also of Harvard). As for the orchestra's favorite child, the illustrious Igor Stravinsky, it is announced that the composer of "Le Sacre du Printemps" has completed for performance in Boston on December 12 and 13 a choral "Symphony of Psalms," which Mr. Stravinsky has dedicated "to the glory of God and to the Boston Symphony Orchestra." Let us hope that both will prove worthy of the honor.

* * *

The first of these musical tributes to be heard in New York was set before us last evening by Mr. Koussevitzky. It was the new symphony by the Parisian master, Albert Roussel, which had its world première in Boston on October 24.

Roussel, now a mellow juvenile of sixty-one, is still a child of his time. He can still be, when he chooses, acerb and delicately drastic. But he drinks out of his own glass. Stravinsky may have dropped in an olive or two (in whose glass has he not done so?); there are several maraschino cherries from the Rimskyan jars—even a tiny drop from Brangaene's inescapable philtre; and the whole is (need one say?) discreetly tinctured with jazz.

* * *

But one takes these things for granted. The point is that Roussel, in this music, adds something to the common store—something definitely individualized, a personal way of fusing and arranging elements, an unmistakable particularity of flavor and of pattern. This score has wit, craft, beauty. One is aware of a civilized and distinguished mind at work behind the tones—a mind urbane, critical, challenging; a French mind, lucid and adult, one that rewards acquaintance.

Mr. Koussevitzky played the new work with superlative finesse and the most intimate comprehension. The performance will remain among the outstanding achievements of his visits to New York—a prodigy of sympathetic identification and projective skill.

* * *

For the remainder of his program the conductor set before us thrice-familiar matter: the brilliantly vacuous "Roman Carnival" of Berlioz, and the unparagoned Johannes at his second best—but still Johannes.

Serge Koussevitzky

Conductor of last night's Boston Symphony concert

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE
NOV 21 1930

Music of the Day

By EDWARD CUSHING

The Boston Symphony and Mr. Koussewitsky Give Their First Concert This Season in Carnegie Hall

NEW YORK had, last evening, its first opportunity to felicitate the Boston Symphony Orchestra upon the attainment of the 50th anniversary of its incorporation—and New York neglected (inexcusably, it seemed to us) to do anything about it. There was a cordial clapping of hands for Mr. Koussewitsky when he appeared on the stage of Carnegie Hall, a greeting in which, presumably, the orchestra was included. But this was not enough. If the season thus far has provided occasion for a demonstration, this was it, and, oddly enough, none was forthcoming. Audiences are unpredictable and often disappointing in their reaction to events.

* * *

The Boston Symphony is by no means the oldest of our major orchestras. Yet if others have longer, none has a more honorable record than this organization, under which a succession of eminent conductors, not the least of whom is Mr. Koussewitsky, has achieved a position among the half-dozen ranking orchestras of the world.

The late Maj. Henry E. Higginson, inspired philanthropist and patron of the arts, could not have foreseen, in 1881, the future of the institution whose cornerstone he laid, but before his death in 1918 that future had become the glorious present of his orchestra. Under the leadership of Dr. Karl Muck the Boston Symphony enjoyed the heyday of its fame, but if subsequent to the resignation of that gentleman the prestige of the orchestra was for a time impaired, its revival has been Mr. Koussewitsky's most conspicuous accomplishment during the past six years.

* * *

It would be difficult to estimate the benefits that Boston has derived from the orchestra founded and so long supported by Major Higginson, almost as difficult to calculate those that New York has enjoyed, since the Boston Symphony has been annually for 43 years a visitor to our metropolis, a contributor, and an important one, to the more profitable activities of New York music seasons. For this reason it seemed that last evening's audience might have given some sign of the gratitude and affection in which it must hold Mr. Koussewitsky and his players, some sign that New York as well as Boston is aware of the anniversary which the orchestra this season celebrates. Had the fact that an anniversary was being celebrated slipped its mind? Possibly. Yet the program of last evening's concert must have reminded it, for it included a Symphony in G minor, by Albert Roussel, "composed for the 50th anniversary of the Boston Symphony," and receiving its first performance in New York on this occasion.

* * *

Though a symphony, it was not to be taken too seriously, this novelty. Agreeable, ingenious, but scarcely a masterpiece it proved to be. We were glad to hear it a first time, but we shall not be unhappy if we wait long to hear it again. As a piece d'occasion it was rather more interesting than one expected. Graceful ideas charmingly set forth were to be found in each of its four movements, but nothing to remind one that music is, or for a time was, the greatest expression in the arts of Western civilization and culture—the art in which, for four centuries past, Western man has most poignantly voiced his aspiration and his despair, his most noble happiness and his most bitter grief.

* * *

It was in revealing contrast that Mr. Koussewitsky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra turned from Roussel to Brahms, from music which diverts the mind to music which nourishes the spirit. Yet oddly enough, the performance of the Roussel Symphony was infinitely superior to that of the Brahms D major. Mr. Koussewitsky, one has often thought, is very much a man of his time and happiest as an interpreter of the contemporaneous. The Roussel Symphony he read with a real eloquence, holding its rhythms firmly in hand, yet allowing them all necesary flexibility, modeling the melodic line with the graceful, expressive flourishes of a master sculptor in sound, drawing from his orchestra a tone full and exuberant. Striking, too, was his treatment of the Berlioz overture, with which this concert began—one was not troubled here, as in the Brahms, by the theatrical character of the performance, for the music of Berlioz is nothing if it is not theatrical, inviting and tolerating the utmost license of interpretation.

A concert by the Boston Symphony, Serge Koussewitsky conducting, at Carnegie Hall last evening.

THE PROGRAM

Berlioz...Overture, "Carnaval Romain"
Roussel.....Symphony in G minor
Brahms.....Symphony in D major

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TELEGRAM
NOV 21 1930

KOUSSEVITZKY DIRECTS HERE

Boston Symphony Orchestra Plays Overture of Berlioz's "Roman Carnival."

By PITTS SANBORN.

When Serge Koussevitzky was a stranger on our island he helped earn his welcome by directing an extraordinary performance of the "Roman Carnival" overture of Berlioz. Mr. Koussevitzky, now a familiar visitor, directed the overture again in Carnegie Hall last evening.

The occasion was the first local concert this season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The "Roman Carnival" opened the program, which included also a symphony in G minor by Albert Roussel and the second symphony of Brahms.

First Performed Last Month.

In the opera "Benvenuto Cellini," to which the "Roman Carnival" is a second overture, Habeneck, the conductor at the Paris Opera, Berlioz complained, would not take the saltarello fast enough. When Berlioz himself conducted the "Roman Carnival" he took the corresponding passage "in the whirlwind time of the Transteverine dancers."

Berlioz certainly would have had no ground for grievance at Mr. Koussevitzky's tempo last evening. And in other respects he might well have rejoiced in the interpretation of the Russian batonist and the playing of the excellent orchestra from Boston.

Roussel's symphony was composed for the fiftieth anniversary of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and was performed for the first time anywhere by that orchestra under Mr. Koussevitzky in Symphony Hall, Boston, last month. Naturally yesterday's performance was the first in New York, and very likely it will be the last.

Composed by Accomplished Technician.

A composer of industry and experience, Roussel is justly accounted one of the foremost musicians of France. The symphony heard last evening is the work of a man who knows his business, an accomplished technician, a master of orchestration.

This symphony was pleasant to listen to, but when you have said that you have perhaps said all. If anything of moment lurked behind its very agreeable manner, yesterday's admirable performance failed to reveal it.

In contrast, the hard-driven symphony of Brahms lifted its head in pride because of its sheer substance.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. EVE. POST

NOV 21 1930

Music : By Oscar Thompson

Koussevitzky Brings His Bostonians Back to Carnegie Hall for Their Forty-fifth New York Season

FROM that still fabulous city where 'tis said the Lowells speak only to the Cabots and the Cabots speak only to Serge, the Boston Symphony returned to dilate the fervors of its Manhattan thurifers with the first of its Carnegie Hall series of the new season last night. The current roster of officers as discoverable in the program books may be taken to indicate, however, that the ancient witticism must be broadened to include the Warrens, the Lodges, the Danes, the Howes, the Hallowells, the Lymans, the Pickmans, the Sawyers, and perhaps even some others, so persuasively has the ameliorating and leveling art of symphony reconciled even Boston to an international speech.

Berlioz, with his "Roman Carnival" Overture; Brahms, with his Second Symphony, and Roussel, with a new work composed especially for the fiftieth anniversary of the Boston orchestra, conspired with Dr. Koussevitzky to bring Gotham and Gomorrah within its redemptive pale. For the occasion there was a reassembling of clans antedating the Koussevitzky theocracy, and we were again tempted to conclude that it is the Boston Symphony that is rooted most strongly in the older musical aristocracy here, as at home. This was a forty-fifth beginning in New York, only five fewer than in Boston.

The evening was attended by one catastrophe. Though the mails brought for subscribers the endlessly informative program notes of Philip Hale, there was occasion for dismay in the discovery that the novelty, a full-fledged new symphony in G minor by Albert Roussel, had to be listened to without the structural and thematic enlightenment invariably to be derived from the sage of symphonists up Massachusetts way. When this work was given its first performance anywhere in Boston a fortnight or so ago, as the annotations explained, there had been no time for the annotator to examine the score; and New York unfortunately fell heir to Boston's calamity, in that the same notes, with the same hiatus, were distributed here.

HOWEVER, the loss was chiefly a literary one, as the Symphony in performance neither baffled the understanding nor ignited any very flaming desire for further facts. The composer is a modern, but not one who believes in being either horrendous or hard-boiled for the sake of being just that. He is sympathetic toward polytonality, but with respect to atonality—though he has confessed admiring "Wozzeck"—he has his doubts. In the work written for the Boston jubilee, he is of his age. There is something of machine rhythm in this work, particularly in the first two movements, which Mr. Koussevitzky played with a forward, propulsive plunge, rather at the expense of that somewhat outworn quality dubbed elasticity. The scoring is edgy, with lapses into solo sentimentalisms. Obvious is the Frenchman's eye for edifice and for special effects; likewise the contemporary internationalist's poverty of really salient ideas. Midway in the slow movement is a fugue that has about it something of the aura of jazz—not the American kind, to be sure, but the Milhaudish or the Hindemithan. As played, it was pretty. But all it said to us was, "A neat job, that."

Mr. Koussevitzky brightened his Brahms as Mr. Toscanini Beethovenized his. Much of the orchestral playing was brilliantly fine, but we did not like the 'cello quality in the Adagio and we could have wished for more undertow and less scintillance at the top elsewhere in this ever refreshing and stimulating example of broody profundity betrayed by the siren of song.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. EVE. POST

NOV 22 1930

"JEPHTE," oratorio by Carissimi (1604-1674), in a new orchestration by his modern countryman, Vittorio Cui, will be given at the third concert of the Society of the Friends of Music tomorrow afternoon in the Metropolitan Opera House. Artur Bodanzky will conduct the orchestra; the chorus, which has been trained by Walter Wohllebe, and the soloists, who are Editha Fleischer, soprano; Marion Telva, contralto; George Meader, tenor; Alfredo Gandolfi, baritone; Louis Robert, organist, and Kurt Ruhrseitz, harpsichord. The oratorio will be preceded by Handel's Concerto Grosso No. 6 and Bach's solo cantata, "O, Schlage Doch Gewuenschte Stunde," by Marion Telva. This will be the first hearing in New York of Cui's orchestration which is scored for string orchestra, harps, harpsichord, triangle and organ.

The Tollefsen Trio will play Beethoven's Trio in B flat major and Edward Schuett's Trio, "Fairy Tale Waltzes," at the Adolph Lewisohn Free Chamber Music concert Wednesday evening in Hunter College, and Dr. Henry T. Fleck will lecture on Beethoven, with illustrations at the piano.

An all-French program will be given tomorrow afternoon by the Roxy Theatre Symphony Orchestra, Erno Rapee director, as follows: "Danse Sacre," Debussy; "Rouet d'Omphale," Saint-Saens; "L'Arlesienne" Suite, Bizet, and a Ravel waltz.

As a part of its fiftieth anniversary season, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give a Beethoven festival of three evenings and one afternoon in Constitution Hall, Washington, D. C., the program being as follows: December 2, Overture to "Egmont," Piano Concerto, No. 4, Myra Hess, soloist, and Third Symphony; December 3, "Lenore" Overture, No. 3, Violin Concerto, Efrem Zimbalist, soloist, and Fifth Symphony; December 5, "Coriolanus" Overture, Fifth Piano Concerto, Josef Hofmann, soloist, and Seventh Symphony; December 6, afternoon, Ninth Symphony, with a chorus of 200, and the following soloists: Jeanette Vreeland, soprano; Nevada Van der Veer, contralto; Dan Gridley, tenor, and Fraser Grange, baritone.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. EVE. WORLD

NOV 21 1930

MUSIC

By Noel Straus

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra, which has been celebrating its fiftieth anniversary with elaborate ceremonial in the metropolis on the Charles, opened its New York season at Carnegie Hall yesterday evening. That Gothamite music lovers might sample one of the works written especially for the organization's commemorative festivities, Mr. Koussevitzky featured on the program the "Symphony in G Minor," opus 42, by Albert Roussel, which had been given its premiere last month in the Hub by the same forces.

Although Roussel is considered one of the leading composers of France, his output has as yet failed to get much of a foothold on this island, and judging from last night's comparatively cool reception of the symphony, that effusion is not likely to add much to his prestige in these parts. When the composition was performed in Boston, Mr. Roussel, who was present, remarked that Mr. Koussevitzky's reading was "perfect." It was doubtless quite as splendidly projected yesterday, so that one was able to appraise its merits under the most favorable circumstances.

But even so, the symphony, while disclosing Mr. Roussel's superior attainments as a technician, had little of importance to communicate. The four brief movements were admirably constructed and possessed the Gallic qualities of economy of means and clear statement. In their orchestration the influence of jazz could be detected, though only as a matter of tonal tinting, here and there. They had the breath of modernity upon them without becoming unduly harsh or grating in their harmonies or the clashings of their cunningly devised counterpoint. But they remained dangerously near the surface, emotionally, and manipulated thematic material that failed to betray any ponderable amount of imaginative invention.

Mr. Roussel, who is now in his sixties, did not begin to devote himself to music until he was twenty-five years old. He soon came under the domination of Debussy's style and later veered to the opposed school of Vincent D'Indy. But he has been pretty much a law unto himself, with the result that only few evidences of his former leanings were discoverable in the symphony. Its first movement had the character of a pompous march in triple time, with a constantly reiterated basic rhythm that helped to accentuate the commonplace atmosphere of the concoction. The second division started off auspiciously and was not long in arriving at an episode where muted horns moved under a contrapuntal web woven by the violins, which proved to be the most treasurable section of the entire opus. This led to a fugue of no particular value in the scheme as a whole. A scherzo of short duration having some of the earmarks of Spanish dance music led to the final allegro which, like its predecessor, had a shallow ring, despite a certain display of high spirits.

Far more profitable was the resplendent rendition of the Berlioz "Roman Carnival" overture, remarkable alike for its lightning-like change of moods and vividness of coloring. Brahms's "Second Symphony" completed the bill.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
TIMES

NOV 22 1930

Boston Symphony Festival for D. C.

When the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Kouscevitsky, conductor, opens its fiftieth anniversary Beethoven festival at Constitution Hall on Tuesday evening, December 3—the first of a four-performance Beethoven orchestral festival that will be without parallel in the musical history of Washington—Myra Hess, soloist, will play the fourth Beethoven piano concerto, instead of the third, while Josef Hofmann, soloist, will play the fifth Beethoven piano concerto at the third performance on Friday evening, December 5, instead of the fourth, as originally scheduled.

This change of program was announced yesterday by Mrs. Wilson-Greene, under whose local management the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give this mammoth festival of Beethoven on Tuesday, Wednesday and Friday evenings, and Saturday matinee, December 2, 3, 5 and 6.

the Day

RD CUSHING

Brooklyn—A Revival of 'La —Three Schubert Me- eges Appear

Concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussewitsky conducting. At the Academy of Music last evening, under the auspices of the Institute of Arts and Sciences.

THE PROGRAM

Mozart..Overture to "Der Zauberfloete"
Beethoven ..... Seventh Symphony
Bach .....Two Preludes
(Transcribed for strings by Pick-Mangiagalli.)
Wagner .....Prelude to "Lohengrin"
Rimsky-Korsakow ..Spanish Caprice

chestra and its conductor, Serge Koussewitsky, at the Academy of Music last evening than that with which they were received on Thursday at Carnegie Hall. It was perhaps the feeling of the Brooklyn audience that some recognition was in order of the fact that the Boston Orchestra this season celebrates the consummation of a half century of existence, and applause that swelled to the proportions of an ovation greeted the appearance of Mr. Koussewitsky on the stage. Rising, the orchestra shared in the tribute and then, settling again to its chairs, was launched by the baton of its leader into a spirited performance of the "Zauberfloete" overture.

* * *

Mr. Koussewitsky's program for this concert, the first of the five which this season as in the past he will conduct at the Academy of Music, was interestingly varied. The Mozart overture was followed by th Seventh of Beethoven's symphonies, and this in turn was succeeded by two Bach preludes, newly transcribed for strings by Pick-Mangiagalli, Wagner's "Lohengrin" prelude and the Spanish Caprice of Rimsky-Korsakow.

The Bach-Mangiagalli preludes were the novelty of the evening—it we have not been misinformed, their performance on this occasion was the first in New York. Mr. Hale's notes on the program did not specify the date of their composition (or rather arrangement), but identified them as the organ prelude in D minor, No. 9, in the Bach Gesellschaft edition of the organ preludes and fugues, and as the prelude to the E-major Partita for violin alone. Signor Pick-Mangiagalli's arrangement of the latter is not accurately described as a transcription, since the Italian composer has here undertaken to compose his own counterpoints to the original Bach melody. These are studious and painstaking in their imitation of the Leipzig master's linear style, but they fail to create those subtle harmonic associations that invariably distinguish Bach's manipulation of one or more melodies in counterpoint. The first transcription is bona fide Bach, an affecting meditation that Signor Pick-Mangiagalli has reverently instrumentated.

* * *

It was good last evening to hear the strings of the Boston Orchestra in both the Bach transcriptions and the "Lohengrin" prelude. Mr. Koussewitsky is learning not to drive his players in the effort to draw from them a sonority beyond the capacity of their instruments. The tone of the violins in particular, to a less extent of violas and cellos, had, as a result, depth as well as brilliance, a rich and luminous quality. This is indeed a splendid orchestra that Boston shares with us—has shared with us, indeed, for the better part of half a century.

* * *

Mr. Koussewitsky's reading of the Beethoven symphony was last evening vigorous and unlabored. The spirit of this music runs high, and the conductor made no attempt to repress it—there was a note of Dionysiac exuberance in the playing of the first movement and the finale, the crown of the work, even in the Allegretto one felt that it was with regret that conductor and orchestra adopted a retarded tempo. The false playing of a trumpeter in the first trio of the scherzo was the only flaw in an orchestral performance ohtrwise virtuose.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
New York Eve. World

NOV 22 1930

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, as part of its fiftieth anniversary season, is to give a Beethoven festival in Washington the evenings of Dec. 2, 3 and 5 and the afternoon of Dec. 6.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
TIMES

MUSIC

The Boston Symphony Orchestra under the able baton of Serge Koussevitsky presented the first in its series of five Brooklyn concerts at the Academy of Music last night.

An almost capacity house tendered the returning conductor an ovation, which he generously shared with his men. But it was a rather staid and orthodox program comprising familiar numbers of Bach, Mozart, Beethoven, Wagner and Rimsky-Korsakoff that Mr. Koussevitsky chose for his Brooklyn opening, albeit the conductor gave it all the care and finesse usually identified only with a world premiere.

That is, if one excepts the overture to "Zauberflote" which opened the evening and which the conductor read in rather colorless vein as he attempted to stress delicacy.

Beethoven's No. 7, which Wagner has styled as the "apotheosis of the dance," but which has also been held to portray the "Pastorale," became, under the Koussevitsky baton, an infectious collection of alluring dance rhythms. Read with especial regard for delineation of detail, the work, according to the Russian's interpretation, transported one from the drabness of every-day life to the woods and fields beloved by its composer.

An arrangement of two Bach preludes by Pick-Mangiagalli followed the intermission, the first appearing rather fragile and superficial and lacking the depth of Bach, but the second, played with zest and fire. In contrast to this was the next offering, the vorspiel to "Lohengrin" with its slow, stately religious aspect, stressed by the conductor so that some of the sublimity of the work itself was transmuted to the orchestra reading it under the Koussevitsky direction.

The finale of the evening was the "Spanish Caprice" of Rimsky-Korsakoff. Begun as a fantasia for violin and orchestra, the composer later partially abandoned this idea in favor of a brilliant orchestration for the ensemble. So well was the work received at its premiere, that the composer dedicated it to the orchestra which officiated. Spanish rather than Russian in texture, Rimsky prepared an instrumentation that fairly dazzles.

Its opening section, a morning serenade, is followed without pause by a theme and variations for horns accompanied by a rather lightly scored ensemble and this soon gives way to a second Allarbada in dance tempo wherein the original virtuoso passages are retained. From here it becomes more highly developed into a gypsy dance with cadanzas for the flute and harp before dashing into a lively fandango.

The kindly though modest gentleman who wielded the baton last night seemed untired as he entered this final section and gave of his best to it. Verily, here is a conductor who holds the orchestra in the hollow of his hand and here is a musician of keen perspective and intellect.

H. E. S.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. EVE. POST
NOV 21 1930

Music : By Oscar Thompson

Koussevitzky Brings His Bostonians Back to Carnegie Hall for Their Forty-fifth New York Season

FROM that still fabulous city where 'tis said the Lowells speak only to the Cabots and the Cabots speak only to Serge, the Boston Symphony returned to dilate the fervors of its Manhattan thurifers with the first of its Carnegie Hall series of the new season last night. The current roster of officers as discoverable in the program books may be taken to indicate, however, that the ancient witticism must be broadened to include the Warrens, the Lodges, the Danes, the Howes, the Hallowells, the Lymans, the Pickmans, the Sawyers, and perhaps even some others, so persuasively has the ameliorating and leveling art of symphony reconciled even Boston to an international speech.

Berlioz, with his "Roman Carnival" Overture; Brahms, with his Second Symphony, and Roussel, with a new work composed especially for the fiftieth anniversary of the Boston orchestra, conspired with Dr. Koussevitzky to bring Gotham and Gomorrah within its redemptive pale. For the occasion there was a reassembling of clans antedating the Koussevitzky theocracy, and we were again tempted to conclude that it is the Boston Symphony that is rooted most strongly in the older musical aristocracy here, as at home. This was a forty-fifth beginning in New York, only five fewer than in Boston.

The evening was attended by one catastrophe. Though the mails brought for subscribers the endlessly informative program notes of Philip Hale, there was occasion for dismay in the discovery that the novelty, a full-fledged new symphony in G minor by Albert Roussel, had to be listened to without the structural and thematic enlightenment invariably to be derived from the sage of symphonists up Massachusetts way. When this work was given its first performance anywhere in Boston a fortnight or so ago, as the annotations explained, there had been no time for the annotator to examine the score; and New York unfortunately fell heir to Boston's calamity, in that the same notes, with the same hiatus, were distributed here.

HOWEVER, the loss was chiefly a literary one, as the Symphony in performance neither baffled the understanding nor ignited any very flaming desire for further facts. The composer is a modern, but not one who believes in being either horrendous or hard-boiled for the sake of being just that. He is sympathetic toward polytonality, but with respect to atonality—though he has confessed admiring "Wozzeck"—he has his doubts. In the work written for the Boston jubilee, he is of his age. There is something of machine rhythm in this work, particularly in the first two movements, which Mr. Koussevitzky played with a forward, propulsive plunge, rather at the expense of that somewhat outworn quality dubbed elasticity. The scoring is edgy, with lapses into solo sentimentalisms. Obvious is the Frenchman's eye for edifice and for special effects; likewise the contemporary internationalist's poverty of really salient ideas. Midway in the slow movement is a fugue that has about it something of the aura of jazz—not the American kind, to be sure, but the Milhaudish or the Hindemithan. As played, it was pretty. But all it said to us was, "A neat job, that."

Mr. Koussevitzky brightened his Brahms as Mr. Toscanini Beethovenized his. Much of the orchestral playing was brilliantly fine, but we did not like the 'cello quality in the Adagio and we could have wished for more undertow and less scintillance at the top elsewhere in this ever refreshing and stimulating example of broody profundity betrayed by the siren of song.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. EVE. POST
NOV 22 1930

"JEPHTE," oratorio by Carissimi (1604-1674), in a new orchestration by his modern countryman, Vittorio Cui, will be given at the third concert of the Society of the Friends of Music tomorrow afternoon in the Metropolitan Opera House. Artur Bodanzky will conduct the orchestra; the chorus, which has been trained by Walter Wohllebe, and the soloists, who are Editha Fleischer, soprano; Marion Telva, contralto; George Meader, tenor; Alfredo Gandolfi, baritone; Louis Robert, organist, and Kurt Ruhrseitz, harpsichord. The oratorio will be preceded by Handel's Concerto Grosso No. 6 and Bach's solo cantata, "O, Schlage Doch Gewuenschte Stunde," by Marion Telva. This will be the first hearing in New York of Cui's orchestration which is scored for string orchestra, harps, harpsichord, triangle and organ.

The Tollefsen Trio will play Beethoven's Trio in B flat major and Edward Schuett's Trio, "Fairy Tale Waltzes," at the Adolph Lewisohn Free Chamber Music concert Wednesday evening in Hunter College, and Dr. Henry T. Fleck will lecture on Beethoven, with illustrations at the piano.

An all-French program will be given tomorrow afternoon by the Roxy Theatre Symphony Orchestra, Erno Rapee director, as follows: "Danse Sacre," Debussy; "Rouet d'Omphale," Saint-Saens; "L'Arlesienne" Suite, Bizet, and a Ravel waltz.

As a part of its fiftieth anniversary season, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give a Beethoven festival of three evenings and one afternoon in Constitution Hall, Washington, D. C., the program being as follows: December 2, Overture to "Egmont," Piano Concerto, No. 4, Myra Hess, soloist, and Third Symphony; December 3, "Leonore" Overture, No. 3, Violin Concerto, Efrem Zimbalist, soloist, and Fifth Symphony; December 5, "Coriolanus" Overture, Fifth Piano Concerto, Josef Hofmann, soloist, and Seventh Symphony; December 6, afternoon, Ninth Symphony, with a chorus of 200, and the following soloists: Jeanette Vreeland, soprano; Nevada Van der Veer, contralto; Dan Gridley, tenor, and Fraser Grange, baritone.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. EVE. WORLD
NOV 21 1930

HADA

s Company (New York World) 1930

1 hot, nourishing soups or casserole d
adults, but the home maker who sp hore hot on one side, turn the sardine
she repeat the process.
s of BROILED SARDINES ON TOAS
Select large sardines and caref remove the skin. Sprinkle them w lemon juice and spread with the opus 42, by in the Hub by the same

Although Roussel is considered one of the leading composers of France, his output has as yet failed to get much of a foothold on this island, and judging from last night's comparatively cool reception of the symphony, that effusion is not likely to add much to his prestige in these parts. When the composition was performed in Boston, Mr. Roussel, who was present, remarked that Mr. Koussevitzky's reading was "perfect." It was doubtless quite as splendidly projected yesterday, so that one was able to appraise its merits under the most favorable circumstances.

But even so, the symphony, while disclosing Mr. Roussel's superior attainments as a technician, had little of importance to communicate. The four brief movements were admirably constructed and possessed the Gallic qualities of economy of means and clear statement. In their orchestration the influence of jazz could be detected, though only as a matter of tonal tinting, here and there. They had the breath of modernity upon them without becoming unduly harsh or grating in their harmonies or the clashings of their cunningly devised counterpoint. But they remained dangerously near the surface, emotionally, and manipulated thematic material that failed to betray any ponderable amount of imaginative invention.

Mr. Roussel, who is now in his sixties, did not begin to devote himself to music until he was twenty-five years old. He soon came under the domination of Debussy's style and later veered to the opposed school of Vincent D'Indy. But he has been pretty much a law unto himself, with the result that only few evidences of his former leanings were discoverable in the symphony. Its first movement had the character of a pompous march in triple time, with a constantly reiterated basic rhythm that helped to accentuate the commonplace atmosphere of the concoction. The second division started off auspiciously and was not long in arriving at an episode where muted horns moved under a contrapuntal web woven by the violins, which proved to be the most treasurable section of the entire opus. This led to a fugue of no particular value in the scheme as a whole. A scherzo of short duration having some of the earmarks of Spanish dance music led to the final allegro which, like its predecessor, had a shallow ring, despite a certain display of high spirits.

Far more profitable was the resplendent rendition of the Berlioz "Roman Carnival" overture, remarkable alike for its lightning-like change of moods and vividness of coloring. Brahms's "Second Symphony" completed the bill.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
TIMES
NOV 22 1930

Boston Symphony Festival for D. C.

When the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Kouscevitsky, conductor, opens its fiftieth anniversary Beethoven festival at Constitution Hall on Tuesday evening, December 3—the first of a four-performance Beethoven orchestral festival that will be without parallel in the musical history of Washington—Myra Hess, soloist, will play the fourth Beethoven piano concerto, instead of the third, while Josef Hofmann, soloist, will play the fifth Beethoven piano concerto at the third performance on Friday evening, December 5, instead of the fourth, as originally scheduled.

This change of program was announced yesterday by Mrs. Wilson-Greene, under whose local management the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give this mammoth festival of Beethoven on Tuesday, Wednesday and Friday evenings, and Saturday matinee. December 2, 3, 5 and 6.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE
NOV 22 1930

Music of the Day

By EDWARD CUSHING

The Boston Symphony in Brooklyn—A Revival of 'La Forsa del Destino"—Three Schubert Memorial Proteges Appear

A WARMER welcome awaited the Boston Symphony Orchestra and its conductor, Serge Koussewitsky, at the Academy of Music last evening than that with which they were received on Thursday at Carnegie Hall. It was perhaps the feeling of the Brooklyn audience that some recognition was in order of the fact that the Boston Orchestra this season celebrates the consummation of a half century of existence, and applause that swelled to the proportions of an ovation greeted the appearance of Mr. Koussewitsky on the stage. Rising, the orchestra shared in the tribute and then, settling again to its chairs, was launched by the baton of its leader into a spirited performance of the "Zauberfloete" overture.

* * *

Mr. Koussewitsky's program for this concert, the first of the five which this season as in the past he will conduct at the Academy of Music, was interestingly varied. The Mozart overture was followed by th Seventh of Beethoven's symphonies, and this in turn was succeeded by two Bach preludes, newly transcribed for strings by Pick-Mangiagalli, Wagner's "Lohengrin" prelude and the Spanish Caprice of Rimsky-Korsakow.

The Bach-Mangiagalli preludes were the novelty of the evening—if we have not been misinformed, their performance on this occasion was the first in New York. Mr. Hale's notes on the program did not specify the date of their composition (or rather arrangement), but identified them as the organ prelude in D minor, No. 9, in the Bach Gesellschaft edition of the organ preludes and fugues, and as the prelude to the E-major Partita for violin alone. Signor Pick-Mangiagalli's arrangement of the latter is not accurately described as a transcription, since the Italian composer has here undertaken to compose his own counterpoints to the original Bach melody. These are studious and painstaking in their imitation of the Leipzig master's linear style, but they fail to create those subtle harmonic associations that invariably distinguish Bach's manipulation of one or more melodies in counterpoint. The first transcription is bona fide Bach, an affecting meditation that Signor Pick-Mangiagalli has reverently instrumentated.

* * *

It was good last evening to hear the strings of the Boston Orchestra in both the Bach transcriptions and the "Lohengrin" prelude. Mr. Koussewitsky is learning not to drive his players in the effort to draw from them a sonority beyond the capacity of their instruments. The tone of the violins in particular, to a less extent of violas and cellos, had, as a result, depth as well as brilliance, a rich and luminous quality. This is indeed a splendid orchestra that Boston shares with us—has shared with us, indeed, for the better part of half a century.

* * *

Mr. Koussewitsky's reading of the Beethoven symphony was last evening vigorous and unlabored. The spirit of this music runs high, and the conductor made no attempt to repress it—there was a note o Dionysiac exuberance in the playing of the first movement and the finale, the crown of the work, even in the Allegretto one felt that it was with regret that conductor and orchestra adopted a retarded tempo. The false playing of a trumpeter in the first trio of the scherzo was the only flaw in an orchestral performance ohtrwise virtuose.

Concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussewitsky conducting. At the Academy of Music last evening, under the auspices of the Institute of Arts and Sciences.

THE PROGRAM

Mozart..Overture to "Der Zauberfloete"
Beethoven ..... Seventh Symphony
Bach .....Two Preludes
(Transcribed for strings by Pick-Mangiagalli.)
Wagner .....Prelude to "Lohengrin"
Rimsky-Korsakow ..Spanish Caprice

THIS CLIPPING FROM
New York Eve. World
NOV 22 1930

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, as part of its [illegible]ry season, is to give a Beethoven festival in Washington the evenings of Dec. 2, 3 and 5 and the afternoon of Dec. 6.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
TIMES
NOV 22 1930

MUSIC

The Boston Symphony Orchestra under the able baton of Serge Koussevitsky presented the first in its series of five Brooklyn concerts at the Academy of Music last night.

An almost capacity house tendered the returning conductor an ovation, which he generously shared with his men. But it was a rather staid and orthodox program comprising familiar numbers of Bach, Mozart, Beethoven, Wagner and Rimsky-Korsakoff that Mr. Koussevitsky chose for his Brooklyn opening, albeit the conductor gave it all the care and finesse usually identified only with a world premiere.

That is, if one excepts the overture to "Zauberflote" which opened the evening and which the conductor read in rather colorless vein as he attempted to stress delicacy.

Beethoven's No. 7, which Wagner has styled as the "apotheosis of the dance," but which has also been held to portray the "Pastorale," became, under the Koussevitsky baton, an infectious collection of alluring dance rhythms. Read with especial regard for delineation of detail, the work, according to the Russian's interpretation, transported one from the drabness of every-day life to the woods and fields beloved by its composer.

An arrangement of two Bach preludes by Pick-Mangiagalli followed the intermission, the first appearing rather fragile and superficial and lacking the depth of Bach, but the second, played with zest and fire. In contrast to this was the next offering, the vorspiel to "Lohengrin" with its slow, stately religious aspect, stressed by the conductor so that some of the sublimity of the work itself was transmuted to the orchestra reading it under the Koussevitsky direction.

The finale of the evening was the "Spanish Caprice" of Rimsky-Korsakoff. Begun as a fantasia for violin and orchestra, the composer later partially abandoned this idea in favor of a brilliant orchestration for the ensemble. So well was the work received at its premiere, that the composer dedicated it to the orchestra which officiated. Spanish rather than Russian in texture, Rimsky prepared an instrumentation that fairly dazzles.

Its opening section, a morning serenade, is followed without pause by a theme and variations for horns accompanied by a rather lightly scored ensemble and this soon gives way to a second Allarbada in dance tempo wherein the original virtuoso passages are retained. From here it becomes more highly developed into a gypsy dance with cadanzas for the flute and harp before dashing into a lively fandango.

The kindly though modest gentleman who wielded the baton last night seemed untired as he entered this final section and gave of his best to it. Verily, here is a conductor who holds the orchestra in the hollow of his hand and here is a musician of keen perspective and intellect.

H. E. S.

54

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK TIMES

NOV 23 1930

MUSIC

By OLIN DOWNES.

New Symphony by Nabakov.

Mr. Koussevitzky's second novelty of the week, following his performance last Wednesday night of Roussel's G minor symphony, was heard yesterday afternoon when he conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall. This new work was a symphony by Nicholas Nabakov. The work bears no other title, and the music has no programatic explanation.

At the least, we prefer this music of Nabakov to that of Roussel. It is warmer. In the last two movements of the symphony it has Russian quality, seeming to smack of the earth that bore it, and to do this without the aggravated intellectualism, mannerisms or musical manners imitative of the latest mode of Russianism as it is known in Paris, France. There is color, there are moods. The idiom of modern without being forced. The last half of the symphony seemed superior to the first, to have more unity, more obvious sense of relation between the movements. The treatment of the last movement is surprisingly brief for the proportions of the rest of the symphony. The treatment of the form is unconventional, but direct and concentrated. Whether there is very much actual originality in the work is a thing better determined after repeated hearings than on first acquaintance, by ear only, with the score. The music has, however, a degree of vitality and individuality in it. It was very brilliantly played. One would say, from preliminary impressions of the work and the performance, that once more Mr. Koussevitzky had done a young modern composer an immense service.

The Russian and Ludmilla overture of Glinka opened the concert. The fourth symphony of Tchaikovsky ended it. Mr. Koussevitzky's performance would have been illuminating to a conductor who interpreted the fourth symphony recently in this city and rather naïvely imagined that he had done a good job. The heavy-handedness, lameness and superficiality of his reading were thrown into high relief by yesterday's interpretation, which also displayed the magnificent capacities of the orchestra. It was possible to disagree with some of Mr. Koussevitzky's tempi, as for example those of the third movement, but as regarded other proportions and big lines and changing moods, the reading was fittingly emotional, brilliant in the technical sense, and in the finale magnificently barbaric. And what richness in this work, with all its banalities and hysteria, beside the obvious efforts of Nabakov! Again the audience was deeply moved by the simple, human and wildly expression of Peter Illytch. One might have wished, from this peerless orchestra and a conductor of singular imagination, knowledge and orchestral technic, a work less familiar than Tchaikovsky's, but had another work been substituted there would have been loss as well as possible gain in the transaction.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
HERALD

NOV 23 1930

When the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, opens its fifteith anniversary Beethoven festival at Constitution Hall on Tuesday evening, December 2—the first of a four-performance Beethoven Orchestral festival that will be without parallel in the musical history of Washington—Myra Hess, soloist, will play the fourth Beethoven piano concerto, instead of the third, while Josef Hofmann, soloist, will play the fifth Beethoven piano concerto at the third perfomance on Friday evening, December 5, instead of the fourth, as originally scheduled.

This change of program was announced yesterday by Mrs. Wilson-Greene, under whos local management the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give this mammoth festival of Beethoven on Tuesday, Wednesday and Friday evenings, and Saturday matinee, December 2, 3, 5 and 6. In making the announcement, Mrs. Wilson-Greene stated that orders for seats for the Washington festival were being received from out-of-town points as far north as Bath, Me., and from transmississippi river points.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. AMERICAN

NOV 23 1930

NABOKOV'S NEW SYMPHONY HAS N.Y. PREMIERE

Composition, Played by Boston Orchestra, Follows 'Old, Reliable Formula,' Critic Says

By LEONARD LIEBLING.

Does any music reviewer go to a performance of a new symphonic work these days in the belief that he is to hear any great, or even any significant revelation? I confess that I, for one, do not.

Hopelessly I went to Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon to experience a new symphony by Nicolas Nabokov, and hopelessly I left after the concert, which was a matinee by the visiting Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Serge Koussevitzky.

YOUNG COMPOSER.

Born at Leningrad, Nabokov is twenty-seven. Like many of his Russian musical colleagues, he disdains to live among the tender Soviets, and makes his home in Paris.

Nabokov tudied in Stuttgart and at the Royal High School of Music in Berlin—the institution from which I was expelled as a student because I spoke up to Professor Barth for saying that "all of Liszt's compositions were dirt."

Maybe Nabakov was told the same thing there, for in the symphony to which I listened yesterday, he certainly has not tried to compose like Liszt. And furthermore, the youthful Russian's symphony is not dirt. Nor is it gold. Nor yet sounding brass. It seems more like a compound of old reliable conservative formulae, with an alloy fo Neo-classicism and a pinch of chastened Prakofieff.

FLUENT WRITING.

The writing is fluent, refined, craftsmanlike. The themes have contour but no distinction. The harmonies are too easily solved by ears accustomed to screaming and acrid modernism. Nabokov's imagination describes no tangents or parabolas. Rather it travels in a circle. The effect of the whole work is one of musical inertia and somnolence.

The "old fashioned" Tschaikowsky, whose Fourth Symphony followed that of Nabokov, showed up the new comer in fashion. The Tschaikowsky eloquent pages sang, and pulsed, and throbbed, and passioned. Their melodies warmed the senses. The orchestration gleamed and glinted with a thousand radiant facets. The vital melodies of Tschaikowsky hummed in one's heart for an hour after the concert. Nabokov had already been forgotten.

Koussevitzky conducted the two symphonies and Glinka's "Russlan and Ludmilla" overture with his usual impressive mastery, and the Boston orchestra played with its established brilliancy and finish.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK TIMES

NOV 23 1930

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will participate in a Beethoven Festival at Washington, D. C., on the evenings of Dec. 2, 3, 5 and the afternoon of Dec. 6. The programs that will be presented at Constitution Hall, under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, are:

Dec. 2—Overture to "Egmont," Piano Concerto No. 4 (Myra Hess, soloist), "Eroica," Symphony No. 3.
Dec. 3—"Leonore" Overture No. 3, violin concerto (Efrem Zimbalist, soloist), Symphony No. 5.
Dec. 5—"Coriolanus" Overture, Fifth Piano Concerto (Josef Hofmann, soloist), Symphony No. 7.
Dec. 6—Symphony No. 1, Symphony No. 9, with chorus of 200 and the following quartet soloists: Jeannette Vreeland, Dan Gridley, Nevada Van Der Veer and Fraser Gange.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
HERALD

NOV 23 1930

Beethoven's Life Filled With Sorrow

By STANLEY OLMSTED

AS ALL OF US must realize by now, Washington is to have its first Beethoven festival on December 2, 3, 5 and 6. By nine-tenths of the musical universe (there is a Bach cult that won't quite allow it) Beethoven ranks as the one genius who stands face to face with Shakespeare in an otherwise unshared immortality.

Practically all the panorama of his bestowal on mankind will be adumbrated by Serge Koussevitzky and his Boston Symphony Orchestra, brought to Constitution Hall by Mrs. Wilson-Greene who is said to have planned it all with whole-hearted fervor.

The composer's life is familiar to everybody, or ought to be. A notation, far too brief, of outstanding moments in the vastly documented saga, is therefore offered here for handiness only. Herald readers may find it convenient in the rush. That is our sole excuse.

He was born at Bonn, on the Rhine, December 16, 1770. Paternally of Flemish blood, he was the second of seven children. His father was musically gifted. But biographers recommend the dismissal of the father strain as not having counted at all.

This father is popularly limned as "a perfect nullity, idle, common, foolish." He was but a channel. Beethoven's granite staunchness came from that father's father; his sensitiveness, from his mother and her line.

At 12, he played Bach in so masterly a fashion as to catch the ears of exalted Bonn initiates. He was given a court orchestral post, as cembalist. At 14 he was appointed court organist, with an annual salary of about $63 in florins.

Each morning he played the 6 o'clock mass. His written compositions during this period were unimportant. His improvisations, on the other hand, left a legend of loveliness. He began to be spoken of as one of the best pianists of the day.

* * *

AT 17 HE journeyed to Vienna. He met Mozart. The latter heard him play, remarking to a companion, "Pay attention to him. He will make a noise in the world some day."

At 18, his mother died. He took actual authority as head of the family, having long before assumed its financial burdens. For a vivid idea of these years, and his drunken father's irresponsibility, read "Jean Cristophe," by Romain Rolland.

The lad's chief recreation were long solitary walks in the country. For four years he played, now, second viola in the court orchestra.

By court order, part of his father's wages in that orchestra were paid to him for household upkeep. They never knew when father would show up from the tavern.

In 1792, that feted Viennese idol, red-heeled old "Papa Haydn," passed through Bonn. Hearing a cantata by young Beethoven, he recommended that the author be given wider scope for study and career. And so, in November of that year, ne left Bonn, never to return. By now he was 22.

Grove, of the dictionary, has said: "Against Mozart's 28 operas, cantatas and masses composed before his twenty-third birthday, Beethoven has absolutely nothing to show."

* * *

IN HAYDN'S VIENNA, Beethoven was to spend the rest of his life, barring minor absences. He met Count Waldstein, who was to be immortalized by that Sonata, opus 53. He met all the aristocracy. Uncouth of aspect, all but yokelish of manner, young Beethoven yet found the door of many great houses open to him.

Prince and Princess Lichnowski set aside a pension for him of 600 florins a year—four times his 12-year-old hire at the Bonn court. In their home "his prejudices were respected, his eccentricities condoned."

Now, in those days, the "patron was an absolute necessity. Some say things haven't altered much in this particular, even today, for musical "geniuses," be they symphonists or sopranos.

Of the 20-odd great houses open to him, several were homes of actual princes of the blood. Many ladies, lovely and high born, overlooked his boorishness, which masked an alluring heman sincerity. It is not on record that any of them ever "vamped" him with conspicuous success.

To get ahead of our two-part story, he never married but was at one time rumored to be engaged to the Countesse Therese, sister of the Count of Brunswick.

Next Sunday we will continue this highly deleted sketch to his tragic final years of stone-deafness, compensated by ears of the all-hearing soul—with attainment ever more titan until the hour of his passing!

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. MORN. WORLD

NOV 23 1930

Music

By Samuel Chotzinoff

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, Carnegie Hall, 2.30 P. M., Serge Koussevitzky conducting. The program:
Overture to "Russlan and Ludmilla" ..... Glinka
Symphony ..... Nabokov
Symphony No. 4 in F Minor (opus 36) ..... Tschaikowsky

At the Boston Symphony's matinee yesterday at Carnegie Hall Mr. Koussevitzky disclosed a new symphony by Nicolas Nabokov, a twenty-seven-year-old Russian now residing in Paris. Last Thursday evening the Boston conductor gave us a new symphony by Albert Roussell. Certainly it is no longer possible to complain of the world's musical sterility. Or is this extraordinary fertility conditioned by the needs of star batonists, a situation comparable to the present state of the drama in New York, whose numerous theaters simply have to house shows of any description?

Mr. Nabokov, like a good many of his countrymen, first found an outlet for his genius in Diaghilev's Russian Ballet, which staged his ballet-oratorio "Ode or Meditation at Night on the Majesty of God, as Revealed by the Aurora Borealis," in Paris two years ago. His symphony is unilluminated by any such grandiose qualification. It is offered as a work in three movements, and we are to take or leave it for its musical valucs alone. Such an unconditional presentation seems rather hard on the critic, whose task the conductor could have simplified by a few words of explanation. Without them the reporter is obliged to compare a work like the Nabokov symphony with some well-known examples of absolute music in the same form, with results that may not be altogether fair to the former.

Regarded then as a symphony, yesterday's novelty seemed like the labor of a well-schooled musician who is not averse to well-defined themes and even tunes—the last movement was built on a good, lively, old-fashioned one. It was neither cacophonous nor pretentious. On the other hand it was neither distinguished nor exciting. What Mr. Nabokov was driving at I cannot say. I thought it a harmless piece of music, which left me with no desire to hear it again.

Tschaikowsky's F minor symphony, which came after it, sounded like very important music, indeed. Notwithstanding the fact that Tschaikowsky had a definite program in mind, the symphony stands squarely on its own musical legs, as all music must do to survive. The opening theme may actually signify Fate, but if you kne nothing about the program you woul nevertheless find the brassy motto ir resistible. The same holds true o all other themes and their develop ment. Tschaiowsky may be vulga and indiscreet, but he is never unex citing. Mr. Nabokov is neither o these things, yet I found his symphony a soporific.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
POST

NOV 23 1930

ORCHESTRA TO PLAY NOTABLE COMPOSITIONS

When the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, opens its fiftieth anniversary Beethoven festival at Constitutional Hall on Tuesday evening, December 2—the first of a four-performance Beethoven orchestral festival that will be without parallel in the musical history of Washington—Myra Hess, soloist, will play the fourth Beethoven piano concerto, instead of the third, while Joseph Hofmann, soloist, will play the fifth Beethoven piano concerto at the third performance on Friday evening, December 5, instead of the fourth, as originally scheduled.

This change of program was announced yesterday by Mrs. Wilson-Greene, under whose local management the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give this mammoth festival of Beethoven on Tuesday, Wednesday and Friday evenings, and Saturday matinee, December 2, 3, 5 and 6.

Outside of the centenary celebration of Beethoven's death given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Boston in 1927, it is doubtful if ever such a Beethoven festival was given in America as this one promises to be. While the Boston centenary festival eclipsed, in completeness and grandeur, all other American celebrations of the composer's centenary, Mrs. Wilson-Greene has emphasized the fact that in Boston there were not to be heard three famous soloists such as Myra Hess, pianist; Josef Hofmann, pianist, and Efrem Zimbalist, violinist, matching their talents with the orchestra.

Three famous Beethoven overtures —"Egmont," "Leonore" and "Coriolanus"—will open the programs of the first three evenings of the festival, while, in addition to the concertos for pianoforte to be played by Miss Hess and Mr. Hofmann, Efrem Zimbalist, violinist, will be heard as soloist at the second performance, playing Beethoven's violin concerto in D major, Opus 61. In all, five of Beethoven's mightiest symphonies will be given during the festival—the third or "Eroica," the fifth, the seventh, the first and the ninth, in the order named.

Apparently the highlight of the entire festival will come at the final performance on Saturday afternoon, December 6, when the first and ninth symphonies will be given with a chorus of 200 voices, trained by Dr. Albert W. Harned, and with Jeannette Vreeland, Nevada Van Der Veer, Dan S.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. Herald Tribune

NOV 23 1930

All-Russian Program Given By Koussevitzky

Nabokov's 'Lyric' Symphony Introduced as Modern Novelty by Boston Conductor

Yesterday's Boston Symphony matinee at Carnegie Hall, under Serge Koussevitzky's direction, offered an all-Russian program, beginning with Glinka's Overture to "Rousslan and Ludmilla," traversing a modern novelty, Nabokov's "Lyric" Symphony and closing with the F minor Symphony of Tchaikovsky.

Nicolas Nabokov was born at Petrograd twenty-seven years ago, and now dwells, like so many of his compatriots, in Paris. He caused some stir in that fairly experienced town a few years ago by a remarkable "ballet-oratorio" modestly entitled, "Ode or Meditation at Night on the Majesty of God, as Revealed by the Aurora Borealis." This was produced by the Ballet Russe, and seems to have been received with incomplete gravity.

The symphony heard yesterday afternoon is a later and less ambitious work. It was given in Paris under Pierre Monteux's direction in February of the present year and was performed for the first time in America a few weeks ago under Mr. Koussevitzky's direction in the Boston Symphony Orchestra's home town.

The new symphony is modest in plan. It has only three movements: an opening Allegro, a Largo and a Scherzo-Finale. The character of the music is romantic, in a day when musical romanticism is as definitely out of fashion as side-whiskers. Mr. Nabokov dares to be songful; he dares to meditate. If neither his songs nor his meditations seem especially memorable, at least they indicate honorable intentions.

The symphony was cordially received, as were the other and more familiar items on the program.

54

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK TIMES

NOV 23 1930

MUSIC

By OLIN DOWNES.

New Symphony by Nabakov.

Mr. Koussevitzky's second novelty of the week, following his performance last Wednesday night of Roussel's G minor symphony, was heard yesterday afternoon when he conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall. This new work was a symphony by Nicholas Nabakov. The work bears no other title, and the music has no programatic explanation.

At the least, we prefer this music of Nabakov to that of Roussel. It is warmer. In the last two movements of the symphony it has Russian quality, seeming to smack of the earth that bore it, and to do this without the aggravated intellectualism, mannerisms or musical manners imitative of the latest mode of Russianism as it is known in Paris, France. There is color, there are moods. The idiom of modern without being forced. The last half of the symphony seemed superior to the first, to have more unity, more obvious sense of relation between the movements. The treatment of the last movement is surprisingly brief for the proportions of the rest of the symphony. The treatment of the form is unconventional, but direct and concentrated. Whether there is very much actual originality in the work is a thing better determined after repeated hearings than on first acquaintance, by ear only, with the score. The music has, however, a degree of vitality and individuality in it. It was very brilliantly played. One would say, from preliminary impressions of the work and the performance, that once more Mr. Koussevitzky had done a young modern composer an immense service.

The Russian and Ludmilla overture of Glinka opened the concert. The fourth symphony of Tchaikovsky ended it. Mr. Koussevitzky's performance would have been illuminating to a conductor who interpreted the fourth symphony recently in this city and rather naively imagined that he had done a good job. The heavy-handedness, lameness and superficiality of his reading were thrown into high relief by yesterday's interpretation, which also displayed the magnificent capacities of the orchestra. It was possible to disagree with some of Mr. Koussevitzky's tempi, as for example those of the third movement, but as regarded other proportions and big lines and changing moods, the reading was fittingly emotional, brilliant in the technical sense, and in the finale magnificently barbaric. And what richness in this work, with all its banalities and hysteria, beside the obvious efforts of Nabakov! Again the audience was deeply moved by the simple, human and wildly expression of Peter Illytch. One might have wished, from this peerless orchestra and a conductor of singular imagination, knowledge and orchestral technic, a work less familiar than Tchaikovsky's, but had another work been substituted there would have been loss as well as possible gain in the transaction.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
HERALD

NOV 23 1930

When the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, opens its fifteith anniversary Beethoven festival at Constitution Hall on Tuesday evening, December 2—the first of a four-performance Beethoven Orchestral festival that will be without parallel in the musical history of Washington—Myra Hess, soloist, will play the fourth Beethoven piano concerto, instead of the third, while Josef Hofmann, soloist, will play the fifth Beethoven piano concerto at the third perfomance on Friday evening, December 5, instead of the fourth, as originally scheduled.

This change of program was announced yesterday by Mrs. Wilson-Greene, under whos local management the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give this mammoth festival of Beethoven on Tuesday, Wednesday and Friday evenings, and Saturday matinee, December 2, 3, 5 and 6. In making the announcement, Mrs. Wilson-Greene stated that orders for seats for the Washington festival were being received from out-of-town points as far north as Bath, Me., and from transmississippi river points.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. AMERICAN

NOV 23 1930

NABOKOV'S NEW SYMPHONY HAS N.Y. PREMIERE

Composition, Played by Boston Orchestra, Follows 'Old, Reliable Formula,' Critic Says

By LEONARD LIEBLING.

Does any music reviewer go to a performance of a new symphonic work these days in the belief that he is to hear any great, or even any significant revelation? I confess that I, for one, do not.

Hopelessly I went to Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon to experience a new symphony by Nicolas Nabokov, and hopelessly I left after the concert, which was a matinee by the visiting Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Serge Koussevitzky.

YOUNG COMPOSER.

Born at Leningrad, Nabokov is twenty-seven. Like many of his Russian musical colleagues, he disdains to live among the tender Soviets, and makes his home in Paris.

Nabokov tudied in Stuttgart and at the Royal High School of Music in Berlin—the institution from which I was expelled as a student because I spoke up to Professor Barth for saying that "all of Liszt's compositions were dirt."

Maybe Nabakov was told the same thing there, for in the symphony to which I listened yesterday, he certainly has not tried to compose like Liszt. And furthermore, the youthful Russian's symphony is not dirt. Nor is it gold. Nor yet sounding brass. It seems more like a compound of old reliable conservative formulae, with an alloy fo Neo-classicism and a pinch of chastened Prakofieff.

FLUENT WRITING.

The writing is fluent, refined, craftsmanlike. The themes have contour but no distinction. The harmonies are too easily solved by ears accustomed to screaming and acrid modernism. Nabokov's imagination describes no tangents or parabolas. Rather it travels in a circle. The effect of the whole work is one of musical inertia and somnolence.

The "old fashioned" Tschaikowsky, whose Fourth Symphony followed that of Nabokov, showed up the new comer in fashion. The Tschaikowsky eloquent pages sang, and pulsed, and throbbed, and passioned. Their melodies warmed the senses. The orchestration gleamed and glinted with a thousand radiant facets. The vital melodies of Tschaikowsky hummed in one's heart for an hour after the concert. Nabokov had already been forgotten.

Koussevitzky conducted the two symphonies and Glinka's "Russlan and Ludmilla" overture with his usual impressive mastery, and the Boston orchestra played with its established brilliancy and finish.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK TIMES

NOV 23 1930

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will participate in a Beethoven Festival at Washington, D. C., on the evenings of Dec. 2, 3, 5 and the afternoon of Dec. 6. The programs that will be presented at Constitution Hall, under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, are:

Dec. 2—Overture to "Egmont," Piano Concerto No. 4 (Myra Hess, soloist), "Eroica," Symphony No. 3.
Dec. 3—"Leonore" Overture No. 3, violin concerto (Efrem Zimbalist, soloist), Symphony No. 5.
Dec. 5—"Coriolanus" Overture, Fifth Piano Concerto (Josef Hofmann, soloist), Symphony No. 7.
Dec. 6—Symphony No. 1, Symphony No. 9, with chorus of 200 and the following quartet soloists: Jeannette Vreeland, Dan Gridley, Nevada Van Der Veer and Fraser Gange.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
HERALD

NOV 23 1930

Beethoven's Life Filled With Sorrow

By STANLEY OLMSTED

AS ALL OF US must realize by now, Washington is to have its first Beethoven festival on December 2, 3, 5 and 6. By nine-tenths of the musical universe (there is a Bach cult that won't quite allow it) Beethoven ranks as the one genius who stands face to face with Shakespeare in an otherwise unshared immortality.

Practically all the panorama of his bestowal on mankind will be adumbrated by Serge Koussevitzky and his Boston Symphony Orchestra, brought to Constitution Hall by Mrs. Wilson-Greene who is said to have planned it all with whole-hearted fervor.

The composer's life is familiar to everybody, or ought to be. A notation, far too brief, of outstanding moments in the vastly documented saga, is therefore offered here for handiness only. Herald readers may find it convenient in the rush. That is our sole excuse.

He was born at Bonn, on the Rhine, December 16, 1770. Paternally of Flemish blood, he was the second of seven children. His father was musically gifted. But biographers recommend the dismissal of the father strain as not having counted at all.

This father is popularly limned as "a perfect nullity, idle, common, foolish." He was but a channel. Beethoven's granite staunchness came from that father's father; his sensitiveness, from his mother and her line.

At 12, he played Bach in so masterly a fashion as to catch the ears of exalted Bonn initiates. He was given a court orchestral post, as cembalist. At 14 he was appointed court organist, with an annual salary of about $63 in florins.

Each morning he played the 6 o'clock mass. His written compositions during this period were unimportant. His improvisations, on the other hand, left a legend of loveliness. He began to be spoken of as one of the best pianists of the day.

* * *

AT 17 HE journeyed to Vienna. He met Mozart. The latter heard him play, remarking to a companion, "Pay attention to him. He will make a noise in the world some day."

At 18, his mother died. He took actual authority as head of the family, having long before assumed its financial burdens. For a vivid idea of these years, and his drunken father's irresponsibility, read "Jean Cristophe," by Romain Rolland.

The lad's chief recreation were long solitary walks in the country. For four years he played, now, second viola in the court orchestra.

By court order, part of his father's wages in that orchestra were paid to him for household upkeep. They never knew when father would show up from the tavern.

In 1792, that feted Viennese idol, red-heeled old "Papa Haydn," passed through Bonn. Hearing a cantata by young Beethoven, he recommended that the author be given wider scope for study and career. And so, in November of that year, ne left Bonn, never to return. By now he was 22.

Grove, of the dictionary, has said: "Against Mozart's 28 operas, cantatas and masses, composed before his twenty-third birthday, Beethoven has absolutely nothing to show."

* * *

IN HAYDN'S VIENNA, Beethoven was to spend the rest of his life, barring minor absences. He met Count Waldstein, who was to be immortalized by that Sonata, opus 53. He met all the aristocracy. Uncouth of aspect, all but yokelish of manner, young Beethoven yet found the door of many great houses open to him.

Prince and Princess Lichnowski set aside a pension for him of 600 florins a year—four times his 12-year-old hire at the Bonn court. In their home "his prejudices were respected, his eccentricities condoned."

Now, in those days, the "patron was an absolute necessity. Some say things haven't altered much in this particular, even today, for musical "geniuses," be they symphonists or sopranos.

Of the 20-odd great houses open to him, several were homes of actual princes of the blood. Many ladies, lovely and high born, overlooked his boorishness, which masked an alluring heman sincerity. It is not on record that any of them ever "vamped" him with conspicuous success.

To get ahead of our two-part story, he never married but was at one time rumored to be engaged to the Countesse Therese, sister of the Count of Brunswick.

Next Sunday we will continue this highly deleted sketch to his tragic final years of stone-deafness, compensated by ears of the all-hearing soul—with attainment ever more titan until the hour of his passing!

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. MORN. WORLD

NOV 23 1930

Music

By Samuel Chotzinoff

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, Carnegie Hall, 2.30 P. M., Serge Koussevitzky conducting. The program:

Overture to "Russlan and Ludmilla" ..... Glinka
Symphony ..... Nabokov
Symphony No. 4 in F Minor (opus 36) ..... Tschaikowsky

At the Boston Symphony's matinee yesterday at Carnegie Hall Mr. Koussevitzky disclosed a new symphony by Nicolas Nabokov, a twenty-seven-year-old Russian now residing in Paris. Last Thursday evening the Boston conductor gave us a new symphony by Albert Roussell. Certainly it is no longer possible to complain of the world's musical sterility. Or is this extraordinary fertility conditioned by the needs of star batonists, a situation comparable to the present state of the drama in New York, whose numerous theaters simply have to house shows of any description?

Mr. Nabokov, like a good many of his countrymen, first found an outlet for his genius in Diaghilev's Russian Ballet, which staged his ballet-oratorio "Ode or Meditation at Night on the Majesty of God, as Revealed by the Aurora Borealis," in Paris two years ago. His symphony is unillumined by any such grandiose qualification. It is offered as a work in three movements, and we are to take or leave it for its musical values alone. Such an unconditional presentation seems rather hard on the critic, whose task the conductor could have simplified by a few words of explanation. Without them the reporter is obliged to compare a work like the Nabokov symphony with some well-known examples of absolute music in the same form, with results that may not be altogether fair to the former.

Regarded then as a symphony, yesterday's novelty seemed like the labor of a well-schooled musician who is not averse to well-defined themes and even tunes—the last movement was built on a good, lively, old-fashioned one. It was neither cacophonous nor pretentious. On the other hand it was neither distinguished nor exciting. What Mr. Nabokov was driving at I cannot say. I thought it a harmless piece of music, which left me with no desire to hear it again.

Tschaikowsky's F minor symphony, which came after it, sounded like very important music, indeed. Notwithstanding the fact that Tschaikowsky had a definite program in mind, the symphony stands squarely on its own musical legs, as all music must do to survive. The opening theme may actually signify Fate, but if you knew nothing about the program you would nevertheless find the brassy motto irresistible. The same holds true of all other themes and their development. Tschaiowsky may be vulgar and indiscreet, but he is never unexciting. Mr. Nabokov is neither of these things, yet I found his symphony a soporific.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
POST

NOV 23 1930

ORCHESTRA TO PLAY NOTABLE COMPOSITIONS

When the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, opens its fiftieth anniversary Beethoven festival at Constitutional Hall on Tuesday evening, December 2—the first of a four-performance Beethoven orchestral festival that will be without parallel in the musical history of Washington—Myra Hess, soloist, will play the fourth Beethoven piano concerto, instead of the third, while Joseph Hofmann, soloist, will play the fifth Beethoven piano concerto at the third performance on Friday evening, December 5, instead of the fourth, as originally scheduled.

This change of program was announced yesterday by Mrs. Wilson-Greene, under whose local management the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give this mammoth festival of Beethoven on Tuesday, Wednesday and Friday evenings, and Saturday matinee, December 2, 3, 5 and 6.

Outside of the centenary celebration of Beethoven's death given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Boston in 1927, it is doubtful if ever such a Beethoven festival was given in America as this one promises to be. While the Boston centenary festival eclipsed, in completeness and grandeur, all other American celebrations of the composer's centenary, Mrs. Wilson-Greene has emphasized the fact that in Boston there were not to be heard three famous soloists such as Myra Hess, pianist; Josef Hofmann, pianist, and Efrem Zimbalist, violinist, matching their talents with the orchestra.

Three famous Beethoven overtures —"Egmont," "Leonore" and "Coriolanus"—will open the programs of the first three evenings of the festival, while, in addition to the concertos for pianoforte to be played by Miss Hess and Mr. Hofmann, Efrem Zimbalist, violinist, will be heard as soloist at the second performance, playing Beethoven's violin concerto in D major, Opus 61. In all, five of Beethoven's mightiest symphonies will be given during the festival—the third or "Eroica," the fifth, the seventh, the first and the ninth, in the order named.

Apparently the highlight of the entire festival will come at the final performance on Saturday afternoon, December 6, when the first and ninth symphonies will be given with a chorus of 200 voices, trained by Dr. Albert W. Harned, and with Jeannette Vreeland, Nevada Van Der Veer, Dan Gridley and Fraser Gange as soloists.

ssian Pr[illegible]am Given By Koussevitzky

Nabokov's 'Lyric' Symphony Introduced as Modern Novelty by Boston Conductor

Yesterday's Boston Symphony matinee at Carnegie Hall, under Serge Koussevitzky's direction, offered an all-Russian program, beginning with Glinka's Overture to "Rousslan and Ludmilla," traversing a modern novelty, Nabokov's "Lyric" Symphony and closing with the F minor Symphony of Tchaikovsky.

Nicolas Nabokov was born at Petrograd twenty-seven years ago, and now dwells, like so many of his compatriots, in Paris. He caused some stir in that fairly experienced town a few years ago by a remarkable "ballet-oratorio" modestly entitled, "Ode or Meditation at Night on the Majesty of God, as Revealed by the Aurora Borealis." This was produced by the Ballet Russe, and seems to have been received with incomplete gravity.

The symphony heard yesterday afternoon is a later and less ambitious work. It was given in Paris under Pierre Monteux's direction in February of the present year and was performed for the first time in America a few weeks ago under Mr. Koussevitzky's direction in the Boston Symphony Orchestra's home town.

The new symphony is modest in plan. It has only three movements: an opening Allegro, a Largo and a Scherzo-Finale. The character of the music is romantic, in a day when musical romanticism is as definitely out of fashion as side-whiskers. Mr. Nabokov dares to be songful; he dares to meditate. If neither his songs nor his meditations seem especially memorable, at least they indicate honorable intentions.

The symphony was cordially received, as were the other and more familiar items on the program.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK SUN
NOV 24 1930

Nicolas Nabokov Work Played

Koussevitsky Offers Program of Russian Music at Boston Symphony Concert.

By W. J. HENDERSON.

The first matinee concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which engaged the attention of a numerous audience in Carnegie Hall Saturday afternoon, was devoted to another glorification of Russian music and incidentally to the unloading upon a defenseless New York of a portion of the burden of unimportant stuff gathered by Mr. Koussevitzky to celebrate the fiftieth anniversary of the orchestra.

Boston's shoulders had already bent under much that we may not be called upon to endure—a theme and variations by Respighi, received with "silence and tears"; a Prokofieff work which bit the dust at the first shot, and a symphony (the first) by Nicolas Nabokov, which was regarded with less disfavor.

This symphony was the central number Saturday afternoon, being preceded by the venerable "Russian and Ludamilla" overture of Glinka and followed by the fourth symphony of Tschaikowsky. It may possibly be worthy of note that none of this Russian music was made under the aegis of the present government. Glinka went into rest in 1857 and Tschaikowsky in 1893. Mr. Nabokov, who was born in Leningrad in 1903, studied at the Hochschule in Berlin and has since then been a resident of Paris, where all the other Russian composers of worldwide fame except Rachmaninoff are domiciled.

Mr. Nabokov's symphony betokens a talent which may ripen into something of value. The work is immature in plan. It has not the sure advance of a master. It is not altogether certain of its own line of development, and it betrays an occasional effort at striking originality, as in the singularly unrelated English horn solo closing the first movement. But in that same movement there are fresh vigor and boldness that demand attention.

The movement alternates the insistent and hammering type of rhythm so common in modern music with some passages of melodic fluency and individual, if not poetic, character. There is a fugato into which the now inevitable trumpet solo injects a touch of circus vulgarity. The fugato itself seems to be only vaguely drawn from the rest of the movement. If it were eliminated the logical process might not be destroyed. But the movement, like the other two, is amiably short.

The middle section of the work, a largo, meanders aimlessly through some devious lanes of shattered melody without arriving at any splendid destination. The finale begins with a good old-fashioned scherzando for the bassoons. This might have been conceived in the days of Schubert. The middle portion is well contrasted and contains some interesting, if not highly important music. The work reaches its close with a broad proclamation in the style of the ancient church music of Russia. The symphony is rich in harmony and after the first movement seldom loses itself in the mazes of dissonance so highly esteemed by the most enlightened progressives. But we fear that this symphony will not outlive the one which followed it on Mr. Koussevitzky's program. As the creation of a young man of 27 it commands some respect and engenders hope.

Mr. Koussevitzky presented the Tschaikowsky work with a nice sense of proportion. The familiar way is to go at it hammer and tongs, as if it were a riot. By treating its more flowing parts with delicacy and deliberation Mr. Koussevitzky was able to build up the climaxes which are too often leveled out of the composition. The audience seemed to indicate a belief that it was a good symphony well played.

THIS CLIPPING FROM ROANOKE, VA.
TIMES
NOV 23 193

BOSTON SYMPHONY TO GIVE FESTIVAL IN WASHINGTON

December Event to Celebrate Fiftieth Anniversary of Noted Orchestra.

Washington, Nov. 22—Celebrating its fiftieth anniversary, the Boston Symphony orchestra, under the baton of its illustrious conductor, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, will give a Beethoven festival at Constitution hall, new home of the Daughters of the American Revolution, in Washington, D. C., on Tuesday, Wednesday and Friday evenings, and Saturday afternoon, December 2, 3, 5, and 6. The event is expected to attract to the city music lovers over a wide area.

This festival promises to eclipse in brilliance and importance any orchestral festival ever given in America with the exception of the Beethoven Centenary Festival given by the same orchestra in Boston, three years ago, on the 100th anniversary of the composer's death. Ever since that time, it has been the ambition of the orchestra management and of Dr. Koussevitzky to give a Beethoven festival in the Capital. Until now, it has not been possible but 1930 being the 50th anniversary of the founding the Boston Symphony, it was decided to give the Festival in Washington to celebrate the Orchestra's 50th birthday and, at the same time, to honor the memory of the master of Bonn.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
NOV 24 1930

BIG BUSINESS NECESSARY FOR CONCERTS IN CITY

So Says W. H. Brennan, Manager of Boston Symphony Orchestra.

"If these artists do not do a big business, there is very little hope for concerts in your city," W. H. Brennan, manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has written to the Providence Music Association, which will open its Infantry Hall series next week Tuesday night with an appearance of John Charles Thomas and Erika Morini. "The attractions are all of the very first order," Mr. Brennan commented.

In the other two concerts at Infantry Hall the Music Association will bring to Providence Nikolai Sokoloff and the Cleveland Orchestra for its third annual appearance in February, and later a joint recital by Sigrid Onegin and Myra Hess.

John Charles Thomas is a well known baritone, while Erika Morini, described by some critics as the greatest living woman violinist, will be giving her first concert in Providence since she was very young. The Onegin-Hess concert in March will bring together an eminent contralto and a pianist who is possibly the greatest of her sex.

The Music Association has reduced prices on its course tickets, which admit to all three concerts at a special rate. The seats are being sold at M. Steinert and Sons on Westminster street.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. EVE. POST
NOV 24 1930

Music : By Oscar Thompson

"Jephte" and "Gerry," a New Nabakov Symphony, and Koussevitzky and Toscanini in the Clouds

FOR sheer sweetness of sound, surely the name of Carissimi is one to conjure with, in or out of the concert halls. Artur Bodanzky and the Friends of Music went conjuring yesterday afternoon in one of those felicitous excursions into the music of the past that would seem to be particularly the mission of an organization with the motto of "L'Art pour l'Art." The audience which assembled in the Metropolitan for the third of the society's concerts was rewarded with a performance of "Jephte," which made of Carissimi something more than a name. Here was music that floated an aura of its own—an aura of gentle benediction in a tranquil close which—for all its seventeenth century religiosity—might be likened in effect, if not in any actual complexity of sound, to the glowing serenities ending some of the Strauss tone-poems. Giacomo Carissimi, who died in Rome as long ago as 1674, knew much of the art by which a worker in tones can deal with death and transfiguration.

"Jephte" is styled an oratorio. Carissimi is historically regarded as the father by adoption, though not the actual inventor, of the sacred cantata. Of him it has been written that he had less learning and more imagination than his predecessors of the Roman school. He is credited with having done much to perfect recitative; and in their lightness and variety his accompaniments have been considered remarkable. He was a prolific composer, and he had such pupils as Bassani, Cesti and Buononcini. What most concerns us here, however, is not his interesting career but the charm of this surviving example of his handicraft. Six years ago, "Jephte" was sung by the Schola Cantorum, but yesterday's was a first performance in America of the work in new orchestration by the composer's modern compatriot, Vittorio Gui—not to be confounded with the Russian composer-artillerist, Cesar Cui. This new instrumentation is the work of a sparing and sensitive hand, tasteful and appropriate, without the strictest adherence to the letter of Carissimi's day.

The work employs the device of the narrator, there being two such singers, one a mezzo, the other a baritone, who tell the biblical story of Jepthah and his daughter, Filia, in recitative that alternates with tenor and soprano airs, and with choruses which either aid in carrying on the narrative or express the emotions of the multitude. In the earlier portions devoted to the unfolding of the tale, the music [illegible] reached the sacrifice of Filia, with its supporting choral lament, it ascended into a region of almost ethereal beauty.

Much of the success of the performance was due to the admirable singing of the music of Filia by Editha Fleischer, especially with respect to her tasteful appreciation of its emotional values. George Meader, Marion Telva and Alfredo Gandolfi were the other soloists. Walter Wohllebe's chorus had been carefully prepared and sang accordingly. The program also included the G Minor Handel Concerto Grosso, not any too well played by the orchestra, though the harpsichord part was skillfully projected by Kurt Ruhrseitz; and the solo cantata, "Schlage doch, gewuenschte Stunde," now commonly attributed to Bach—though not without dissenting opinions—sympathetically sung by Miss Telva. In spite of much nice discrimination as between Bach and Handel, the latter might as conceivably have composed this essentially monodic work as Bach. Under its fluent vocal melody is an accompaniment that peculiarly presages some of the most un-Bachian [illegible] of later-day opera.

EARLIER in the afternoon, Geraldine Farrar reappeared in recital at Carnegie Hall. Whether or not the Gerryflappers of ten years ago ever have grown up, they stood up as a greeting to their idol of other times. In a program that was half German Lieder, Miss Farrar depended once more on the charm of her personality and on the appeal of a tasteful and rather placid style to awaken and hold the interest that her weak and colorless tones scarcely could have held had she been less lovely to look upon. It was singing without climax or much of emotion of any kind except a gentle wistfulness that was in keeping with the silvered hair above the glowing, youthful eyes. So faulty was her enunciation that this listener had difficulty deciding whether she sang German or English. But neither that nor her vocal limitations interfered with the most fervid applause.

ENTER Nicolas Nabakov among our symphonists. He was born in Leningrad some twenty-seven years ago and he lives in Paris. Serge Koussevitzky played for the first time in New York at his Boston Symphony concert Saturday afternoon a symphony in three movements, without designation of any kind, tonality or programmatic; brought out in France as recently as February of this year by Pierre Monteux. It possesses substance; it "sounds." In its structure are brevities that suggest either impatience with past ideas of development or a variety of short-windedness that may be due to youth and inexperience. But, by and large, this is the work of a traditionalist, not an innovator. Perhaps what it has to say is not very weighty, but it is said in a manner to hold the ear. Would it hold it, with repetition? Perhaps Mr. Koussevitzky will give us opportunity to find out.

Aside from the new symphony and Glinka's "Russian and Ludmilla" Overture, the Boston conductor attested his Russianism by an altogether superb performance of the Tchaikovsky Fourth Symphony, superb at the same time that it was extreme in many of its details. Here was the virtuosity of this conductor and this orchestra at its most thrilling.

In the evening, Arturo Toscanini played the Strauss "Ein Heldenleben" with a heart-shaking beauty of sound and with an emotional conviction quite the counterpart of that beauty of sound. Cherubini's "Anacreon" Overture and Mozart's "Haffner" Symphony also had the hallmarks of his genius for clarity, grace, euphony and structural equipoise.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
NEWS TRIBUNE
NOV 24 193

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA TO PLAY HERE NEXT TUESDAY

"If these artists do not do a big business, there is very little hope for concerts in your city," W. H. Brennan, manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has written to the Providence Music Association, which will open its Infantry Hall series next week, Tuesday night. The Music Association has reduced prices on its course tickets which admit to all three concerts at a special rate.

Appearing with the Boston Symphony will be John Charles Thomas, well known baritone, and Arika Morini, described by some critics as the greatest living woman violinist. In the other two concerts the Music Association will bring to this city Nikolai Sokoloff and the Cleveland orchestra for its third annual appearance in February and later a joint recital by Sigrid Onegin and Myra Hess.

55
THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. JOURNAL
NOV 24 1930

Farrar Returns in Concert; Some New Music

By IRVING WEIL.

Nobody, we suppose, can listen to Geraldine Farrar sing as he would listen to any one else—and for the not at all simple reason that she is Geraldine Farrar. The subtle and sophisticated charm of her personality invades whatever she happens to be doing with her voice, and one accepts her singing unconditionally on these terms. The great audience that filled Carnegie Hall yesterday upon her return in concert, figuratively, threw itself at her feet, just like every other for nearly twenty-five years.

We confess quite shamelessly that we scarcely heard the first two or three songs she sang. Swift memories of her Juliet, of her Tosca, her Cio-Cio-San, her Fiammette, Madame Sans-Gene, Zaza, Louise, crowded across the back of one's mind. What a gallery! But now she was singing Schumann—an older and a different Farrar, but still, after all, the same.

It did not seem to matter greatly, for example, that Schumann's phrasing in a song like his "Greeting" or "In the Open" was not always the singer's, that her vowel sounds rather distorted the text, or that her tone was not quite pure or steady. The main point was that these songs had the Farrar touch.

ART ENRICHES SINGING.

It was the same later with songs of Schubert and Wolf, Brahms and Richard Strauss, Gretry and Bizet and Godard. And occasionally—but too rarely, so delightfully was it done—Miss Farrar would enrich a song with a bit of the actress's art in gesture and play of facial expression. Thus she made a notable picture out of Brahms's "Vain Serenade," which she sang as one of numerous encores. Nor did it seem to matter much, again, that in this she quite changed Brahms's melodic close. For this was Farrar, and not merely a lieder singer.

* * *

A RUSSIAN NOVELTY.

The young composer of today seldom turns to the symphony to express what is going on inside him. It is explained that the form no longer serves for what he wants to say, but it is also wickedly suggested that he generally isn't able to say that much. Occasionally, however, someone who hasn't been completely eaten up by modernism fondly embraces the old form and hopes for the best.

This seems to have been the case with Nikolai Nabokoff, a young Russian of 27, whose "lyric" Symphony was introduced to the town by Serge Koussevitzky, and the Boston Orchestra at their second concert in Carnegie Hall. Mr. Nabokoff is one of the numerous Russians who have found asylum in Paris and he attracted some attention there a couple of years ago with a "ballet-oratorio," about "The Majesty of God as Revealed by the Aurora Borealis."

The Russian's symphony had the virtue of brevity and was not quarrelsome in the modernist fashion. It was melodious enough to merit the designation of lyric (which is not, however, the composer's) but the song it had to sing was only mildly interesting. Mr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra played it devotedly. They also played Tchaikovsky's in E-minor, which is a song of quite another sort, and Glinka's overture, "Russlan and Ludmilla."

56

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
LOWELL, MASS.
COURIER-CITIZEN

NOV 2 6 1930

Boston Programs.

At the concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra Friday afternoon and Saturday evening the novelty will be a symphony recently composed by Howard Hanson. The programs will include the overture to "The Flying Dutchman," one of Wagner's earlier operas which has just been revived at the Metropolitan; Ravel's now familiar "Bolero;" and the Emperor Concerto of Beethoven with Mr. Gieseking as the pianist.

This evening in Jordan hall a concert of chamber music will be given by the Gordon String Quartet, which hails from Chicago.

Next Sunday afternoon in Symphony hall Reinald Werrenrath, who of late has been interested in radio broadcasting, will return to the concert stage for a program of songs such as he was accustomed to give from time to time [illegible] elsewhere.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will participate in a Beethoven Festival at Washington, D. C., on the evenings of Dec. 2, 3, 5 and the afternoon of Dec. 6. The programs that will be presented at Constitution hall, under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, are:

Dec. 2—Overture to "Egmont," Piano Concerto No. 4 (Myra Hess, soloist), "Eroica," Symphony No. 3.

Dec. 3—"Leonore" Overture No. 3, violin concerto, (Efrem Zimbalist, soloist), Symphony No. 5.

Dec. 5—"Coriolanus" Overture, Fifth Piano Concerto (Josef Hofmann, soloist), Symphony No. 7.

Dec. 6—Symphony No. 1, Symphony No. 9, with chorus of 200 and the following quartet soloists: Jeannette Vreeland, Dan Gridley, Nevada Van Der Veer and Fraser Gange.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
LOWELL, MASS.
COURIER CITIZEN

NOV 2 6 1930

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will participate in a Beethoven Festival at Washington, D. C., on the evenings of Dec. 2, 3, 5 and the afternoon of Dec. 6. The programs that will be presented at Constitution hall, under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, are:

Dec. 2—Overture to "Egmont," Piano Concerto No. 4 (Myra Hess soloist), "Eroica," Symphony No. 3.

Dec. 3—"Leonore" Overture No. 3, violin concerto, (Efrem Zimbalist, soloist), Symphony No. 5.

Dec. 5—"Coriolanus" Overture, Fifth Piano Concerto (Josef Hofmann, soloist), Symphony No. 7.

Dec. 6—Symphony No. 1, Symphony No. 9, with chorus of 200 and the following quartet soloists: Jeannette Vreeland, Dan Gridley, Nevada Van Der Veer and Fraser Gange.

LOWELL, MASS.
COURIER CITIZEN

NOV 2 6 1930

Boston Programs.

At the concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra Friday afternoon and Saturday evening the novelty will be a symphony recently composed by Howard Hanson. The programs will include the overture to "The Flying Dutchman," one of Wagner's earlier operas which has just been revived at the Metropolitan; Ravel's now familiar "Bolero;"

THIS CLIPPING FROM VARIETY

A Laugh Needed

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its initial concert of the season, under the direction of Mr. Koussevitzky, at Carnegie.

Albert Roussel's Symphony in G Minor (first New York performance) was brilliantly played, with much interpretive sense and finish. The Brahms' Symphony was a poetic and romantic climax to an evening of high music before a capacity audience.

But all the artists of the concert world take themselves and their work most seriously. Never a laugh in a week. There might be a bit of comedy interjected into music as well as tragedy or romance. The modern composers are making a strong attempt at this.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
ROCHESTER, N. Y.
Democrat Chronicle

NOV 29 1930

Boston Audience Hails Playing of Dr. Hanson's New Symphony

Rochester Composer Called To Stage by Applause as Serge Koussevitski Directs First Performance of 'The Romantic' in Symphony Hall

By STEWART B. SABIN
Staff Critic

Boston, Nov. 28—Fortune smiled upon Dr. Howard Hanson today when the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the first performance of his new symphony, "The Romantic," in Symphony Hall this afternoon.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra at its best leaves nothing to be desired in capacity for performance and its conductor, Serge Koussevitski, reveals this best when he is genuinely interested in the composition he is playing. This was a condition today.

Dr. Koussevitski has given Hanson's symphony rehearsal preparation of particular, detailed thoroughness; the orchestra players have remarked upon his evident liking for the symphony, and the performance yesterday in virtuosity, in brilliant episodic playing and in rousing climax was a notable one. It moved its hearers to spontaneous, prolonged enthusiasm in which Dr. Hanson, Koussevitski and the orchestra shared recognition.

Instrumentation Brilliant

The symphony contributes its quota to such a performance as was given it. Aside from purely musical qualities, the score is a brilliant piece of instrumentation in which instrumental sections and solo instruments are used to full effect in arresting and holding attention. Charles M. Loeffler, the celebrated Boston composer, commented on the invention of the score, saying that in passages the instrumentation amounted almost to new forms of tonal combination. The music has sharp contrasts in its themes, rhythms, and moods: an occasional pause, sometimes with orchestra at full power, sometimes in pianissimo playing, alls to the dramatic appeal. But such score requirements demand the utmost skill of the players, and this in full measure the players accorded in today's performance.

At the close of the symphony the audience applauded until Dr. Hanson had made his way from the center of the hall to the stage to which, with Koussevitski, he was again recalled. The first movement of the symphony was listened to attentively, but it was with the second movement that the listeners made known that they were enjoying the music heartily.

Melodies Used Plentifully

Salient characteristics of this new symphony are the constant use throughout of melody in the traditional sense in which the word is used; themes are melodies, and Hanson has used them plentifully enough in all his writing, but in his "Romantic" he uses what the casual hearer of music means when he speaks of melody.

Again the framework of the symphony is clearly audible through all its phases; there is very full instrumentation at times; boisterous moments; occasional excursions by sections and solo instruments from the beaten path of the music. But it all coheres to a solid backdrop which is not lost from the ear.

Continued from Page Thirteen

The observance of glodic directness is parallelled to a great extent in the rhythmic structure of the music; the second movement is in the main simple to hear in its swinging rhythm; it is in song form; its principal theme is a likely one to be called by somebody a "lovely tune" without injustice or rightful prejudice against its excellence for its purpose. In this movement Dr. Hanson by no means writes in the age-long triads of the key, or, for that matter, of any key throughout, but the effect is as definite and impressive of tonality, tunefulness and rhythmetic certitude as any sensible lover of musical solidities could ask.

Lyricism Praised

With excellent effectiveness, the quiet and suavely melodious close of the first movement foreshadows the lyricism of the second. And the secondary theme of the first movement, one of the most easily sensed melodies of the work, is built into a forte climax at the close of the finals to again secure marked effectiveness in appeal.

Dr. Hanson has in no wise turned from his individual manner of writing in this symphony, but he has inducted into the manner simplicity in the songs [illegible]

THIS CLIPPING FROM
ROCHESTER, N. Y.
TIMES UNION

NOV 29 1930

PLAUDITS WON BY SYMPHONY OF DR. HANSON

Boston Audience Vociferously Acclaims 'The Romantic,' Composed by Eastman School Head.

The name of Rochester was today blazing afresh in the high places of themusical world, carried there by Dr. Howard Hanson's new symphony, "The Romantic."

Recognized as a superb melodic creation, this work by the head of the Eastman School of Music had its premier last night in Boston with a superior performance by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Dr. Hanson was there and received the plaudits of a delighted audience on the eve of his sailing for Rome where he is to conduct his symphony.

Dr. Hanson was called to the stage to share the vociferous applause with Serge Koussevitski and his musicians. In his direction of the Rochester composition, Koussevitski showed plainly his personal liking for it.

"The Romantics" will be on the regular program of the Boston Symphony tonight. Dr. Hanson, who assisted the conductor in rehearsals of the Boston Symphony for the premier, will conduct his composition for the first time personally before an audience in Rome, Dec. 14.

He was to be picked up at Boston today by the liner Saturnia, which left New York yesterday, departing from its regular route to pick up Dr. Hanson after last night's concert.

Rochester will hear the new symphony in January, when it will be presented by the Rochester Philharmonic. The Detroit and Cincinnati Symphony Orchestras will play it in February.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK EVE. POST

NOV 29 1930

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give a four days' Beethoven Festival in Washington, D. C., next week, the programs being: Tuesday, "Egmont" overture, Piano Concerto No. 4, with Myra Hess as soloist, and the "Eroica" Symphony. Wednesday, "Leonore" No. 3 overture, violin concerto with Efrem Zimbalist as soloist, and Fifth Symphony. Friday "Coriolanus" overture, Fifth Piano Concerto with Josef Hofmann as soloist, and Seventh Symphony. Saturday afternoon, Ninth Symphony with chorus of 200 and Jeanette Vreeland, Nevada Van der Veer, Dan Gridler and Fraser Gangs as soloists.

Four new works will be presented by the League of Composers at their concert in Town Hall, December 10, as follows: Three excerpts from "The Daughter of Jephta," by Saminsky; Choral Songs from old texts by Hindemith the "Hallelujah" from Petyrek's "Litany" and Heinrich Kaminsky's Prelude and Fugue for violin and organ.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK EVE. POST

NOV 29 1930

Music : By Oscar Thompson

The Notions Counter for Conductors, With Some Consideration for the Future of Those Who Simply Must Sing

WITH Arturo Toscanini conducting in Philadelphia and Leopold Stokowski in New York, notions about celebrities of the baton are to the musical scene just now what the Spirituals are to "Green Pastures." The conductor who can do no wrong and the conductor who can do no right are by no means new upon this scene, and the same sorts of bias for and against men who contrive to transcend routine probably will agitate these airs long after all present personalities have vanished and television has combined with radio to bring their predecessors into the households of millions—front view, at that. How much more important personality may be then than now, how much more the gleaming eye or the glittering smile, how much more the cut of the afternoon coat or the sweep of an arm may figure in the making of music's notions is conjectural to a degree but one thing is certain: conductors are going to have to learn to sing better or give up singing entirely.

Add television to radio so that listeners who look up from their soup to discover what's wrong with the english horn find out that it is only the dirigent ah-ing along with the instrument in the voice of a crow and it will become evident that the technique of ah-ing, as of interjecting pum-pum, will be scarcely second the technique of holding the baton Mr. Stokowski seems to have decided to dispense with the baton. Perhaps in due time, conductors of equal individuality will be persuaded to dispense with their coloratura. Either that, radio engineers will find some means of eliminating it, along with static, perhaps by absorbing it in some new amplification of the Theremin machine. If conductors must sing, composers at least ought to be permitted to put in their own markings with respect to when to use the chest voice and when falsetto.

THE legend of the perfect performance persists, in spite of broken batons and an occasional smashed cabinet. There may be reason to suspect that nothing annoys Mr. Toscanini more than to be applauded with all the customary fervor, perhaps more, at the end of a work in which there has been raggedness of attack and in which some solo passage has been muffed altogether—as we are informed by a dependable musician (who was following his score) happened in the Brooklyn concert of the Philharmonic. But if there are lapses in performance which happily tend to keep the virtuoso orchestra rooted in this earth instead of being whisked away from us into some more rarefied sphere where none could follow, so the greatest of executive musicians must be confessed to have limitations. Not every performance he gives can be his finest. Nor can all of his conceptions be equally and infallibly fortunate. At this point, begin the notions.

With respect to Toscanini, opinion has fairly well crystallized two ways. Either he is equally supreme in everything he undertakes or he is to be regarded as having one variable in a not vulnerable deficiency, that of the more literary or philosophical music of the German romantics. Only a few can seriously entertain any such idea as that expressed in a recent magazine article, that he has but one great gift, that of a phenomenal capacity for beating time. Among notions this is one as reckless as some that have been spoken out with respect to Mr. Stokowski and Mr. Koussevitzky. Frequently we have heard it said of certain conductors that they could not read an orchestral score. Sometimes, when they have been called upon to conduct for soloists, we have observed that they were more than a little busy reading something. And if conducting is for these men primarily a matter of memory and motions, it is rather difficult to understand why memory and motions would not have had their usual effect when there was a soloist to keep an eye on, without the additional strain of turning the pages and pretending to follow music the conductor couldn't read.

Notions like these are passed on from one era to another, irrespective of the men who happen to be at the top. But it is always about the men who are at the top that they are told. The number of successful conductors who have not been good musicians is truly amazing; indeed, if all these notions as to the lack of fundamental musicianship could be chalked opposite the great names of the past in orchestral music, we might be led to conclude that to be a musician is to be no conductor; and that, perhaps, after all, there is a reason for conductors taking so universally to singing.

LIKE others, we have our notions. We believe Mr. Toscanini is a very great conductor, but we have a somewhat similar respect for Mr. Stokowski and Mr. Koussevitzky. We have the notion that in the Beethoven Symphonies, even though there may be a disagreement over some such detail as the tempo of the trio of the scherzo in the "Eroica," there is no other playing known to us which approaches the Italian's. This notion might be extended to cover a very considerable part of his programs throughout the years he has been in New York. But we have also the notion that we never heard from him a "Tannhaeuser" Bacchanale like one or two we have heard from Mr. Stokowski, or anything in Russian music as incandescent as Mr. Koussevitzky's performance of the Tchaikovsky Fourth Symphony only a week ago. Here, again, our notion could be expanded to include a very liberal number of compositions better played by one or another of the visiting orchestras than we have had them at our Philharmonic concerts.

The notion seems to us the logical one: that different conductors, with a different approach to different music, granted that each has his liberal endowment of technique (perhaps even of genius!), have a closer sympathy and a more communicable grasp of specific works than others.

Mr. Toscanini does not play Tchaikovsky at all. He is said to regard him as cheap. Mr. Koussevitzky might very well give the same reason for his failure to play some of Mr. Toscanini's Italian novelties.

In the end, we may get back to the starting point of notions—notions by conductors as well as notions about conductors—and thus feel justified in clinging to our belief—or notion—that only when we have once more a first rank German conductor will we realize just what it is that has been the matter with most of our recent performances of Schubert and Brahms. It is notion born of these recent performances, and not of any long-cherished convictions as to limitation of individuals by reason of nationality.

THIS CLIPPING FROM RICHMOND, VA.
NEWS LEADER
29 1930

BELGIAN SOPRANO WILL BE FEATURE

Clare Clairbert, Coming to Mosque Monday, Highly Praised by Critics.

By HELEN de MOTTE.

Interest centers next week upon the appearance Monday night at the Mosque of Mme. Clare Clairbert, the Belgian soprano who has created such a profound impression on critics and public during his, her first season in America. She has chosen a fairly familiar program, the repertoire for the coloratura soprano being definitely limited, and as somewhat rare with a leading artist she appears first in the Proch Variations, with flute obligato.

Her second group includes a "Serenade," by Brahms; "Pourquoi," from "Lakme," by Delibes, and Alibieff's "Russian Nightingale," arranged by Estelle Liebling, the popular voice teacher of New York. In the last half of the program she will sing Giordani's "Caro mio ben" and "L'Enlevement au Serail" (Abduction from the Harem), by Mozart, and "Ah fors e lui" from "La Traviata."

Her accompanist, Francis de Bourguignon, will play three numbers, an "Allegro Appassionata," by Saint-Saens, and two Spanish dances by Granados and Albeniz. Eugene Lion, the flutist, will play Doppler's "Pastorale Hongroise."

* * *

BEGINNING next Tuesday in Washington, the Boston Symphony orchestra is presenting a Beethoven festival. This is a notable occasion for a number of reasons, not the least of which is the rising importance of Washington as a center of musical interest.

The increasing tendency for those whose wealth and leisure permits the ownership of a number of residences in this country and in Europe to establish permanent residence in Washington as their American domicile is bringing to the Capitol an important social group which acts as a go-between, as it were, for the permanent residents and official society, affiliating with both and giving a larger patronage to artistic activities than has previously obtained in that city of shifting alliances and distinct social cleavage.

Heretofore, such an important musical enterprise would doubtless have been confined to the larger cities which have maintained symphony orchestras over a long period of years. It is three years since the 100th anniversary of Beethoven's death was made the occasion of memorial programs. It is particularly gratifying that the further opportunity of hearing many of his greatest works in a group, during a period of four days, is being offered in Washington—an opportunity of which many Richmond people expect to take advantage.

Three of his "Overtures" will be presented, those to Goethe's "Egmont," the "Leonore," known as No. 3, and to "Coriolanus"; the third, fifth, seventh, first and ninth "Symphonies" will be played; two of his pianoforte "Concertos" will enlist the co-operation of Myra Hess, the distinguished English pianist, and Josef Hofmann, American pianist, and the violin "Concert in D major" will have Efrem Zimbalist as soloist, while the great "Symphony No. 9" will have as soloists Jeannette Vreeland, Dan Gridley, Nevada Van Der Veer and Fraser Gange, in addition to a large chorus.

We commend the consideration of such a festival for Richmond's Civic Musical Association. The expense would be much less than a three-day season of the Metropolitan Opera and properly publicized would offer an opportunity to music lovers as far South as Georgia and as far West as West Virginia, Tennessee and Kentucky. Why not consider it in connection with the Yorktown celebration next year? Richmond will have a chorus capable of singing the "Ode to Joy" the close of the Ninth Symphony, that time. Why not?

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
TIMES
NOV 29 1930

FESTIVAL OF SYMPHONY MUSIC

The greatest festival of orchestra music ever given in Washington will begin at Constitution Hall next Tuesday evening, December 2, at 8:30 o'clock, when the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky conducting, will open its superb four-day Beethoven Festival in celebration of the orchestra's fiftieth anniversary. Three of Beethoven's most famous overtures, three of his greatest concertos and five of his mightiest symphonies will be given, with no less than seven soloists and a chorus of 200 voices.

The festival opens on Tuesday evening, December 2, with the overture to Goethe's Egmont, Opus 84; Pianoforte Concerto No. 4 in G major, Opus 58, Myra Hess, pianist, soloist; and Symphony No. 3 in E flat major, Opus 55, "The Eroica." The second performance will be given the following evening, Wednesday, December 3, when the Overture to "Leonore" No. 3, Opus 72, will be given, with the violin concerto in D major, Opus 61, Efrem Zimbalist, soloist; and Symphony No. 5 in C minor, Opus 67.

The third performance will be given on Friday evening, December 5, at 8:30 o'clock, when the overture to "Coriolanus," Opus 82; Pianoforte Concerto No. 5 in E flat, Opus 73, Josef Hofmann, pianist, soloist, and Symphony No. 7 in A major, Opus 92, will be given. At the fourth and final performance, on Saturday afternoon, December 6, at 3 o'clock, the first and ninth symphonies will be given with final chorus of 200, trained by Albert W. Harned, and four soloists, on Schiller's "Ode to Joy." The entire festival will be under the local management of Wilson-Greene.

HANOVER, PA.
SUN
NOV 2 6 1930

Music

NOTES OF MUSIC WORLD

The programs for the fiftieth jubilee celebration of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Constitution Hall, Washington next week, which will take the form of a Beethoven festival, will be as follows:

December 2, Egmont Overture, Third Piano Concerto with Myra Hess as soloist, Eroica Symphony; December 3, Third Leonore Overture, Violin Concerto with Efrem Zimbalist as soloist, and Fifth Symphony; December 5, Coriolanus Overture, Fourth Pianoforte Concerto with Josef Hofmann as soloist, Seventh Symphony; December 6, First and Ninth Symphonies. Beethoven's mighty symphony, in which a chorus of 200 voices combines with the orchestra singing Schiller's Ode to Joy, makes a fitting culmination for the festival. The vocal quartet will comprise Jeannette Vreeland, Dan Gridley, Nevada Van Der Veer and Fraser Gange.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK TIMES
NOV 30 1930

NEWLY

Serge Koussevitzky a Waltzes;

By COMPTON PAKENHAM.

THE news that Victor's November release includes yet a further complete recording of Tchaikovsky's Sixth symphony (the Pathétique) might suggest another diatribe on the old subject of duplications. As it happens, however, inspection of the set goes a long way toward convincing us that the case is fully warranted. This addition to the tale of an already overrecorded symphony is from the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Serge Koussevitzky—which in itself is almost sufficient justification. After running through it, one finds several other points for recommendation.

Too well known to require any historical or musical introduction here, the fate of the Pathétique has indeed been pathetic. Overdone by fickle admirers of its obvious beauties, whose consequent familiarity with it soon developed into the usual cheap contempt, Tchaikovsky's fine symphony seems to have lost considerable credit in men's eyes. But despite the efforts of those who have tried to kill the thing they loved by heaping ridicule on it, those poor misguided creatures who still consider music is a matter for enjoyment persist in taking every opportunity to vote it into "special request" programs.

But this is not the sort of rendition one often hears on such occasions. Eschewing the obvious temptations—and the "Pathétique" teems with them—Koussevitzky has hewn to the task of bringing out the melodies and building up a great unified structure. Here is no laboring for effects, no banality. The whole is refreshing in its dignity. The climax achieved in the third movement has not been touched by any previous recordings.

A noticeable point about this album set is that it breaks away from what threatened to amount to a tradition in the industry and has done so with pleasing and interesting results. Every recorded "Pathétique" with which we are familiar has slavishly followed the divisions established by the first. On discovering that the opening side of this set ran short of the accustomed spot, it immediately occurred to us that here was another example of the trick for which Victor has been taken to task on several occasions lately, the spreading out of a selection until it runs on to an extra record. A check-up on the number of records in the album showed this to be wrong, and after continuing to play we reached a thoroughly apologetic frame of mind.

For instance, in all other sets side two closes on the serene ending of the exposition. Thus the stirring opening of the development section loses much of its intended effect by reason of the interruption necessary to change the record. Koussevitzky has put this to rights by ending the second side eight bars earlier than is customary and opening side three with the clarinet solo. Thus the entrance of the brass comes with the atmosphere as it should be, and yet the whole movement does not run over the customary four sides. The same treatment has been adopted at other breaking points, and in each case the choice of a spot at which to stop seems to us to be better than those selected before.

Even with automatic machines the break between disks is an inherent weakness of the gramophone, and, though it is one which no amount of scheming can turn into a virtue, such careful consideration as this makes one very grateful to whoever is responsible. It is easy to name sets which have been completely ruined by carelessness in this particular.

* * *

Before leaving Victor's orchestral list, there is a single ten-inch for notice. With a steady though not overgreat demand for well-played and recorded waltzes, the Stock "Du und Du" from "Die Fledermaus," Chicago Symphony Orchestra (Vic. 1481), arrives with the promise of being in circulation for some time to come. So in all probability, it will be, but it might almost be wished that it was not quite such a good rec-

NEW YORK TIMES
NOV 30 1930

The newly organized Symphony Society of Brooklyn, represented by an orchestra of eighty-five musicians under the direction of Ole Windingstad, conducte will make its first public appeara ce Tuesday evening at the Brookl Academy of Music, with Anton ek, formerly concertmaster of e Boston Symphony Orchestra, a soloist.

Mr. Windin stad, formerly conductor of the ilharmonic Society of Oslo, Norw , and a composer in his own ri , will conduct a program con sting of Beethoven's "Leonore" verture and his violin concerto, nd Tchaikovsky's Fifth symphony

Mr. Wi , who is concertmaster each Sum er of the Baireuth Music Festival rchestra, will be the regular c ncertmaster of the new orchestra Alma Witek, his wife, will sit b side her husband as first violinist rself.

Handel' "Oratorio of Joshua" will be sung the First Presbyterian Church, fth Avenue and Twelfth Street, n t Sunday evening at 8 o'clock u er the direction of Dr. William Carl. Dr. Carl writes THE TIMES:

"After nsiderable research we find that his will be, in all probability, th first presentation of the work in ew York City. Records repetition e year later by that organization.

The Detro Symphony Orchestra, with Ossip G brilowitsch conducting, will make its only appearance of the season in th metropolitan district next Saturda evening in the Westchester Coun y Centre at White Plains. The program will consist of Beethoven's O erture to a Heroic and Allegorical Ballet, "The Creatures of Pro etheus"; Brahms's Third symphon in F major; Mozart's piano co certo in D minor, with Mednikoff the soloist, and the "Ride of the Valkyries," from Wagner's "Die Walkiire."

Stravinsky's new work, "Symphonie de Psaumes," for orchestra and chorus, written for the fiftieth anniversary of the Boston Symphony Orshow that it was given by the Handel and Haydn Society of Boston in 1876 and during the same year at the Worcester Musical Festival with

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
UNION
DEC 3 1930

Current Music

ORCHESTRAL FARE

By MARGARET REGAL

New York, Nov. 29—All New England feels a proprietary sense of pride in the Boston Symphony orchestra and takes pleasure in the realization of New York's thorough-going appreciation of its quality. Thursday, the 29th, not long after its dramatic 50th anniversary program in Boston when its first conductor, George Henschel, now Sir George, abandoned his retirement in England to conduct this famous orchestra once again, it gave the first concert of its 45th New York season under the leadership of the regular conductor, Serge Koussevitzky, at Carnegie hall. There was special interest in the performance of Albert Roussell's G minor symphony, written for the anniversary. Roussel is undoubtedly one of the more important composers of today and whatever he writes is entitled to a respectful hearing. It was obvious that Mr Koussevitzky had expended a vast amount of effort on the work, which has more in it to please a listener of somewhat old-fashioned tastes than the writings of most who so definitely belong to the modernistic school—if a courageous independence may be counted as adherence to a school. And even if, as some felt, the symphony lacks substance it is well constructed and skillfully orchestrated, so that its ideas seem, perhaps, more important than they are.

A brilliant performance of Berloiz's "Carnival Romain" was the opening number and a beautiful reading of the Brahms second symphony was really the piece de resistance of the program.

This orchestra played again Saturday afternoon, giving this time Glinka's ever delightful overture to "Russian and Ludmilla" and other novelty, a symphony by Nicholas Nabikoff, which many hearers preferred to the Roussel. The fourth symphony of Tschaikowsky was the final number and to hear Mr Koussevitzky conduct this one work would be enough to rank him among the great, so eloquently does he

N. Y. MORN. WORLD
NOV 30 1930

Next Saturday morning at Carnegie Hall Guila Bustabo, thirteen-year-old child violinist who has previously been heard with Ernest Schelling, will appear again as solist at the second concert of the Children's Series No. 2. She will play the allegro from the Mozart concerto in A Major. The rest of the program will be drawn from music by Destouches, Rameau, Bach and Gretry.

* * *

PHILHARMONIC PROGRAMS
LEOPOLD STOKOWSKI, CONDUCTOR
Metropolitan Opera House, This Afternoon at 3

Academic Overture.....Brahms
Double Concerto.....Brahms
Soloists—Scipione Guidi and Alfred Wienstein
Wir glauben all' einen Gott.....Bach
Ich ruf zu dir.....Bach
Toccata and Fugue in D Minor.....Bach

Carnegie Hall, Tuesday Evening at 8.45
Carnegie Hall, Friday Afternoon at 2.30
Symphony No. 1 in E Minor.....Sibelius
(First time by the Philharmonic-Symphony Society)
Sacre du Printemps.....Stravinsky

Carnegie Hall, Saturday Evening at 8.45
(Student Concert)
Carnegie Hall, Sunday Afternoon at 3
Soloist—EFREM ZIMBALIST, Violinist
Finlandia.....Sibelius
Violin Concerto.....Sibelius
Sacre du Printemps.....Stravinsky

ERNEST SCHELLING, CONDUCTOR
Children's Series No. 2, Concert No. 2
Carnegie Hall, Saturday Morning at 11
Soloist—GUILA BUSTABO, Violinist
Le Tambourin de Dardomphe.....Destouches
Rigaudon, Musette and Gavotte from Acante et Cephi.....Rameau
Suite.....Bach
Allegro from Concerto in A Major for Violin.....Mozart
Song—The British Grenadiers
Tambourin and Gigue.....Gretry

As part of its fiftieth anniversary season, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give a Beethoven festival in the nation's capital next month. The principal works of Beethoven will be performed in Constitution Hall, Washington, D. C., the evenings of Dec. 2, 3 and 5, and the afternoon of Dec. 6. The program:

Dec. 2—Overture, "Egmont," piano concerto No. 4; Myra Hess, soloist; symphony No. 3 in E flat, "Eroica."

Dec. 3—Third "Leonore" overture, violin concerto, Efrem Zimbalist, soloist; symphony No. 5 in C minor.

Dec. 5—"Coriolanus" overture, fifth piano concerto, Josef Hofmann, soloist; symphony No. 7 in A.

Dec. 6—Symphony No. 1 in C, symphony No. 9 in D minor ("choral"), with chorus of 200 and the following quartet of soloists: Jeannette Vreeland, Dan Gridley, Nevada Van Der Veer and Fraser Gange.

THIS CLIPPING FROM CHICAGO, ILL.
TRIBUNE
DEC 1 1930

Orchestra Gets Leading Role in Musical Gotham

Boston Symphony Pays Annual Visit.

By Joan King.
[Chicago Tribune Press Service.]

NEW YORK, Nov. 29.—[Special.]—Occasions orchestral have provided the high lights of Gotham's musical calendar of late. Not only has the New York Philharmonic itself officiated at several most unusual and interesting evenings, but that noted annual visitor—the Boston Symphony—has made its season's debut.

For his initial program of 1930-'31 Serge Koussevitzky chose a varied enough list to please everybody. He opened with the Berlioz overture, "The Roman Carnival," concluded with the Brahms symphony in D, and, as a middle number, offered a first New York reading of Albert Roussel's symphony in G minor.

This last mentioned work was composed recently, in honor of the fiftieth anniversary of the orchestra, which commenced its career a half century ago under George Henschel. It is only one of a number of compositions which have been commissioned or voluntarily offered by the most distinguished of our contemporary masters as contributions toward the Bostonians' jubilee. Among them have been a symphony by Prokofieff; a theme and variations by Respighi; a "Festival Overture" by an anonymous writer, widely suspected of being the orchestra's own conductor; music for an ode by Hillyer, by Prof. Edward Burlingame Hill of Harvard, and a choral "Symphony of Psalms," by Igor Stravinsky, dedicated to "the glory of God and the Boston Symphony orchestra." The Roussel work was the first of these tributes to be heard here. It had its world premiere in Boston Oct. 25.

* *

THIS CLIPPING FROM RICHMOND, VA.
NEWS LEADER

12 9 1930

BELGIAN SOPRANO WILL BE FEATURE

Clare Clairbert, Coming to Mosque Monday, Highly Praised by Critics.

By HELEN de MOTTE.

Interest centers next week upon the appearance Monday night at the Mosque of Mme. Clare Clairbert, the Belgian soprano who has created such a profound impression on critics and public during this, her first season in America. She has chosen a fairly familiar program, the repertoire for the coloratura soprano being definitely limited, and as somewhat rare with a leading artist she appears first in the Proch Variations, with flute obligato.

Her second group includes a "Serenade," by Bemberg; "Pourquoi," from "Lakme," by Delibes, and Alibieff's "Russian Nightingale," arranged by Estelle Liebling, the popular voice teacher of New York. In the last half of the program she will sing Giordani's "Caro mio ben" and "L'Enlevement au Serail" (Abduction from the Harem), by Mozart, and "Ah fors e lui" from "La Traviata."

Her accompanist, Francis de Bourguignon, will play three numbers, an "Allegro Appassionata," by Saint-Saens, and two Spanish dances by Granados and Albeniz. Eugene Lion, the flutist, will play Doppler's "Pastorale Hongroise."

* * *

BEGINNING next Tuesday in Washington, the Boston Symphony orchestra is presenting a Beethoven festival. This is a notable occasion for a number of reasons, not the least of which is the rising importance of Washington as a center of musical interest.

The increasing tendency for those whose wealth and leisure permits the ownership of a number of residences in this country and in Europe to establish permanent residence in Washington as their American domicile is bringing to the Capitol an important social group which acts as a go-between, as it were, for the permanent residents and official society, affiliating with both and giving a larger patronage to artistic activities than has previously obtained in that city of shifting alliances and distinct social cleavage.

Heretofore, such an important musical enterprise would doubtless have been confined to the larger cities, which have maintained symphony orchestras over a long period of years. It is three years since the 100th anniversary of Beethoven's death was made the occasion of memorial programs. It is particularly gratifying that the further opportunity of hearing many of his greatest works in a group, during a period of four days, is being offered in Washington—an opportunity of which many Richmond people expect to take advantage.

Three of his "Overtures" will be presented, those to Goethe's "Egmont," the "Leonore," known as No. 3, and to "Coriolanus"; the third, fifth, seventh, first and ninth "Symphonies" will be played; two of his pianoforte "Concertos" will enlist the co-operation of Myra Hess, the distinguished English pianist, and Josef Hofmann, American pianist, and the violin "Concert in D major" will have Efrem Zimbalist as soloist, while the great "Symphony No. 9" will have as soloists Jeannette Vreeland, Dan Gridley, Nevada Van Der Veer and Fraser Gange, in addition to a large chorus.

We commend the consideration of such a festival for Richmond's Civic Musical Association. The expense would be much less than a three-day season of the Metropolitan Opera and properly publicized would offer an opportunity to music lovers as far South as Georgia and as far West as West Virginia, Tennessee and Kentucky. Why not consider it in connection with the Yorktown celebration next year? Richmond will have a chorus capable of singing the "Ode to Joy" at the close of the Ninth Symphony, that time. Why not?

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
TIMES

NOV 29 1930

FESTIVAL OF SYMPHONY MUSIC

The greatest festival of orchestra music ever given in Washington will begin at Constitution Hall next Tuesday evening, December 2, at 8:30 o'clock, when the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky conducting, will open its superb four-day Beethoven Festival in celebration of the orchestra's fiftieth anniversary. Three of Beethoven's most famous overtures, three of his greatest concertos and five of his mightiest symphonies will be given, with no less than seven soloists and a chorus of 200 voices.

The festival opens on Tuesday evening, December 2, with the overture to Goethe's Egmont, Opus 84; Pianoforte Concerto No. 4 in G major, Opus 58, Myra Hess, pianist, soloist; and Symphony No. 3 in E flat major, Opus 55, "The Eroica." The second performance will be given the following evening, Wednesday, December 3, when the Overture to "Leonore" No. 3, Opus 72, will be given, with the violin concerto in D major, Opus 61, Efrem Zimbalist, soloist; and Symphony No. 5 in C minor, Opus 67.

The third performance will be given on Friday evening, December 5, at 8:30 o'clock, when the overture to "Coriolanus," Opus 82; Pianoforte Concerto No. 5 in E flat, Opus 73, Josef Hofmann, pianist, soloist, and Symphony No. 17 in A major, Opus 92, will be given. At the fourth and final performance, on Saturday afternoon, December 6, at 3 o'clock, the first and ninth symphonies will be given with final chorus of 200, trained by Albert W. Harned, and four soloists, on Schiller's "Ode to Joy." The entire festival will be under the local management of Mrs. Wilson-Greene.

Music

NOTES OF MUSIC WORLD

The programs for the fiftieth jubilee celebration of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Constitution Hall, Washington next week, which will take the form of a Beethoven festival, will be as follows:

December 2, Egmont Overture, Third Piano Concerto with Myra Hess as soloist, Eroica Symphony; December 3, Third Leonore Overture, Violin Concerto with Efrem Zimbalist as soloist, and Fifth Symphony; December 5, Coriolanus Overture, Fourth Pianoforte Concerto with Josef Hofmann as soloist, Seventh Symphony; December 6, First and Ninth Symphonies. Beethoven's mighty symphony, in which a chorus of 200 voices combines with the orchestra singing Schiller's Ode to Joy, makes a fitting culmination for the festival. The vocal quartet will comprise Jeannette Vreeland, Dan Gridley, Nevada Van Der Veer and Fraser Gange.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK TIMES

NOV 30 1930

NEWLY

Serge Koussevitzky a... Waltzes;

By COMPTON PAKENHAM.

THE news that Victor's November release includes yet a further complete recording of Tchaikovsky's Sixth symphony (the Pathétique) might suggest another diatribe on the old subject of duplications. As it happens, however, inspection of the set goes a long way toward convincing us that the case is fully warranted. This addition to the tale of an already overrecorded symphony is from the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Serge Koussevitzky—which in itself is almost sufficient justification. After running through it, one finds several other points for recommendation.

Too well known to require any historical or musical introduction here, the fate of the Pathétique has indeed been pathetic. Overdone by fickle admirers of its obvious beauties, whose consequent familiarity with it soon developed into the usual cheap contempt, Tchaikovsky's final symphony seems to have lost considerable credit in men's eyes. But despite the efforts of those who have tried to kill the thing they loved by heaping ridicule on it, those poor misguided creatures who still consider music is a matter for enjoyment persist in taking every opportunity to vote it into "special request" programs.

But this is not the sort of rendition one often hears on such occasions. Eschewing the obvious temptations—and the "Pathétique" teems with them—Koussevitzky has hewn to the task of bringing out the melodies and building up a great unified structure. Here is no laboring for effects, no banality. The whole is refreshing in its dignity. The climax achieved in the third movement has not been touched by any previous recordings.

A noticeable point about this album set is that it breaks away from what threatened to amount to a tradition in the industry and has done so with pleasing and interesting results. Every recorded "Pathétique" with which we are familiar has slavishly followed the divisions established by the first. On discovering that the opening side of this set ran short of the accustomed spot, it immediately occurred to us that here was another example of the trick for which Victor has been taken to task on several occasions lately, the spreading out of a selection until it runs on to an extra record. A check-up on the number of records in the album showed this to be wrong, and after continuing to play we reached a thoroughly apologetic frame of mind.

For instance, in all other sets side two closes on the serene ending of the exposition. Thus the stirring opening of the development section loses much of its intended effect by reason of the interruption necessary to change the record. Koussevitzky has put this to rights by ending the second side eight bars earlier than is customary and opening side three with the clarinet solo. Thus the entrance of the brass comes with the atmosphere as it should be, and yet the whole movement does not run over the customary four sides. The same treatment has been adopted at other breaking points, and in each case the choice of a spot at which to stop seems to us to be better than those selected before.

Even with automatic machines the break between disks is an inherent weakness of the gramophone, and, though it is one which no amount of scheming can turn into a virtue, such careful consideration as this makes one very grateful to whoever is responsible. It is easy to name sets which have been completely ruined by carelessness in this particular.

* *

Before leaving Victor's orchestral list, there is a single ten-inch for notice. With a steady though not overgreat demand for well-played and recorded waltzes, the Stock "Du und Du" from "Die Fledermaus," Chicago Symphony Orchestra (Vic. 1481), arrives with the promise of being in circulation for some time to come. So in all probability, it will be, but it might almost be wished that it was not quite such a good rec-

NEW YORK TIMES

NOV 30 1930

The newly organized Symphony Society of Brooklyn, represented by an orchestra of eighty-five musicians under the direction of Ole Windingstad, conducted will make its first public appearance Tuesday evening at the Brooklyn Academy of Music, with Anton ...tek, formerly concertmaster of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, as soloist.

Mr. Windingstad, formerly conductor of the Philharmonic Society of Oslo, Norway, and a composer in his own right, will conduct a program consisting of Beethoven's "Leonore" overture and his violin concerto, and Tchaikovsky's Fifth symphony.

Mr. Wi..., who is concertmaster each Sum...er of the Baireuth Music Festival ...rchestra, will be the regular c...ncertmaster of the new orchestra. Alma Witek, his wife, will sit b...ide her husband as first violinist ...rself.

Handel's "Oratorio of Joshua" will be sung ... the First Presbyterian Church, ...fth Avenue and Twelfth Street, n...t Sunday evening at 8 o'clock u...der the direction of Dr. William ... Carl. Dr. Carl writes

THE TIMES:

"After ...nsiderable research we find that ...his will be, in all probability, th... first presentation of the work in ...ew York City. Records ... repetition ...e year later by that organization.

The Detroit Symphony Orchestra, with Ossip G...brilowitsch conducting, will make its ...only appearance of the season in the metropolitan district next Saturday evening in the Westchester Coun...y Centre at White Plains. The program will consist of Beethoven's Overture to a Heroic and Allegorical Ballet, "The Creatures of Prometheus"; Brahms's Third symphony in F major; Mozart's piano concerto in D minor, with Mednikoff as the soloist, and the "Ride of the Valkyries," from Wagner's "Die Walküre."

Stravinsky's new work, "Symphonie de Psaumes," for orchestra and chorus, written for the fiftieth anniversary of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will be given by the Handel and Haydn Society of Boston in 1876 and during the same year at the Worcester Musical Festival, with a chestra, will be played by that orchestra, with Serge Koussevitzky conducting, on Dec. 12 and 13. Mozart's symphony in G minor will be on the same program.

ORCHESTRAL FARE

By MARGARET REGAL

New York, Nov. 29—All New England feels a proprietary sense of pride in the Boston Symphony orchestra and takes pleasure in the realization of New York's thorough-going appreciation of its quality. Thursday, the 29th, not long after its dramatic 50th anniversary program in Boston when its first conductor, George Henschel, now Sir George, abandoned his retirement in England to conduct this famous orchestra once again, it gave the first concert of its 45th New York season under the leadership of the regular conductor, Serge Koussevitzky, at Carnegie hall. There was special interest in the performance of Albert Roussell's G minor symphony, written for the anniversary. Roussel is undoubtedly one of the more important composers of today and whatever he writes is entitled to a respectful hearing. It was obvious that Mr Koussevitzky had expended a vast amount of effort on the work, which has more in it to please a listener of somewhat old-fashioned tastes than the writings of most who so definitely belong to the modernistic school—if a courageous independence may be counted as adherence to a school. And even if, as some felt, the symphony lacks substance it is well constructed and skillfully orchestrated, so that its ideas seem, perhaps, more important than they are.

A brilliant performance of Berloiz's "Carnival Romain" was the opening number and a beautiful reading of the Brahms second symphony was really the piece de resistance of the program.

This orchestra played again Saturday afternoon, giving this time Glinka's ever delightful overture to "Russlan and Ludmilla" and other novelty, a symphony by Nicholas Nabikoff, which many hearers preferred to the Roussel. The fourth symphony of Tschaikowsky was the final number and to hear Mr Koussevitzky conduct this one work would be enough to rank him among the great, so eloquently does he

N. Y. MORN. WORLD

NOV 30 1930

Next Saturday morning at Carnegie Hall Guila Bustabo, thirteen-year-old child violinist who has previously been heard with Ernest Schelling, will appear again as soloist at the second concert of the Children's Series No. 2. She will play the allegro from the Mozart Concerto in A Major. The rest of the program will be drawn from music by Destouches, Rameau, Bach and Gretry.

* * *

PHILHARMONIC PROGRAMS
LEOPOLD STOKOWSKI, CONDUCTOR
Metropolitan Opera House, This Afternoon at 3

Academic Overture.....Brahms
Double Concerto.....Brahms
Soloists—Scipione Guidi and Alfred Wallenstein
Wir glauben all' an einen Gott.....Bach
Ich ruf zu dir.....Bach
Toccata and Fugue in D Minor.....Bach

Carnegie Hall, This Evening at 8.45
Carnegie Hall, Next Day Afternoon at 2.30
Symphony No. 1 in E Minor.....Sibelius
(First time by the Philharmonic-Symphony Society)
Sacre du Printemps.....Stravinsky

Carnegie Hall, Saturday Evening at 8.45
(Student's Concert)
Carnegie Hall, Sunday Afternoon at 2
Soloist—EFREM ZIMBALIST, Violinist
Finlandia.....Sibelius
Violin Concerto.....Sibelius
Sacre du Printemps.....Stravinsky

ERNEST SCHELLING, CONDUCTOR
Children's Series No. 2, Concert No. 2
Carnegie Hall, Saturday Morning at 11
Soloist—GUILA BUSTABO, Violinist
Le Tambourin de Triomphe.....Destouches
Rigaudon, Musette and Gavotte from Acante et Cephise.....Rameau
Suite.....Bach
Allegro from Concerto in A Major for Violin.....Mozart
Song—The British Grenadiers
Tambourin and Gigue.....Gretry

As part of its fiftieth anniversary season the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give a Beethoven festival in the nation's capital next month. The principal works of Beethoven will be performed in Constitution Hall, Washington, D. C., the evenings of Dec. 2, 3 and 5, and the afternoon of Dec. 6. The program:

Dec. 2—Overture, "Egmont," piano concerto No. 4; Myra Hess, soloist; symphony No. 3 in E flat, "Eroica."

Dec. 3—Third "Leonore" overture, violin concerto, Efrem Zimbalist, soloist; symphony No. 5 in C minor.

Dec. 5—"Coriolanus" overture, fifth piano concerto, Josef Hofmann, soloist; symphony No. 7 in A.

Dec. 6—Symphony No. 1 in C, symphony No. 9 in D minor ("choral"), with chorus of 200 and the following quartet of soloists: Jeannette Vreeland, Dan Gridley, Nevada Van Der Veer and Fraser Gange.

THIS CLIPPING FROM CHICAGO, ILL.
TRIBUNE

NOV 30 1930

Orchestra Gets Leading Role in Musical Gotham

Boston Symphony Pays Annual Visit.

By Joan King.
[Chicago Tribune Press Service.]

NEW YORK, Nov. 29.—[Special.]—Occasions orchestral have provided the high lights of Gotham's musical calendar of late. Not only has the New York Philharmonic itself officiated at several most unusual and interesting evenings, but that noted annual visitor—the Boston Symphony—has made its season's debut.

For his initial program of 1930-'31 Serge Koussevitzky chose a varied enough list to please everybody. He opened with the Berlioz overture, "The Roman Carnival," concluded with the Brahms symphony in D, and, as a middle number, offered a first New York reading of Albert Roussel's symphony in G minor.

This last mentioned work was composed recently, in honor of the fiftieth anniversary of the orchestra, which commenced its career a half century ago under George Henschel. It is only one of a number of compositions which have been commissioned or voluntarily offered by the most distinguished of our contemporary masters as contributions toward the Bostonians' jubilee. Among them have been a symphony by Prokofieff; a theme and variations by Respighi; a "Festival Overture" by an anonymous writer, widely suspected of being the orchestra's own conductor; music for an ode by Hillyer, by Prof. Edward Burlingame Hill of Harvard, and a choral "Symphony of Psalms," by Igor Stravinsky, dedicated to "the glory of God and the Boston Symphony orchestra." The Roussel work was the first of these tributes to be heard here. It had its world premiere in Boston Oct. 25.

* *

THIS CLIPPING FROM BALTIMORE, MD.
SUN
NOV 30 1930

An Operatic Novelty Is Heard

Fair At Sorochinsk, By Moussorgsky, Given Its Presentation At The Metropolitan

Boston Symphony And The Philharmonic Both Offer Concerts Marked By Oddity

By JOHN ALAN [illegible]GHTON

THE first operatic novelty of the season was heard at the Metropolitan at the Saturday matinee, the work being Moussorgsky's Fair at Sorochinsk.

This opera, the la[illegible] composed by Moussorgsky, like his Boris, has had a lot of tinkering done with it. The composer had great ability, but is said to have had inadequate technique in the matter of composition so that he was unable to give concrete form to innate ideas. Fragments of the score were played in concert in Petrograd in 1911 and a public performance given in the Comedie Theater in that city in December of the same year. The following year an edition edited by Karatigin and Tcherepnin and orchestrated by Liadoff was published with the title A Hot Summer's Day In Little Russia. It was also presented with long stretches of spoken dialogue at the Free Theater in Moscow in 1917, scoring a failure.

CUI'S VERSION

Cesar Cui, a fierce opponent of Moussorgsky during his lifetime, next tried his hand at it and his version was given in Petrograd a week before the outbreak of the Revolution in 1917.

Its next karma was in Monte Carlo, under the direction of Raoul Gunsbourg, in 1923, a version having been made by Tcherepnine. At last it achieved a success and was afterward given in other parts of France, in Germany and in South America.

Mr. Tcherepnine instead of injecting bits of his own into the opera, took pages, here and there, from Moussorgsky's own scores and incorporated his early symphonic poem, A Night On Bald Mountain, in the ballet.

PLOT OF OPERA

The plot of the opera is not very interesting nor very consecutive, but this is a common fault of most Russian operas. Briefly, the story is as follows: At the Fair at Sorochinsk, Tcherevik appears with his daughter Parasha. An old man tells the story of the Scarlet Jacket which had been sold to a Jew by a devil who had been expelled from hell. The Jew sold the jacket and a year later a pig's snout was poked through his window, reclaiming it.

Parasha is seen at the fair and loved at sight by Gritzko, a gypsy; but her mother, the shrewish Khivria, opposes the match, while her father, Tcherevik, is in favor of it. On the way home Tcherevik is accosted by a gypsy who wants to buy his cow. Twenty roubles and the consent of Parasha's mother to the match are the price.

Act II is in Tcherevik's cottage. Khivria is carrying on an affair with Afanesi. She throws her husband out of the house and tells him to sleep in the yard. While she is entertaining her lover there is a knock at the door. Afanesi hides in the attic and Tcherevik comes in with a gang of boon companions. A noise is heard in the attic. It is probably Scarlet Jacket. A pig's snout, manipulated by Gritzko, appears in the window, causing terror. Afanesi falls through the ceiling, thus giving Tcherevik the whip hand in the situation. Gritzko comes in and demands the daughter and Khivria is forced to consent. He also gets the cow for an additional 15 rubles and the opera ends in uproarious gayety.

Infantile stuff, this, and as dull as most Russian libretti.

IN THE CAST

The cast included Maria Mueller as Parasha, Ina Bourskaya as Khivria, Frederick Jagel as Gritzko, Ezio Pinza as Tcherevik, Marek Windheim as Afanesi, and Messrs. Danise, Cehanovsky, Bada, Altglass and Malatesta in the lesser roles. Tullio Serafin conducted.

The music as a whole is dull and uninspired until the final act, which is characteristically Russian in content and orchestration. Parasha's reverie and dance in this scene are the best bet in the opera. Mueller sang beautifully and looked charming, but the part offers scant opportunity. Pinza was easily the star of the production, both dramatically and vocally. Jagel was good but undistinguished. Bourskaya acted well and sang acceptably. The ballet well conceived and executed, represents the witches' Sabbath as a drunkard's dream. The opera is worth hearing, but is not apt to become a popular success. Serafin conducted deftly.

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Mr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony were greeted by audiences of unusual size and enthusiasm to hear two interesting programs. As has been his custom for some time, taking a leaf out of Mr. Toscanini's book, perhaps, Mr. Koussevitzky gave us some new things. At the first concert, sandwiched between Berlioz's Roman Carnaval and the Brahms Second Symphony, was a Symphony in G by Roussel which had its world premiere in Boston last month at the fiftieth anniversary of the orchestra's founding for which occasion it was especially composed.

Mr. Roussel's work is interesting, but scarcely epoch making. It is pleasant to hear, with an occasional nod in the direction of Stravinsky, some orchestration that hints at Rimsky-Korsakoff and, of course, some Wagner with, low be it spoken, an occasional acknowledgment of the existence, elsewhere, perhaps, of nothing less than American jazz.

RUSSIAN SYMPHONY

On an all-Russian program, Mr. Koussevitzky features another new symphonic work, a symphony by one Nikolai Nabakoff, born in 1903 and now residing in Paris. The work has the sanction of the present regime in Russia. It has all the many vices and the few virtues which one might expect. Chief among the latter are a undeniable virility and among the former a hesitant, meandering quality of not knowing which way to turn.

This, after all, may be the soul-expression of Moscow. Who knows? The symphony cannot be dismissed with a gesture as much of the present Russian music (whether composed by the Volga or the Seine or even the East river) can be, but, on the other hand, it seems a prentice work of a composer none too sure either of his emotional sources or his technique for expressing their outpouring.

THE PHILHARMONIC

Under [illegible] the Philharmonic gave a curious program of Schubert, Liszt and Schubert-Liszt music. The numbers were the Unfinished Symphony, the Wanderer Fantasy of Schubert-Liszt with Siloti doing the piano part, the Mephisto Waltz and the Danse Macabre for piano and orchestra, again with Mr. Siloti.

THIS CLIPPING FROM COLUMBUS, O.
STATE JOURNAL
NOV 30 1930

In the World of Music

BY OLEY SPEAKS
Sunday Journal Special Writer.

NEW YORK, Nov. 29.—The Boston Symphony Orchestra which has lately been celebrating its fiftieth anniversary with a series of gala concerts in the home town came to New York this week to begin its season in Carnegie Hall. It is interesting to note the intense appeal of orchestral music in New York. The Philharmonic-Symphony orchestra gives around 100 concerts here during the season (most of them to capacity audiences), the Manhattan Symphony orchestra has 25 concerts, the Philadelphia orchestra has 10 and the Boston orchestra a considerably larger number. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky continues as conductor for this honorable organization, which concerts always have a certain air of importance.

The program in the concert heard by the writer was an All-Russian one; to begin with was the overture to "Russian and Ludmilla" by Glinka. Then came a symphony by Nicolas Nabokov. This composer was born in Leningrad in 1903 and now lives in Paris. This music was heard for the first time in New York in this concert. This symphony is in three movements only, each of these of short duration; Mr. Nabokov is a modernist, but not of the ultra cult; his music has undeniable charm and feeling and his manner of orchestration original and effective. This music has made considerable appeal to the large audience there and there was much applause for conductor and players. To close this program was Tschaikovsky's Symphony No. 4 and how the Boston musicians did play this music, which dwarfed the two preceding numbers.

Dr. Koussevitzky and his orchestra gave a most inspiring performance of this symphony. It was magnificently built, culminating in the stirring finale, Allegro con fuoco; in the lighter movements of the sympathy there was clarity of expression with the themes clearly traced but never intruding on the whole scheme. The Scherzo movement was played with great bravura.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
POST
NOV 30 1930

Mrs. Hoover Heads List of Subscribers For Beethoven Fe[illegible]

Mrs. Hoover heads the list of subscribers for the Beethoven festival of the B sontSo shrd T B shrd mf f of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Constitution Hall this week.

Others are Countess Szechenyi, Mrs. Anne Archbold, Frau O. C. Klep, Mrs. William Butterworth, Mrs. Adolf Miller, Miss Mabel Boardman, Mrs. Edwin B. Parker, Mrs. Frank S. Bright, Miss Alice Clapp, Mrs. J. B. Kendall, Mrs. Beale R. Howard, Mrs. Ross Thompson, Mrs. Lowell Fletcher Hobart, Mrs. William E. Crozier, Mrs. Thomas W. Phillips, jr., Mrs. Hennen Jennings.

Mrs. Charles R. Shepard, Mrs. Franklin Ellis, Mrs. Patrick J. Hurley, Mrs. Henry Leonard, Mrs. George E. Hamilton, Mrs. George Thorpe, Justice Jennings Bailey, Rear Admiral and Mrs. W. L. Capps, Mrs. Leander McCormack-Goodhart, Mrs. Ridgely Hunt, Mrs. T. H. B. McKnight, Mrs. Frank C. Baldwin, Mrs. David A. Reed, Mrs. F. W. Pleadwell, Mrs. Stephen B. Elkins, Mrs. Tracy Dows, Mrs. Armistead Peter 3d, Mrs. Henry Fletcher, Mrs. Christian Heurich.

Mrs. Chester Bolton, Mrs. F. A. Delano, Mrs. William C. Eustis, Mrs. U. S. Grant 3d, Mrs. James Hogan, Miss A. Hegeman, Mrs. Demarest Lloyd, Mrs. Edward B. Meigs, Mrs. Eugene Meyer, Mr. and Mrs. Frank B. Noyes, Mrs. Lawrence E. Phipps, Mme. Roso, Mrs. Alexander Rogers, Mrs. Anson Phelps Stokes, Mrs. Charles Rhoads, Mrs. Lawrence Townsend, Mrs. F. C. Walcott, Mrs. Montgomery Blair, Mrs. Price Whitaker and others.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
STAR
NOV 30 1930

Many Patrons Enrolled For Beethoven Festival

Those who have subscribed to the forthcoming Beethoven festival of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Constitution Hall on December 2, 3, 5 and 6 were announced by Mrs. Wilson-Greene, who is managing the affair locally, are: Mrs. Herbert Hoover, Mrs. Anne Archbold, Mrs. F. A. Keep, Mrs. William Butterworth, Mrs. Adolf Miller, Miss Mabel Boardman, Mrs. Edwin B. Parker, Mrs. Frank S. Bright, Miss Alice Clapp, Mrs. J. B. Kendall, Mrs. Beale R. Howard, Mrs. Ross Thompson, Mrs. Lowell Fletcher Hobart, Mrs. William Crozier, Mrs. Thomas W. Phillips, jr.; Mrs. Hennen Jennings.

Mrs. Charles R. Shepard, Mrs. Franklin Ellis, Mrs. Patrick J. Hurley, Mrs. Henry Leonard, Mrs. George E. Hamilton, Mrs. George Thorpe, Justice Jennings Bailey, Admiral and Mrs. W. L. Capps, Mrs. Leander McCormack-Goodhart, Mrs. Ridgely Hunt, Mrs. T. H. B. McKnight, Mrs. Frank C. Baldwin, Mrs. David A. Reed, Countess Szchenyi, Mrs. Stephen B. Elkins, Mrs. Tracy Dows, Mrs. Armistead Peter, 3d; Mrs. Henry Fletcher, Mrs. Christian Heurich.

Mrs. Chester Bolton, Mrs. F. A. Delano, Mrs. William C. Eustis, Mrs. U. S. Grant, 3d; Mrs. James Hogan, Miss A. Hegeman, Mrs. Demarest Lloyd, Mrs. Edward B. Meigs, Mrs. Eugene Meyer, Mr. and Mrs. Frank B. Noyes, Mrs. Lawrence Phipps, Mme. Roso, Mrs. Alexander Rogers, Mrs. Anson Phelps Stokes, Mrs. Charles Rhoads, Mrs. Lawrence Townsend, Mrs. F. C. Walcott, Mrs. Montgomery Blair, Mrs. Price Whitaker and others.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
STAR
NOV 30 1930

Fritz Kreisler In Recital At The Lyric

Eminent Violinist Will Make His Annual Appearance In Baltimore On Wednesday

Boston Symphony Will Play Four Beethoven Programs In Capital On Anniversary

By HELEN S. TAYLOR

WITH the spell of the superb playing of Beethoven and Chopin by Mr. Paderewski last week still lingering, it is good to know that one equally renowned in his own field will play at the Lyric on Wednesday evening, Fritz Kreisler, violinist, whom even those only mildly interested in music journey to the concert hall to hear. The post-Christmas lull is beginning to make itself evident, so that this with the recital on Friday afternoon at the Peabody by Pasquale Tallarico, of the faculty, will be the only two events of outstanding interest for the week.

The eminent Austrian violinist is now 55, and since 1889, when he made his first tour of this country with Moritz Rosenthal, the piano virtuoso, he has been in a steady ascendence of favor, until now his supremacy is unquestioned. Curiously enough, it was America who first recognized the coming greatness of Kriesler at that time.

IN TEMPORARY RETIREMENT

Following this tour Kreisler went into temporary retirement from the concert stage and devoted his time to other things, among them a rigid course of military training (he is still an officer in the reserve corps of the Uhlans) and the study of medicine. He subsequently studied art in Paris and Rome.

During his year of military service Kreisler laid his violin aside entirely. When he afterward resumed his playing it was with so little success that he was moved to retire again for eight weeks of intensive practice. Emerging, he was a brilliant success at his Berlin debut in 1899. In the same year he revisited the United States, where he was lauded everywhere. Since that time no season has seemed complete without a recital by Kreisler.

More recently he has spent effort in composition, his numerous arrangements being regarded as classics for the violinist. His collection of famous violins is one of the finest in existence. Also it is a fact that Kreisler, did he choose, could shine almost as well as a pianist as a player of the violin.

PROGRAM FOR CONCERT

His program for Wednesday will include the following:

La Folia.....Corelli
Partita in B Minor (for violin alone).....Bach
Sarabande.
Double.
Bourree.
Concerto in E Minor.....Mendelssohn
Allegro Appasionata.
Andante.
Allegretto ma non Troppo.
Allegretto Molto Vivace.
Romance in A Major.....Schumann
Rondo in G Major.....Mozart
Three Violin Caprices.....Mozart
Study on a Chorale (for violin alone).....Stamnitz
La Chasse.....Cartier
Tarantella.....Wieniawski
Caprice Viennois.....Kreisler
La Gitana.....Kreisler

TALLARICO ON FRIDAY

Pasquale Tallarico will be heard in recital at the Friday afternoon concert of the Peabody Conservatory. Although Mr. Tallarico is an Italian by name, he is an American by birth and training. He has lived in Baltimore for the past ten years, during which time he has been a valuable member of the Peabody Conservatory. Mr. Tallarico's programs are particularly well-balanced. They embrace the music of the old masters and are also representative of the outstanding composers of the modern school. His program will be as follows:

Fantasia in C Major.....Bach
Pastorale
Gigue
Capriccio.....Scarlatti
Chromatic Fantasie and Fugue....Bach
Sonata in B flat minor.....Chopin
Two Poems, Op. [illegible] F sharp major, D major.....Scriabin
Etude in E sharp major.....Stravinsky
Sonetto 104 del Petrarca
Au bord d'Une Source
Hungarian Rhapsody, No. 12.....Liszt

THE BEETHOVEN FESTIVAL

There will no doubt be quite a number of music-lovers who will be interested enough in the Beethoven Festival to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Washington this week beginning Tuesday night, to journey over to the Capital City to enjoy the four programs.

The celebration has a double significance, in that it also commemorates the fiftieth anniversary of the Boston's organization's existence. Some of the most noted conductors on the concert platform have wielded the baton of the Boston orchestra, the latest being Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, of Russia, who has so ably directed its musical destinies for the past few years that the eminence of the orchestra in the musical world has been completely restored, after a long period of depression, both artistically and otherwise.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
STAR
NOV 30 1930

Arts Club Pays Honor To Dr. Koussevitsky

The Arts Club of Washington will give a reception Wednesday afternoon from 3:30 to 5 o'clock in honor of Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who will be in Washington for several days during the Beethoven festival, which the orchestra will give this week. Miss Marjorie Lowe is chairman of the entertainment committee of the Arts Club under whose auspices the reception has been arranged.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
POST
NOV 30 1930

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will give a series of four concerts this week in connection with the Bethoven Festival, will be the honor guest at a reception given under the auspices of the hospitality committee of the Arts Club at the clubhouse, 2017 I street, on Wednesday afternoon from 3:30 to 5 o'clock.

THIS CLIPPING FROM BALTIMORE, MD.
SUN
NOV 30 1930

An Operatic Novelty Is Heard

Fair At Sorochinsk, By Moussorgsky, Given Its Presentation At The Metropolitan

Boston Symphony And The Philharmonic Both Offer Concerts Marked By Oddity

By JOHN ALAN [illegible]GHTON

NEW YORK.

THE first operatic novelty of the season was heard at the Metropolitan at the Saturday matinee, the work being Moussorgsky's Fair at Sorochinsk.

This opera, the last composed by Moussorgsky, like his Boris, has had a lot of tinkering done with it. The composer had great ability, but is said to have had inadequate technique in the matter of composition so that he was unable to give concrete form to his innate ideas. Fragments of the score were played in concert in Petrograd in 1911 and a public performance given in the Comedie Theater in that city in December of the same year. The following year an edition edited by Karatigin and Tcherepnine and orchestrated by Liadoff was published with the title A Hot Summer's Day In Little Russia. It was also presented with long stretches of spoken dialogue at the Free Theater in Moscow in 1923, scoring a failure.

CUI'S VERSION

Cesar Cui, a fierce opponent of Moussorgsky during his lifetime, next tried his hand at it and his version was given in Petrograd a week before the outbreak of the Revolution in 1917.

Its next karma was in Monte Carlo, under the direction of Raoul Gunsbourg, in 1923, a version having been made by Tcherepnine. At last it achieved a success which was afterward given in other parts of France, in Germany and in South America.

Mr. Tcherepnine instead of injecting bits of his own music to the opera, took pages, here and there, from Moussorgsky's own scores and incorporated his early symphonic poem, A Night On Bald Mountain, in the ballet.

PLOT OF OPERA

The plot of the opera is not very interesting nor very consecutive, but this is a common fault of most Russian operas. Briefly, the story is as follows: At the Fair at Sorochinsk, Tcherevik appears with his daughter Parasha. An old man tells the story of the Scarlet Jacket which had been sold to a Jew by a devil who had been expelled from hell. The Jew sold the jacket and a year later a pig's snout was poked through his window, reclaiming it.

Parasha is seen at the fair and loved at sight by Gritzko, a gypsy; but her mother, the shrewish Khivria, opposes the match, while her father, Tcherevik, is in favor of it. On the way home Tcherevik is accosted by a gypsy who wants to buy his cow. Twenty roubles and the consent of Parasha's mother to the match are the price.

Act II is in Tcherevik's cottage. Khivria is carrying on an affair with Afanesi. She throws her husband out of the house and tells him to sleep in the yard. While she is entertaining her lover there is a knock at the door. Afanesi hides in the attic and Tcherevik comes in with a gang of boon companions. A noise is heard in the attic. It is probably Scarlet Jacket. A pig's snout, manipulated by Gritzko, appears in the window, causing terror. Afanesi falls through the ceiling, thus giving Tcherevik the whip hand in the situation. Gritzko comes in and demands the daughter and Khivria is forced to consent. He also gets the cow for an additional 15 rubles and the opera ends in uproarious gayety.

Infantile stuff, thin and as dull as most Russian libretto.

IN THE CAST

The cast included Maria Mueller as Parasha, Ina Bourskaya as Khivria, Frederick Jagel as Gritzko, Ezio Pinza as Tcherevik, Marek Windheim as Afanesi, and Messrs. Danise, Cehanovsky, Bada, Altglass and Malatesta in the lesser roles. Tullio Serafin conducted.

The music as a whole is dull and uninspired until the final act, which is characteristically Russian in content and orchestration. Parasha's reverie and dance in this scene are the best bet in the opera. Mueller sang beautifully and looked charming, but the part offers scant opportunity. Pinza was easily the star of the production, both dramatically and vocally. Jagel was good but undistinguished. Bourskaya acted well and sang acceptably. The ballet, well conceived and executed, represents the witches' Sabbath as a drunkard's dream. The opera is worth hearing, but is not apt to become a popular success. Serafin conducted deftly.

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Mr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony were greeted by audiences of unusual size and enthusiasm to hear two interesting programs. As has been his custom for some time, taking a leaf out of Mr. Toscanini's book, perhaps, Mr. Koussevitzky gave us some new things. At the first concert, sandwiched between Berlioz's Roman Carnaval and the Brahms Second Symphony, was a Symphony in G by Roussel which had its world premiere in Boston last month at the fiftieth anniversary of the orchestra's founding for which occasion it was especially composed.

Mr. Roussel's work is interesting, but scarcely epoch making. It is pleasant to hear, with an occasional nod in the direction of Stravinsky, some orchestration that hints at Rimsky-Korsakoff and, of course, some Wagner with, low be it spoken, an occasional acknowledgment of the existence, elsewhere, perhaps, of nothing less than American jazz.

RUSSIAN SYMPHONY

On an all-Russian program, Mr. Koussevitzky features another new symphonic work, a symphony by one Nikolai Nabakoff, born in 1903 and now residing in Paris. The work has the sanction of the present regime in Russia. It has all the mauy vices and the few virtues which one might expect. Chief among the latter are a undeniable virility and among the former a hesitant, meandering quality of not knowing which way to turn.

This, after all, may be the soul-expression of Moscow. Who knows? The symphony cannot be dismissed with a gesture as much of the present Russian music (whether composed by the Volga or the Seine or even the East river) can be, but, on the other hand, it seems a prentice work of a composer none too sure either of his emotional sources or his technique for expressing their outpourings.

THE PHILHARMONIC

Under [illegible] the Philharmonic gave a curious program of Schubert, Liszt and Schubert-Liszt music. The numbers were the Unfinished Symphony, the Wanderer Fantasy of Schubert-Liszt with Siloti doing the piano part, the Mephisto Waltz and the Danse Macabre for piano and orchestra, again with Mr. Siloti.

THIS CLIPPING FROM COLUMBUS, O.
STATE JOURNAL
NOV 30 1930

made no recommendations for successor to Postmaster William Corne, who died last week, but understood Frank S. Neighbor, pu[illegible] director of the state highwa[illegible] and Edward S. Ra[illegible] the Republica[illegible]

NEW YORK, Nov. 29.—The Boston Symphony Orchestra which has lately been celebrating its fiftieth anniversary with a series of gala concerts in the home town came to New York this week to begin its season in Carnegie Hall. It is interesting to note the intense appeal of orchestral music in New York. The Philharmonic-Symphony orchestra gives around 100 concerts here during the season (most of them to capacity audiences), the Manhattan Symphony orchestra has 25 concerts, the Philadelphia orchestra has 10 and the Boston orchestra a considerably larger number. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky continues as conductor for this honorable organization, which concerts always have a certain air of importance.

The program in the concert heard by the writer was an All-Russian one; to begin with was the overture to "Russian and Ludmilla" by Glinka. Then came a symphony by Nicolas Nabokov. This composer was born in Leningrad in 1903 and now lives in Paris. This music was heard for the first time in New York in this concert. This symphony is in three movements only, each of these of short duration; Mr. Nabokov is a modernist, but not of the ultra cult; his music has undeniable charm and feeling and his manner of orchestration original and effective. This music has made considerable appeal to the large audience there and there was much applause for conductor and players. To close this program was Tschaikovsky's Symphony No. 4 and how the Boston musicians did play this music, which dwarfed the two preceeding numbers.

Dr. Koussevitzky and his orchestra gave a most inspiring performace of this symphony. It was magnificently built, culminating in the stirring finale, Allegro con fuoco; in the lighter movements of the sympathy there was clarity of expression with the themes clearly traced but never intruding on the whole scheme. The Scherzo movement was played with great bravura.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
POST
NOV 30 1930

Mrs. Hoover Heads List of Subscribers For Beethoven Fe[illegible]

Mrs. Hoover heads the list of subscribers for the Beethoven festival of the B sontSo shrd T B shrd mf f of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Constitution Hall this week.

Others are Countess Szechenyi, Mrs. Anne Archbold, Frau O. C. Kiep, Mrs. William Butterworth, Mrs. Adolf Miller, Miss Mabel Boardman, Mrs. Edwin B. Parker, Mrs. Frank S. Bright, Miss Alice Clapp, Mrs. J. B. Kendall, Mrs. Beale R. Howard, Mrs. Ross Thompson, Mrs. Lowell Fletcher Hobart, Mrs. William E. Crozier, Mrs. Thomas W. Phillips, jr., Mrs. Hennen Jennings.

Mrs. Charles R. Shepard, Mrs. Franklin Ellis, Mrs. Patrick J. Hurley, Mrs. Henry Leonard, Mrs. George E. Hamilton, Mrs. George Thorpe, Justice Jennings Bailey, Rear Admiral and Mrs. W. L. Capps, Mrs. Leander McCormack-Goodhart, Mrs. Ridgely Hunt, Mrs. T. H. B. McKnight, Mrs. Frank C. Baldwin, Mrs. David A. Reed, Mrs. F. W. Pleadwell, Mrs. Stephen B. Elkins, Mrs. Tracy Dows, Mrs. Armistead Peter 3d, Mrs. Henry Flather, Mrs. Christian Heurich.

Mrs. Chester Bolton, Mrs. F. A. Delano, Mrs. William C. Eustis, Mrs. U. S. Grant 3d, Mrs. James Hogan, Miss A. Hegeman, Mrs. Demarest Lloyd, Mrs. Edward B. Meigs, Mrs. Eugen Meyer, Mr. and Mrs. Frank B. Noyes, Mrs. Lawrence E. Phipps, Mme. Roso, Mrs. Alexander Rogers, Mrs. Anson Phelps Stokes, Mrs. Charles Rhoads, Mrs. Lawrence Townsend, Mrs. F. C. Walcott, Mrs. Montgomery Blair, Mrs. Price Whitaker and others.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
STAR
NOV 30 1930

Many Patrons Enrolled For Beethoven Festival

Those who have subscribed to the forthcoming Beethoven festival of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Constitution Hall on December 2, 3, 5 and 6 were announced by Mrs. Wilson-Greene, who is managing the affair locally, are: Mrs. Herbert Hoover, Mrs. Anne Archbold, Mrs. F. A. Keep, Mrs. William Butterworth, Mrs. Adolf Miller, Miss Mabel Boardman, Mrs. Edwin B. Parker, Mrs. Frank S. Bright, Miss Alice Clapp, Mrs. J. B. Kendall, Mrs. Beale R. Howard, Mrs. Ross Thompson, Mrs. Lowell Fletcher Hobart, Mrs. William Crozier, Mrs. Thomas W. Phillips, jr.; Mrs. Hennen Jennings.

Mrs. Charles R. Shepard, Mrs. Franklin Ellis, Mrs. Patrick J. Hurley, Mrs. Henry Leonard, Mrs. George E. Hamilton, Mrs. George Thorpe, Justice Jennings Bailey, Admiral and Mrs. W. L. Capps, Mrs. Leander McCormack-Goodhart, Mrs. Ridgely Hunt, Mrs. T. H. B. McKnight, Mrs. Frank C. Baldwin, Mrs. David A. Reed, Countess Szchenyi, Mrs. Stephen B. Elkins, Mrs. Tracy Dows, Mrs. Armistead Peter, 3d; Mrs. Henry Fletcher, Mrs. Christian Heurich.

Mrs. Chester Bolton, Mrs. F. A. Delano, Mrs. William C. Eustis, Mrs. U. S. Grant, 3d; Mrs. James Hogan, Miss A. Hegeman, Mrs. Demarest Lloyd, Mrs. Edward B. Meigs, Mrs. Eugene Meyer, Mr. and Mrs. Frank B. Noyes, Mrs. Lawrence Phipps, Mme. Roso, Mrs. Alexander Rogers, Mrs. Anson Phelps Stokes, Mrs. Charles Rhoads, Mrs. Lawrence Townsend, Mrs. F. C. Walcott, Mrs. Montgomery Blair, Mrs. Price Whitaker and others.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
STAR
NOV 30 1930

Arts Club Pays Honor To Dr. Koussevitsky

The Arts Club of Washington will give a reception Wednesday afternoon from 3:30 to 5 o'clock in honor of Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who will be in Washington for several days during the Beethoven festival, which the orchestra will give this week. Miss Marjorie Lowe is chairman of the entertainment committee of the Arts Club under whose auspices the reception has been arranged.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
POST
NOV 30 1930

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will give a series of four concerts this week in connection with the Bethoven Festival, will be the honor guest at a reception given under the auspices of the hospitality committee of the Arts Club at the clubhouse, 2017 I street, on Wednesday afternoon from 3:30 to 5 o'clock.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
POST
NOV 30 1930

By ELISABETH E. POE.

THAT this is to be a brilliant musical season in Washington can not be gainsaid with Sousa and Paderewski already golden memories and this week to be a gala one with the Beethoven Festival by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conducting, with its three outstanding soloists, Josef Hofmann, pianist; Myra Hess, pianist, and Efrem Zimbalist, violinist, starting on Tuesday in Constitution Hall, and Mrs. Lawrence Townsend's series of musical mornings beginning on Wednesday in the Hotel Mayflower.

The Beethoven Festival will continue for four days with four performances in all, three evenings, and one matinee. A group of soloists will be heard with the superb Ninth Symphony in many respects the high point of the festival. Washington will have every reason to be proud of its chorus of 200 voices which will be heard with this symphony.

Mrs. Lawrence Townsend will present as her artists at the opening musical morning. Clare Clairbert, Belgium's leading coloratura scprano, and Richard Crooks, tenor. The appearance of either of these stars alone would be a musical event; when both of them appear on one program it is indeed an achievement.

Washington choirs have already begun their rehearsals for festival Christmas programs and there is every prospect for a banner Yuletide in this regard. The standard of church music has been enhanced greatly in Washington in the last few years, largely due, of course, to the earnest services of a group of unusually well equipped organists and choirmasters.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
STAR
NOV 30 1930

THE coming week, in the words of one of Washington's sager literati, is literally "unparalleled" in its musical history. With the rising of the curtain on the Beethoven festival, which has been arranged through the courtesy of Mr. Koussevitsky and others, this city will have one of the major musical thrills of its lifetime. A whole week of Beethoven is something to wonder at, as would be the mere appearance of the Boston Symphony alone, playing anything that happened to strike its fancy. Swelling, too, its ranks will be that remarkable pianist, Myra Hess, of whom praise never ceases to come in bunches, and Efrem Zimbalist and Josef Hofmann, who need no introduction. There is, furthermore, more than a smattering of interest in the large chorus that Dr. Harned has been training, and which rumor would accredit as being about the finest vocal group of this kind ever brought together. In spite of many interesting musical distractions to heckle this great singing crew, it is said that Dr. Harned has kept his band together through the many, many rehearsals with a kindly but iron hand, with the result that Beethoven's ninth symphony is likely to be done ample justice.

Word from the offices of the mighty, too, indicate that all the way from Bath, Me., and from the West people are coming to commemorate the fiftieth Beethoven anniversary. For once—well, maybe twice in its life—Washington has turned into a veritable music center, to which are gravitating, bag and baggage, staid Bostonians, cynical New Yorkers and hordes of music lovers who never show themselves except on some such rare occasion.

Fritz Kreisler In Recital At The Lyric

Eminent Violinist Will Make His Annual Appearance In Baltimore On Wednesday

Boston Symphony Will Play Four Beethoven Programs In Capital On Anniversary

By HELEN S. TAYLOR

WITH the spell of the superb playing of Beethoven and Chopin by Mr. Paderewski last week still lingering, it is good to know that one equally renowned in his own field will play at the Lyric on Wednesday evening, Fritz Kreisler, violinist, whom even those only mildly interested in music journey to the concert hall to hear. The pre-Christmas lull is beginning to make itself evident, so that this with the recital on Friday afternoon at the Peabody by Pasquale Tallarico, of the faculty, will be the only two events of outstanding interest for the week.

The eminent Austrian violinist is now 55, and since 1889, when he made his first tour of this country with Moritz Rosenthal, the piano virtuoso, he has been in a steady ascendence of favor, until now his supremacy is unquestioned. Curiously enough, it was America who first recognized the coming greatness of Kriesler at that time.

IN TEMPORARY RETIREMENT

Following this tour Kreisler went into temporary retirement from the concert stage and devoted his time to other things, among them a rigid course of military training (he is still an officer in the reserve corps of the Uhlans) and the study of medicine. He subsequently studied art in Paris and Rome.

During his year of military service Kreisler laid his violin aside entirely. When he afterward resumed his playing it was with so little success that he was moved to retire again for eight weeks of intensive practice. Emerging, he was a brilliant success at his Berlin debut in 1899. In the same year he revisited the United States, where he was lauded everywhere. Since that time no season has seemed complete without a recital by Kreisler.

More recently he has spent effort in composition, his numerous arrangements being regarded as classics for the violinist. His collection of famous violins is one of the finest in existence. Also it is a fact that Kreisler, did he choose, could shine almost as well as a pianist as a player of the violin.

PROGRAM FOR CONCERT

His program for Wednesday will include the following:

La Folia.....Corelli
Partita in B Minor (for violin alone).....Bach
Sarabande.
Double.
Bourree.
Concerto in E Minor.....Mendelssohn
Allegro Appasionata.
Andante.
Allegretto ma non Troppo.
Allegretto Molto Vivace.
Romance in A Major.....Schumann
Rondo in G Major.....Mozart
Three Violin Caprices.....Mozart
Study on a Chorale (for violin alone).....Stamnitz
La Chasse.....Cartier
Tarantella.....Wieniawski
Caprice Viennois.....Kreisler
La Gitana.....Kreisler

TALLARICO ON FRIDAY

Pasquale Tallarico will be heard in recital at the Friday afternoon concert of the Peabody Conservatory. Although Mr. Tallarico is an Italian by name, he is an American by birth and training. He has lived in Baltimore for the past ten years, during which time he has been a valuable member of the Peabody Conservatory. Mr. Tallarico's programs are particularly well-balanced. They embrace the music of the old masters and are also representative of the outstanding composers of the modern school. His program will be as follows:

Fantasia in C Minor.....Bach
Pastorale
Gigue
Capriccio.....Scarlatti
Chromatic Fantasie and Fugue....Bach
Sonata in B flat Minor.....Chopin
Two Poems, Op. [illegible] F sharp major, D major.....
Etude in [illegible] sharp major.....Scriabin
Sonata, 104 del Petrarca.....Stravinsky
Au bord d'Une Source
Hungarian Rhapsody, No. 12.....Liszt

THE BEETHOVEN FESTIVAL

There will no doubt be quite a number of music-lovers who will be interested enough in the Beethoven Festival to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Washington this week beginning Tuesday [illegible] to journey over to the Capital City to enjoy the four programs.

The celebration has a double significance, in that it also commemorates the fiftieth anniversary of the Boston's organization's existence. Some of the most noted conductors on the concert platform have wielded the baton of the Boston orchestra, the latest being Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, of Russia, who has so ably directed its musical destinies for the past few years that the eminence of the orchestra in the musical world has been completely restored, after a long period of depression, both artistically and otherwise.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
POST
NOV 30 1930

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, conductor of the Boston Symphony, who this week will present a Beethoven Festival program.

The Conducting Three

Like others, we have our notions, writes Oscar Thompson in the New York Evening Post. We believe Mr. Toscanini is a very great conductor, but we have a somewhat similar respect for Mr. Stokowski and Mr. Koussevitzky. We have

Continued on Page Fourteen

Concert-Chronicle

Continued from Page Twelve

Trans. Dec.

the notion that in Beethoven's Symphonies, even though there may be a disagreement over some such detail as the tempo of the trio of the scherzo in "The Eroica," there is no other playing known to us which approaches the Italian's. This notion might be extended to cover a very considerable part of his programs throughout the years he has been in New York. But we have also the notion that we never heard from him a Bacchanale out of "Tannhäuser" like one or two we have heard from Mr. Stokowski; or anything in Russian music as incandescent as Mr. Koussevitzky's performance of Chaikovsky's Fourth Symphony only a week ago. Here, again, our notion could be expanded to include a very liberal number of compositions better played by one or another of the visiting orchestras than we have had them at our Philharmonic Concerts.

The notion seems to us the logical one that different conductors, with a different approach to different music, granted that each has his liberal endowment of technique (perhaps even of genius!), have a closer sympathy and a more communicable grasp of specific works than others. Mr. Toscanini does not play Chaikovsky at all. He is said to regard him as cheap. Mr. Koussevitzky might very well give the same reason for his failure to play some of Mr. Toscanini's Italian novelties.

Snobs, Stravinsky and The Incidental Public orchestra ... concerto in E-flat as it has not been played hereabouts within easy recollection. At the matinée, the house was warily responsive. It suspected that something had happened; yet was not sure enough to let itself go in admiration. "Wait and see what the papers say." (For such innocent faith in reviews is said to survive in this town.) As it was, Mr. Gieseking was recalled no oftener and no more warmly than any pianist of the first rank might have been.

TRANS. DEC. 6.

Cynics may hint that by Saturday evening the word had been passed, as news is said to travel through the jungle. Yet with many a piece this second audience has given proof of a mind of its own, reviewers to the contrary notwithstanding. That mind perceived quickly that a signal performance of the "Emperor Concerto" was in progress; as soon as it was ended applauded to the echo. Not only must Mr. Gieseking return thanks, thrice and four times; but once he must bring with him Dr. Koussevitzky.

Possibly the most remarkable quality in these two performances, twenty-eight hours apart, of the same piece from the same hands, was the exact likeness of the one to the other. A pianist, a conductor, the players in an orchestra, are but men. Having distinguished themselves on a Friday, they may be less in the vein—for no discoverable reason—when they repeat the piece on the following Saturday. Or, with natural ambition to excel the first performance, they actually fall short, from over-tension, in the second. For once, no such untoward chance marred the repetition of Beethoven's Concerto. Pianist, conductor and orchestra were not a whit less responsive to each other, and to the composer. There was cause again to marvel at the felicities of Mr. Gieseking's touch, at the range of his tone; but equally at the euphonies of the orchestra and the gradations of its manifold voice.

Throughout, moreover, pianist and conductor heard Beethoven, ear to ear. With what superbity, relieved—and therefore heightened—by lyric grace, marched the first movement! What note of ecstacy sang out of the second, whether pianist or orchestra received the melody! Through the finale the orchestra matched the fingers of the pianist, and of zest, swiftness and instant impact, no more need be said. It was time to remember again that Dr. Koussevitzy has restored concertos, for piano or violin, to musical worth, interest and excitement unknown to the Symphony Concerts since Dr. Muck's day. . . . Earlier in the evening Mr. Hanson's new Symphony came—and went, this time without the presence of the composer, already en route to Rome to "sit in" at another performance of his masterworks. There is more than one reason to suspect that it will be long before another is heard at Symphony Hall.

H. T. P.

Incidents and Prospects

Dr. Koussevitzky and the Symphony Orchestra depart for Washington this evening. There, in the ample spaces of Constitution Hall—the Daughters of the Revolution so named it—they will give four concerts, Tuesday, Wednesday, Friday and Saturday, to make a Beethoven Festival. It will comprise his first, third, fifth, seventh and ninth symphonies; the "Egmont," "Coriolan" and third "Leonora" overtures; the fourth and the fifth piano-concerto; the violin-concerto. Miss Hess and Mr. Hofmann will be the pianists; Mr. Zimbalist, the violinist. A local chorus and Mmes. Vreeland and van der Veer, Messrs. Gridley and Gange, will assist in the Ninth Symphony.

Contrary to first report, Mr. Copeland will not repeat on Friday, in Paine Hall at Harvard, the program of his concert on Thursday at Jordan Hall in Boston. Instead, he will be heard at Cambridge in these numbers:

Minuet	Muffat
Pastoral-Caprice	Scarlatti
Minuet	Ravel
Jesus Christus, Filius Dei	Bach
Gnossienne	Satie
Prélude—Soirée dans Grénade—Danse de Puck—L'Apres-midi d'un faune	Debussy
Espana cani	Unknown
Tango Espagnole—El Polo	Albeniz
Canco I; Danza, No. 5	Mompou
Homenaje a las jota	Nin
Malaguena	Lecuona

Since Cambridge programs are the order of the moment, here is Dr. Koussevitzky's for the concert of the Symphony Orchestra in Sanders Theater on Thursday evening, Dec. 11:

Overture to The Opera, "The Magic Flute"	Mozart
Symphony in G minor (K. 550)	Mozart
Symphony, No. 2, in D major	Brahms

Both with Dr. Koussevitzky and Mr. Toscanini two symphonies to a program, are rather the mode this year.

Apropos His New "Caprice," A Note on the "Circle" That Surrounds Him

WHEN Stravinsky's Capriccio, to be heard at Symphony Hall on Friday and Saturday next, received its first performance in Paris (Orchestre Symphonique de Paris, Ernest Ansermet, conductor; Igor Stravinsky, piano soloist, Salle Pleyel, Dec. 6, 1929), Arthur Lourié, widely read Parisian commentator, delivered himself of these meditations in the columns of "La Revue Musicale."

When Stravinsky composed his "Mavra" he encountered either complete silence or ironical regrets, which, however, did not hinder a large number of musicians from finding nourishment upon the game brought down in the woods of "Mavra." When "Oedipus" appeared, the attempt was made to gloss over the rudeness with which "Mavra" had been received. Not that "Oedipus" gave particular pleasure; to be truthful, it was not much better understood than "Mavra"; but one found in it a note of the pathetic, which greatly simplified the task of appreciation. In any case, the relation of Stravinsky to Handel in "Oedipus" was more accessible for the "musical society of the advance-guard," than that with Chaikovsky in "Mavra"—which was frankly shocking. Even for the snobs, this pill ("Mavra") was at the time very hard to swallow. Snobism even became for the time a thing heroic (it seems, however, that in general the snob has a stomach of steel, able to swallow all indigestibles).

From this time on, there were nothing but years of "returns." In truth, the last five or six years will seem very strange to posterity, on account of this tendency toward "returns," which in fact often have the manner of retreats or even of flights. "Returns" took place in all possible directions. However, not all those who "returned" took account of what they were doing, so that many of them were less "returning" than merely "turning about" on their own little axis.

With each new work of Stravinsky there was a tendency to neglect the essence of the work itself in the search for the direction in which he was permitting himself to "return"; in the search for what could safely be repeated out of the mass of that which had already been or had already been repeated (for, though to repeat, a certain courage is also necessary, it is imprudent to advance all alone, and much better to follow someone or other.) . . . However, the question remains; if modernity is in such an impassé that it is impossible to advance farther (which has never been proved, but is taken for an axiom on all sides), then one may repeat as much as one wishes, but on condition that one knows how to repeat; that is to say, it is necessary that one shall manage so that the repetition will be at least as good as the thing which one repeats.

As far as the last works of Stravinsky are concerned, th[illegible] in my opinion, the only criterion by which they may be judged. If then one wished to formulate a standard, based on the "return" to the past, one could say that an intelligent and skillful violation of a canon of the past creates a new canon. This is a principle as valid as that of spontaneous creation itself, which is not based on anything pre-existing; for even spontaneous creation, which seems at first to break all relations with the past, often is joined to the past by very solid relationships, even though these may be entirely unknown to the author. Wherefore, there is no reason why the said author should not conscientiously accept relations established, when he is planning the creation of a work based on a skillful violation of an ancient canon, with the aim of making that canon relive on a new basis.

Discussions on the later works of Stravinsky are above all discussions of specialists, otherwise known as musical discussions "de famille." The public is there for nothing.

It seems to me that the fundamental lack of comprehension in these matters is explained by the insufficient competence of judgments pronounced on the new musical culture; for the criterion, "this pleases me," or "this does not please me" is here entirely out of the question. Incompetence or frank ignorance are evidently appanages of youth, but if these ally themselves with maturity, the matter becomes simply delicious. It is true that there are heretics in good faith, or diverse principles. Such I have not in mind at present. It is not at all necessary to like what Stravinsky does. One can even dislike it. But in order to judge what he has done, it is necessary to crawl out of one's own little hole and stand upon common ground with him. There are several simple truths which we have just now assimilated. One is that nothing has more resemblance to the past than that which at first appears to be most distant from it. Another is that if a thing is particularly bad, there is a marked tendency for it to appear as a product of genius. But in order that a thing may thus appear, it must be very bad indeed. In this case one could say without fear of being mistaken, that it is so bad that it shows genius. And this is why it is indecent to use this word in our epoch.

The reactions toward Stravinsky in general are very curious. One fine day he makes people afraid of him; this is what happened when "Le Sacre" was new. Since that time, one has feared him more than one has liked him. No matter how elegant his language may be, one does not give him credit; one looks at him with suspicion, always awaiting another offense. And what is most droll, even while one fears him one desires him passionately. Which has for me the air of a pathological phenomenon. The most refined and charming musical language, presented in its most charming form, which holds our attention upon things interesting and sympathetic, does not produce the effect we are awaiting, or if it does produce it, does so in so feeble a manner as to prove that the language is taken for what it is not. Which is at the least rather strange.

There are people who do not think that music may be used to cause sexual excitation, although this has been proclaimed with much persuasiveness and authority not only by Wagner. Stravinsky is one of these people. Not because such excitement is bad but because it is not the affair of music. It is the end of the nineteenth century which has brought to the art this flattering privilege. However, it is not said that it ought to be thus.

However, a certain mystification is produced. The domaine of eroticism has ceased to be the special field of music. Into this fertile soil has been transplanted the seed of rhythm, which has grown very rapidly. There is not time to talk further of this, but it must be recognized that the future development of the art of music can develop only if it is freed from the physiological role which rhythm, as an end in itself, still plays in it.

The Capriccio, it appeared, pleased everyone.

The Chronicle Of Bostonian Concert-Halls

Respighi's Virtuoso Piece, Franz Kneisel's Son, Newcomers

Trans. Nov. 6

ON Friday and Saturday of this week at Symphony Hall, it is the turn of Mr. Respighi to present his contribution to the jubilee year of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He has chosen to write a work with the formidable title, "Metamorphoseon: Modi XII.," less forbidding when translated into English as "Metamorphoses, in Twelve Variations." The score, like most of the anniversary pieces, is still in manuscript. The orchestra is the usual array of the present day: woodwinds and trumpets in threes; horns and trombones in fours; the quintet of strings. The percussion section calls for bells and tamtam in addition to the ever-present kettledrums. The score also requires harp and organ.

The principal theme unfolds at once in two broad streams of counterpoint. Strings, in register medium to high, take the upper strand; the deeper strings, the lower. Woodwinds join in to swell a crescendo. But there is no harmonization of the two lines of this first portion of the theme; merely a full-voiced counterpoint in two parts. The pace is slow, of sedate dignity. The harmonic flavor is such as to suggest the mellowness of music written in one of the churchly modes. Those who favor modal analysis wherever possible, will name it the Aeolian Mode. Others may prefer to call it our modern minor (B-flat) unaltered by a leading note. A contrasting portion of the theme enters in high register, harmonized, in notes of more rapid time-values.

It would be boring to try to trace in print, without musical illustration, the changes which Respighi rings upon this theme. Indeed, a hasty view of the score causes one to ask why the title "Metamorphoses." For these variations seem at first sight more concerned with various forms of decoration upon repetitions of the theme in different instruments than with those profound mutations in the theme itself which the title "Metamorphoses" suggests. Here are the twelve variations as listed in the score, with brief comment where it seems desirable:

I. Moderato non troppo. Flutes and clarinets carry the theme, strings accompany.

II. Allegretto. English horn and viola sing the theme, while flutes have ornamental figures. An animato brings a climax:

III. Lento.

IV. Lento. The theme in both these variations is delivered songfully; while the ornamental figures begin to assume the proportions of small cadenzas.

V. Molto vivace.

VI. Vivo. Both these variations are in sprightly manner, somewhat suggesting the mood of a scherzo.

VII. The show-number of the piece. Elaborate, displayful cadenzas, requiring high virtuosity, follow each other in rapid succession for an amazing number of instruments: violoncello and harp, violin, viola, three solo violins combined soon with solo viola, bassoon, flute, clarinet, harp, clarinet, violin, bass clarinet.

VIII. Andantino mosso. Melodies derived from the theme, in wind instruments.

IX. Lento non troppo. High strings are prominent.

X. Molto allegro. Oboe and first violins deliver the theme in even quarter-notes. Other instruments accompany with motivs from the theme.

XI. Molto allegro. Active rhythm and, again, passage-work.

XII. Vivo non troppo. As would be expected, the final variation is exceedingly brilliant with much use of the theme in brass.

From this list it is evident that in the variations preceding the cadenzas Mr. Respighi follows the succession of movements in a symphony. That is, after the theme and initial variations (comparable in a sense to a first movement) succeeding movements are slow and songful, to be followed in turn by movements of more rapid tempo, in mood not entirely foreign to the symphonic scherzo. The last three variations have the characteristics of a brilliant, climactic, imposing finale. Mr. Respighi thus plans his "Metamorphosis" on the grand scale.

Further it may be said that the variations are orchestrally colorful, brilliant. Virtuosity shines forth from almost every page. The astute Italian, always quick at perceiving opportunities for a displayful, resounding music, has apparently taken thought; said to himself that he is writing for an orchestra of renowned virtuosi; would pay it the compliment of drawing upon that virtuosity, of allowing it to reap its own rewards. But at Symphony Hall in rehearsal, the paragons are "sweating blood" (to use a common phrase) in meeting the "generous" composer's demands. . . . Certain compliments are like a two-edged sword.

A. H. M.

59

Concert-Chronicle

Trans. Nov. 7

For Cambridge Ears

THE program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Sanders Theater, Cambridge, last evening, anticipated the week's concerts in Boston in the inclusion of Handel's Concerto Grosso No. 12 in B minor, and for the rest followed the program of last week with Nabokov's Symphony and Chaikovsky's Symphony in F minor, No. 4.

Nabokov's symphony again gave the impression that its composer is a young man of more than ordinary talent. Whether that large talent will ripen into genius, is, as the phrase goes, "up to him." The question has been raised in the foreign press as to how much Nabokov owes to Stravinsky and Prokofieff. To one listener at least, the question seems futile. Probably he would not have written as he did had the two great moderns not lived. But also, probably he would not have written as he did had jazz not been invented. Indeed, if one listens closely, one can hear the echo of the styles of half a dozen or more composers in the work of Nabokov, and probably a majority among them are late Romanticists. It would be as true with equal truth that Nabokov's style could not be what it is were it not for these composers.

Nabokov seems to be laying the foundations of a style which will be both intensely personal and broadly eclectic. He is not given to "isms," be they of the or that lion or movement of his day and age, or be they of the past. Such masters, in his style, are apparently put in their place in the style which he is forging for himself. But not all the elements which are going into the making of this style are as yet perfectly fused. It is a natural stage in the work of many a young composer. It argues that a certain state of immaturity has not yet been passed. The promise for Nabokov lies in the inherent beauty of his ideas and of the uses to which he puts them, and in the sure and certain way in which he is fusing diverse elements into a style of his own. Such a work as this symphony proved highly enjoyable, even though it contains certain evidences of immaturity. Of course, not a little of this enjoyment is due to the splendid performance which Dr. Koussevitzky and his men gave to the work.

Handel's concerto renewed pleasant memories of past experiences with string silken and sonorous; of a composer now plaintive, now sumptuous, now vigorously energetic; of a conductor always with these strings and this composer's music. For Dr. Koussevitsky gives to his Handel a reading that includes all breadths, all vigors, but also all beauties of line and all beauty of shade; he polishes tonal quality until it shines with an incomparable brightness, kindles until it becomes fiery with eloquence, caresses it to soothing gentleness. Such is the Handel concerto of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in its year of jubillee.

But for a thrill give us Chaikovsky's 'Fourth." It seems as if with this year's performance of this symphony the conductor had set for himself a new and amazingly high standard with Chaikovsky with whom he had already excelled. It makes it a thing Russian, of the Russians—but for all the world. Not possibly could this music have been conceived in Western Europe. Of the quasi-Orient Russia it breathes in measure after measure, period after period. What matters it if Russian "nationalists" (as they called themselves) found in Chaikovsky all to great kinship with the German? It is the spirit beneath such external relationships that counts; and where in the world would one find a work more Russian in spirit than this symphony of Chaikovsky. In its gloomy melodies, in its brilliant and bizarre decorative scheme, in its colorful languors, in its wild, unrestrained energies, in its unsurpassable pageantry this symphony is Russian beyond the work of many a "nationalist." And it is in the blood of the conductor to underscore every such quality. If the range of emotion and effect in the symphony-wide, his feeling for it reaches its utmost limit. Performance which as perfect matches, point for point, the inherent qualities of the work, one will not soon experience from other sources.

A. H. M.

Music Notes and Comment

This week brings what may prove the chief event of the current Boston musical season, the first performance anywhere of Stravinsky's new "Symphonie de Psaumes" dedicated to "The Incidents and Prospects"

A new symphony, written by Prokoffiev for the semi-centennial year of the orchestra, will be heard at the Symphony Concerts next week. Report heralds it as light—in the manner of his "Classical Symphony." Mr. Polatschek will play his clarinet-concerto. Rimsky-Korsakov's "Spanish Caprice" and the overture to Mozart's opera, "The Magic Flute" round out a light program.

Westward Dr. Koussevitzky's successful novelties take their way. . . . For the concerts of the Chicago Orchestra tomorrow and Saturday, Mr. Walton's overture, "Portsmouth Point," and Mr. Gruenberg's tone-poem, "Enchanted Isle" are both on the program.

Boston Symphony concerts a memorable performance of the Beethoven "Emperor" concerto, will be heard in recital at Symphony Hall. As a musician and as a pianist he is unsurpassed by anyone now living. He excels in Bach and in Debussy, composers both represented on his program.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
POST
NOV 30 1930

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, conductor of the Boston Symphony, who this week will present a Beethoven Festival program.

The Conducting Three

Like others, we have our notions, writes Oscar Thompson in the New York Evening Post. We believe Mr. Toscanini is a very great conductor, but we have a somewhat similar respect for Mr. Stokowski and Mr. Koussevitzky. We have

Continued on Page Fourteen

Concert-Chronicle

Continued from Page Twelve

Trans. Dec.

the notion that in Beethoven's Symphonies, even though there may be a disagreement over some such detail as the tempo of the trio of the scherzo in "The Eroica," there is no other playing known to us which approaches the Italian's. This notion might be extended to cover a very considerable part of his programs throughout the years he has been in New York. But we have also the notion that we never heard from him a Bacchanale out of "Tannhäuser" like one or two we have heard from Mr. Stokowski; or anything in Russian music as incandescent as Mr. Koussevitzky's performance of Chaikovsky's Fourth Symphony only a week ago. Here, again, our notion could be expanded to include a very liberal number of compositions better played by one or another of the visiting orchestras than we have had them at our Philharmonic Concerts.

The notion seems to us the logical one that different conductors, with a different approach to different music, granted that each has his liberal endowment of technique (perhaps even of genius), have a closer sympathy and a more communicable grasp of specific works than others. Mr. Toscanini does not play Chaikovsky at all. He is said to regard him as cheap. Mr. Koussevitzky might very well give the same reason for his failure to play some of Mr. Toscanini's Italian novelties.

Concert-Chronicle

Masterpiece

Trans. Dec. 1

HOW much securer in perception and judgment is the audience at the Symphony Concert of Saturday over that of Friday! On both occasions Mr. Gieseking, Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra played Beethoven's piano-concerto in E-flat as it has not been played hereabouts within easy recollection. At the matinée, the house was warily responsive. It suspected that something had happened; yet was not sure enough to let itself go in admiration. "Wait and see what the papers say." (For such innocent faith in reviews is said to survive in this town.) As it was, Mr. Gieseking was recalled no oftener and no more warmly than any pianist of the first rank might have been.

Cynics may hint that by Saturday evening the word had been passed, as news is said to travel through the jungle. Yet with many a piece this second audience has given proof of a mind of its own, reviewers to the contrary notwithstanding. That mind perceived quickly that a signal performance of the "Emperor Concerto" was in progress; as soon as it was ended applauded to the echo. Not only must Mr. Gieseking return thanks, thrice and four times; but once he must bring with him Dr. Koussevitzky.

Possibly the most remarkable quality in these two performances, twenty-eight hours apart, of the same piece from the same hands, was the exact likeness of the one to the other. A pianist, a conductor, the players in an orchestra, are but men. Having distinguished themselves on a Friday, they may be less in the vein—for no discoverable reason—when they repeat the piece on the following Saturday. Or, with natural ambition to excel the first performance, they actually fall short, from over-tension, in the second. For once, no such untoward chance marred the repetition of Beethoven's Concerto. Pianist, conductor and orchestra were not a whit less responsive to each other, and to the composer. There was cause again to marvel at the felicities of Mr. Gieseking's touch, at the range of his tone; but equally at the euphonies of the orchestra and the gradations of its manifold voice.

Throughout, moreover, pianist and conductor heard Beethoven, ear to ear. With what superbity, relieved—and therefore heightened—by lyric grace, marched the first movement! What note of ecstacy sang out of the second, whether pianist or orchestra received the melody! Through the finale the orchestra matched the fingers of the pianist, and of zest, swiftness and instant impact, no more need be said. It was time to remember again that Dr. Koussevitzky has restored concertos, for piano or violin, to musical worth, interest and excitement unknown to the Symphony Concerts since Dr. Muck's day. . . . Earlier in the evening Mr. Hanson's new Symphony came—and went, this time without the presence of the composer, already en route to Rome to "sit in" at another performance of his masterworks. There is more than one reason to suspect that it will be long before another is heard at Symphony Hall.

H. T. P.

Incidents and Prospects

Dr. Koussevitzky and the Symphony Orchestra depart for Washington this evening. There, in the ample spaces of Constitution Hall—the Daughters of the Revolution so named it—they will give four concerts, Tuesday, Wednesday, Friday and Saturday, to make a Beethoven Festival. It will comprise his first, third, fifth, seventh and ninth symphonies; the "Egmont," "Coriolan" and third "Leonora" overtures; the fourth and the fifth piano-concerto; the violin-concerto. Miss Hess and Mr. Hofmann will be the pianists; Mr. Zimbalist, the violinist. A local chorus and Mmes. Vreeland and van der Veer, Messrs. Gridley and Gange, will assist in the Ninth Symphony.

Contrary to first report, Mr. Copeland will not repeat on Friday, in Paine Hall at Harvard, the program of his concert on Thursday at Jordan Hall in Boston. Instead, he will be heard at Cambridge in these numbers:

Minuet	Muffat
Pastoral-Caprice	Scarlatti
Minuet	Ravel
Jesus Christus, Filius Dei	Bach
Gnossienne	Satie
Prélude—Soirée dans Grénade—Danse de Puck —L'Apres-midi d'un faune	Debussy
Espana cani	Unknown
Tango Espagnole—El Polo	Albeniz
Canco I; Danza, No. 5	Mompou
Homenaje a las jota	Nin
Malaguena	Lecuona

Since Cambridge programs are the order of the moment, here is Dr. Koussevitzky's for the concert of the Symphony Orchestra in Sanders Theater on Thursday evening, Dec. 11:

Overture to The Opera, "The Magic Flute"	Mozart
Symphony in G minor (K. 550)	Mozart
Symphony, No. 2, in D major	Brahms

Both with Dr. Koussevitzky and Mr. Toscanini two symphonies to a program, are rather the mode this year.

Studios

—it is unthinkable that one expert could sketch the outlines and opos His New "Caprice," A Note on the "Circle" That Surrounds Him

WHEN Stravinsky's Capriccio, to be heard at Symphony Hall on Friday and Saturday next, received its first performance in Paris (Orchestre Symphonique de Paris, Ernest Ansermet, conductor; Igor Stravinsky, piano soloist, Salle Pleyel, Dec. 6, 1929), Arthur Lourié, widely read Parisian commentator, delivered himself of these meditations in the columns of "La Revue Musicale."

When Stravinsky composed his "Mavra" he encountered either complete silence or ironical regrets, which, however, did not hinder a large number of musicians from finding nourishment upon the game brought down in the woods of "Mavra." When "Oedipus" appeared, the attempt was made to gloss over the rudeness with which "Mavra" had been received. Not that "Oedipus" gave particular pleasure; to be truthful, it was not much better understood than "Mavra"; but one found in it a note of the pathetic, which greatly simplified the task of appreciation. In any case, the relation of Stravinsky to Handel in "Oedipus" was more accessible for the "musical society of the advance-guard," than that with Chaikovsky in "Mavra"—which was frankly shocking. Even for the snobs, this pill ("Mavra") was at the time very hard to swallow. Snobism even became for the time a thing heroic (it seems, however, that in general the snob has a stomach of steel, able to swallow all indigestibles).

From this time on, there were nothing but years of "returns." In truth, the last five or six years will seem very strange to posterity, on account of this tendency toward "returns," which in fact often have the manner of retreats or even of flights. "Returns" took place in all possible directions. However, not all those who "returned" took account of what they were doing, so that many of them were less "returning" than merely "turning about" on their own little axis

With each new work of Stravinsky there was a tendency to neglect the essence of the work itself in the search for the direction in which he was permitting himself to "return"; in the search for what could safely be repeated out of the mass of that which had already been or had already been repeated (for, though to repeat, a certain courage is also necessary, it is imprudent to advance all alone, and much better to follow someone or other.) . . . However, the question remains; if modernity is in such an impassé that it is impossible to advance farther (which has never been proved, but is taken for an axiom on all sides), then one may repeat as much as one wishes, but on condition that one knows how to repeat; that is to say, it is necessary that one shall manage so that the repetition will be at least as good as the thing which one repeats.

As far as the last works of Stravinsky are concerned, th[illegible], in my opinion, the only criterion by which they may be judged. If then one wished to formulate a standard, based on the "return" to the past, one could say that an intelligent and skillful violation of a canon of the past creates a new canon. This is a principle as valid as that of spontaneous creation itself, which is not based on anything pre-existing; for even spontaneous creation, which seems at first to break all relations with the past, often is joined to the past by very solid relationships, even though these may be entirely unknown to the author. Wherefore, there is no reason why the said author should not conscientiously accept relations established, when he is planning the creation of a work based on a skillful violation of an ancient canon, with the aim of making that canon relive on a new basis.

Discussions on the later works of Stravinsky are above all discussions of specialists, otherwise known as musical discussions "de famille." The public is there for nothing.

It seems to me that the fundamental lack of comprehension in these matters is explained by the insufficient competence of judgments pronounced on the new musical culture; for the criterion, "this pleases me," or "this does not please me" is here entirely out of the question. Incompetence or frank ignorance are evidently appanages of youth, but if these ally themselves with maturity, the matter becomes simply delicious. It is true that there are heretics in good faith, or diverse principles. Such I have not in mind at present. It is not at all necessary to like what Stravinsky does. One can even dislike it. But in order to judge what he has done, it is necessary to crawl out of one's own little hole and stand upon common ground with him. There are several simple truths which we have just now assimilated. One is that nothing has more resemblance to the past than that which at first appears to be most distant from it. Another is that if a thing is particularly bad, there is a marked tendency for it to appear as a product of genius. But in order that a thing may thus appear, it must be very bad indeed. In this case one could say without fear of being mistaken, that it is so bad that it shows genius. And this is why it is indecent to use this word in our epoch.

The reactions toward Stravinsky in general are very curious. One fine day he makes people afraid of him; this is what happened when "Le Sacre" was new. Since that time, one has feared him more than one has liked him. No matter how elegant his language may be, one does not give him credit; one looks at him with suspicion, always awaiting another offense. And what is most droll, even while one fears him one desires him passionately. Which has for me the air of a pathological phenomenon. The most refined and charming musical language, presented in its most charming form, which holds our attention upon things interesting and sympathetic, does not produce the effect we are awaiting, or if it does produce it, does so in so feeble a manner as to prove that the language is taken for what it is not. Which is at the least rather strange.

There are people who do not think that music may be used to cause sexual excitation, although this has been proclaimed with much persuasiveness and authority not only by Wagner. Stravinsky is one of these people. Not because such excitement is bad but because it is not the affair of music. It is the end of the nineteenth century which has brought to the art this flattering privilege. However, it is not said that it ought to be thus.

However, a certain mystification is produced. The domaine of eroticism has ceased to be the special field of music. Into this fertile soil has been transplanted the seed of rhythm, which has grown very rapidly. There is not time to talk further of this, but it must be recognized that the future development of the art of music can develop only if it is freed from the physiological role which rhythm, as an end in itself, still plays in it.

The Capriccio, it appeared, pleased everyone.

The Chronicle Of Bostonian Concert-Halls

Respighi's Virtuoso Piece, Franz Kneisel's Son, Newcomers

Trans. Nov. 6

ON Friday and Saturday of this week at Symphony Hall, it is the turn of Mr. Respighi to present his contribution to the jubilee year of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He has chosen to write a work with the formidable title, "Metamorphoseon: Modi XII," less forbidding when translated into English as "Metamorphoses, in Twelve Variations." The score, like most of the anniversary pieces, is still in manuscript. The orchestra is the usual array of the present day: woodwinds and trumpets in threes; horns and trombones in fours; the quintet of strings. The percussion section calls for bells and tam-tam in addition to the ever-present kettle-drums. The score also requires harp and organ.

The principal theme unfolds at once in two broad streams of counterpoint. Strings, in register medium to high, take the upper strand; the deeper strings, the lower. Woodwinds join in to swell a crescendo. But there is no harmonization of the two lines of this first portion of the theme; merely a full-voiced counterpoint in two parts. The pace is slow, of sedate dignity. The harmonic flavor is such as to suggest the mellowness of music written in one of the churchly modes. Those who favor modal analysis wherever possible, will name it the Aeolian Mode. Others may prefer to call it our modern minor (B-flat) unaltered by a leading note. A contrasting portion of the theme enters in high register, harmonized, in notes of more rapid time-values.

It would be boring to try to trace in print, without musical illustration, the changes which Respighi rings upon this theme. Indeed, a hasty view of the score causes one to ask why the title "Metamorphoses." For these variations seem at first sight more concerned with various forms of decoration upon repetitions of the theme in different instruments than with those profound mutations in the theme itself which the title "Metamorphoses" suggests. Here are the twelve variations as listed in the score, with brief comment where it seems desirable:

I. Moderato non troppo. Flutes and clarinets carry the theme, strings accompany.

II. Allegretto. English horn and viola sing the theme, while flutes have ornamental figures. An animato brings a climax.

III. Lento.

IV. Lento. The theme in both these variations is delivered songfully, while th[illegible]

Mr. Wood said that as far as the Con[illegible] solidated is concerned there is only o[illegible] course of action open to pay the bond[illegible] "We can't do that so we will have t[illegible] submit. The New Haven Railroad," h[illegible] added, "does not feel obligated to me[illegible] the large maturities and will not put u[illegible] additional funds"

The entire funded debt of the Consol[illegible] dated became due Aug. 1. Issues due a[illegible] amounts are Worcester & Southbrid[illegible] Street Railway first gold 6s $500,00[illegible] Worcester Consolidated Street Rail[illegible] first & refunding 4½s $1,489,000; Worc[illegible] ter Consolidated Street Railway fir[illegible] refunding 6½s $2,116,000; Worcester Co[illegible] solidated Street Railway debenture [illegible] are prominent.

X. Molto allegro. Oboe and first violins deliver the theme in even quarter-notes. Other instruments accompany with motivs from the theme.

XI. Molto allegro. Active rhythm and, again, passage-work.

XII. Vivo non troppo. As would be expected, the final variation is exceedingly brilliant with much use of the theme in brass.

From this list it is evident that in the variations preceding the cadenzas Mr. Respighi follows the succession of movements in a symphony. That is, after the theme and initial variations (comparable in a sense to a first movement) succeeding movements are slow and songful, to be followed in turn by movements of more rapid tempo, in mood not entirely foreign to the symphonic scherzo. The last three variations have the characteristics of a brilliant, climactic, imposing finale. Mr. Respighi thus plans his "Metamorphosis" on the grand scale.

Further it may be said that the variations are orchestrally colorful, brilliant. Virtuosity shines forth from almost every page. The astute Italian, always quick at perceiving opportunities for a displayful, resounding music, has apparently taken thought; said to himself that he is writing for an orchestra of renowned virtuosi; would pay it the compliment of drawing upon that virtuosity, of allowing it to reap its own rewards. But at Symphony Hall in rehearsal, the paragons are "sweating blood" (to use a common phrase) in meeting the "generous" composer's demands. . . . Certain compliments are like a two-edged sword.

A. H. M.

Concert-Chronicle

Trans. Nov. 7

For Cambridge Ears

THE program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Sanders Theater, Cambridge, last evening, a[illegible] ticipated the week's concerts in Bost[illegible] in the inclusion of Handel's Concer[illegible] Grosso No. 12 in B minor, and for t[illegible] rest followed the program of last we[illegible] with Nabokov's Symphony and Chaik[illegible] sky's Symphony in F minor, No. 4.

Nabokov's symphony again gave t[illegible] impression that its composer is a you[illegible] man of more than ordinary tale[illegible] Whether that large talent will ripen i[illegible] genius, is, as the phrase goes, "up[illegible] him." The question has been raised[illegible] the foreign press as to how much Na[illegible] kov owes to Stravinsky and Prokofi[illegible] To one listener at least, the questi[illegible] seems futile. Probably he would n[illegible] have written as he did had the two gre[illegible] moderns not lived. But also, probab[illegible] he would not have written as he did h[illegible] jazz not been invented. Indeed, if o[illegible] listens closely, one can hear the echo[illegible] the styles of half a dozen or more co[illegible] posers in the work of Nabokov; a[illegible] probably a majority among them a[illegible] late Romanticists. It would be as[illegible] with equal truth that Nabokov's st[illegible] could not be what it is were it not [illegible] these composers.

Nabokov seems to be laying the foun[illegible] itons of a style which will be both [illegible] tensely personal and broadly eclect[illegible] He is not given to "isms," be they of t[illegible] or that lion or movement of his day a[illegible] age, or be they of the past. Such ma[illegible] ters, in his style, are apparently put in[illegible] their place in the style which he is fo[illegible] ing for himself. But not all the elemen[illegible] which are going into the making of th[illegible] style are as yet perfectly fused. It [illegible] a natural stage in the work of ma[illegible] a young composer. It argues that [illegible] certain state of immaturity has not [illegible] yet been passed. The promise for Nab[illegible] kov lies in the inherent beauty of [illegible] ideas and of the uses to which he pu[illegible] them, and in the sure and certain w[illegible] in which he is fusing diverse elemen[illegible] into a style of his own. Such a wo[illegible] as this symphony proved highly enjo[illegible] able, even through it contains certai[illegible] evidences of immaturity. Of course, n[illegible] a little of this enjoyment is due to t[illegible] splendid performance which Dr. Ko[illegible] sevitzky and his men gave to the wo[illegible]

Handel's concerto renewed pleasa[illegible] memories of past experiences with strin[illegible] silken and sonorous; of a composer [illegible] manner now plaintive, now sumptuo[illegible] now vigorously energetic; of a conductor[illegible] way with these strings and this co[illegible] poser's music. For Dr. Koussevitsky give[illegible] to his Handel a reading that includes a[illegible] breadths, all vigors, but also all beau[illegible] of line and all beauty of shade; he p[illegible] ishes tonal quality until it shines wi[illegible] an incomparable brightness, kindles [illegible] until it becomes fiery with eloquenc[illegible] caresses it to soothing gentleness. Su[illegible] is the Handel concerto of the Bost[illegible] Symphony Orchestra in its year [illegible] jubilee.

But for a thrill give us Chaikovsky[illegible] 'Fourth." It seems as if with this year[illegible] performance of this symphony the co[illegible] ductor had set for himself a new ar[illegible] amazingly high standard with Chaikovsk[illegible] with whom we had already excelled. H[illegible] makes it a thing Russian, of the Ru[illegible] sians—but for all the world. Not possib[illegible] could this music have been conceived [illegible] Western Europe. Of the quasi-Orient[illegible] Russia it breathes in measure aft[illegible] measure, period after period. What ma[illegible] ters it if Russian "nationalists" (as the[illegible] called themselves) found in Chaikovsk[illegible] all to great kinship with the German[illegible] It is the spirit beneath such extern[illegible] relationships that counts; and where [illegible] the world would one find a work mo[illegible] Russian in spirit than this symphony [illegible] Chaikovsky. In its gloomy melodies, in i[illegible] brilliant and bizarre decorative scheme[illegible] in its colorful languors, in its wild, unr[illegible] strained energies, in its unsurpassable pa[illegible] eantry this symphony is Russian beyo[illegible] the work of many a "nationalist." And [illegible] is in the blood of the conductor to unde[illegible] score every such quality. If the ran[illegible] of emotion and effect in the symphony[illegible] wide, his feeling for it reaches its utmo[illegible] limit. Performance which as perfect[illegible] matches, point for point, the inhere[illegible] qualities of the work, one will not soo[illegible] experience from other sources.

A. H. M.

Music Notes and Comment

This week brings what may prove the chief event of the current Boston musical season, the first performance anywhere of Stravinsky's new "Symphonie de Psaumes" dedicated to "The gloray of God and the Boston Symphony Orchestra." Dr Koussevitsky, following the precedent he set at the first performance here of Prokofieff's "Sept, ils sont sept," will repeat Stravinsky's symphony at the end of the program, so that the audience may judge it better. On the program of this week's Symphony concerts also occurs another recent work of Stravinsky, the Capriccio for piano, to be heard for the first time in Boston.

Kreisler's recital today is the second he has given here this season. The program should enable the master violinist to use his full powers.

Next Sunday afternoon Walter Gieseking, who gave at the last pair of Boston Symphony concerts a memorable performance of the Beethoven "Emperor" concerto, will be heard in recital at Symphony Hall. As a musician and as a pianist he is unsurpassed by anyone now living. He excels in Bach and in Debussy, composers both represented on his program.

60

yers === Music and Musician.

"Civis Romanus Sum"

Otterino Respighi (Loomis)

Composer, in Tribute to the Symphony Orchestra, of the Virtuoso Variations Played Today

Boston Symphony
Nov 8 Herald

JRDAY, NOVEMBER 8, 1930

MUSIC

SYMPHONY CONCERT

By PHILIP HALE

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Koussevitzky conductor, gave the fifth concert of the present, the 50th season, yesterday afternoon. The program was as follows: Handel, Concerto Grosso for string orchestra, B minor No. 12: Respighi, "Metamorphoseon, Modi XII," which being interpreted means "Theme and 12 Variations"—first performance, written for the orchestra jubilee. Brahms, Symphony, D major, No. 2.

Respighi's "Metamorphoseon" is a perfunctory work, interesting only by the brilliance of the orchestration. The musical ideas are negligible when they are not wholly lacking. The theme is neither impressive in stateliness nor charming by reason of beauty. This Italian gentleman who has given pleasure by his arrangements of old airs for the lute; by his "Fountains" and his "Pines" of Rome; by the dramatic fury of his "Ballade of the Gnomides" accepted a task. He could not therefore write spontaneously. There was a forced draught. Already by his "Roman Festivals" he showed that his inventive flow was checked; that he was obliged to rely chiefly on gorgeous clothing for his anaemic musical body; on gorgeous clothing and on thunderous sonority. Is it not possible that he has been writing too much and without critical thought?

This latest composition is first of all monotonous by reason of an apparently persistent tonality, also by scholastic and hard labor in the variation form. It evidently occurred to him that this orchestra was blessed with skilful solo players of instruments; so he said to himself: "Come now, I will write cadenzas for these gifted players, so that they may show their dexterity, and men of the harp, horn, flute, violin, oboe, clarinet, etc., rejoicing in an opportunity of exhibiting their skill, will rise up and call me blessed." The various artists thus called on did their prettiest, but the cadenza variation reminded one of examination-day at a music school. It is surprising that Respighi did not introduce a cadenza for the organ pedals. The organ was there; the organist was capable and the organ helped swell the din in the expected apotheosis designed to excite applause.

Dr. Koussevitzky and the players did all that could be done to give distinction to this music. For once their labor was in vain; there could be no glorification of what was inherently without true strength or beauty, for splendor of orchestration will not cover paucity of musical ideas.

The latest biographers of Johannes Brahms differ curiously concerning the character of the second symphony. The excellent Walter Niemann finds a tragic undercurrent; ghostly elements "glimmering in a supernatural uncanny way"; even "mysterious Wagnerian visions." The equally excellent Richard Specht finds sunshine, fair days, warm winds, clarity and tenderness. The performance yesterday was pleasing, effective in that Dr. Koussevitzky found music in this symphony and shared his enjoyment with the audience.

Brahms can on occasion be gloomy and crabbed enough. Why cannot Mr. Niemann, a devoted admirer of Johannes, allow him to be cheerful once in a while, as in this second symphony?

Handel's concerto in B minor is nearly 200 years old. The vitality of the allegri; the eloquent simplicity, the serenity of the slow movement; the calm olympian authority displayed throughout—these put the rhythmic frenzy, the melodic sterility, the search after "originality" characterizing so much contemporaneous music to shame and confusion.

"Beauty lives not for the self-glorification of the priests of any art, but for the enjoyment of priests and laity alike. He is the best art-priest who brings most beauty most home to the hearts of most men," wrote Samuel Butler in a note book. For his idolatrous worship of Handel one can forgive Butler for attempting to compose in the Handelian manner, as one has a warmer liking for Stravinsky because he too endeavored in his "Oedipus Rex," to pay "the most superb personage one meets in the history of music" a similar homage.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program of next week is announced as comprising these works: Mozart's Overture to "The Major Flute"; also his Clarinet Concerto (Mr. Polatschek, clarinetist); Prokofieff's Symphony No. 4 (composed for the orchestra's jubilee); Rimsky-Korsakov's Caprice on Spanish themes.

The weekly "First performance: composed for the fiftieth anniversary of the Boston Symphony Orchestra" was provided for the program of Nov. 7 and 8 at Symphony Hall, Boston, by Ottorino Respighi. He entitled his donation "Metamorphoseon, Modi XII." For a less momentous occasion he might have called it a Theme and 12 Variations, since that is what it is. The theme, announced by the strings, with the woodwinds joining in later, appears to be built on one of the ecclesiastical modes. It is stately and unimpressive. The variations consist to a considerable degree of bijouterie. In the seventh especially there is lavish provision for exercise of the talents of the soloists—an opportunity which was embraced to excellent effect by the Boston virtuosi. In the slower passages there is some writing of beauty, reminiscent of the composer's Roman trees and fountains and church windows. There is of course a clangorous finale, in which conductor and players struggled valiantly to bring out from the score an import which after all was not there.

Dr. Koussevitzky opened this fifth program of the season with Handel's Concerto Grosso for string orchestra in B minor, No. 12. In this he fell once more into that besetting conductorial weakness of his which reveals itself in slow movements and particularly in those written for strings alone—an overstraining for effect which leads him to break his melodic line and leave his attacks ragged for want of precision in his beat. When he let the orchestra have its head, in the livelier sections, the music was superbly played.

Honors of the day, however, must be awarded to the dependable Johannes Brahms, who was invited only at the tenth hour when a prospective visitor proved unready, and whose Symphony in D major seemed radiant indeed beside the musical garb of his fellow-guests. In this lyrical and playful and emotional score the orchestra was at home and the conductor in his element, and a superlative performance ensued.

L. A. S.

Eleventh Hour Rescue of the Symphonic Day

TRANS. — NOV 8

Respighi's Empty Variations, Over-Strained Handel, Saving Brahms

IT WAS bound to happen. It might have come sooner and it might have been worse. . . . At the suggestion of Dr. Koussevitzky twelve or more composers are under commission to write "new and original" pieces for the present fiftieth year of the Symphony Concerts. Since the Boston Orchestra has regained international fame, the choice of contributors to its jubilee rites ranges as widely. One by one they are delivering their manuscripts, to be the property of Symphony Hall through a year. First came Mr. Hill's Commemoration Ode at a respectable level of occasional music. Next, the notable Symphony of Roussel, received as warmly as it was written. Then, without commission, followed the Solemn Overture of the conductor himself. It was made from the heart to release his pride in the orchestra at this semi-centenary season, his devotion, past, present, future, to its fortunes. It touched reciprocating feeling, if it did not always persuade the ear. Prokoffiev's new Symphony is announced for next week. Stravinsky's Psalms lie on the library shelf. Other contributions—three, at least, from American hands—await Dr. Koussevitzy's pleasure.

Yesterday it was the turn of Mr. Respighi, and the eminent Italian had evidently found himself in the plight that even now may be harassing one and another of his commissioned colleagues. He had accepted an invitation that did him honor; but when he came to fulfill it his mind was alight with no creative idea. No new tonal pageant of Rome outspread upon his imagination, to be added to the fountains, the pines, the festivals, that have made his reputation at home and abroad. He had exhausted cathedral winflows; put by the sinister grotesquerie of his early Gnomides. He could not transcribe Bach of the organ-loft, as he did for Mr Toscanini and the Philharmonic Society of New York. Nor could he put together a third Suite of old airs and dances for the lute—enhanced into a light modern orchestra. The commission asked independent work.

Composers are but men; and the human, as well as the professional, refuge in such exigency was formalism. Ready to his experienced hand lay too convenient a container. It is true that of a theme and variations Strauss made one of his masterpieces, "Don Quixote." In the best of modernist operas, "Wozzeck," Berg has turned them to potent theatric and dramatic usage. Brahms's "St. Antoni" variations, Elgar's "Enigma" variations, Reger's variations and fugue on a theme by Hiller, each sings the composer's praises. But to a thousand and one other composers this tempting form has been cloak for passing or continuous sterility.

Becomingly the Signore salves an uneasy conscience. He gives his theme and twelve variations a semi-fantastic, semi-scholarly, title. Together they shall make a "Metamorphoseon"; while each variation shall be labelled a "Modus." Through half the way their course shall recall the progress of a symphony: slow introduction, quicker-paced first movement; slow movement; scherzo—to be followed, first, by a decorative intermezzo; then by slow preluding to an upspringing finale. This and that variation shall not lack quasi-Italianate melody; more than one shall tax and display the virtuosity of a band of virtuosi. At the end there shall be no extended, climactic, roof-shaking fugue.

Yet when Mr. Respighi undertook to fill these thirteen waiting jars, scarcely a musical idea came to him. The orchestra announces his theme; ear and mind receive it—with no other sensation than a statement in notes devoid of distinctive quality. Twelve times over, he proceeds to transform, diversify and decorate it. Only as decoration do the variations interest or impress—intermittently. Try as he may, Mr. Respighi cannot fertilize his theme; lead it through a dozen incarnations in as many moods. His creative faculty is dormant. His scholarship deserts him. There is no room for his vivid pictorial sense. But the Signore is a master of orchestration—true without the finesse and piquancy of Ravel or the sumptuous, and occasionally diabolic, resource o Strauss; but in his degree a master none the less. To it, then, with endless play of instrumental timbres eked out with harmonic vesture and rhythmic impetus. The orchestra sounds en masse, in groups, in individual voices. In a whole variation of cadenzas, even the bassoon and the bass-clarinet take a turn. There are ornamental figures, recurring passage-work, anything and everything that an orchestra and all that therein is can do—not too subtly.

Now, a quarter of an hour of such entertainment is amusing when the virtuosi of Symphony Hall are excelling themselves, jointly and severally; when Dr. Koussevitzky has honorably persuaded himself that Mr. Respighi's piece contains twice as much as is really there and he must draw forth the double quantity. Thirty-five minutes of uninterrupted instrumental gewgaws, gimcracks and miscellaneous confections are another thing. The listening ears are loyed and wearied, which condition was evident in the clapping hands when Mr. Respighi at last was done. They no more than sufficed to bring the conspicuous jugglers of cadenzas, and then the whole orchestra, to its feet. Thereupon, as though it suspected tollsome rehearsal and repeated practice at home, the audience applauded loudly. . . . And so addio to Signor Respighi. May he next return in better form—say in his orches-

To begin the concert, the string choir played five of the six divisions of Handel's Concerto Grosso in B minor, handsomely and justly restored to the active repertory by Dr. Koussevitzky after twenty years of neglect by his predecessors. Yet in the performance one read—or fancied one read—the nervous strain of that incessantly rehearsed "Metamorphoseon." The conductor took the slow movements at a dragging pace. Occasionally there, oftener in the quicker divisions, the strings sounded with a surprisingly edgy tone. Cassandra-like, the program-book quoted Monsieur Romain Rolland as saying that in performance Handel's instrumental music should sound like "a constant improvisation." For the first time, from Dr. Koussevitzky's hand, one of these Concerti Grossi fell short of such impression. The dragging pace in the slow movements stiffened the curve of the Handelian melody, cribbed its spaciousness, dried its beauty. Sharp tones do not suit the quick, smooth stride, the flowing counterpoint, the animated figures, of his Allegros. Throughout the Concerto it was the over-strained playing of overtired men—as though Respighi haunted them.

Only in Brahms's Second Symphony were conductor and orchestra themselves, retrieving the concert. And this Brahms, being repertory piece, so requiring less preparation, was substitute for the announced Seventh of Sibelius—a symphony that cries for rehearing; that more than a few have eagerly awaited; that should surely have place in concerts to come. . . . But Brahms "in D major" is no repertory piece when Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra play it in the vein. He catches the singing, sunlit quality of many a page—the swaying rhythm, unlabored abundance, warm unfolding, of the first movement; through the second, the sense of a Brahms withdrawn into the shade to meditate with the violoncellos, upon his idyll until he is content; the touch-and-go of the scherzo, grace and bite in alternation; the buoyant flood of the finale.

Withal, Dr. Koussevitzky does not forget that his singing Brahms has also rugged tones; that the ingrained autumnal mood may descend, for a space, upon these summer musings; that shadows do steal across that glinting finale, of a sudden slackening it. He takes this Second Symphony objectively enough, sounds the notes, turns the phrases, keeps the

NOVEL PROGRAM BY SYMPHONY

First Performance Given of "Metamorphoseon" by Respighi

Trav. Nov 8

Perhaps no more trying place than one following Handel and preceding Brahms could be chosen for the first performance of a contemporary work. Surely Respighi's "Metamorphoseon," composed for the 50th anniversary of the Boston Symphony orchestra, suffered by the obvious comparisons yesterday afternoon.

The Theme and Variations under the superb generalship of Dr. Koussevitzky emerged as a colossal achievement for composer, conductor and orchestra. Indeed the Metamorphoseon presents such difficulties that an announcement early in the week noted certain program changes made to allow rehearsal time for its exacting demands.

All of Respighi's creations are permeated with his ardent temperament, the strong Russian influence which was a part of his training, and with his scholarly and exhaustive methods by which he proceeds. His is a rare gift for melody, an absolute and facile technical command and, above all, brilliant orchestration. And yet the Metamorphoseon at times seemed wearisome in its exacting demands upon its listeners. Its instrumentalization often assumes more importance than its outline. The organ lent a stateliness to the broad and florid ending. Altogether the new work is a masterly composition, free from many of the musical idiocyncrasies of earlier works.

The Handel B minor Concerto Grosso which opened the afternoon's program in its simplicity and purity, with notable solo parts, received a fine performance. Likewise with the truly beautiful Brahms Second Symphony in D major. Superlatives about Dr. Koussevitzky's treatment of the diversified musical matter he offers have long since been exhausted. He excels at moderns, we aver. Tchaikovsky is his finest achievement, when his programs include it. But yesterday's performance of the Brahms, with the whole splendid pattern as material, emerged as one of the most superb performances of the entire season. The unusual vivacity, vigor and spontaneous gaiety of the finale lent themselves admirably to Dr. Koussevitzky's sympathetic mood.

The concert will as usual be repeated tonight, with next week's program offering Mozart, Prokafieff and Rimsky-Korsakov. The Prokofieff will be still another first performance, the symphony No. 4 from the Russian master having been composed in honor of the orchestra's anniversary.

60

...yers --- Music and Musician.

"Civis Romanus Sum"

Otterino Respighi (Loomis)

Composer, in Tribute to the Symphony Orchestra, of the Virtuoso Variations Played Today

Boston Symphony ...RDAY, NOVEMBER 8, 1930 Herald

MUSIC

SYMPHONY CONCERT
By PHILIP HALE

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Koussevitzky conductor, gave the fifth concert of the present, the 50th season, yesterday afternoon. The program was as follows: Handel, Concerto Grosso for string orchestra, B minor No. 12: Respighi, "Metamorphoseon, Modi XII," which being interpreted means "Theme and 12 Variations"—first performance, written for the orchestra jubilee. Brahms, Symphony, D major, No. 2.

Respighi's "Metamorphoseon" is a perfunctory work, interesting only by the brilliance of the orchestration. The musical ideas are negligible when they are not wholly lacking. The theme is neither impressive in stateliness nor charming by reason of beauty. This Italian gentleman who has given pleasure by his arrangements of old airs for the lute; by his "Fountains" and his "Pines" of Rome; by the dramatic fury of his "Ballade of the Gnomides" accepted a task. He could not therefore write spontaneously. There was a forced draught. Already by his "Roman Festivals" he showed that his inventive flow was checked; that he was obliged to rely chiefly on gorgeous clothing for his anaemic musical body; on gorgeous clothing and on thunderous sonority. Is it not possible that he has been writing too much and without critical thought?

This latest composition is first of all monotonous by reason of an apparently persistent tonality, also by scholastic and hard labor in the variation form. It evidently occurred to him that this orchestra was blessed with skilful solo players of instruments; so he said to himself: "Come now, I will write cadenzas for these gifted players, so that they may show their dexterity, and men of the harp, horn, flute, violin, oboe, clarinet, etc., rejoicing in an opportunity of exhibiting their skill, will rise up and call me blessed." The various artists thus called on did their prettiest, but the cadenza variation reminded one of examination-day at a music school. It is surprising that Respighi did not introduce a cadenza for the organ pedals. The organ was there; the organist was capable and the organ helped swell the din in the expected apotheosis designed to excite applause.

Dr. Koussevitzky and the players did all that could be done to give distinction to this music. For once their labor was in vain; there could be no glorification of what was inherently without true strength or beauty, for splendor of orchestration will not cover paucity of musical ideas.

The latest biographers of Johannes Brahms differ curiously concerning the character of the second symphony. The excellent Walter Niemann finds a tragic undercurrent; ghostly elements "glimmering in a supernatural uncanny way"; even "mysterious Wagnerian visions." The equally excellent Richard Specht finds sunshine, fair days, warm winds, clarity and tenderness. The performance yesterday was pleasing, effective in that Dr. Koussevitzky found music in this symphony and shared his enjoyment with the audience.

Brahms can on occasion be gloomy and crabbed enough. Why cannot Mr. Niemann, a devoted admirer of Johannes, allow him to be cheerful once in a while, as in this second symphony?

Handel's concerto in B minor is nearly 200 years old. The vitality of the allegri; the eloquent simplicity, the serenity of the slow movement; the calm olympian authority displayed throughout—these put the rhythmic frenzy, the melodic sterility, the search after "originality" characterizing so much contemporaneous music to shame and confusion.

"Beauty lives not for the self-glorification of the priests of any art, but for the enjoyment of priests and laity alike. He is the best art-priest who brings most beauty most home to the hearts of most men," wrote Samuel Butler in a note book. For his idolatrous worship of Handel one can forgive Butler for attempting to compose in the Handelian manner, as one has a warmer liking for Stravinsky because he too endeavored in his "Oedipus Rex," to pay "the most superb personage one meets in the history of music" a similar homage.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program of next week is announced as comprising these works: Mozart's Overture to "The Magic Flute"; also his Clarinet Concerto (Mr. Polatschek, clarinetist); Prokofieff's Symphony No. 4 (composed for the orchestra's jubilee); Rimsky-Korsakov's Caprice on Spanish themes.

The weekly "First performance: composed for the fiftieth anniversary of the Boston Symphony Orchestra" was provided for the program of Nov. 7 and 8 at Symphony Hall, Boston, by Ottorino Respighi. He entitled his donation "Metamorphoseon, Modi XII." For a less momentous occasion he might have called it a Theme and 12 Variations, since that is what it is. The theme, announced by the strings, with the woodwinds joining in later, appears to be built on one of the ecclesiastical modes. It is stately and unimpressive. The variations consist to a considerable degree of bijouterie. In the seventh especially there is lavish provision for exercise of the talents of the soloists—an opportunity which was embraced to excellent effect by the Boston virtuosi. In the slower passages there is some writing of beauty, reminiscent of the composer's Roman trees and fountains and church windows. There is of course a clangorous finale, in which conductor and players struggled valiantly to bring out from the score an import which after all was not there.

Dr. Koussevitzky opened this fifth program of the season with Handel's Concerto Grosso for string orchestra in B minor, No. 12. In this he fell once more into that besetting conductorial weakness of his which reveals itself in slow movements and particularly in those written for strings alone—an overstraining for effect which leads him to break his melodic line and leave his attacks ragged for want of precision in his beat. When he let the orchestra have its head, in the livelier sections, the music was superbly played.

Honors of the day, however, must be awarded to the dependable Johannes Brahms, who was invited only at the tenth hour when a prospective visitor proved unready, and whose Symphony in D major seemed radiant indeed beside the musical garb of his fellow-guests. In this lyrical and playful and emotional score the orchestra was at home and the conductor in his element, and a superlative performance ensued. L. A. S.

Eleventh Hour Rescue of the Symphonic Day

TRANS. — NOV 8

Respighi's Empty Variations, Over-Strained Handel, Saving Brahms

IT WAS bound to happen. It might have come sooner and it might have been worse. . . . At the suggestion of Dr. Koussevitzky twelve or more composers are under commission to write "new and original" pieces for the present fiftieth year of the Symphony Concerts. Since the Boston Orchestra has regained international fame, the choice of contributors to its jubilee rites ranges as widely. One by one they are delivering their manuscripts, to be the property of Symphony Hall through a year. First came Mr. Hill's Commemoration Ode at a respectable level of occasional music. Next, the notable Symphony of Roussel, received as warmly as it was written. Then, without commission, followed the Solemn Overture of the conductor himself. It was made from the heart to release his pride in the orchestra at this semi-centenary season, his devotion, past, present, future, to its fortunes. It touched reciprocating feeling, if it did not always persuade the ear. Prokoffiev's new Symphony is announced for next week. Stravinsky's Psalms lie on the library shelf. Other contributions—three, at least, from American hands—await Dr. Koussevitzy's pleasure.

Yesterday it was the turn of Mr. Respighi, and the eminent Italian had evidently found himself in the plight that even now may be harassing one and another of his commissioned colleagues. He had accepted an invitation that did him honor; but when he came to fulfill it his mind was alight with no creative idea. No new tonal pageant of Rome outspread upon his imagination, to be added to the fountains, the pines, the festivals, that have made his reputation at home and abroad. He had exhausted cathedral winflows; put by the sinister grotesquerie of his early Gnomides. He could not transcribe Bach of the organ-loft, as he did for Mr Toscanini and the Philharmonic Society of New York. Nor could he put together a third Suite of old airs and dances for the lute—enhanced into a light modern orchestra. The commission asked independent work.

Composers are but men; and the human, as well as the professional, refuge in such exigency was formalism. Ready to his experienced hand lay too convenient a container. It is true that of a theme and variations Strauss made one of his masterpieces, "Don Quixote." In the best of modernist operas, "Wozzeck," Berg has turned them to potent theatric and dramatic usage. Brahms's "St. Antoni" variations, Elgar's "Enigma" variations, Reger's variations and fugue on a theme by Hiller, each sings the composer's praises. But to a thousand and one other composers this tempting form has been cloak for passing or continuous sterility.

Becomingly the Signore salves an uneasy conscience. He gives his theme and twelve variations a semi-fantastic, semi-scholarly, title. Together they shall make a "Metamorphoseon"; while each variation shall be labelled a "Modus." Through half the way their course shall recall the progress of a symphony: slow introduction, quicker-paced first movement; slow movement; scherzo—to be followed, first, by a decorative intermezzo; then by slow preluding to an upspringing finale. This and that variation shall not lack quasi-Italianate melody; more than one shall tax and display the virtuosity of a band of virtuosi. At the end there shall be no extended, climactic, roof-shaking fugue.

Yet when Mr. Respighi undertook to fill these thirteen waiting jars, scarcely a musical idea came to him. The orchestra announces his theme; ear and mind receive it—with no other sensation than a statement in notes devoid of distinctive quality. Twelve times over, he proceeds to transform, diversify and decorate it. Only as decoration do the variations interest or impress—intermittently. Try as he may, Mr. Respighi cannot fertilize his theme; lead it through a dozen incarnations in as many moods. His creative faculty is dormant. His scholarship deserts him. There is no room for his vivid pictorial sense. But the Signore is a master of orchestration—true without the finesse and piquancy of Ravel or the sumptuous, and occasionally diabolic, resource o Strauss; but in his degree a master none the less. To it, then, with endless play of instrumental timbres eked out with harmonic vesture and rhythmic impetus. The orchestra sounds en masse, in groups, in individual voices. In a whole variation of cadenzas, even the bassoon and the bass-clarinet take a turn. There are ornamental figures, recurring passage-work, anything and everything that an orchestra and all that therein is can do—not too subtly.

Now, a quarter of an hour of such entertainment is amusing when the virtuosi of Symphony Hall are excelling themselves, jointly and severally; when Dr. Koussevitzky has honorably persuaded himself that Mr. Respighi's piece contains twice as much as is really there and he must draw forth the double quantity. Thirty-five minutes of uninterrupted instrumental gewgaws, gimcracks and miscellaneous confections are another thing. The listening ears are loyed and wearied, which condition was evident in the clapping hands when Mr. Respighi at last was done. They no more than sufficed to bring the conspicuous jugglers of cadenzas, and then the whole orchestra, to its feet. Thereupon, as though it suspected toilsome rehearsal and repeated practice at home, the audience applauded loudly. . . . And so addio to Signor Respighi. May he next return in better form—say in his orches-

To begin the concert, the string choir played five of the six divisions of Handel's Concerto Grosso in B minor, handsomely and justly restored to the active repertory by Dr. Koussevitzky after twenty years of neglect by his predecessors. Yet in the performance one read—or fancied one read—the nervous strain of that incessantly rehearsed "Metamorphoseon." The conductor took the slow movements at a dragging pace. Occasionally there, oftener in the quicker divisions, the strings sounded with a surprisingly edgy tone. Cassandra-like, the program-book quoted Monsieur Romain Rolland as saying that in performance Handel's instrumental music should sound like "a constant improvisation." For the first time, from Dr. Koussevitzky's hand, one of these Concerti Grossi fell short of such impression. The dragging pace in the slow movements stiffened the curve of the Handelian melody, cribbed its spaciousness, dried its beauty. Sharp tones do not suit the quick, smooth stride, the flowing counterpoint, the animated figures, of his Allegros. Throughout the Concerto it was the over-strained playing of overtired men—as though Respighi haunted them.

Only in Brahms's Second Symphony were conductor and orchestra themselves, retrieving the concert. And this Brahms, being repertory piece, so requiring less preparation, was substitute for the announced Seventh of Sibelius—a symphony that cries for rehearing; that more than a few have eagerly awaited; that should surely have place in concerts to come. . . . But Brahms "in D major" is no repertory piece when Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra play it in the vein. He catches the singing, sunlit quality of many a page—the swaying rhythm, unlabored abundance, warm unfolding, of the first movement; through the second, the sense of a Brahms withdrawn into the shade to meditate with the violoncellos, upon his idyll until he is content; the touch-and-go of the scherzo, grace and bite in alternation; the buoyant flood of the finale.

Withal, Dr. Koussevitzky does not forget that his singing Brahms has also rugged tones; that the ingrained autumnal mood may descend, for a space, upon these summer musings; that shadows do steal across that glinting finale, of a sudden slackening it. He takes this Second Symphony objectively enough, sounds the notes, turns the phrases, keeps the proportion; finds revealing pace and charactering rhythm. Subjectively, the warmth of mood, the clear color, the changeful, streaming course, touch him nearly. His Brahms smiles but will not forego melancholy; speaks out, then locks within. In short a romantic Brahms. The perfect Brahmsite—they are many nowadays—does not demur. H. T. P.

...the Boston Symphony orchestra, suffered by the obvious comparisons yesterday afternoon.

The Theme and Variations under ... superb generalship of Dr. Koussevitzky emerged as a colossal achievement ... composer, conductor and orchestra. Indeed the Metamorphoseon presents such difficulties that an announcement early in the week noted certain program changes made to allow rehearsal time for its exacting demands.

All of Respighi's creations are permeated with his ardent temperament, the strong Russian influence which was a part of his training, and with his scholarly and exhaustive methods by which he proceeds. His is a rare genius for melody, an absolute and facile technical command and, above all, brilliant orchestration. And yet the Metamorphoseon at times seemed wearisome in its exacting demands upon its listeners. Its instrumentalization often assumes more importance than its outline. The organ lent a stateliness to the gross and florid ending. Altogether the new work is a masterly composition, free from many of the musical idiocyncrasies of earlier works.

The Handel B minor Concerto Grosso which opened the afternoon's program in its simplicity and purity, with notable solo parts, received a fine performance. Likewise with the truly beautiful Brahms Second Symphony in D major. Superlatives about Dr. Koussevitzky's treatment of the diversified musical matter he offers have long since been exhausted. He excels at moderns, weaver. Tchaikovsky is his finest achievement, when his programs include it. But yesterday's performance of the Brahms, with the whole splendid pattern as material, emerged as one of the most superb performances of the entire season. The unusual vivacity, vigor and spontaneous gaiety of the finale lent themselves admirably to Dr. Koussevitzky's sympathetic mood.

The concert will as usual be repeated tonight, with next week's program offering Mozart, Prokafieff and Rimsky-Korsakov. The Prokofieff will be still another first performance, the symphony No. 4 from the Russian master having been composed in honor of the orchestra's anniversary.

RESPIGHI WORK AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

"Metamorphoseon, Modi XII," Written for Boston

Ingenious Set of Variations Tests Virtuosity of Boston Orchestra

Globe—Nov 8

Week by week the importance of the announcement from Symphony Hall at the opening of the current 50th anniversary season of the Boston Symphony that a number of new works had been commissioned by the trustees becomes more manifest. Dr Koussevitzky apparently intends to put one on each program.

Yesterday it was the turn of Respighi, whose contribution to the anniversary, an ingenious set of variations with the awe-inspiring title "Metamorphoseon, Modi XII," was played for the first time in public. Next week brings a new symphony by Prokofieff. Before the season ends, most of the chief living composers will have been represented on the program by works commissioned by the Boston Symphony.

Respighi, who conducted the Boston Symphony in a program of his works Feb 18 and 19, 1927, paid the orchestra an adroit and deserved compliment in writing the variations heard yesterday. He included showy and difficult cadenza passages for most of the principal players, which displayed their virtuosity effectively. The whole piece is written so that only a full modern orchestra of the first rank, under an eloquent leader, can do it anything like justice. Yesterday the Boston Symphony met Respighi's test triumphantly.

For Most Listeners

Sets of variations are anathema to some listeners. In the past half century few composers of note have attempted pieces in that form for orchestra, though such instances as d'Indy's "Istar" and Elgar's "Enigma Variations" come to mind as exceptions.

Respighi's title indicates his purpose. He metamorphoses his theme ingeniously, altering the pace, piling up embroidery on it. It is not obvious at a first hearing to what extent he uses the old scales known as "modes," which one might expect from the title. Some of the harmony is certainly based on them, but a true translation of "modi" would seem to be rather "forms" than "modes" in the technical sense of scales.

The real point about any new piece is not for most listeners its form, or its technique, or even the opportunities it may afford for virtuosity on the part of the players. What matters is whether the composer says anything in imagainative and emotional terms; whether the audience is held intent and absorbed by the power of the music without lapse of attention. One listener yesterday found Respighi's variations more intricate than enthralling, more ingenious than emotional.

The other numbers on the program, is it was finally rearranged, were Handel's concerto grosso in B minor, No. 12; and Brahms' Second Symphony. The strings in the Handel played less well than they often do these days in such pieces. No doubt an undue portion of rehearsal time was taken by the very exacting Respighi music.

Dr Koussevitzky, as usual, interpreted "lago" as something slower than the pace of the proverbial snail. This comes of taking andantes and adagios too slowly. Largo must be slower still, according to modern ideas of tempi, though it is by no means clear that that it what "largo" meant to Handel. If your adagios have been as slow as possible, what is to be done with largos?

Brahm's Symphony

In the Brahms symphony one felt as on other occasions that Dr Koussevitsky missed the lyric songlike quality of the first movement, with its very Germanic and very lovely melodies. He did the slow movement better than most other conductors have done it, and was appropriately eloquent in the finale.

But one has still to be convinced that any non-German can really do justice to this symphony, after hearing Toscanini as well as Koussevitsky interprat it. Perhaps, as often before, one's cherished memories of Dr Muck prevent fairness to other interpreters.

The program now announced for next week includes Mozart's "Magic Flute" overture, his clarinet concerto, Prokofieff's new Fourth Symphony and Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Caprice on Spanish Themes."

P. R.

VIRTUOSITY TESTS FOR SYMPHONY

Pat Nov 8

Respighi's Variations Climaxed in the Seventh

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Save for the first, which marked the semi-centenary is another way, each of the programmes of the five pairs of concerts of the current Symphony season has offered a piece written in commemoration of the orchestra's 50th anniversary. Yesterday, as it will be again this evening, this new piece was one from the hand of Ottorino Respighi, bearing the imposing title "Metamorphoseon, Modi XII." (Theme and Variations.)

GLIB RATHER THAN POETIC

Signor Respighi is a fluent and fertile maker of music. Since 1920 a dozen pieces by him have been played at the Symphony concerts, and there are operas and other works that Boston does not know. All of these compositions show the hand of an able craftsman, especially of one who has solved the mysteries and mastered the complexities of modern orchestration. But the very soundness of Respighi's technical equipment, combined with a ready flow of musical ideas, enables him to talk easily and also agreeably even when he has nothing much to say. Not all of his subsequent works have attained to the level of the "Fountains of Rome," by which a decade ago the orchestral Respighi was first made known to us. Some, indeed, have fallen far below it. And the new Variations must be considered of the glib and resourceful rather than of the imaginative and poetic Respighi.

The theme itself, richly proclaimed, is arresting and impressive, and for a time the variations firmly hold the attention. One of them in particular, the seventh, caught the audience's ear, and no wonder. To this variation is affixed the caption Cadenze. In turn, yesterday, the harp of Mr. Zighera, the 'cello of Mr. Bedetti, the violin of Mr. Burgin, the viola of Mr. Lefranc, the horn of Mr. Boettcher, the bassoon of Mr. Laus, the flute of Mr. Laurent, the clarinet of Mr. Polatschek and the oboe of Mr. Gilet were heard in displayful passages that might have been culled from concertos for the several instruments. But from then on it became an increasingly difficult task to listen to the "Metamorphoseon" with attentive interest. In particular, the eighth and ninth variations seemed superfluous, and the sonorous close could not altogether efface the impression that Respighi had grown diffuse and verbose, that much of this latest music was manufactured, lacking the true creative impulse.

Change in List

Incidentally these Variations, and not only that of the showy cadenzas, are taxing even for a virtuoso orchestra, so taxing in fact that the preparation of them made necessary certain changes in the announced programme. For the Seventh Symphony of Sibelius and the Clarinet Concerto of Mozart, Dr. Koussevitzky must needs substitute the Second Symphony of Brahms, a work that the orchestra has at its finger-tips. As it happened the change was a fortunate one. After Respighi, Brahms was good to hear, especially in the first movement, which is the glory of this Second Symphony.

Of this Symphony, Dr. Koussevitzky achieved an eloquent and glowing performance. Notably played, too, was Handel's Twelfth Concerto Grosso with which the concert opened, not the most ingratiating of the set, although it does contain a noble Larghetto that only Handel could have written. Furthermore, the performance of the "Metamorphosoen" represented a signal triumph over formidable difficulties. With reason at the conclusion of the piece, Dr. Koussevitzky bade his players rise and take the applause unto themselves.

Conductors, Orchestras, "Wizardry"

TRANS. DEC. 10

A Parisian at Symphony Hall, The Toscanini-Stokowski Interchange

LAST October, Henry Prunières, editor in Paris of La Revue Musicale, essayist, biographer and reviewer as well, spent three weeks in the United States. He came hither to be guest of Mrs. Coolidge at her festival of chamber music in Chicago. There he heard Mr. Stock and the Chicago Orchestra. Turning eastward he was guest of Mr. Stokowski in Philadelphia, listening to its orchestra also. In New York he renewed acquaintance with the Philharmonic Society under Mr. Kleiber. (He had known it first—Mr. Toscanini conducting—in Paris last spring.) Finally he came to Boston with his friend, Albert Roussel the composer; here heard the Symphony Orchestra, at rehearsal, in Debussy's sea-pieces and Roussel's new symphony, but at no concert with an audience. Before a Friday permitted, he must make speed to New York to catch his ship for Paris. We Americans, it sometimes seems, are not the only hurried people in this world.

From Paris Monsieur Prunières has now sent to the New York Times an article, printed last Sunday, about the orchestras he heard in the United States. He gives a considerable part of it to comparisons between French and American orchestral organization, personnel and salaries. He writes, for the hundredth time, the ordained acclaim for Mr. Toscanini and the Philharmonic Society—when the Italian conductor leads it. He bestows upon Mr. Stock and the Chicagoans just praise that they do not always receive in a city and a country that takes them too much for granted. Mr. Stokowski "dazzled" Monsieur Prunières in personal contacts and in the concert-hall. Into all this, the distinguished Parisian tosses desultory sentences about the Boston Orchestra. At last come the clinching paragraphs:

> Which American orchestra is to be ranked the first? I find it difficult to choose among such orchestras as those in New York, Boston and Philadelphia. When Toscanini stands before the New York orchestra the result seems to be absolute perfection. When he is replaced, even by such a great conductor as Erich Kleiber, whose worth, as I see it, was not sufficiently recognized in New York, the qualities of certain of the solo instruments may be criticized.
>
> At Boston and Philadelphia, despite every effort, I have been unable to discern a weak point in the composition of the orchestras. If my preferences should incline toward Boston, it is because the quartet there [i. e. the strings] appeared to me to possess a sonority more glowing than even that in Philadelphia. These are simply nuances to differentiate the three orchestras, which deserve to be classed and proclaimed equally the best in the whole world.

Bostoniana

Monsieur Prunières begins his wanderings around the Boston Orchestra by recalling Ravel's praise of the trumpets, "played by Germans." The valiant Mager, the excellent Lafosse, Perret and Voisin, may be surprised at the new nationality that these Parisian visitors attribute to them. Monsieur Prunières goes cheerfully on: "There are thirty-eight Frenchmen in the Boston Orchestra." Likely enough; since wartime nobody but he has been at pains to count them. For the rest of us they are members of an orchestra that does not test ability by nationality. Forthwith discovery and proclamation: "Koussevitzky is a great conductor. . . . To judge him, one must hear him at the head of the Boston Symphonic Orchestra." Quite so, and "uncommon civil" of Monsieur Prunières.

Furthermore: "Serge Koussevitzky is very popular in Paris, where we are grateful to him for some magnificent concerts which he has given here, and for all the great new works which he has introduced. No other conductor has done so much for modern music in France as Mr. Koussevitzky. I am happy to see that he continues along these lines in the United States, for it is due to his initiative that the Boston Symphony Orchestra has commissioned some new works for its fiftieth anniversary by the best contemporaneous composers, and has brought into existence symphonies by Stravinsky, Prokofieff, Albert Roussel, etc." Is one a supersensitive "native" to find a slightly patronizing touch in this long final sentence? To take leave, our visitor emits a pious ejaculation: "May we soon have the pleasure [of hearing Koussevitzky and the Bostonians] in France!" . . . There are so many things that the Parisians would enjoy, if and when there are Americans to provide them. H. T. P.

As Concerts Come and Go, Under Noted

"Little Symphony" by Krenek, New Composer, New Work, Sessions's Suite

Dec. 11 — Trans

THOUGH the week's novelty at Symphony Hall is not an anniversary piece, nor even a first performance in America, it nevertheless has a distinction all its own. It introduces a new and much talked-of composer to the Symphony concerts—Ernst Krenek (pronounced Krshnek, exactly as Dvorák is known to most musicians to be pronounced with a similar 'sh" sound.) Krenek was born in Vienna, Aug. 23, 1900, of Bohemian parents. He studied for some years under Franz Schreker in Vienna and in Berlin. His first eleven opus numbers were written during these student years. Opus 1 dates from 1918. He married a daughter of Gustav Mahler. He has been associated with Paul Bekker in operatic work.

One notices first, perhaps, the extraordinary facility with which Krenek works. Though he has been composing only twelve years, his opus numbers already exceed sixty. And many of those works are in the larger forms. Among orchestral works his symphonies are: No. 1, Op. 7, 1921; No. 2, Op. 12, 1922; No. 3, Op. 16, also 1922; then, skipping a year, "Seven Orchestral Pieces," Op. 31, and a Symphony for Winds and Percussion, Op. 34, date from the winter 1924-25. After a longer interval, a Potpourri for Orchestra, Op. 54, dates from 1927. And this week's "Little Symphony," Op. 58, dates from 1928. There are also other orchestral pieces in the complete list of his works.

The year of the first gap mentioned above, 1923, brought the first two stage works, the comic opera, "Der Sprung Ueber dem Shatten," Op. 17, and the serious opera, "Orpheus and Euridice," Op. 21. Adolf Weissman has characterized his treatment of these two characters as "a modern wedded pair who reveal a Strindbergian love which is at the same time hate." The work with which Krenek took the world by the ears is of course his jazz opera, "Jonny Spielt Auf," Op. 45, 1927. From about the same time came a trio of one-act operas, "Der Diktator," "Der Meisterboxer," "Das geheime Königreich." In his latest opera (one hesitates to use the word "latest" in so prolific a composer), "Das Leben des Orest," Op. 60, 1929, he has again turned to a classical subject. (Riemann's Dictionary contains a complete list of his works through Op. 57).

In his earliest works Krenek, in the words of Riemann's Dictionary, was "of the left wing of modernists." His works were frequently in the nature of parodies. His methods were linear, contrapuntal. With them atonality was inevitable, but was only a by-product, not a foundation of his system. "His music," says Weissman, "reveals a simple determination to 'epater les bourgeois,'" was a music much sought for modern music festivals, but seldom arrived at more than one or two hearings. Then comes a period when Romantic tendencies are pronounced, when he turned "toward life and relinquished all that was uncompromising and unsystematic."

Summing up the article in Modern Music from which the above is quoted, Herr Weissman concludes, "A survey of Krenek's general development shows that the man whose radicalism seemed the support and strength of the modern trend in Germany is now seeking attention through entirely opposite measures . . . Krenek has become a composer for the multitude which has taken him for its own. . . . The essential musical principle within Krenek, once so promising, is receding ever further into the background. The scenically effective has become his chief preoccupation; his music is too second-hand, too derived to be suggestive of further development for art. Such at least is the case today. [November, 1928.] Only the future will show inches and Will Be Powered with Four Pra

Continued on Page Fourteen

Krenek and Sessions

Continued from Page Ten

whether Krenek will be an influence on the music of our time."

Of the late opera, "Das Leben des Orest," Op. 60, a writer in Die Musik, in an extensive review speaks as a work that "has gone to school to Wagner," a work whose "chief law is truth of characterization," a work in which music is in a very real sense in the service of the drama. He also mentions, however, jazz, short melodic bits, trivial rhythms. He continues, "Krenek's desire to create an operatic work of purest style, in which the arts of song shall be the ruling force, becomes clear in the manner in which he creates his rôles according to the various vocal categories. From the heroic baritone to the coloratura soprano all have received the same careful consideration and there are expansive lyrical moments for every one of the singers. There are powerful Verdi-like ensembles." Like that of "Jonny," the first performance this sanguine writer evaluates as "a significant evening for Leipzig, probably for the entire history of opera."

6

The "Kleine Symphonie" ("Little Symphony") Opus 58, which Mr. Burgin, in the absence of Dr. Koussevitzky, will conduct on Friday and Saturday, Dr. Weissman, at the time of its first performance under Klemperer in Berlin, December, 1928, spoke of as "eine Nachgeburt des Jonny" (literally "an after-birth of Johnny"). The writer hailed the piece as "a neat, graceful little work." It is in three movements, the first preceded by an introduction: I. Andante sostenuto—Allegro energico; II. Andantino (poco lento); III. Allegretto, poco grave. Dates in the score are interesting and perhaps instructive. Under the first measure is written, "Paris, 8, 5, 28." Under the last measure of the first movement, "Paris, 8, 6, 28." At the end of the second movement, "Ascona (Ticina) 28, 6, 28." And at the end, "Zurich—Wien, 30, 6, 1928." From such data those so inclined could probably draw dogmatic statements as to Krenek's methods of composition.

The scoring of this little work calls for an orchestra such as has probably never before been assembled in Symphony Hall: two flutes, three clarinets (B-flat, E-flat and bass clarinet), two bassoons (one alternating with double bassoon), three trumpets ,two trombines and one tuba, harp, two mandolins, two banjos, one guitar, kettle-drum, three varieties of small drum, bass drum, cymbals, first and second violins and double basses. Apparently the battery of plucked instruments is intended to replace violas and 'cellos.

The forms are in miniature the conventional forms of the symphony. The first is a sonata-form, the second a three-part song-form, the last a rondo. After the introduction the main theme is of march-like character, in A minor. The second, moving chiefly in half-notes in first violins, is in E major. The second movement, in 7-8 and other irregular meters, has for its principal subject a graceful theme given to a clarinet. While the principal theme of the last is given to a bassoon with flutes and strings for the contrast sections. Writing to Mr. Gilman for the program-book of the New York Philharmonic-Symphony Society, when this work was produced by this orchestra Nov. 6, 1930, under Kleiber, Krenek said of the rondo: "The themes are strung together potpourri fashion, and are bound organically only by the obstinate tango rhythm. This technique offers many opportunities to the composer. The last movement, like the closing section of the first, is tinged with the characteristics of the modern dance—though not, however, with any parodistic intention. The 'Tango' idea plays in my symphony a rôle no more or less important than the Minuet in the classical symphony."

A. H. M.

BOSTON SYMPHONY IN MONDAY EVE CONCERT

Large Audience Attends Opening of Series

Globe 11 Nov.

The Monday evening series of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra began last evening. For this concert Dr Koussevitzky played two Bach preludes arranged for string orchestra by Pick-Mangiagalli: Respighi's "Metamorphoseon, Modi XII" (theme and variations), and Beethoven's Seventh Symphony in A major.

Dr Koussevitzky received great applause upon his first appearance, applause given to a familiar and well-liked figure after an absence of several months.

There was but one "familiar" number on the program. The Pick-Mangiagalli arrangement of the Bach preludes was heard for the first time anywhere at the second pair of regular subscription concerts this Fall. The Respighi piece was first played at the subscription concerts of last week.

The juxtaposition of the first two pieces aroused in one listener various thoughts. While no doubt the bone of contention regarding the artistic merits of transcription and other treatment of Bach music wil be argued indefinitely, there was the firm impression that Pick-Mangiagalli, however great the liberties he may have thus taken, did his arranging with great fidelity to the spirit of Bach.

Both preludes in their modern orchestral dress retained the character and spirit of Bach and were not distorted unrecognizably. One found more than a little admiration for them.

On the other hand, the same admiration and warmth were not aroused for the Respighi theme and variations. The theme, regardless of quality, is pleasant enough. The variations, also regardless of artistic merit, are not so pleasant. The nervous, strained, and straining atmosphere which seems to envelope the "Modi" did little to one person, but arouse a certain irritation, and conscious resistance against them. The self-consciousness of the orchestration, its constantly changing effects, spoke of a restlessness and dissatisfaction on the part of the creator, whether or not such feelings were actually experienced by him.

But a fine and heartfelt performance of the Beethoven symphony dispelled the taut, highly charged atmosphere of the variations. Reservations were held against Dr Koussevitzky's tempo in the Allegretto, but the conventional treatment of this movement seems to be a too retarded and dragging pace. But conductor and orchestra were at one in Beethoven of lusty good humor, and their feelings were also those of the audience, to judge from the applause.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is giving an unusual number of Boston concerts this week. It plays at Symphony Hall tomorrow night, Wednesday and Thursday afternoons, for young people, as well as the regular concerts of Friday and Saturday. Most of the tickets for the young people's concerts have been distributed through the schools of Boston and vicinity. A block of seats has been reserved for others wishing to take their children, and sold at the box office. Adults not accompanied by children are not admitted to these concerts.

Dr Koussevitzky's programs in the regular series this season have so far each included one of the new works commissioned for the 50th anniversary. This week the novelty is a symphony by Prokofieff, his fourth, written especially for the Boston Symphony, and accordingly to be played for the first time anywhere. The clarinet concerto of Mozart, postponed from last week, is again announced. At the moment of writing there is some doubt whether Mozart's "Magic Flute" overture or a set of dances by Mozart will finally be chosen. All programs made by Dr Koussevitzky are subject to change up to the last moment.

6 Nov 27 5

TRANS DEC. 10

Dec 10

Dr. Koussevitzky is going on well and will be ready for work again at the supplementary Symphony Concert on Monday evening of next week. . . . By telephonic inadvertence, a new program for the Symphony Concert at Harvard tomorrow was announced in this place. To the contrary, Mozart's Overture to "The Magic Flute"; his Symphony in G minor; Brahms's Second Symphony, will be played as originally proposed, but with Mr. Burgin conducting.

62

Herald — Nov. 11

SYMPHONY CONCERT

The Monday Symphony Series opened last night with the following program: Two Preludes of Bach arranged for String Orchestra by Pick-Mangiagalli; Metamorphoseon, Modi • XIII (Theme and Variations), composed for the 50th anniversary of the Boston Symphony Orchestra by Ottorino Respighi; Beethoven's Seventh Symphony, in A Major.

Dr. Koussevitsky was given a warm reception by the audience, most of whom were in their seats before the concert began, ready and eager for music.

The orchestra's playing of the two Bach preludes, arranged beautifully by Pick-Mangiagalli, was exceedingly brilliant; the violins played with wonderful unity and flexibility the one of the preludes which is often heard as a violin solo in concert halls, so difficult and dazzling it is. The slower of the two preludes was played with a great richness of tone and beauty of phrasing. Respighi's Metamorphoseon sounds best when heard from the part of the hall nearest the stage, for they gather glamor from constantly-renewed percussive waves of color from the instruments. From some distance, when the deceptive vibrations have been dissipated, the music seems a trifle thin and repetitious. Beethoven's Seventh was given the vigorous and sensitive reading Dr. Koussevitsky has taught his audiences to expect—a strong, well-molded, moving interpretation. E. B.

FIRST MONDAY NIGHT CONCERT

Symphony Plays Two of Newest Pieces

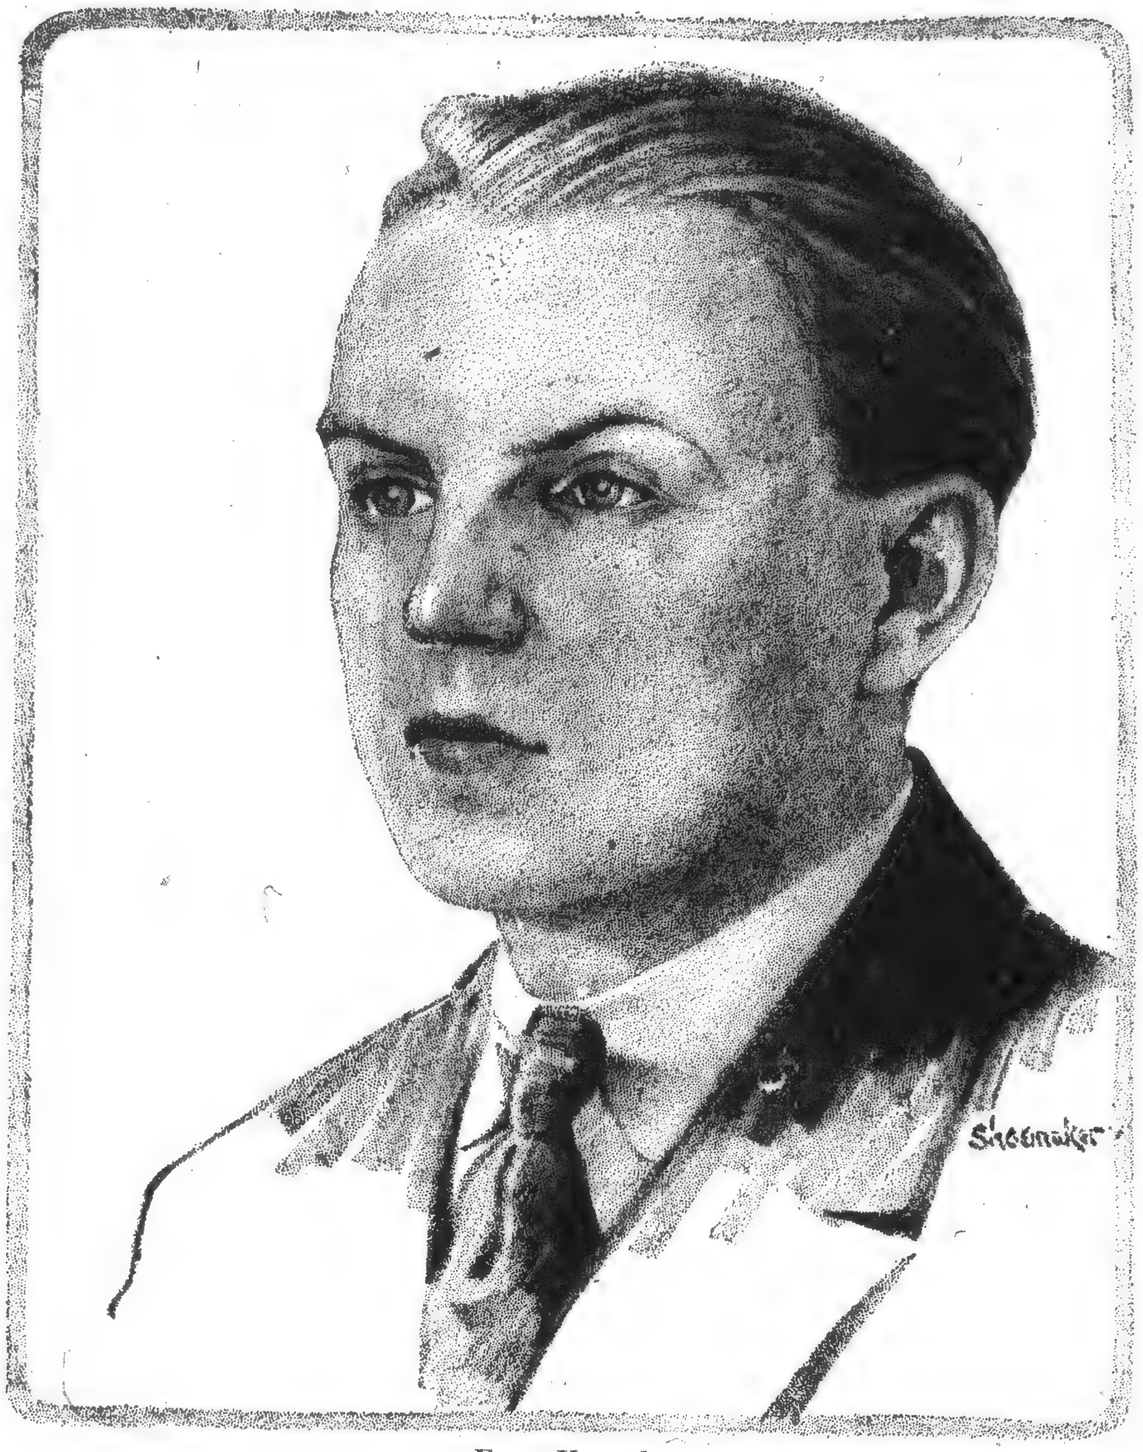
Post — Nov. 11

The audience of the first of the Monday evening Symphony Concerts heard last night in Symphony Hall two of the pieces which Dr. Koussevitzky has this year introduced to Boston, Pick-Mangiagalli's arrangement of a pair of Bach Preludes and Respighi's theme with its 12 variations that he calls "Metamorphoseon." The Seventh Symphony of Beethoven, completing the programme, brought the leaven of the familiar.

As at the pair of regular concerts at which they were first made known, Pick-Mangiagalli's ingenious and felicitous transcriptions of the music of Bach gave much pleasure, and the audience likewise received warmly Beethoven's Symphony in the individual but effective version of Dr. Koussevitzky that has more than once been heard in Boston. And Respighi's Variations, that many on Friday and Saturday found unduly long and here and there not too interesting, seemed greatly to delight the audience of last evening, which applauded the piece far more heartily than did the company of Friday afternoon or of Saturday evening.

Players --- Music and Musicians

The Lad With an Innocent Air



Ernst Krenek

Modernist Composer Introduced to Boston This Afternoon at the Symphony Concerts

With Mr. Burgin Filling the Breach

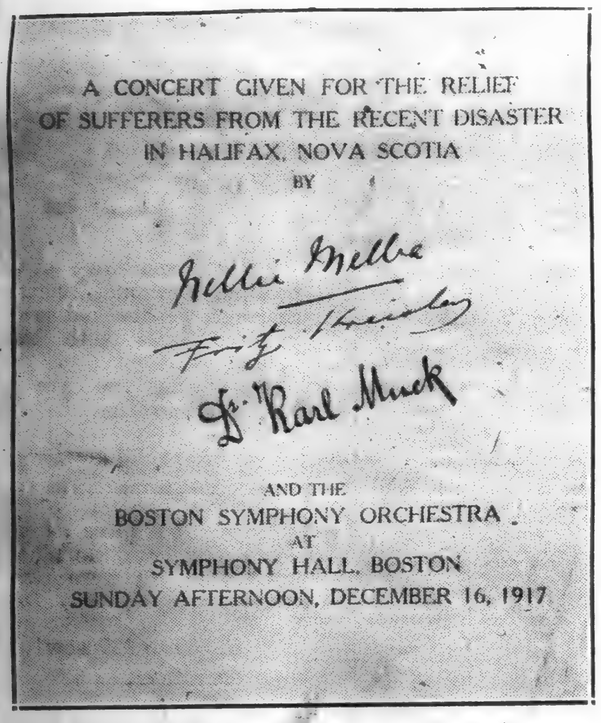
A LEAFLET inserted in the program book for the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Sanders Theater at Harvard last evening read: "On account of the illness of Dr. Koussevitzky, Richard Burgin will conduct this concert." No doubt there was general speculation whether the orchestra would sound its usual self during Dr. Koussevitzky's absence. Reassurance was quickly forthcoming, as well as confirmation of Mr. W. J. Henderson's recently published remarks that performances are determined by rehearsals and not by the sudden inspiration of conductors at concert time. Mr. Burgin kept the performance well in hand and in every way led the musicians with credit to himself. Just before intermission time, the clapping was so vigorous that he deputy conductor returned to the tage and called the musicians to their eet. Enthusiasm ran still higher at the lose of the program; Mr. Burgin twice esponded. It was pleasing to think that clapping Mr. Burgin for his capable ervice in an emergency, one was likewise applauding Dr. Koussevitzky, who, with Mr. Burgin's assistance among the violins, had set the quality of performance some time ago in numerous rehearsals. Nor should the fine esprit de corps of the musicians go unnoticed.

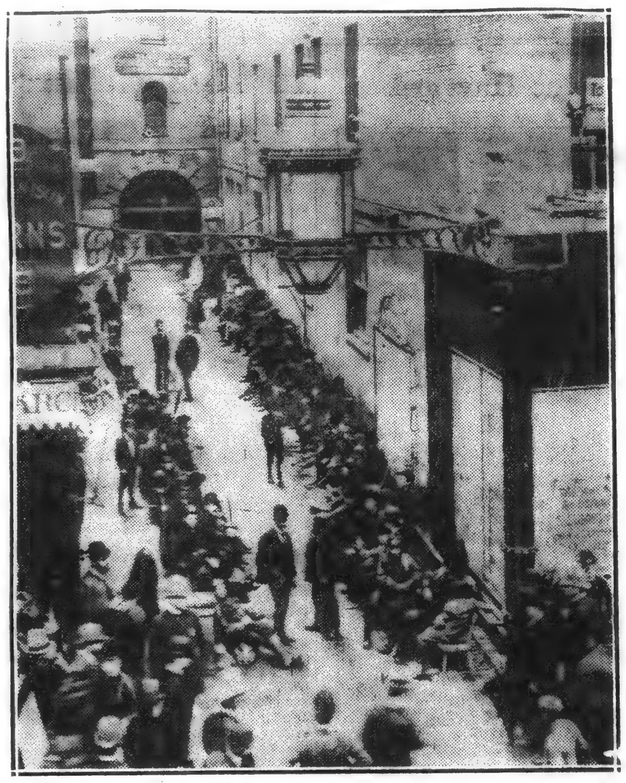
The program, comprising but three pieces, was entirely from conservative repertory: The Overture to Mozart's opera, "The Magic Flute," the Symphony in G Minor by the same composer, and the Symphony in D Major of Brahms. Mozart's Overture was well placed, appearing as an excellent prelude to the other two pieces. Terse, compact and compelling in its interplay of fugal counterpoint and prophetic horn chords, it promised a continuation of the same vein. Just as the overture to an opera may come more quickly to the point than the drama immediately succeeding, however, so this overture to "The Magic Flute" gave more concise utterance than the following symphony. It was, in fact, Mozart reaching forward to and, in the main, actually attaining a style of composition in advance of that which was his familiar wont. The listener could almost perceive present-day pith and sinew thrusting its way through Mozartean elegance.

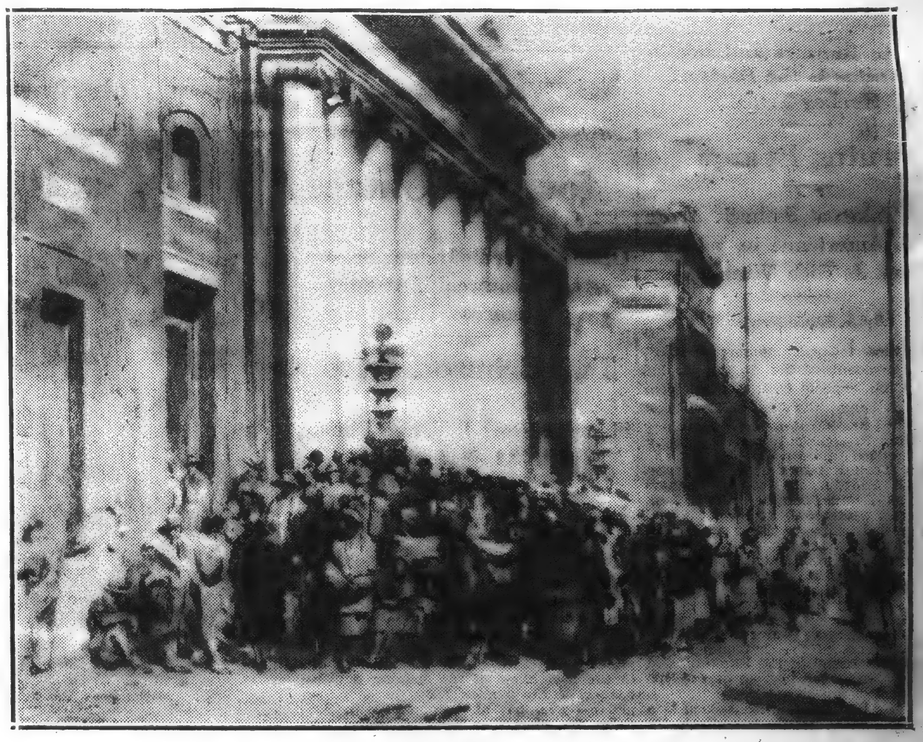
As for performance, Mr. Burgin and the musicians had not yet settled into their task; emphasing the prelude-like character of this opening piece, they quickly passed to the Symphony. Here, with the exception of an exceedingly slow Andante, the orchestra excelled in the fine-spun tones and clean-edged attacks which make its performance of Mozart's symphonies so distinguished. With the opening Allegro, Mr. Burgin held the exact pace and carefully knit the details of design. In this movement, Mozart was again his usual self, expressing in clear tone and balanced figure a well-ordered though slightly melancholy contentment. The Andante—not the most beautiful of Mozart's slow movements, in the first place—dragged upon the rest of the Symphony. Sensing this effect at the close of the movement, Mr. Burgin was impatient to continue with the Minuet, in the trio of which the play of woodwinds against the answering strings was exceedingly fine. The final movement went fleet and sure. At the beginning of the Second Symphony of Brahms, one could feel the audience settling down for the solid comfort of a favorite piece. The musicians played it with their familiar devotion. Perhaps the opening movement was attacked with some indecision, but the quick summing up of the final measures was deftly executed. In the closing movement, the bursting sonorities which produced such a hearty round of clapping seemed over-strained. Yet Mr. Burgin should wear a special feather in his cap for his reading of the Adagio. Having an intimate acquaintance with the strings and knowing all their possibilities, he drew from them a performance that was at once eloquent and noble.

N. M. J.

The Symphony Orchestra Sets Up a Temporary Museum of Its Own







Opening This Afternoon in Symphony Hall of Its Rare Collection of Memorabilia

At the intermission in the Symphony Concert this afternoon so many of the audience as wander the corridors will discover a strange, new thing in Symphony Hall—a memorial exhibition. It is hung upon the walls and distributed through cases in the rectangular room on the back of the first balcony along Huntington Avenue. There, during The Pops, one may eat or, if one has the taste for them, absorb the sugary drinks of intemperate prohibition. Now the room wears another aspect. It is brightly lighted; there is space in which to walk about; while all around, to suit this jubilee year, are memorabilia from public and private collections, from the archives of Symphony Hall itself, to recall the fifty seasons that the Boston Symphony Orchestra is now celebrating.

Three paintings first catch the observing eye. In the center of one of the long walls, as in place of honor, hangs Sargent's portrait of Henry Lee Higginson, founder of the orchestra in 1881, sustainer of it thenceforth through 1916, Harvard University lent it to be [illegible] of the memorial exhibition. Not [illegible]ay is the little known picture by [illegible]anforth Page of the orchestra at [illegible]l in this Koussevitzkian day. The [illegible]r, in characteristic motion, may [illegible]overed in a tan-colored pull-over, [illegible]orning jacket flung aside at the edge [illegible] little platform. Under close in[illegible]tion, not a few members of the or[illegible] flight of [illegible] morning. Needless to say, most of them are feminine. Hence in frocks and hats, color.

Around the Walls

These three noted, the visitor may begin a tour of the four walls. Turning to the left, he sees newspaper-pages assembling photographs of the ancient instruments in the Casadesus Collection down the corridor. Or stringing together figures from the weekly pursuers of those same "rush seats." Next he encounters three familiar drawings—each characteristic—of Mr. Higginson. Then follow programs of the concert that opened the old Music Hall, down town, on Nov. 20, 1852, and the new Symphony Hall, up town, on Oct. 15, 1900. (Mr. Gericke conducting; "a report" from Mr. Higginson.) Further on, hang a photograph of the interior of the old Music Hall; another, reproduced on this page, of the "seat line" that, in September of 1889, waited through five days and five nights to be first comers at the ticket-window. The subsequent auctions indoors had not yet begun.

Next the inevitable array of photographs of the successive conductors: Henschel; Gericke, in both his terms; Nikisch; Paur; Muck variously; Fiedler; Rabaud; Monteux—a capital likeness; Koussevitzky. Along with them, their several orchestras on the stage assembled from the earliest times to the present day. Mr. Gericke a... his men may be observed in the old Music Hall, fringed by a meagre chorus. Or Dr. Muck stands before the far larger forces joined together for his performance of Bach's "Matthew Passion." Or Dr. Koussevitzky presents Dr. Davison, Mr. Woodworth and their Harvard-Radcliffe choirs to the audience at the end of the Beethoven Festival. Interlude is a photograph of the orchestra at ease on railroad tracks, its special train in the background, when it journeyed in 1915 to San Francisco for a series of concerts at the Panama-Pacific Exhibition.

Then digression. From the collection of Boaz Piller, bassoonist of the band, comes an amusing collection of German colored prints of orchestral players and their instruments, done in semi-caricature. From them we learn that "lady-harpists," as the polite English call them, are no recent addition to the orchestral ranks; that Mephistopheles, at will or need, could play upon the flute; while, beside him, a fat and saintly friar rumbles through the tuba.

Around the turn miscellaneously, the setting designed by Robert Edmond Jones for The Pops, first used last spring. Beyond, for new acquaintance, the aquiline features of L[illegible] Jones, designer long [illegible]miliar front-cov[illegible] of the [illegible]ward; Willy Hess and Anton Witek, also concert-masters; Georges Longy of the oboe; for supplement the Kneisel Quartet [illegible] its palmiest days. Then, in photographs, the guest-conductors bidden to the orchestra in recent years while Dr. Koussevitzky was on holiday. If they happen to be composers as well, they usually left behind, in the Piller collection, a few autographed measures. Prints and photographs disclose other composers, ancient, classic, modern, or of our own time, now and again with an autographed letter or a signed theme. Best is the shaggy, fat-bodied Brahms, shoulders squared, head thrown back, feet firmly planted as he plays the piano.

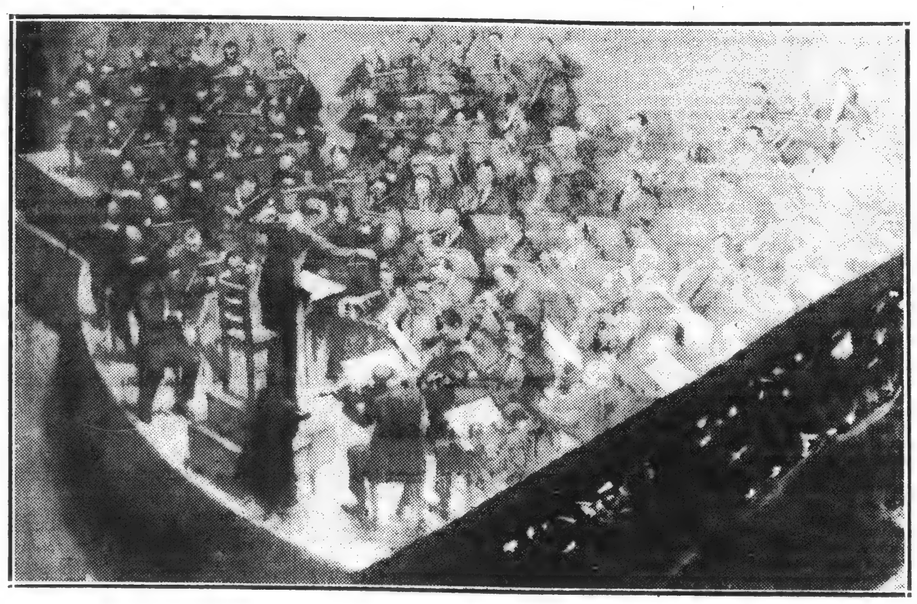
Among the Cases

So to the door again and down the center of the room to glance through the cased memorabilia. Under one glass are programs from the old Music Hall—of concerts by Patti, Nilsson, Theodore Thomas and his orchestra; von Bülow as pianist; the Harvard Musical Association whose orchestra preceded the Symphony; even of Rubinstein, playing for the last time in Boston. Along with them, the twenty small, thin sheets, printed in black and white, that were the "official program" through the first season of the orchestra. Hard by, two or three examples of the earlier tickets, one reproduced herewith. In little rectangles, the date of each concert bordered these cards. [illegible] doorkeepers punched them. Years [illegible] Companion-piec[illegible] with a player, recorded in [illegible] and ink on blue legal paper, signed by him and Mr. Higginson. Programs, as well, of concerts by Mr. Henschel and Lillian Bailey, his wife; of the Kneisel Quartet and other affiliated musical groups in the days when "the founder and sustainer" also fostered chamber music.

Next in the course, encased manuscripts of the "works" contributed by commissioned composers to the current jubilee—Roussel's and Prokoffiev's symphonies; Respighi's Variations; Mr. Hill's Ode—all four lately heard; Honegger's symphony and Copland's "Symphonic Ode" to come. Beyond, Koussevitzkiana—early photographs of a slender young man, playing the double bass or conducting at concerts in Russia; caricatures from Boston and New York as far as Madrid; programs of the festivals with which he has enriched our musical life. Singular above the rest, a record in German prose by Oskar Bie and in fine-lined drawings by Steri of Koussevitzky's voyage in steamer up and down the Volga, halting in city or town to give concerts by his "[illegible] orchestra" [illegible] ranged yesterday—a selec[illegible] teeming scrap-books in the archives. One is open at an amusing full-page picture in colors, printed by the Globe in 1892, representing the young ladies as they leave the old Music Hall. Another discloses a cartoon, from the dead-and-gone Beacon, of embarrassed comers to the Music Hall in search of a Symphony Concert, only to discover that a boxing match is in progress. Other pages are upturned at the interviews that heralded Nikisch, Muck and other conductors when they first descended upon Boston. If one has the time and the will, one may reread reviews of notable concerts; smile at yellowing sketches and caricatures; discover that there was once a brood of Saturday evening and Sunday morning newspapers in Boston that appeared o.. no other day. . . . Fifty years of the Symphony Orchestra around these walls and through these cases; fifty years as well of this little, neatly self-contained world, which is Boston.

H. T. P.

The Work That Wins



The Symphony Orchestra (1929) at Rehearsal

Dr. Koussevitzky is Leading in a Tan-Colored Pull-Over, His Jacket at the Foot of the Conductor's Stand From the Painting, Here Reproduced for the First Time, by Marie Danforth Page

Upper Left—Autographed Program of One of the Notable Concerts of the Symphony Orchestra when Disaster Came Upon a Neighboring Community

Upper Middle—The "Seat Line" that Waited through Five Days and Nights at the Old Music Hall in September, 1889, to Buy Tickets for the Symphony Concerts

Lower Middle—Tickets for the First Season, 1881-82, of the Symphony Concerts, with the Doorkeeper's Punches

Upper Right—The Crowd that Waits Every Friday Afternoon at the Present Symphony Hall to Rush the Unreserved Seats in the Second Balcony. From the Painting (1924) by Duane Haley

Lower Right—Caricature (1924) of Dr. Koussevitzky, Guest Conductor in Madrid. The Upper Inscription Reads: "My People and My Sovereigns Applauded You. Do not Forget that my Unschooled Philharmonic Orchestra Follows your Baton Soulfully and with Good Will—Admiring your Art, Madrid." The Lower Line Runs: "From the Worst of the Second Violins of the Orchestra to the Eminent Master, Koussevitzky."

(All Photographs by Warren Colby)

MUSIC

SYMPHONY CONCERT

BY PHILIP HALE

The eighth concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Dr. Koussevitzky was still suffering from a cold, but he will be able to conduct the Monday night, Saturday night and Friday afternoon concerts of next week. Yesterday Richard Burgin, the concert-master of the orchestra reigned in his stead. The program was as follows: Krenek, Little Symphony (first time in Boston), Mozart, concerto in A major for piano (Bruce Simonds, pianist) and ochestra, Sibelius, Symphony No. 1, E minor.

Krenek, of Czeckoslovakian origin, born in Vienna, a pupil of Schoenberg, and now living in Berlin is in his 31st year. A fertile composer, he is probably best known in this country by his opera "Jonny Spielt Auf," which has been performed at the Metropolitan in New York, by his "Symphonische Musik," and by chamber music. The symphony played yesterday, composed in 1928, was performed on Nov. 6th of this year at a concert in New York of the Philharmonic Symphony Society, led by Erich Kleiber, a guest.

This composer must be a humorist of the first water, for he wrote an analysis of the symphony with a gravity becoming any Herr Mueller whose pedestrian work was to be played in Eisleben or Plauen. Krenek speaks of his following the traditional sonata form, of basic tonalities, reprise, coda, song form, etc., so that any one not knowing him would expect what is eulogized by reactionaries as a "solid work," "well written," "sincere," "wholly worthy"—and prepare himself therefore for a boresome half-hour. Krenek surely slapped his thighs and beat his sides with laughter as he wrote these conventional lines about a most unconventional and delightful little work, composed much of it in the spirit of jazz, but at the same time displaying the technical equipment of a thoroughly grounded musician who has an unusual gift of invention, and true fancy that runs occasionally into the fantastic. Krenek also has a pleasing melodic streak in his musical nature; a feeling for beauty, shown not only in the slow movement. The composition of his orchestra is as uncommon as the music itself; but his choice of instruments is not alone for dance rhythms. His score calls for banjos, mandolins, guitar and harp for the suggestion of the dance; also for a "vibrating, rattling, metallic sound" that he desires; but with customary orchestral instruments, curiously grouped and used, he gains surprising, fascinating effects. Rossini in his latter years wrote a Mass that has many admirable pages, among them a double fugue constructed in a masterly manner. With characteristic irony he put on the title page "Petite Messe." Krenek speaks of his "little" symphony. The three movements are short, but the pleasure given by them is great. The audience yesterday felt with Athenaeus that music is not purposely, necessarily "educative"; that it should on occasion "dissipate sadness, produce affability and a sort of gentleman-like joy. Krenek's little work answers the definition of Athenaeus. The ladies and gentlemen of the congregation who sat in the pews of Symphony hall yesterday accepted the symphony and rejoiced in it; rejoiced and were not ashamed.

Mr. Burgin might have been a little more audacious in his interpretation of Krenek's work; even a little more reckless, for he could safely rely on the virtuosos on the stage; but the performance was exciting, and inspired the desire to hear the Symphony again and soon. His presentation of the great Symphony by Sibelius was most effective. He knows Sibelius, the man and the composer; he was for a time concert-master of the Helsingfors Symphony orchestra. It is not surprising, that yesterday he was charged with the spirit of Sibelius; the Sibelius of the earlier symphonic years. So great is Mr. Burgin's musical enthusiasm for this wild eloquence—the symphony is more than a "human document"; it is a bardic rhapsody on Finland's landscapes and sea-scapes, people and tragic history—that he communicated the intensity of his feeling to players who responded with gusto; to an audience that was moved deeply by the emotional outbursts of the composer.

Mr. Simonds played accurately and glibly Mozart's notes; he played with undeviating tonal monotony. For this performance without nuances in tempo or color, he was warmly applauded.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program of next week is thus announced: Mozart, Symphony, G minor. Stravinsky "Symphonie de Psaumes" for orchestra with chorus (the Cecilia trained by its conductor, Arthur Fiedler); Capriccio for piano (Mr. Sanroma), and orchestra. Repetition of the "Symphonie de Psaumes." Bach, Organ Fugue in E flat major, orchestrated by Schoenberg. Stravinsky's "Symphonie de Psaumes," written for the 50th anniversary of the orchestra, also his Capriccio will be performed for the first time in the United States. The former work will be performed in Brussels today.

GALES BATTER BRITISH SHIP

Considerable deck damage was sustained by the British steamer Arundale, Capt. Williams, on a voyage from Dunkirk which it completed yesterday. Leaving the French port Nov. 19 the ship, laden with 4000 tons of chalk ran into gales that swept the decks and necessitated heaving to on several occasions. A big sea flooded the fireroo and smashed a port lifeboat. The st was five days late reaching port.

Tomorrow and Yesterday at Symphony Hall

TRANS — Nov. 13

Prokoffiev's Jubilee Number, Eyes as Well as Ears at A Children's Matinee

THE contribution from the Russian composer, Serge Prokoffiev for the anniversary of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is a symphony that will be played at the concerts of Friday and Saturday. It is the composer's fourth symphony and stands in the key of C major. Within belief, it is not a work written merely to fulfill the demands of a "commission"; not entirely a "pièce d'occasion"; for the manuscript score at Symphony Hall bears the date and opus number, "Op. 47, 1929." If the work owes its inception entirely to the commission from Boston, that commission was given many months ago, and the composer must have set to work quickly and must have written with dispatch. It is easier to believe that he dedicated to the orchestra in its festival year a work already projected and perhaps partly completed. The new symphony shows no departures from orthodox form and but few departures from the practices of conventional orchestration. Students of orchestration, however, will be interested to discover that Prokoffiev's score follows those moderns who would do away with the bogey of transposing instruments: all his instruments are written in "C"—clarinets and horns included. It is not the first time, however, that Prokoffiev has so written.

Prokoffiev's harmonies, in the new symphony, follow paths already trodden, and characteristic of the composer. It is not to the precedent of the barbaric Scythian Suite or of "Sept, ils sont sept," that Prokoffiev here returns. Rather in the Classical Symphony, or better still, in portions of "Love for Three Oranges" may we look for the composer of this symphony. Dissonances there are, but not in such quantity as to dominate the style. The sharpest dissonances are used very sparingly, and then only to point vividly certain accents—as a Whistler might illuminate a canvas of grays by a single touch of red. There is considerable use of the characteristic device of modulating quickly through a series of comparatively unrelated keys, or of passing through a series of unrelated common major or minor chords, always emerging, in either case, in the key prevailing at the time.

His melodies are either surprisingly active and virile, or soothingly lyric—often child-like, almost naive. In either case they have a tendency of leaping into an unrelated key in the midst of a phrase, only to return with equal suddenness in the answering phrase. The texture of the music is in part highly contrapuntal (no dissonance is too sharp for the composer if it can serve in the natural conduct of a contrapuntal line), or goes to extremes of homophonic style. Accompaniment figures of the simple type sometimes called "Mozartean" are much in evidence. Often it assumes a slightness, a spareness akin to chamber-orchestra style. The rhythms are of the strong, aggressive type characteristic of both the composer and of the day in which he lives.

Prokoffiev's Symphony IV, in C major, Opus 47, begins with a slow introduction, Andante Assai. Proceeds through a sonata-formed Allegro Eroica, for first movement; the second is the usual slow movement, Andante tranquillo; a third movement, Moderato, sub-titled "Scherzoso," is in the un-scherzo-like meter of two-four, and the key of B minor; the fourth movement, Allegro risoluto, returns to C major.

The introduction is quiet and tranquil in mood. Flutes and clarinets sing the theme. The bass has a rhythmic motif from which the main theme of the symphony germinates. This highly energetic theme enters with the Allegro Eroica. The "bridge" is full of staccato-rhythmed passages, accented by sharp dissonances. As it draws near a close it diminishes to the exceedingly simple Mozartean accompaniment figures. These in turn serve as perfect introduction to the clear, fluid melody which is the second theme. It is sung by flute to simple string accompaniment, is followed at once by duet between clarinet and bass clarinet. The development is very energetic, full of active skips, highly accented, works chiefly the main theme. The recapitulation is regular. The Coda once more brings final working of the main theme.

In the second movement after four measures of a sort of misty introduction a flute sings a long sustained melody of eleven measures. Then comes the chief curiosity of the symphony. Bass tuba and contrabassoon sing an expressive melody by way of transition passage. The second theme enters expressively for clarinet solo, B major, three-two. Much of this material is then worked as in a development section. Both the first theme and the tuba theme receive attention. There are ominous chords in low trombones with kettle-drums. At the end there are slight reminiscences of the first movement. A recapitulation is much abridged. The first theme sings in strings briefly. A Larghetto merely hints, in clarinet, at the second theme.

A piquant theme in the oboe at once begins the "Scherzoso" movement. After some contrasting material it is repeated in strings. The main contrast, however, is also given to the oboe, "Meno Mosso," more songful in character, and vacillates between D major and F major. These two divisions alternate with each other much after the manner of a rondo.

The last movement, Allegro Risoluto, is the most extended of the four. A very vigorous and rapidly moving passage in eighth notes, taken in unison by strings and wood-winds, forms the chief theme. To that theme, which is much repeated, all else is subsidiary. The movement is the most energetic of the four, forming real climax to the symphony. Harmonically it is also the most daring, reminding more than the other three movements of the harmonic excesses of the decade which began during the World War. Occasionally its wildness, its abandon, suggest the Prokoffiev of an earlier period, say of the "Scythian Suite." Now and again it rises to fury such as only this twentieth century has been able to bring in music.

Rare Mozart

The week-end concerts list also a semi-novelty out of time, all but forgotten. The orchestra this year has a new clarinet soloist, Mr. V. Polatschek. At the coming concerts he will play Mozart's concerto for his chosen instrument. Only once has this concerto been heard at Symphony concerts—on March 29 and 30, 1918, when Mr. Sand was soloist and Mr. Schmitt conducted. Once previously in the history of the orchestra has there been a clarinet solo, when a Mr. Strasser was soloist in 1884. The score of the work bears the date Sept. 28, 1791, at Vienna. It was therefore written very shortly before the death of Mozart. Biographers affirm that it was written in a single day for a convivial friend of the composer who was a great clarinetist.

The concerto moves through the usual three movements: Allegro, Adagio, Rondo. It is Mozartean technic running its normal, pleasant course. There is the conventional form, the conventional tutti, the conventional solo passages. The clarinet has sufficient opportunities to display dexterity as well as the tone color of its several registers. Beyond which—well, it was a day's work for Mozart.

A. H. M.

Eyes and Ears

The frequenter of the Young People's Concerts of the Symphony Orchestra caught a new, perhaps a belated, impression yesterday afternoon at Symphony Hall—the interest of the children in the visualized action of conductor and players. From the little lad in the red pullover who sat only three or four rows from the stage to the fringe of boys and girls, still of tender years, in the upper balcony, the movements that made the music caught eyes before the music itself sounded in ears. The conductor, whether it was Dr. Koussevitzky or Mr. Burgin, engrossed the child in the pullover who gave his mother—as she doubtless told his father—"a trying afternoon." He saw, watched, remembered, until he could anticipate with his own hands the guiding motions.

More fastened upon the playing orchestra. Thirty-odd violinists, bowing as one through Pick-Mangiagalli's arrangement of a Prelude from Bach, were fascinating to see. The youngest made round eyes and lips when, at moments in Musorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition," Mr. Sidow hoisted his tuba and blew upon it lustily. The older lads and girls followed as closely Mr. Polatschek's fingers as they slipped up and down his clarinet in an Adagio from Mozart. Once more sight was the sense that theater or concert-hall touches quickest. These youngsters were as natural as could be—and they saw before they heard. The concert-orchestra, invisible behind a screen, is a vision of superfluous, dehumanized perfection.

To read the program was to mistrust it. Heard, it dispelled misgiving. In and out of the teens these juveniles feel rhythm, stir to sonority. Neither the one nor the other is salient trait of the Allegretto from Beethoven's Seventh Symphony or of the Adagio from Mozart's Concerto for Clarinet. Bach, as it seemed, was to save the day for these elder masters with the lively rhythms and the keen or the full string-tone of the transcribed Prelude (Vivace). To the contrary, the beauty of the instrumental song, the wonders of its course, through Beethoven's Allegretto caught these young ears—caught and held them. Similarly they heard, hushed, the liquid sweetness, the rounded fullness, of Mr. Polatschek's tone through Mozart's transparent measures.

Now and again the onlooker regrets that there are not more of the teens, and less of tenderer ages, at these children's concerts. But would sixteen be as susceptible as twelve to this music which has no other being than itself? In these days the orchestra at Symphony Hall hardly consists of gentlemen of leisure; while to a man they know the tricks of the trade. Through this Bach and Beethoven they might have made the appropriate motions. Instead—Dr. Koussevitzky pointing the way—they played to 2000 listening "kids" as they play to the taut connoisseurs of Saturday evenings. Nor was Mr. Polatschek merely testing himself before an audience. He can hardly be a more marvellous clarinetist tomorrow than he was to the children.

Only Mr. Meyer, as guide to the young idea, was in difficulty with these numbers. What is there to say, for youngsters to grasp on the instant, about a Prelude of Bach, a clarinet-concerto, or Beethoven's Allegretto? Next to nothing. And for pictures? Only Bach's head or Mozart's or the frowning Ludwig's, along with violins, clarinets and such like. Mr. Meyer's turn came with the second half of the program and Mr. Burgin on the conductor's stand—gnomes and chicks and big-wheeled peasant-carts for the numbers from Musorgsky's "Pictures": the Diaghilev Ballet, in full fettle, for the Tartar Dances from "Prince Igor."

Borodin would obviously excite the children; what with melodies, rhythms, native wildness and savagery galore. He surely did. The six pictures, chosen from Musorgsky's series according to Ravel, might evade the young audience—the reviewer said to himself. They required too much programmatic background. But he forgot the rhythm which is their life and soul. Not for nothing did Mr. Burgin turn the lumbering wheels and sound the folk-song of "Bydlo," or set the chicks teetering out of their shells, ballet-fashion. And when Mr. Ritter smote his drums or the brass flamed out for the Tartar Dances, the school-doctors, had they been present, might have counted faster heart-beats. . . . By all odds an amusing afternoon alike to apple cheeks and gray heads. Indeed, one little boy was so absorbed that he forgot to doff his cap. An understanding teacher let it stay.

H. T. P.

Items of the Day

There will be no Symphony Concerts next week when Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra carry to New York no less than four symphonies—Roussel's and Brahms's Second on one program; Nabokov's and Chaikovsky's Fourth on the other. . . . At the next pair of concerts at home, on Nov. 28 and 29, Mr. Hanson's new "Romantic Symphony" will be heard and Mr. Gieseking, the pianist, will join the orchestra in Beethoven's "Emperor" Concerto. "Bolero," too, will be played once more.

There is one defender of Mr. Respighi's berated "Metamorphoseon"—the librarian of the orchestra, who spent hours in the correction of the manuscript parts. He cannot say too much for the musicianly scholarship, the command of orchestral resource and instrumental invention that such scrutiny disclosed. He admits that he is a solitary champion. And what if these paper-virtues failed to sound out of public performance? First of all music is written to be heard.

Between Families

Serge Prokoffiev—From The Drawing by Stravinsky's Son

The Composer's New Symphony, Written for the Jubilee of the Boston Orchestra, Will Be Played at the Symphony Concerts Tomorrow and Saturday

Musicians --- The Sc

The New Master

Victor Polatschek (Horner)

Clarinetist, from Vienna to the Symphony Orchestra, to Be Heard as Soloist at the Concerts of Tomorrow and Saturday

BURGIN CONDUCTS SYMPHONY CONCERT

Bruce Simonds Soloist in Mozart Concerto

First Performance in Boston of Krenek's "Little Symphony"

Globe Dec. 13

Dr Koussevitzky has a cold, and after the fatigue of the Beethoven Festival in Washington last week, felt obliged to turn over the conducting of this week's Symphony concerts in Cambridge and Boston to Richard Burgin, concert master of the orchestra. The two new works by Stravinsky, announced for yesterday, have been postponed till next week. Mr Burgin's program began with Ernest Krenek's "Little Symphony," and included a Mozart piano concerto, in A major and Sibelius' First Symphony.

The program books yesterday included a slip announcing that an exhibition of pictures, music, programs, and other relics of the 50 years of the Boston Symphony is on display in Huntington-av foyer off the first balcony. This exhibition includes a number of interesting photographs, letters of many celebrated musicians, and the portrait of Maj Higginson by Sargent which ordinarily hangs in the Harvard Union. It was thronged yesterday.

Krenek is chiefly known in America by his opera "Jonny spielt auf," produced by the Metropolitan Opera in New York two seasons ago. He was born in 1900 and was a pupil of Schreker. The "Little Symphony" played yesterday is his opus 58.

For Small Orchestra

Like so many of the younger generation of composers, Krenek has definitely broken with the 19th century, and gone back to a style recalling music of the 18th century. This symphony is for small orchestra, ingeniously scored to emphasize percussive and rhythmic effects rather than either sonority or volume of tone. Its form is consciously orthodox. Its mood has none of the sentiment, none of the moral earnestness, none of the striving for epic breadth of 19th century German music. Krenek recalls neither Beethoven nor Wagner, but rather the lighter, more cynical, more impudent writers of the 18th century in Italy. His one aim is to make his music sprightly and entertaining. With all his ingenuity he fails to achieve it except at moments, unless yesterday's performance belied him. Of other composers known here, this symphony can most obviously be compared with some of the work of Hindemith and of Prokofieff. It is more correctly written, according to text book standards, but that is probably because Krenek cannot quite forget all that he undoubtedly learned in his student days about counterpoint in the manner of Reger.

Mr Burgin was warmly applauded by orchestra and audience. In Sibelius' symphony he gave a performance which was not merely intelligent and sympathetic, but full of the dramatic quality the eloquence of which famous orchestral conductors have no monopoly. His reading of this familiar work, and the orchestra's eager cooperation, brought about a performance that deserves to be described as memorable. Mr Burgin's conducting has steadily improved as opportunities have offered. He is now much more than a mere substitute filling an unexpectedly vacant place, as he was when he first conducted the Boston Symphony some years ago.

Bruce Simonds Plays

Bruce Simonds, a young American pianist known to Jordan Hall audiences from several recitals there, repeated the Mozart concerto he had given Thursday night in Cambridge. His performance, though competent enough, lacked distinction of musical style. Mozart is, of course, the most difficult of all composers to play really well. Celebrities far greater than Mr Simonds have failed, as he failed yesterday, to do more than play the notes about as written. The requisite nuances of melody and rhythm eluded him. Mr Burgin, obviously nervous about the difficult task of leading an orchestral accompaniment, was also not at his best in this concerto.

Next week Dr Koussevitzky plans to conduct the first public performances of Stravinsky's new "Symphony of Psalms," Stravinsky Cappriccio for piano, and Mozart's G minor symphony and Bach's fugue in E flat, orchestrated by Schoenberg. The Cecilia Society chorus will assist the orchestra.

P. R.

LITTLE AND BIG WORK BY SYMPHONY

Post Dec. 13

Krenek's Banjo Piece and Sibelius' First Played

Dec 13

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

For Dr. Koussevitzky, indisposed, so it is said, as the result of his struggles with an ill-trained chorus at the recent Beethoven Festval in Washington, there can be only sympathy and hope for a speedy recovery. Yet the Symphony concert, led by Richard Burgin, yesterday, was one that for the moment amply satisfied, one indeed that could ill have been spared.

SIBELIUS' FIRST

There was yesterday the Little Symphony of Ernest Krenek of "Jonny Spielt Auf" fame, that as a representative work of a much-talked-of composer deserved a hearing in Symphony Hall. There was the second of Mozart's two piano concertos in A major, delightfully played by Bruce Simonds and delightfully accompanied by Mr. Burgin and the orchestra. And there was, for fitting climax to an enjoyable afternoon and in a performance that did full justice to the music, a masterpiece from the hand of one of the few truly vital figures among living composers, the First Symphony of Sibelius.

Krenek's Little Symphony, written in May and June of 1928 when the prolific composer of the most celebrated of jazz operas, was still in his 29th year, is symptomatic of the tendency on the part of many of the Central European music-makers to treat their art not seriously but flippantly and perhaps a shade contemptuously.

Banjos and Mandolins

Krenek writes for a small orchestra from which violas and 'cellos are absent, their places filled by two mandolins, two banjos and a guitar. The first of the three movements is clever, ingenious, original in ideas and in treatment, although the jazz at the end of it seems impertinent and obtrusive, distracting if diverting, amusing yet annoying. The second movement is one of conscious simplicity, not without charm and a personal flavor and distinguished by curious effects in instrumentation.

The Finale, in Tango rhythm, with its liberal use of plucked and pulsatile instruments, aims merely to entertain, and if one be not too highbrow, too jealous of the traditional dignity of symphony concerts, fulfills its mission.

Power and Beauty

But what a rebuke to the fooleries and superficialities of Krenek were the burning sincerities, the passionate utterance, the might and power, the beauty and pathos, of Sibelius' Symphony, written before young men were world-weary and disillusioned. It would be interesting to come back in 50 years and see how the first two symphonies of the Finn have fared in comparison with the more individual but for most of us less forcefully appealing Sixth and Seventh. Incidentally, is it not high time that the Fourth was heard again in Symphony Hall?

Yesterday's audience welcomed this puissant First Symphony gladly and heartily, and applauded until Mr. Burgin bade the players, who throughout the afternoon had given him notable co-operation, rise and bow.

SYMPHONY CONCERT FOR YOUNG PEOPL

Globe Dec. 13

The Boston Symphony Orchestr gave yesterday at 4 in Symphony Ha the first of its annual concerts f young people. The program include a Bach prelude, arranged by Pic Mangiagalli; the allegretto fro Beethoven's Seventh Symphony; t adagio from Mozart's clarinet concert several numbers from Musorgsky "Pictures at an Exhibition," orche trated by Ravel, and the familia dances from Borodin's "Prince Igor."

Dr Koussevitzky conducted t Bach, Mozart and Beethoven. Rich and Burgin conducted the Musorgsk and Borodin numbers. The clarine soloist was Victor Polatschek, the ne first clarinet of the orchestra, who wi play the whole Mozart concerto which one movement was heard ye terday, at the regular subscriptio concerts this week.

Alfred H. Meyer again showed stereopticon slides illustrative of the pieces played, and made brief informal comments, which held the attention of an audience that filled the hall.

This program, which will be repeated today at 4, was well chosen to introduce youthful listeners to the orchestral repertory. It avoided the trivial and the ponderous alike, offering only things likely to delight relatively inexperienced listeners, and yet never condescending to what is miscalled "popular" taste.

DEATHS

BOSTON HERALD, THURSDAY, NOVEMBER 13, 1930

GUESTS AT COLLEGE DINNER IN STATLER BALLROOM

Mrs. Lindbergh is at the centre of the table, facing the camera, at her right is Serge Koussevitsky, leader of the Boston Symphony orchestra; at her left, Eliot Wadsworth. Continuing around the table, from Mr. Wadsworth, Mrs. B. Loring Young, Henry B. Sawyer, Mrs. Koussevitsky, Col. Lindbergh, with back to the camera, Mrs. Wadsworth, Maj.-Gen. Connor and Mrs. Sawyer.

Col. and Mrs. Charles Lindbergh abandon their usual flying togs for formal evening attire. They made a surprise flight to Boston to attend the dinner.

Lindberghs Fly to Boston for Dinner; Colonel Denies He Is Foe of Press

Just before dusk last night Col. and Mrs. Charles A. Lindbergh swooped down on the Boston airport unannounced. They came to attend the dinner at the Statler Hotel at which Col. Lindbergh's illustrious father-in-law, Senator-elect Dwight W. Morrow, was the principal speaker.

As they taxied Mrs. Lindbergh's biplane to the Curtiss-Wright hangar they were greeted by Manager Fred Copeland. The Lindberghs were transported to Boston by taxi, the astonished driver being Philip Landino of East Boston. They went immediately to the Ritz-Carlton Hotel.

Just before they left to attend the dinner given in the Statler Hotel by alumnae of seven women's colleges, an interview was granted to newspaper men at the Ritz-Carlton.

Smilingly Col. Lindbergh denied that he disliked newspaper men and said that some of them are his best friends.

"We are just here for a visit," said the colonel as he introduced Mrs. Lindbergh to the press.

When asked whether he was interested in the political situation he said that every American is interested in his government.

When Mrs. Lindbergh said that this is not her first trip to Boston the colonel reminded her that it is the first time she has flown here. "But we've passed over several times on our way to Maine," she said.

A large crowd, attracted by a large group of cameramen outside the Ritz-Carlton Hotel, had a glimpse of Col. Lindbergh and his wife attired in formal clothes rather than flying togs. The Lindberghs will take off from Boston airport for home this morning about 9:30 o'clock.

BOSTON HERALD, THU

Nov. 13

MU

YOUNG PEOPLE'S CONCERT

Dr. Koussevitzky and Mr. Richard Burgin divided the honors at the Young People's concert yesterday afternoon. The program was as follows: Bach-Pick-Mangiagalli, prelude for string orchestra; Beethoven, allegretto from the Seventh Symphony; Mozart, adagio from the Concerto for Clarinet with Victor Polatschek, soloist; Moussorgsky-Ravel, "Pictures at an Exhibition"; Bowdin, Polovetzkian dances from the opera "Prince Igor." There were explanations with stereopticon slides by Mr. Alfred H. Meyer. Dr. Koussevitzky conducted the first three numbers; Mr. Burgin the other two.

The conductors as well as the orchestra were very fortunate in having an audience sufficiently unsophisticated to react naturally to the music they heard. The silence while the music was played was wonderful to behold in children. Some even dared to assist Dr. Koussevitzky in conducting, but unfortunately were quickly suppressed by their escorts, who really were vandals at this concert and only admitted if a child brought them along.

The program was attentively and respectfully listened to through the Mozart, but enthusiasm did not break loose until the Moussorgsky suite was played. The gnome was received as a kindred spirit; the rumbling and creaking of the Polish cart brought forth a heartfelt burst of applause. Over the Ballet of the Chicks in their shells one felt a slight controversy. To some this ballet seemed quite the proper thing; others were a little skeptical over it, yet not enough so to prevent smiling. Needless to say the instruments of percussion were considered the most fascinating in the orchestra. Though Mr. Polatschek's exquisite phrasing was appreciated, it was the roll of a drum that brought excitement to its zenith.

Mr. Meyer's apt remarks and interesting pictures added much to the enjoyment of the audience, though a more personal and imaginative attitude might have aroused his young listeners to a more attentive response. His mere mention of Dr. Koussevitzky's name was met with a spontaneous outburst.

The program will be repeated this afternoon.

L. B. D.

66

AND MUSICIANS

Globe Dec. 14

Boston Orchestra Praised

Henry Prunieres, well-known French critic of music, has written for the New York Times his impressions of four American orchestras, which he heard on a recent visit to this country. He says that all four are better than the Berlin Philharmonic, which he thinks is now the best in Europe. And of the four he inclines to prefer the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

This testimony from an impartial foreign critic of high standing would justify any claim local pride in our orchestra may make. According to M Prunieres, the Boston Symphony is today the best orchestra in the world. What would he have said of the old Boston Symphony under Dr Muck, which by common consent of all who remember it surpassed the present orchestra

M Prunieres is editor of the leading serious magazine in France devoted to music, the Revue Musicale. His point of view is not that of the popular journalist, nor does it appear that he aims to flatter Americans. As he says, the presence in the Boston Symphony of 38 Frenchmen suffices to prove that Paris could have just as good an orchestra as Boston has today if anyone in Paris were prepared to spend the necessary large sum of money. The $100,000 annual deficit of the Boston Symphony would look almost astronomical if counted in French francs.

Excerpts from M Prunieres' article, published by the New York Times Dec 7 follow:

"I am quite sure that if the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra, which is the best in Europe, in my opinion, were to visit America, it would be adjudged as being in the fifth or sixth rank, certainly below that of the Chicago Symphony Orchestra, which seems to me to be inferior to those in Boston, Philadelphia and New York.

Boston Orchestra Preferred

"Which American orchestra is to be ranked the first? I find it difficult to choose among such orchestras as those in New York, Boston and Philadelphia. When Toscanini stands before the New York orchestra the result seems to be an absolute perfection. When he is replaced, even by such a great conductor as Erich Kleiber, whose worth, as I see it, was not sufficiently recognized in New York, the qualities of certain of the solo instruments may be criticized.

"At Boston and Philadelphia, despite every effort, I have been unable to discern a weak point in the composition of the orchestras. If my preferences should incline toward Boston, it is because the quartet there appeared to me to possess a sonority more glowing than even that in Philadelphia. There are simply nuances to differentiate these three orchestras, which deserve to be classed and proclaimed equally the best in the whole world.

"Serge Koussevitzky is very popular in Paris, where we are grateful to him for some magnificent concerts which he has given here, and for all the great new works which he has introduced. No other conductor has done so much for modern music in France as Mr Koussevitzky, I am happy to see that he continues along these lines in the United States, for it is due to his initiative that the Boston Symphony Orchestra has commissioned some new works for its 50th anniversary by the best contemporaneous composers, and has brought into existence symphonies by Stravinsky, Prokofieff, Albert Roussel, etc.

"Koussevitzky is a great conductor, and I was enthusiastic when I heard him conduct Albert Roussel's Third symphony, Debussy's "La Mer" and excerpts by Rameau. To judge him, one must hear him at the head of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. May we have this pleasure soon in France!"

Music Notes and Comment

Dr Koussevitzky has postponed until the Symphony concerts of this week the first performances of Stravinsky's new "Symphonie des Psaumes" and Capriccio for piano originally announced for last week.

The soloist at the Monday Symphony concert tomorrow night will be Anton Witek, who was for several years concert master of the Boston Symphony under Dr Muck. Mr Witek, who returned to America last season, now lives and teaches in New York. The program, altered from that first announced, retains Mozart's A major concerto for Mr Witek, and Brahms' Second Symphony. The concert will begin with Handel's concerto grosso in B minor. It is announced from Symphony Hall that Dr Koussevitzky, who did not conduct the regular series concerts last week owing to a slight indisposition, will conduct the Monday concert.

OLD MUSIC DOMINATES SYMPHONY

Rimsky's Caprice Puts Prokofieff's Work in Shade

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

For a time the rich-toned and inspiring performance of Rimsky-Korsakov's Spanish Caprice that ended the Symphony Concert of yesterday afternoon effaced all recollection of what had gone before, of Mozart's Overture to "The Magic Flute,' neatly handled by a diminished orchestra; of that same composers' Clarinet Concerto, with the accomplished Mr. Polatschek as the soloist, and of the New Fourth Symphony of Prokofieff, composed, it now goes almost without saying, for the 50th anniversary of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

MOZART FOR BEGINNINGS

When the excitements engendered by this gorgeous and compelling version of Rimsky's orchestral show-piece had sufficiently cooled, the listener did recall that Mozart's overture had been given a performance more than usually felicitous, thanks not a little to Dr. Koussevitzky's happy expedient of reducing the number of strings. He recalled, too, that Mr. Polatschek, the orchestra's new first clarinetist, had played with true Mozartian grace and finish, with sensitive phrasing and a tone beautifully controlled, his portion in the Concerto that Mozart in a single day wrote for a contemporary virtuoso, and also that the piece itself, unheard here for many years, is possessed of no small charm, that its Adagio, indeed, is Mozart in one of his rarer moods.

Yes, these things did come back to mind; but although Dr. Koussevitzky undoubtedly never intended it, the music of the elder Russian caused that of the younger to fade quite completely out of the mental picture. This Spanish Caprice was written two years before Prokofieff was born. The listener, wending his way homeward, wondered whether it would not be played and enjoyed long after not only Prokofieff himself, but his compositions too, have gone the way of all the world.

Made to Order Music

We listen as appreciatively as we may to the music of our own day. We have our enthusiasm for this or that school, for this or that composer. But ever and anon there arises a doubt as to whether anything written by the men whom we of 1930 call modernists is endowed with the vitality that defies the years.

At any rate it takes no great courage to declare that Prokofieff's symphony of yesterday has not that quality. Here is a piece made, in a sense, to order, and bearing plainly the earmarks of an appointed task competently performed rather than those of music written out of some inner necessity.

Labor All Around

There are agreeable moments in the new symphony's slow division and again in the Scherzo, and the Finale ends with a vigor and bustle that yesterday elicited a round or two of applause. But the piece is, for Prokofieff, strangely lacking in physiognomy. The musical ideas are not salient; the treatment of them is seldom striking. To speak plainly, the net impression was one of labor; labor for the composer, labor for the players, and labor for the conductor. And then came Rimsky with his frank tunes and rhythms, his glowing orchestration to set that labor quite at naught.

Globe Nov 15

CLARINET SOLO AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Victor Polatschek Plays Mozart Concerto

Prokofieff's Fourth Symphony Is Performed for the First Time

For the first time in many seasons a concerto for clarinet was heard at yesterday's Symphony concert. The soloist was Victor Polatschek, first clarinet of the Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra from 1912 to 1929, now first clarinet of the Boston Symphony. Mr Polatschek in a Mozart concerto gave a performance that was wholly admirable, and deservedly much applauded. The program also included the first performance anywhere of Prokofieff's Fourth Symphony, opus 47, one of the works commissioned by the Boston Symphony for its current anniversary season.

Mozart's music is the severest of all possible tests of a performer's musicianship. Its melody and rhythm demand the utmost flexibility and subtlety of treatment. There is no possibility of covering up a defective technique or an imperfect sense of musical style by sheer volume of tone, or by any of the other well-worn artifices by which virtuoso players set audiences to clapping. One cannot hurry the climaxes, or exaggerate the pianissimi and fortissimi. One cannot be a "prima donna," on sensation bent, in Mozart's music.

Of First Rank

Mr Polatschek, trained under such conductors as Weingartner, Nikisch, Muck, Walter, Fuertangler and Richard Strauss, in an orchestra still by repute unsurpassed in Europe or America, and admirably gifted by nature, is a musician of the first rank. The sheer perfection of his playing in the adagio of yesterday's concerto was something beyond praise. It went to one's heart to hear a Mozart melody sung once more as such melodies should invariably be sung. An audience, to prone of recent years owing, perhaps, to circumstances beyond its control, to think of Mozart as a writer of tinkling trifles, was obviously deeply stirred.

The clarinet concerto, written out in a single day to oblige a celebrated player and planned to permit ample technical display, is music with a spontaneity, a beauty, that is perhaps a greater proof of Mozart's genius than are his ackonwledged masterpieces. The minor works of Beethoven and Wagner, and even Bach are often dull or tawdry. There are few dull pages in Mozart. All that he wrote has his personal stamp on it. Nearly all is beautiful.

Prokofieff's new symphony is a curiously pallid and dull work to come from the writer of the startling "Scythian Suite," and the deft and fluent "Classical Symphony," unless yesterday's performance failed to do it justice. There is a restless modulation from key to key, after the fashion that often grows annoying in the minor works of Cesar Franck. The scoring for the orchestra is gray and colorless, lacking in clarity and sonority. It was unkind of Dr Koussevitzky to follow Prokofieff's symphony by Rimsky-Korsakov's "Spanish Caprice," one of the best-written works for orchestra yet produced by anyone. But Debussy, Ravel or Stravinsky would have shown up Prokofieff equally clearly if thus juxtaposed. Their woodwind, in particular, would eclipse his.

The only interesting thing about this symphony is the rhythmic groups and contrasting rhythms. One got very weary of 2-4 and 4-4, however, as the music progressed. Perhaps Prokofieff meant his music to win the parodied title "apotheosis of the march." But his rhythms lack the variety and the vitality of those in Beethoven's A major symphony, the "Apotheosis of the Dance."

Strong Point

Dr Koussevitzky, whose Mozart has never been his strong point, had evidently made a special effort with the "Magic Flute" overture and the concerto yesterday. The overture went distinctly better than one anticipated. The so-called "Masonic chords" that interrupt it were twice taken too slowly, but otherwise there was the requisite fluency. Mozart here avoids writing melodic passages.

But in the concerto the orchestral accompaniment failed to measure up to Mr Polatschek's solo playing. It is only fair to add that it was the best Mozart playing in melodic passages that Dr Koussevitzky has yet achieved at these concerts.

The Rimsky-Korsakov, except that the "andante con moto" of the variations became a largo in pace, was brilliantly played and heartily applauded. It, too, showed off Mr Polatschek's virtuosity in incidental clarinet solos.

There are no symphony concerts here next week, as the orchestra goes to New York. For Nov 27 and 28 Beethoven's "Emperor" concerto, with Walter Gieseking as soloists, and a new symphony by Howard Hanson are the chief items on the program as now planned.

P. H.

Globe Nov 15

MUSIC

Herald Nov 15

SYMPHONY CONCERT

By PHILIP HALE

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Dr. Koussevitzky, conductor, gave its sixth concert of the season yesterday afternoon in Symphony hall. Mozart, Overture to "The Magic Flute" and Clarinet concerto (Mr. Polatschek, clarinetist). Prokofieff, Symphony, No. 4 (first performance. Composed for the orchestra's Jubilee). Rimsky-Korsakov, Caprice on Spanish Themes.

It was said before the performance of Prokofieff's symphony that it was more in the line of his "Classical" symphony, than after the manner of his earlier works, splendid in savagery. The performance yesterday, one that would surely have pleased the composer, did not justify the statement. A note from Prokofieff states that in some passages of the symphony he used the same musical material which is introduced in his ballet, "The Prodigal Son." "This does not lead to the conclusion," he writes, "that the symphony is written on the material extracted from 'The Prodigal Son,' or the 'Prodigal Son' on the material from the symphony. Merely, in the symphony I had the possibility to develop symphonically what a ballet-form did not enable me to do." And he cites the example of Beethoven's ballet "Creatures of Prometheus" and his third symphony.

The ballet was produced at Paris in May, 1929; the symphony was composed in 1929-30. There are four movements. Here conventionality stops.

The "Classical" symphony was western in thought and expression. This fourth symphony is oriental as was to be expected after one knew that Prokofieff had used some of his ballet material. Hearing the music, one recognized a spirit that was not western in any way: Not in thematic invention, not in harmonic progressions; decidedly not in the orchestration. For his "classical" symphony, the composer was quoted as saying that he had written after the manner of Mozart. No doubt he said this with his tongue in his cheek. In the fourth symphony he went back to the earlier Prokofieff. Nor is there in the later work the melodic inspiration that is desired. There are tunes that promise beauty; they are soon tortured. There are also patterns that are ingeniously used, for it would be foolish to question the technical skill of this composer; but one can not live on patterns.

One can easily think that this or that section, especially in the Scherzoso, was planned for dancers; that in the other movements there are pages for those on the stage telling the story in pantomime. A glance at the ballet score might easily show the folly of fancied identifications. The symphony as it stands is absolute music, and as music pure and simple it cannot be ranked with the best of Prokofieff's works. There is no objection to his being the wild man, as in the "Scythian Suite," and "They Are Seven," but in this symphony there is not the barbaric outpourings that have a beauty of their own and impress one by their strength. In former works the orchestration when clangorous was effective; more than a mere shock to the nervous system. In the symphony the orchestration in fortissimo is often only blatant; and when objective or subtle beauty is sought by the blending of instrumental timbres there is, as a rule, a disappointing experiment.

For many years at European symphony concerts there was no hesitation in the introduction of players of wind instruments as soloists. Even at the concerts of the Paris conservatory the flutist, oboist, clarinetist and the player of the horn or bassoon was welcomed and treated respectfully by audience and professional critics. At the concerts of the Boston Symphony orchestra soloists of a few wind instruments have made their appearance, but they were few in number and they appeared at long intervals. Mozart wrote a concerto for the oboe, one for the clarinet, one for the bassoon; for the flute, also for the flute and harp; several for the horn. The clarinet concerto performed yesterday had been played here at a Symphony concert in 1918.

It is characteristically Mozartian by its grace, suavity and the strange tinge of melancholy at times that entered into his music, especially in his latter years. (The concerto was composed only a few months before his death.) Mr. Polatschek, who was warmly welcomed and applauded, played as a musician as well as a virtuoso. His performance was distinguished by tasteful phrasing, and at no time was there an attempt to display the virtuoso at the expense of the composer. Dr. Koussevitzky, always happy in his ac-

Continued bottom of page

Concerts

HERALD Nov. 16

By PHILIP HALE

"Confused explosions of the outrageous effrontery of a young man."

Again: "It is believed that a prodigal use of the most barbaric dissonances and a noisy use of all the orchestral instruments will make an effect. Alas, the ear is only stabbed; there is no appeal to the heart."

Would not one think that these were the opinions of some who squirm in Symphony or Jordan Hall when they hear the work of a young composer now living, but not a personal friend?

The two quotations are from reviews written about performances of Beethoven's first symphony. The first was published at Leipsic in 1801. The second quotation was published at Paris in 1810.

In recent years the Symphony audience has heard much "contemporaneous" music, some of it from members of the radical school; music that is good, though its idiom may be strange for those accustomed to traditional forms, conservative harmonies, and orchestration of agreeable but obvious character; music that is bad, not because it is "barbaric," "ear-stabbing"; but because it is impotent, without musical ideas, merely a futile experiment in rhythm and in bizarre instrumentation.

There are young hearers in the audience, male and female after their kind, who without a musical background, without a knowledge of musical history, welcome everything that is strange and unexpected in a new composition. To them Haydn is "old hat"; Mozart, childish; Schumann "couldn't orchestrate," and they speak as if they had taken a thorough course in orchestration and knew the inherent character and capabilities of each particular instrument. Beethoven, yes, he is to be endured, but performances should be at long intervals; Brahms, so-so; never Tchaikovsky, and they sneer: he liked tunes and his symphonies are full of them. Unfortunately, they are cocky and voluble; thus they work injury to art, for self-assurance converts some who like Dorothea Brooke's uncle—was it her uncle? We have not read "Middlemarch" for many years—are of miscellaneous opinions and uncertain vote.

The noble army of those unwilling to accept any music that perplexes them or awakens them from peaceful, somnolent listening, assured by the long-accepted name of an orthodox composer, does similar injury to the Muse. They feel personally insulted if the new work does not appeal to them at the first hearing. They may even write indignant letters to Dr. Koussevitzky, who is simply doing his duty in acquainting the receptive, the discriminating, the reactionaries, the prejudiced minds, with modern tendencies. For, it is to be said over and over again that music is not a fixed, a determined, definite art; it is influenced by tradition, to be sure; it is also and largely influenced by the contemporaneous thought and spirit of the world. It would be hard for a young composer to write after the great war as he would have written before it. The music of today often reflects the hurrying, restless, noisy, grossly materialistic, extravagant age we live in.

It is interesting to hear the succession of works written for the Jubilee of the Boston Symphony Orchestra; to see whether this or that composer finds freedom in an obligatory task and can reveal freely and effectively his individuality; whether his composition sounds as if it had lain for two or three years in a portfolio and been taken out, salted and peppered for the festive day; whether a composer simply puts aside his individuality, thinking the occasion a solemn or a pompous one, finding it prudent, perhaps lucrative, to write in a vein foreign to his musical nature. It is all very interesting: to listen to the new works, and be able to applaud honestly, or gnash one's teeth in rage and disgust; to discover in old music hitherto unnoticed beauties, now brought out by genius of interpretation on the part of the conductor and by the present remarkable proficiency of the orchestra; to wonder why a work that now seems feeble, commonplace, dull excited one's admiration in former years.

For if the idioms of music change, so changes the aesthetic receptivity of the hearer. The apostle Paul made some wise remarks on the change in mental workings wrought by the passing years. As they are no doubt familiar to those who still have the habit of reading the New Testament if not the Old we'll not quote them.

Conclusion of Concert companiment of soloists, brought out the fine details, the ravishing little harmonic and orchestral bits that too often escape the notice of conductors.

A spirited performance of the immortal overture and a brilliant performance of Rimsky-Korsakov's ideas about the nature of Spanish music were greatly enjoyed. The concert will be repeated tonight. The orchestra will be out of town next week. The program of Nov. 28, 29 will be as follows: Wagner Overture to "The Flying Dutchman"; Hanson, Symphony No. 2, "Romantic" (first performance; composed for the orchestra's jubilee). Beethoven, Piano Concerto No. 5 (Walter Giesecking, pianist). Ravel, Bolero.

Globe Nov 14

As He Heard Himself

Nikisch on The Mystery of Conducting

WHEN one of my colleagues, after a concert asks me how I secured a certain effect, I find myself incapable of giving an answer. I have been asked how I communicate my emotions to my men. I can only reply that I do it simply and without consciously knowing how. When I conduct a composition, the power of the music masters me, and I follow it without rules or preconceived plan. I do not sit down beforehand and plan how I am going to realize every effect.

Details of interpretation, therefore, change with almost every concert, for I am mastered by the emotion which the music has evoked. But note, this applies only in details. To feel a symphony of Beethoven one way today and another tomorrow would be as laughable as illogical.

[From a Memorial Volume lately Published in Leipzig

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Howard Hanson's "Romantic" Symphony will be the next anniversary piece to be heard at the Symphony concerts on Nov. 28 and 29. Dr. Hanson plans to be present to hear these first performances of the work which he composed, like so many of his confreres, in honor of the semi-centenary of the Boston Orchestra. Then, when Boston has heard it, Dr. Hanson will carry his "Romantic" Symphony to Europe, where it will be heard in Rome no later than Dec. 8, under Dr. Hanson's baton and from the Augusteo Orchestra.

* * * *

This week the orchestra departs for its first New York and Brooklyn concerts of the season. Incidentally it will also give this week, on Tuesday evening, the first of its series of concerts in Providence.

* * * *

Music Notes and Comment

There are no Boston Symphony concerts at Symphony Hall this week, as the orchestra is to visit Providence, New York and Brooklyn. For Nov 28 and 29, the next pair of concerts in the regular series in Boston, the program now arranged includes Wagner's "Flying Dutchman" overture, a new "Romantic Symphony" by Howard Hanson, composed for the 50th anniversary of the orchestra, Beethoven's "Emperor" concerto with Walter Gieseking as pianist, and Ravel's Bolero.

For the first of the six Tuesday afternoon concerts, Nov 25, Dr Koussevitzky plans a program including two Bach preludes, arranged by Pick-Mangiagalli; Beethoven's Seventh Symphony and Brahms' Second Symphony. This series is the one best suited to the tastes of those who love the great classics more than modern novelties of lesser masters.

Dec 2, 3, 5 and 6 the Boston Symphony Orchestra is to give in Constitution Hall, Washington, D C, a Beethoven Festival, duplicating that given in Symphony Hall in 1927.

N. M. J.

Incidents and Prospects

The tentative dates for the production at the Symphony Concerts of Stravinsky's new "Symphony of Psalms"—dedicated "to the glory of God and to the Boston Symphony Orchestra"—are Friday and Saturday, Dec. 12 and 13. Seldom has a new piece by Stravinsky been performed for the first times outside Paris. A choir from The Cecilia will assist the orchestra.

One reason why Serge Koussevitzky has held himself aloof from reporters is that he still feels more at home in Russian, French or German than in English. It was only four years ago that President Faunce of Brown astonished a commencement audience by announcing, after the conductor had been granted his honorary degree, that "since Mr.

SONALITIES

ON HAM

Koussevitzky does not desire the use of our English tongue in public, he will respond in the language of music, which all can understand." Koussevitzky's response, you may recall, was made on the double bass.

Nowadays he is a little more sure of himself in the language of his latest adopted land. He has spoken in public once or twice in the past year and recently he has even essayed a few words on the radio. He still fights shy of interviews. Reporters have such funny ways.

A few season tickets may still be had for the six Tuesday afternoon concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which begin this week. As the other subscription series are sold out, this is the only chance to hear the orchestra for persons not already subscribers. The Tuesday programs invariably include only standard pieces, chiefly the great classics. They offer a haven of refuge for listeners who dislike modern novelties of the sort so frequently played in the regular Friday and Saturday series.

Music Notes and Comment

Dr Koussevitzky plans to perform at this week's Boston Symphony concerts in the regular series a new symphony by Howard Hanson, his second, with the title, "Romantic," one of the works commissioned for the 50th anniversary. Mr Hanson, a young American, is now director of the Eastman School of Music at Rochester, N Y. His first symphony, with the irritating title, "Nordic," has already been heard at these concerts.

Walter Gieseking, one of the greatest of living musicians, will be the soloist at this week's Symphony concerts, in Beethoven's "Emperor" concerto. Mr Gieseking, like his contemporary, Jose Iturbi, is a pianist, capable of subordinating a remarkable virtuoso technique to a musicianship even more remarkable, and to some listeners, far more important. Gieseking will give his only Boston recital of the season at Symphony Hall Dec 14.

New York Tribute to Boston Jubilee

The Herald Tribune Salutes The Fiftieth Year of the Symphony Orchestra

THESE are festival days (wrote Mr. Lawrence Gilman on Friday last) for the Boston Symphony, which came to town Thursday evening for its first New York concert of the season. As all the world of music knows, the orchestra which has helped to make the East Wind and the Watch and Ward Society bearable is celebrating its fiftieth season of significantly fruitful life. For half a century the name of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has stood for those æsthetic virtues which contribute to the glory of musical art. Other orchestras have sometimes lowered their standards, compromised with expediency; merchants have occasionally trafficked in their souls. We recall no instances of such lapses or perversions in the history of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

With a singularly constant ideal of rectitude and dignity this great organization combines a liberality of attitude toward the unorthodox and the experimental which has immensely enriched our musical life and stimulated our receptiveness. Great is the orchestra's reward. It is recognized today as a tongue of music unsurpassed for eloquence. It is honored as an institution which justifies the civilization that nurtured and perfected it. We drink a somewhat inky toast to the Boston Symphony Orchestra. May it live forever to make glad the hearts of those for whom such triumphs of the spirit outlast the drums and tramplings of a half-century of material conquests.

Naturally, the B. S. O. has been clebrating, and in a characterstic way. In olden times composers were commissioned by Princes to supply for this or that occasion such works as inspiration or industry could produce. Today great orchestras have taken over that amiable and often rewarding function, leaving the imperial Mrs. F. S. Coolidge almost alone among those sovereigns of a democratic time who still seek to poke the fires of genius wherever they may be suspected of existence.

The B. S. O.'s addresses to music-makers here and abroad have been of the lordliest kind. The most distinguished contemporary masters have been commissioned or encouraged to write new works for its jubilee. Prokoffiev sent a symphony; Respighi proffered a Theme and Variations; the Parisian composer, Albert Roussel, dispatched a symphony; an anonymous writer, widely suspected of being no less a personage than the eminent present conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra—who can play the bull fiddle and compose music as ably as he leads—contributed, with profuse blushes, a "Festival Overture." Professor Edward Burlingame Hill, of Harvard, speaking up for Massachusetts, supplied music for an Ode by Robert Silliman Hillyer (also of Harvard). As for the orchestra's favorite child, the illustrious Igor Stravinsky, it is announced that the composer of "Le Sacre du Printemps" has completed for performance in Boston on December 19 and 20 a choral "Symphony of Psalms," which Mr. Stravinsky has dedicated "to the glory of God and to the Boston Symphony Orchestra." Let us hope that both will prove worthy of the honor.

The first of these musical tributes to be heard in New York was set before us Thursday evening by Mr. Koussevitzky. It was the new symphony by the Parisian master, Albert Roussel, which had it's world premiere in Boston on Oct. 24. Roussel, now a mellow juvenile of sixty-one, is still a child of his time. He can still be, when he chooses, acerb and delicately drastic. But he drinks out of his own glass. Stravinsky may have dropped in an olive or two (in whose glass has he not done so?); there are several maraschino cherries from the Rimskyan jars—even a tiny drop from Brangaene's inescapable philtre; and the whole is (need one say?) discreetly tinctured with jazz.

But one takes these things for granted. The point is that Roussel, in this music, adds something to the common store—something definitely individualized, a personal way of fusing and arranging elements, an unmistakable particularity of flavor and of pattern. This score has wit, craft, beauty. One is aware of a civilized and distinguished mind at work behind the tones—a mind urbane, critical, challenging; a French mind, lucid and adult, one that rewards acquaintance.

Dr. Koussevitzky played the new work with superlative finesse and the most intimate comprehension. The performance will remain among the outstanding achievements of his visits to New York—a prodigy of sympathetic identification and projective skill. . . . For the remainder of his program the conductor set before us thrice-familiar matter—the brilliantly vacuous "Roman Carnival" of Berlioz and the unparagoned Johannes at his second best—but still Johannes.

Pendant

With a pseudo-Teutonic facetiousness the Evening Post also undertook to celebrate the occasion, saying: "From that still fabulous city where tis said the Lowells speak only to the Cabots and the Cabots speak only to Serge, the Boston Symphony returned to dilate the fervors of its Manhattan thurifers with the first of its Carnegie Hall series of the new season. The current roster of officers as discoverable in the program-books may be taken to indicate, however, that the ancient witticism must be broadened to include the Warrens, the Lodges, the Danas, the Howes, the Hallowells, the Lymans, the Pickmans, the Sawyers, and perhaps even some others, so persuasively has the ameliorating and leveling art of symphony reconciled even Boston to an international speech.

"Berlioz, with his 'Roman Carnival' Overture; Brahms, with his Second Symphony, and Roussel, with a new work composed especially for the fiftieth anniversary of the Boston orchestra, conspired with Dr Koussevitzky to bring Gotham and Gomorrah within its redemptive pale. For the occasion there was a reassembling of clans antedating the Koussevitzky theocracy, and we were again tempted to conclude that it is the Boston Symphony that is rooted most strongly in the older musical aristocracy here, as at home. This was a forty-fifth beginning in New York, only five fewer than in Boston."

A "Romantic" symphony, written for the Boston Symphony Orchestra's jubilee by Howard Hanson, "Mus. Bac., Mus. Doc., F. A. A. R.," born at Yahoo, Nebraska, will be played at the orchestra's concerts this week. The program will also include Ravel's "Bolero," of which it has been said that the theme is Arabian, not Spanish, and the character of the music, rhythm, etc., is not that of a bolero. But why is one so "beastly particular"? As it stands, Ravel's "Bolero" is amusing and exciting.

New York Tribune to Boston Jubilee

The Herald Tribune Salutes The Fiftieth Year of the Symphony Orchestra

THESE are festival days (wrote Mr. Lawrence Gilman on Friday last) for the Boston Symphony, which came to town Thursday evening for its first New York concert of the season. As all the world of music knows, the orchestra which has helped to make the East Wind and the Watch and Ward Society bearable is celebrating its fiftieth season of significantly fruitful life. For half a century the name of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has stood for those æsthetic virtues which contribute to the glory of musical art. Other orchestras have sometimes lowered their standards, compromised with expediency; merchants have occasionally trafficked in their souls. We recall no instances of such lapses or perversions in the history of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

With a singularly constant ideal of rectitude and dignity this great organization combines a liberality of attitude toward the unorthodox and the experimental which has immensely enriched our musical life and stimulated our receptiveness. Great is the orchestra's reward. It is recognized today as a tongue of music unsurpassed for eloquence. It is honored as an institution which justifies the civilization that nurtured and perfected it. We drink a somewhat inky toast to the Boston Symphony Orchestra. May it live forever to make glad the hearts of those for whom such triumphs of the spirit outlast the drums and tramplings of a half-century of material conquests.

Naturally, the B. S. O. has been clebrating, and in a characterstic way. In olden times composers were commissioned by Princes to supply for this or that occasion such works as inspiration or industry could produce. Today great orchestras have taken over that amiable and often rewarding function, leaving the imperial Mrs. F. S. Coolidge almost alone among those sovereigns of a democratic time who still seek to poke the fires of genius wherever they may be suspected of existence.

The B. S. O.'s addresses to music-makers here and abroad have been of the lordliest kind. The most distinguished contemporary masters have been commissioned or encouraged to write new works for its jubilee. Prokoffiev sent a symphony; Respighi proffered a Theme and Variations; the Parisian composer, Albert Roussel, dispatched a symphony; an anonymous writer, widely suspected of being no less a personage than the eminent present conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra—who can play the bull fiddle and compose music as ably as he leads—contributed, with profuse blushes, a "Festival Overture." Professor Edward Burlingame Hill, of Harvard, speaking up for Massachusetts, supplied music for an Ode by Robert Silliman Hillyer (also of Harvard). As for the orchestra's favorite child, the illustrious Igor Stravinsky, it is announced that the composer of "Le Sacre du Printemps" has completed for performance in Boston on December 19 and 20 a choral "Symphony of Psalms," which Mr. Stravinsky has dedicated "to the glory of God and to the Boston Symphony Orchestra." Let us hope that both will prove worthy of the honor.

The first of these musical tributes to be heard in New York was set before us Thursday evening by Mr. Koussevitzky. It was the new symphony by the Parisian master, Albert Roussel, which had it's world premiere in Boston on Oct. 24. Roussel, now a mellow juvenile of sixty-one, is still a child of his time. He can still be, when he chooses, acerb and delicately drastic. But he drinks out of his own glass. Stravinsky may have dropped in an olive or two (in whose glass has he not done so?); there are several maraschino cherries from the Rimskyan jars—even a tiny drop from Brangaene's inescapable philtre; and the whole is (need one say?) discreetly tinctured with jazz.

But one takes these things for granted. The point is that Roussel, in this music, adds something to the common store—something definitely individualized, a personal way of fusing and arranging elements, an unmistakable particularity of flavor and of pattern. This score has wit, craft, beauty. One is aware of a civilized and distinguished mind at work behind the tones—a mind urbane, critical, challenging; a French mind, lucid and adult, one that rewards acquaintance.

Dr. Koussevitzky played the new work with superlative finesse and the most intimate comprehension. The performance will remain among the outstanding achievements of his visits to New York—a prodigy of sympathetic identification and projective skill. . . . For the remainder of his program the conductor set before us thrice-familiar matter—the brilliantly vacuous "Roman Carnival" of Berlioz and the unparagoned Johannes at his second best—but still Johannes.

Pendant

With a pseudo-Teutonic facetiousness the Evening Post also undertook to celebrate the occasion, saying: "From that still fabulous city where tis said the Lowells speak only to the Cabots and the Cabots speak only to Serge, the Boston Symphony returned to dilate the fervors of its Manhattan thurifers with the first of its Carnegie Hall series of the new season. The current roster of officers as discoverable in the program-books may be taken to indicate, however, that the ancient witticism must be broadened to include the Warrens, the Lodges, the Danas, the Howes, the Hallowells, the Lymans, the Pickmans, the Sawyers, and perhaps even some others, so persuasively has the ameliorating and leveling art of symphony reconciled even Boston to an international speech.

"Berlioz, with his 'Roman Carnival' Overture; Brahms, with his Second Symphony, and Roussel, with a new work composed especially for the fiftieth anniversary of the Boston orchestra, conspired with Dr Koussevitzky to bring Gotham and Gomorrah within its redemptive pale. For the occasion there was a reassembling of clans antedating the Koussevitzky theocracy, and we were again tempted to conclude that it is the Boston Symphony that is rooted most strongly in the older musical aristocracy here, as at home. This was a forty-fifth beginning in New York, only five fewer than in Boston."

Dr. Koussevitzky's most conservative audience awaits him, five times a year, in Brooklyn. To it he must play only classics and a few generally accepted moderns. Perish the thought that a modernist should defile the purity of the program. Hence, last Friday, the Overture to "The Magic Flute," the Prelude to "Lohengrin," Beethoven's Seventh Symphony, two transcribed Preludes from Bach, Rimsky-Korsakov's "Spanish Capice." In these days, fancy that in either Boston or New York.

H. T. P.

Incidents and Prospects

Says Le Temps, the Parisian newspaper, in its most official tones: "Monsieur Henri Rabaud, member of the Institute, director of the national Conservatory of music and declamation, has been designated, for a new period of five years, director of the establishment." The same Rabaud who, for one, was conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra—the shortest term in all its fifty years.

68

Sneeze Spoiled Big Photo of First Boston Symphony Orchestra

George W. Stewart Recalls Early Days of Famed Organization

By JOHN E. PEMBER

George W. Stewart, founder and manager of the Boston Festival orchestra, was one of the original members of the Boston Symphony orchestra, whose 50th jubilee season is being celebrated this year with more than a little pride and enthusiasm.

There are not many of them left. Father Time has cut a devastating swath in the ranks of the men who played in the first concerts, but there are many music lovers who recall those epoch-making appearances in 1881, when the wisdom of Col. Henry L. Higginson in launching so tremendous an enterprise was doubted by many, and even so acute a critic as the late A. W. Apthorpe, gave the orchestra a scant two years to live.

The big photograph of that first symphony orchestra, published in the Sunday Herald rotogravure section recently, is the rare and treasured possession of those who are so fortunate as to own a copy. There is a good story in connection with its taking, and Mr. Stewart, while in a reminiscent mood, related to a Sunday Herald man the other day.

SNEEZE MADE PHOTOGRAPHER'S WORK GO FOR NAUGHT

"Taking photographs in 1881 was a very different thing from taking photographs today," remarked Mr. Stewart, "and this occasion was no exception. The picture narrowly escaped not being made at all.

"When the season opened it was felt by many that a photograph ought to be taken of the orchestra as a memento of the event and several attempts were made to do so. It proved almost impossible to get the 70-odd men together at one time. Invariably it was found that one or more had unbreakable engagements whenever a time was suggested, and the business was delayed again and again. But eventually they were all collected after a rehearsal, the photographer was on hand, and the attempt was made.

"The orchestra took its place on the platform of old Music hall and the photographer set up his camera in one of the balconies. Nowadays he would have told his subjects to 'keep still' for a moment, snapped his shutter, and it would have been all over. But things were different then.

"It seemed to take that photographer forever to get ready. He adjusted his apparatus over and over again and appeared and disappeared from beneath his black covering until the musicians' patience was completely exhausted. They wanted to get out and were restless and annoyed.

"Finally, after at least three-quarters of an hour of preparation, the man said he was ready and enjoined the players to sit absolutely motionless while he made the long exposure.

"The seconds ticked by and the endurance of the orchestra members was almost at the breaking point, when, right in the middle of things, one of the players burst into the most tremendous sneeze I have ever heard. He tried to strangle it, and the resulting combination of bark and sizzle and groan was absolutely astonishing. As one man the entire orchestra burst into uncontrollable laughter and fairly rocked in their seats with mirth.

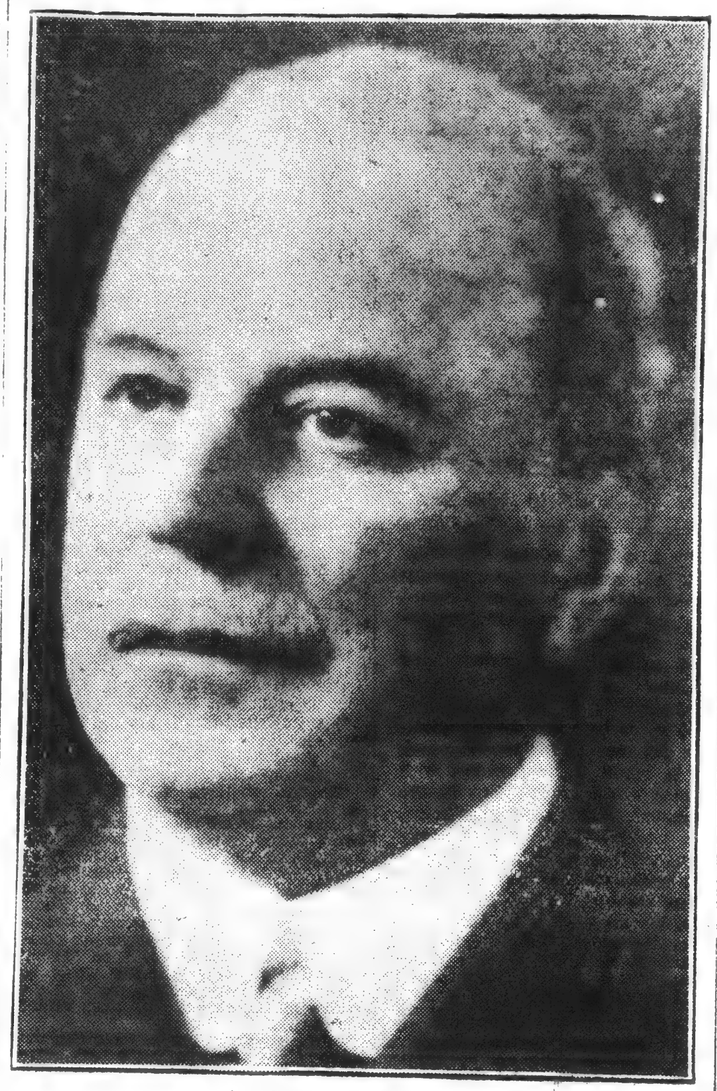
"That ended the attempt to take a photograph—in that way. Afterward the musicians went one by one to Notman's studio and were taken individually. From these pictures a composite of the whole was carefully built up. It was a terrible job to match them all in correctly, in the proper order of arrangement, but it was done at last. A representation of the famous Music Hall organ and the bronze statue of Beethoven was painted in as for a background and the whole was then re-photographed as a unit. It was a great success. In fact, I think the result was much better than subsequent pictures, taken with modern apparatus, in which the orchestra was photographed entire."

One of the classic "yarns" concerning the Boston Symphony orchestra which is always narrated when the players get together, is about an incident that took place 25 years ago. Let Mr. Stewart tell it:

"The Boston Festival orchestra happened to be in Pittsfield on a tour," he said, "and we were on the station platform waiting for a train to take us to North Adams. An express train pulled in from the West, from which descended Gen. Nat Wales, division superintendent, and a well-known character, attended by an English friend.

"In amazement, the Englishman looked at the crowd of musicians and the instrument cases of the orchestra, piled up on the trucks, ready to be taken to the baggage car. He had never seen anything like it.

"'Bless my soul!' he exclaimed. 'Look at all these men and all these instruments! What in the world does it mean?'



George W. Stewart.

"'That, sir,' replied Gen. Wales, who thought it was the Boston Symphony on its travels, 'is the greatest orchestra in the world.'

"Before he could explain further I spoke up and said: 'Right! And the Boston Symphony orchestra comes next.'

"'Hell!' remarked Gen. Wales, turning on his heel.

"Fred Comee, assistant manager of the Symphony orchestra, was accustomed to relate this story with great glee. Gen. Wales never got over it."

Mr. Stewart told another anecdote, at the expense of a famous member of the Symphony orchestra, now deceased. Out of consideration for his living relatives the name is suppressed.

"While the orchestra was travelling—I think we were in Cincinnati"—said Mr. Stewart, "Mr. Gericke, the director, during rehearsal announced that a trunk belonging to one of the players containing his concert clothes, including his dress suit, was missing, and asked if the trunk showed up in the room of any player that he would put it in the hotel corridor and notify the management.

"The trunk had been traced to the hotel all right, but it had evidently been delivered to the wrong room. However, no word was heard of it and the unlucky player either had to appear in his travelling rig or hire a suit—I don't know which he did.

"When the orchestra came to leave the hotel, lo and behold! the porters came upon the missing trunk in the room of the player who is nameless for the occasion. It had been there all the time. Mr. Gericke, rather nettled over the occurrence, called upon the man to explain. The reply is one of the orchestra's traditions.

"'Why, Herr Kapelmeister!' expostulated the player, round-eyed and unconscious of offence, 'the trunk wasn't in my way.'

"There was nothing to be done. The situation was beyond words."

"There is another story about Gericke," continued the narrator, "which, so far as I know, has never been told. When he first came to direct the orchestra he was regarded as somewhat radical in his musical taste. Henschel, his predecessor, had always, in accordance with the custom of the time, included one or two light numbers in the program, something of 'a pleasing nature,' as it used to be called. Gericke sternly cut that out. His programs were strictly classical and aesthetic. Nothing 'light' for him.

"The newspapers slated him pretty severely for this departure. He was attacked savagely. Ben Wolfe, I remember, expended the full measure of his cutting and biting tongue upon him. Mr. Gerricke, who was of a sensitive nature, felt this criticism severely.

Stage Hands Moved Piano On Sieverking, but He Played His Encore

"Now, it happened to be very cold weather at this time, and Mr. Gericke, walking to the hall from his home on Beacon Hill, was accustomed to wear a very handsome beaver coat, mink-lined, with great fur cuffs and collar. One day, on Arlington street opposite the Public Garden, a great mastiff jumped upon him in a clumsy, good-natured way. His claws ripped and tore the fur coat and reduced it to rags.

"Surveying the wreck, Mr. Gericke exclaimed, with feeling, 'Ach! Effen der togs are against me!'"

Neil Patterson, the veteran baggage-master of the orchestra, who sees that its multitudinous belongings are properly transported when it is "en tour," recalled this one.

As is well known, when soloists appear with the Symphony Orchestra, no encores are allowed under any circumstances. They take time and cause suburban patrons who are more interested in the concerted numbers than in the soloists either to miss their last trains home or lose part of the programme.

This was not always so. At first the soloists took as many recalls as they could get. Eventually Col. Higginson limited the number of encores to four, then to two, and finally prohibited them altogether. It was while the four limit was in force that the orchestra was playing in Washington. Martinus Sieverking, the Swedish pianist, was the soloist. Sieverking was a very vain man and the ruling on encores irked him sorely.

Now, in order to discourage the encores the order had been given to the stage hands that after the fourth recall they should close the piano and move it back to the rear of the stage. On this occasion the order was carried out. The piano, a heavy grand, was laboriously deposited between the projecting feet of a statue, in a situation where it took at least two ordinary men to budge it.

The audience resumed its applausive outbursts and Sieverking, who was a regular Hercules of a man, oblivious of the rule, marched down to the front, shoved the piano back into place with consummate ease, opened the case, sat down, and, to quote Mr. Patterson, "played for 35 minutes without stopping."

It was a sublime exhibition of self-assurance and resulted in the definite prohibition of encores thereafter.

TUESDAY SYMPHONY SERIES

The Boston Symphony orchestra gave its first Tuesday afternoon program yesterday at 3 P. M. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky conducted. The program was Bach, Two Preludes (arranged for string orchestra by Pick-Mangiagalli); Beethoven, Symphony No. 7 in A major, Opus 92; Brahms, Symphony No. 2 in D major, Opus 73. Her. Nov 26

It is an old idea and a good one—this concert of the three great B's. Toscanini used it to usher in his Sunday afternoon concerts in New York. Here Dr. Koussevitzky used it yesterday to inaugurate his Tuesday afternoon series.

In spite of barometric and financial depressions, Symphony Hall was crowded. A temperate welcome greeted the conductor, but the audience increased the warmth of its enthusiasm as the afternoon progressed. At the intermission the orchestra was called to its feet and when the glorious sonorities of the Brahms Finale closed the program, the listeners were slow to leave. If they had come to be shown, they went away enlightened and enlivened.

From Bach and the tender manipulation of Pick-Mangiagalli, came two Preludes. The first, originally an organ prelude, sustained a mood serene and glowing from within. The second, from the Third Partita, was swift and spirited in rhythm and the orchestra, after its fatiguing travels, seemed to find it exacting. In neither instance did Bach lose anything at his transcriber's hands or at his interpreter's. For many he gained new clarity.

In the Beethoven Seventh the performance came close to perfection. The players seemed to identify themselves completely with the composition, reliving again the surprises in accent and pause which characterize the first movement, making of the Alegretto a contemplative but not unhappy song; ascending through the vigor and fire of the third movement to the ecstatic climax of the fourth; a glorious re-creation.

After intermission, the Brahms Second Symphony filled the cup of pleasure to brimming. More complex in development than the work which preceded it, its stabs of emotion were many barbed. It swept on, from the masterful, stirring opening, into the brooding calm of the second movement, from which, with renewed strength, the Scherzo burst forth joyously. The ascendant and transcendent harmonies of the Finale left the audience with flushed cheeks and sparkling eyes. Small wonder they were loathe to leave. For Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra, another triumph. F. S. F.

CLASSICS HEARD AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Globe Nov 26

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall the first of its annual series of six Tuesday afternoon concerts. It goes without saying that the hall was full. Empty seats at a Boston Symphony concert would be what instructors in journalism call "a news event." Dr Koussevitzky, in bringing about this state of affairs, has accomplished something few conductors can accomplish. His great vogue with the Boston public is beyond dispute.

This Tuesday series has become a refuge for those conservative listeners who shun modern music and consider Cesar Franck a modern and Debussy almost insanely radical. Of these listeners, for whom the past 30 years in musical history are a descent into chaos, there are many. Yesterday they heard only music by great composers, Bach, Beethoven and Brahms. It must be added that some of them seemed to find two symphonies, Beethoven's Seventh and Brahms' Second, on one program, almost too much of a good thing, if lukewarm applause and half-suppressed yawns mean anything.

The Bach was the two preludes arranged by Pick-Mangiagalli, lately performed in the regular subscription series. The strings yesterday played these preludes more smoothly, more finely than they did at the first Boston performance of them on a recent Friday afternoon.

The Beethoven and the Brahms symphonies need no comment as music. Both are masterpieces acknowledged even by those who do not love them. One cannot say anything to the point about such music. It is, in the hackneyed phrase, "beyond words."

One might say a good deal about certain characteristic shortcomings in Dr Koussevitzky's interpretations. It may all be summed up in the remark that he is never content to let the great masters speak for themselves. One must listen, not to Beethoven or to Brahms, but to highly personal and eloquent interpretations by Serge Koussevitzky, based more or less on Beethoven and Brahms. P. R.

FIRST TUESDAY CONCERT GIVEN

Symphony Plays List of the Classics

Post Nov 26

Evidently it is the intention of Dr. Koussevitzky to give the subscribers to the six Tuesday afternoon Symphony concerts an intensive education in the weightier symphonic masterpieces. He may regale the listeners of Friday afternoon and Saturday evening with Ravel's "La Valse" and "Bolero" or Rimsky-Korsakov's "Spanish Caprice," nor does he deny such tidbits to those who attend the concerts on Monday evenings. But for the audiences of Tuesday a strict diet of the classics is prescribed until the conductor's generally chronological scheme vouchsafes them the moderns at the end of the series.

Yesterday afternoon there began at Symphony Hall a new series of these Tuesday concerts and on the programme stood music by Von Bulow's "three B's," Bach, Beethoven and Brahms. The first named composer was represented by the two preludes so successfully arranged for string orchestra by Pick-Mangiagalli and played for the first time anywhere in that arrangement at this season's second pair of Symphony concerts. From Beethoven came the Seventh Symphony, and from Brahms his Second, in D major. A stiff dose, this; yet yesterday's audience showed no sign of finding it more than it could assimilate. Throughout the concert there was much enthusiasm as distinguished from dutiful or perfunctory applause. And the performances, after the fashion of performances at these Tuesday concerts,

First Inning for Native Composers

Howard Hanson Contributes A "Romantic Symphony" To Current Rites

TRANS — NOV. 26

THIS week at the Symphony concerts an American presents a major work for the anniversary. Again it is a symphony. The composer is Doctor Howard Hanson of the Eastman School of Music of Rochester, N. Y. The symphony is the composer's second. He labels it "Romantic." He has appended to it the annotation, "Begun April, 1928; finished July, 1930." Thus again there arises suspicion that the work is not in the strictest sense a "pièce d'occasion," but that it is a work that was already planned and well in hand when the composer received his invitation to write for the year of jubilee. Otherwise one must assume that these commissions were given to composers something like two years in advance of the occasion. And unless some responsible officer of the orchestra, or some person equally "in the know," expressly makes a statement to that effect, the conclusion is more reasonable that many composers are dedicating to the orchestra pieces already planned. Certainly works thus planned are more likely to result satisfactorily than works written purely "to order."

Dr. Hanson's second symphony runs through three movements: (1) Adagio and Allegro moderato; (2) Andante con tenerezza; (3) Allegro con brio. The score carries no key designation. But if ever a composer was justified in describing a symphony as being in two keys (one recalls Arnold Bax of last year) he is so justified in this symphony. And by that one does not mean polytonality. This new symphony begins in vague tonality, with a leaning toward C minor. Toward the end of the introduction, however, it is definitely in C major. And the main body of the movement being in C major. Passing through a variety of keys during its course, it ends with equal definiteness in D-flat major. The second movement begins and ends in C major. The third, like the first, begins in C major and ends in D-flat.

The symphony in its structure follows the principles first laid down by César Franck, and more fully developed by his chief disciple, Vincent d'Indy. One refers of course to the principles of building an entire symphony upon one or two short, simple (always?) mottos. Two such mottos appear in the slow introduction to the present work. The first comes in the first measure of the introduction. Melodically it is exceedingly simple, consisting of three notes ascending stepwise. The supporting harmonies are, however, very complex. If one heard no more than this one measure one would grant Dr. Hanson complete right to title which he has affixed to his symphony, "Romantic." Even the single measure suggests at once the possibility of Byronic moods; Byronic not so much in prospects of rages and ironies—though if one wanted to stretch a point one could read even these into certain later portions of the symphony—but Byronic in the moodiness and mellowness, the poignancy which these harmonies connote. Probably few symphonies save those of Chaikovsky are equally emotion-drenched. The machine age, the age of hard and brittle counterpoint, has found its exception.

This measure, out of which not a little of the thematic material of the symphony springs, is repeated, literally and in transpositions, four times in woodwinds, further with addition of strings; is expanded and developed until a second, more rhythmical, motif appears in horns. For a measure this new motif rocks back and forth between dominant and tonic, then leaps up boldly through two intervals of the fourth: G, C, F. It too is a motif pregnant for the future course of the symphony.

The Allegro moderato begins with the first harmonies of the introduction. Out of them, rather than out of the melodic motif grows the first part of the principal theme. This theme is given to four horns, with each note of it in the score provided with a heavy accent mark. The end of the theme brings in the two successive fourths, this time in descending form and rhythmically emphasized. The transitional or "bridge" theme, more quietly goes to an oboe. One can trace its derivation from portions of the principal theme, though the detailed explanation is too abstruse for newsprint. The second theme, "Lento" and in notes chiefly of long times values, again goes to a horn. Not by accident, one surmises, is the horn thus much used. (More will be heard of it in the final movement.) Its golden tones are ideal vehicles for the entirely "romantic" content of the symphony.—The development is chiefly on the first theme and figures from it—taken in augmentation, diminution, with all the wiles and ingenuities of the expert contrapuntist. The climax of the movement comes at the end of the development, is exceedingly stormy. It leads directly, through a repetition of the rhythmed tonic and dominant of the last measures of the introduction to the recapitulation, with its normal beginning with the principal theme of the symphony. This time the bridge theme goes to a clarinet the second theme again to horns. The energy and passion of the movement gradually subsides and finally ends very quietly in low strings on a simple D-flat major chord.

The second movement begins in much lighter, less intense vein. Two flutes sing a theme not the least of whose qualities are simple graciousness and pure charm. The little theme of a measure and a half is worked in many and various forms in this movement. There is a secondary theme (some of the intervals of which are suggested no doubt by the second motif of the introduction) more songful in its nature, given to the massed strings. There are also many references to the material of the introduction, to the sustained second theme of the first movement. The middle portion of this movement amounts practically to a further development of the matter of the first movement plus the principal theme of the second. It ends with a reworking of the theme as at first presented at the beginning of the movement. The final measures are again quiet, as in the first movement.

The last movement, after an introductory quasi-impressionistic figure in swiftly moving sixteenth notes, also much used for background throughout many portions of the movement, presents no new material. The chief theme, again for horns, is only an expansion of the second motif of the introduction. The second theme, above rapidly repeated Schönbergian chords built up entirely in fourths, is made up of motives from previous themes: the fourths of the second motif of the introduction, the first measure of the bridge theme of the first movement, the seconds of the first motif, and again the fourths. It is played by English horn. Then follows the most extended development yet presented of the matter of the entire symphony: the cheerful theme of the second movement, now energetic in horns: a broad treatment in strings and trumpets of the first theme of the first movement, then of its second theme; finally, a working of the chief theme of this last movement itself. At the conclusion a last Largamente brings two measures of brass with a highly accented statement of the theme of the middle movement over suggestions of harmonies of the opening motto of the symphony. Then, after a downward glissando, there is final peace on a simple D-flat major chord.

A. H. M.

New: From Stravinsky

A Choral "Symphony of Psalms" and a Caprice for Piano at the Symphony Concerts

NEXT Monday Dr. Koussevitzky and the Symphony Orchestra depart to Washington for a Beethoven Festival four concerts long. They will return on the following Sunday to make ready a notable pair of concerts, on Dec. 12 and 13, in the regular series. At them Stravinsky's new "Symphony of Psalms" will be heard for the first times anywhere and his recent Caprice for Piano and Orchestra for the first times in America. A chorus from The Cecilia, prepared by Arthur Fiedler will take the voice-parts in the Symphony. Mr. Sanromá will be the pianist in the Caprice. Contrary to custom, the Symphony, which is short, will be heard twice at each concert. The Psalms are numbers XXVIII and XXXIX, both in part, and number CL as a whole. They will be sung in the Latin of the Vulgate. . . . Mozart and Bach will soothe the ears—and the tempers—of those who find "this new music" trying.

A Tuesday May Prove Remarkable

Conductor, Orchestra, House, In Full Mettle Through Symphonic Classics

Transcript Nov 26

HOWEVER hard the times, they shall not deprive us of our pleasures—so far as we may shun that doleful fate. Say that our living is divided into compartments, like those of an ocean-going ship. In days of lessened incomes we may close this or that altogether; restrict ourselves in others; yet to the end keep one open—that from which the companion-ways lead to favorite pleasures. . . . So it is, perhaps, that every seat for the Symphony Concerts of Friday and Saturday is still taken; that for the supplementary "Monday Series" there is scarcely a vacant place; that for the "Tuesday Matinées," which began again yesterday, the audience seems undiminished, larger even than that of last season. As it happened the empty seats appeared where they were least to be expected—on the sides of the upper balcony. Now, that balcony is the stronghold sure of nearly every concert in Symphony Hall. To it flock musically inclined youth, dwelling in this town or for the while students within it. Interspersing them are older comers whose purse is not so long as their interest is ardent. Most of us remember such years.

And it was there, of all places, where default was plainest. For once parquet and lower balcony bore away the palm. Can it be that paternal remittances have lessened? Perish the thought before it is written. Who of us would not have his dinner-jacket shinier rather than deprive "the kid" of the means to desirable pleasures? Or are there ewer of the musically inclined hereabouts? Not by the evidence of many an autumn concert. There is reason to suspect error and delusion. Whenever Dr. Koussevitzky conducts—it is custom to believe—there are no empty seats. But he leads his orchestra sixty times in the course of the symphonic year. There is usually an exception to prove every rule. For the moment, it is to be discovered in the second balcony at the Tuesday Matinées. There, if they would only believe it, les jeunes, to say nothing of their elders, may still find room.

As it is, this "Tuesday audience" remains unique in quality. No matinée of a favorite star at one of the "better" theaters assembles so many middle-aged or elderly ladies of a type peculiar to this Boston. (A Saturday matinée at the Metropolitan Opera House is the only comparison.) They are gentle folk, quite sure of their places in this world, awaiting receptively the unquestioned classics that, they know, conductor and orchestra will play to them. Their coiffures and dress are unobtrusive evidence of the taste that has guided all their lives. Their manners put to shame the juniors of a rougher-coated time. We lookers-on in paradise watch their brightening eyes, their fine-lined faces, as the music stirs them; watch wistfully and with regret. There should always be such a generation in the boldest of our concert-rooms—and the present Symphony Hall is surely such. We others, for better, for worse, are of a different time, breeding and temper. . . .

There are more to be counted. Those who know the audiences of Friday afternoon and Saturday evening are surprised to see how many have come from them. Some because they cannot have enough of symphonic music, of the present conductor and his orchestra. More, because they hunger for the great, established classics over and over and over again. Wisely Dr. Koussevitzky now makes the Tuesday programs almost wholly of such pieces. And in this division of the audience, be it noted, men predominate. (At best, there are not too many at these matinées.) Perhaps, after all, it is they, not the women, who are ingrained conservatives. . . .

By no means forget the assembled youth. Upstairs and down, they patch the hall; in the intermission brighten the gray corridors to the eye; while their tongues set them ringing to the ear. They are discovering those "great, established classics"; fortunately in performance that keeps them vital and aglow, renewing the light and heat when even they were "new: first times." Or they are learning to know them better; in the process discovering that the art of music is a flowing, changeful stream, as each new age turns and troubles the current; re-shapes the banks. So are they better grounded to sift out the modernisms that may touch them nearer. So are they also discerning that this musical art is born less of theory and principles and all the other pedantries than of the individual men whose manifold or intensified powers wrought within it. If one chooses, one may overhear much in those resonant corridors of Symphony Hall. Between two cigarettes young wisdom shares its impressions of Beethoven, No. 7, or Brahms, No. 2. As often as not, they are surprisingly clear and just. This youngest generation is heartening.

Connoisseurs of the four series of Symphony Concerts say that the conductor and the orchestra oftener excel themselves on a Monday evening or a Tuesday afternoon than on a Friday or a Saturday in regular course. It is easy to agree, since they are playing music, for the most part, that has come to riper and riper performance through the preceding weeks or months. The psychologically minded proffer deeper explanation. On Friday afternoons, they say, when conductor and orchestra are producing the current program, testing it, and themselves in it, for the first time before an audience, they work under no little tension. On Saturday evenings, the musical big-wigs of the town confront them; or having done wonders on Friday they must now repeat them; or this or that mis-judgment must be corrected; or what failed at first hearing must be made to prevail at second. Under such exigency the tension is renewed. On a Monday evening or a Tuesday afternoon, the audience comes more to receive than to judge; the performance is already ripened and secure. Conductor and orchestra feel this freedom; being free, lead and play, as artists should, at the top of their bent. Certainly there are no routined, perfunctory repetitions for Dr. Koussevitzky himself. Though he open a score for the hundredth time, yet once more it enkindles him. Long since the orchestra was remade in his image.

Certainly again, both excelled themselves yesterday. The string choir phrased as one man, gained a mutual and unified depth of tone, through the Adagio transcribed by Pick-Mangiagalli from Bach; were as one in rhythm, brilliance and élan when their bows bit into the succeeding Vivace. In both divisions, the conductor's pace and shadings were aptness themselves, disclosing, characterizing, vitalizing each several page. Here, the listener might say, were the perfect transcriptions as perfectly played. Bach sounded in his own voice; yet how suitable seemed the new medium through which it prevailed!

Beethoven's Seventh Symphony followed. Once upon a time, with an inferior orchestra, Mr. Toscanini played it in Boston. Some who heard believed that no one but him, of present conductors, could so lead the principal theme of the first Allegro from germ to development, from development to all-pervading sound, ever upspringing. Yet Dr. Koussevitzky and his orchestra now did equally that Beethovenish feat. There are times when one rages against the recurring Pilgrim Hymn of the Scherzo. Will Beethoven, infatuate with repetitions, never have done? At each return, yesterday, Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestral tone heightened and deepened it. It is old-new objection that if the Finale be played at the pace, with the rhythm, in the exuberant tumult that Beethoven imagined, much will pass blurred—less music then passion. On Tuesday it had all the "expressive" qualities; yet not a phrase or an accent went clouded. The Allegretto sang in golden tone; not a sentimentality marred it; not an effect for the effect's sake distorted it. From the Symphony throughout sounded the Beethoven of up-flinging power and out-leaping beauty. Though the Titan was relatively at play, he was Titanic still.

After Beethoven, Brahms, the lighter Brahms of the Second Symphony. Though the sunshine of this world floods in upon his music-making, yet must he have his brooding moments, autumnal tints, his haunted sense of "the tears of things." Mr. Boettcher's horn, often the darker strings with him, deep-dyed these autumnal hues. Persuaded by Dr. Koussevitzky, the Brahmsian spirit brooded over the slow movement gravely, not thickly; intently, not dryly. Finely turned were the descents and the shadings, when the free-flowing, quick-spirited Brahms of the first movement and the finale is reminded, as by unescapable impulse, of the melancholies and the vanities of this mortal being in a world that presses upon it not lightly. Then brusquely, as tone and accent went, would he brush them away. To every high-placed conductor his Brahmsian masterpiece. Mr. Toscanini's partisans hold out the First for their idol. Mr. Stokowski's followers allot the Fourth to him. For Dr. Koussevitzky, surely and beyond compare, the Second. . . . Tuesday matinée though it was, and "all-classic," a remarkable concert.

H. T. P.

70

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

Globe Nov 30

Conductors Change Places

In the old-time New England small town ministers of churches and faiths not too diverse used sometimes to exchange pulpits, a proceeding which invariably furnished their congregations with subject matter for many a discussion. Now two of the most admired orchestral conductors in America have exchanged places for a fortnight. Last week and this week Toscanini is conducting the Philadelphia Orchestra as guest and Stokowski is conducting the New York Philharmonic.

The subscribers to the respective series of concerts will have plenty to say, and so will the newspaper reviewers, of the merits of the two. Stokowski, always a clever journalist, has chosen this moment to make public his naturally very enthusiastic opinion of Toscanini's conducting.

One wishes that another season Dr Koussevitzky would exchange places with Toscanini for a fortnight, or, failing that, with Stokowski. Boston more than New York or Philadelphia, is in need of hearing a variety of prominent orchestral conductors. In New York there are annual series of concerts by both the Philadelphia and Boston Orchestras. In Philadelphia the New York Philharmonic gives a series of concerts each season. But Boston rarely hears any orchestra of high rank, or any of the foremost conductors, except its own Symphony under its permanent leader.

Not that one would wish to encourage the custom of entrusting an orchestra to a series of guest leaders. All experience proves that the best artistic results are obtained by having an orchestra play most of its concerts under one man. But a fortnight of Toscanini or Stokowski would do our orchestra no harm and might do our audience much good.

Effects on Orchestra

Perhaps the most interesting thing about such an exchange of conductors is the effect on the playing of the orchestra. One can readily estimate the share the conductor has in the performance of the players. The Boston Symphony, under such guests as Sir George Henschel, E. Fernandez Arbos and Eugene Goossens, has in recent seasons retained many of the qualities it has under Dr Koussevitzky, and shown in some instances powers Dr Koussevitzky does not elicit from it.

Think, for example, how well Mozart's music, conducted by Bruno Walter, and on a more recent occasion by Sir Thomas Beecham, sounded from the Boston Symphony. Dr Koussevitzky does not do Mozart justice. Think, on the other hand, of the music of Skriabin and of Tchaikovsky, in which no other conductor has succeeded as Dr Koussevitzky so notably succeeds.

In New York most listeners have so far agreed that Toscanini gets more from the Philharmonic than any one else among the numerous leaders of recent seasons there. In Philadelphia opinion is unanimous that only Stokowski can make the most of the Philadelphia Orchestra, which is his personal creation. He built it up from mediocrity to its present proud position, unsurpassed in the world.

In Boston it is Dr Koussevitzky who, building on a foundation laid by Mr Monteux, has raised the Boston Symphony to its present high estate after the tragic collapse in 1918. Could even Toscanini or Stokowski, or, for that matter, Dr Muck, under whom the Boston Symphony reached heights never attained before or since by any orchestra anywhere, at once do notably more with Koussevitzky's orchestra than Koussevitzky himself commonly does?

One would like to know. We shall not have Muck as guest conductor, for reasons unconnected with the art of music. But we could perhaps have Toscanini or Stokowski, or some European celebrity like Fuertwangler.

Dr Koussevitzky is now a far greater conductor than he was in 1924, thanks to the opportunities given him in Boston. He is admired greatly in New York as well as in this city. He, as well as Stokowski, is entitled to be treated on equal terms by Toscanini.

Music Notes and Comment

The new "Symphonie des Psaumes," which Stravinsky has written for the Boston Symphony Orchestra's 50th anniversary celebration, will be performed for the first times at the next pair of Boston Symphony concerts at Symphony Hall, Dec 12 and Dec 13. A chorus from the Cecilia Society, Arthur Fiedler, conductor, will assist. Dr Koussevitzky plans to repeat the Stravinsky on the same program. Its text is verses from the 28th and 29th Psalms and the 150th Psalm. The words are Latin. At this concert Stravinsky's Capriccio for piano and orchestra will be performed for the first time in America, with Jesus Maria Sanroma as soloist. Mozart's G minor symphony and Bach's organ fugue in E flat, transcribed by Schoenberg, are the other numbers.

The Boston Symphony is to give in Washington, D C, this week a Beethoven festival, akin to the one heard in this city in 1927. There are accordingly no concerts in the subscription series here this week.

GIESEKING IS SYMPHONY SOLOIST

By MOSES SMITH

Soloists are rare birds nowadays at the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra — soloists, that is, of distinguished names, intended to bolster up the drawing power of the purely symphonic program. Serge Koussevitzky has succeeded notably in selling symphonic music to audiences on its own merits.

It is fortunate, however, that Walter Gieseking, extraordinary pianist, is the assisting artist at this week's concerts, for without him they would prove very tame. Playing the Beethoven E-flat major Concerto, Gieseking exhibited again at yesterday's matinee the superlative artistry which has elicited such lavish praises during the past three or four seasons. The fire and storm, the exquisitely attuned lyricism, the rare moments of virtuosity, the noble, classic restraint—all these things were present in a performance that could probably not be matched in the world today. The orchestral accompaniment, sympathetic in most respects, was inclined to be ragged at times. It did not approach the perfection attained at the time of Gieseking's first appearance with the orchestra several years ago.

The Concerto was preceded by the Second "Romantic" Symphony of Howard Hanson, American composer, director of the Eastman of Music at Rochester. Composed for the fiftieth anniversary of the Boston Orchestra and played yesterday for the first time this symphony made on this writer the impression of a series of fragments with no central, unifying force, most of them uninteresting and unoriginal in character. Occasional moments of quiet beauty, as at the end of the first movement, did not seem to atone for second-hand Strauss of "Till Eulenspiegel" or Debusseyan impressionism. Perhaps the work will sound better at second hearing.

A stirring performance of Wagner's Overture to "The Flying Dutchman" and a slow-paced rendering of Ravel's "Bolero" began and ended the concert.

GIESEKING HEARD AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Great Pianist Triumphs in Beethoven Concerto

First Performance of Hanson's New "Romantic Symphony" Given

Globe Nov. 29

Walter Gieseking again proved his right to rank as one of the greatest of concert pianists by a remarkably fine performance in Beethoven's "Emperor" Concerto. Dr Koussevitzsky and the orchestra surpassed themselves in this number, making the occasion one to be remembered. Too seldom is a great classic given so notable a performance.

A new "Romantic Symphony," dedicated to the Boston Symphony Orchestra by Dr Howard Hanson, director of the Eastman School of Music at Rochester, N Y, was played for the first time anywhere. A program which proved less lacking in imaginative unity than one might assume from reading it, began with Wagner's "Flying Dutchman" overture and ended with Ravel's "Bolero."

Mr Gieseking, a musician of the finest taste as well as a remarkable pianist, gave so compelling an interpretation of the Beethoven concerto that even those to whom this piece has not in the past seemed the masterpiece it actually is, must have been impressed. Dr Koussevitzky and the orchestra provided Gieseking with the best accompaniment they have given any soloist. For a parallel one would have to go back to the memorable day in 1915 when the Boston Symphony under Dr Muck aided Kreisler in a performance of the Beethoven violin concerto that still seems to one who was lucky enough to hear it to have realized an ideal. This performance yesterday was renewed evidence that Dr Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony are not resting upon their laurels, but attaining greater heights each season. It is to be hoped that they will some day do for most classics what yesterday they did for the "Emperor Concerto."

Romantic Symphony

Dr Hanson, in a program note, explains that his "Romantic Symphony" represents for him "a definite and acknowledged embracing of the romantic phase."

"I recognize, of course," writes the composer, "that romanticism is at present the poor stepchild, without the social standing of her elder sister, neo-classicism. Nevertheless, I embrace her all the more fervently, believing, as I do, that romanticism will find in this country rich soil for a new, young, and vigorous growth."

This is a courageous and honest stand to take. The composer's aim in the symphony heard yesterday was, he further tells us, "to create a work young in spirit, romantic in temperament, and simple and direct in expression."

Although one cannot honestly feel that Dr Hanson succeeded in achieving his aim, one cannot but respect him for attempting, not what current Parisian musical fashion would dictate, but what he himself desired to do.

One thought yesterday, listening to Dr Hanson's symphony, of Dvorak's "New World" symphony, and of Charpentier's opera "Louise." There was no direct imitation or reminiscence of either work, though reminiscences of other familiar music occasionally obtruded themselves on the listening ear. But a Dvorak who had heard Stravinsky's rhythms and the dissonant harmonies now common property might, in his less inspired moments, have written such a work as this Romantic Symphony.

It was probably the cloying sweetness of much of Dr Hanson's dissonance that recalled Charpentier, as well as his manifesting at a rather late date romantic intentions. The audience seemed less pleased with the new work than one would have expected in view of its relatively tuneful and simple character. The composer was present, but did not conduct his work. Dr Koussevitzky's reading of it was notably eloquent and sympathetic.

Eloquent Reading

When Ravel's Bolero was first played here last season the audience made a demonstration hitherto unheard of at these concerts. Yesterday's applause for this tour de force, now grown stale through familiarity, was mildly cordial. More interesting was the fact that a number of persons were impelled to leave the hall during the music, driven no doubt by its monotony, which to some listeners is now almost intolerable. The present reviewer, having now listened to this Bolero six times, would never willingly listen to it again.

The reading of Wagner's early and, on the whole, rather empty and trivial overture was eloquent, but the orchestra played it less accurately than they did the other numbers.

There are no Symphony concerts here next week, as the orchestra will give a Beethoven Festival in Washington, D C. For Dec 12 and 13 the announced program includes the first public performance of Stravinsky's new "Symphonies de Psaumes," the most eagerly awaited of the several novelties commissioned for the 50th anniversary.

P. R.

GIESEKING PLAYS WITH SYMPHONY

Pianist Does Wonders With Beethoven's Concerto

Boston Post Nov 29

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

With an overture of Wagner, that to "The Flying Dutchman," a new "Romantic" Symphony from the facile and agreeable pen of Dr. Howard Hanson, a piano soloist, Walter Gieseking, doing wonders with Beethoven's "Emperor" Concerto, and finally Ravel's "Bolero," the most popular piece of last season's pop concerts, all on one programme, the subscribers to the Symphony concerts of this week have a cup that is running over.

GIESEKING'S ARTISTRY

There are those, to be sure, who regard "Bolero," with its studied monotony of rhythm, its ingenious long crescendo, its surprise modulation at the close, as a piece to be heard once and once only; but the concert-going public as a whole has by no means had its fill of it. Some among yesterday's audience may have felt that Dr. Koussevitzky's dramatic reading of the "Dutchman" overture was marred by the exuberant vigor of trumpets and trombones, now and then blown not wisely but too well. And those who are inconsiderate enough to scrutinize too closely a gift symphony may complain that Dr. Hanson's orotund and tuneful composition, written for the 50th anniversary of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is undistinguished, unduly reminiscent, and lacking in that indefinable yet precious and essential quality known as style.

But if any there were yesterday who found fault with Mr. Gieseking's and Dr. Koussevitzky's Beethoven, they were hard to suit indeed. Granted that there have been performances which lent this music greater breadth, a more heroic, more imperial quality, to make reference to the title which someone has foisted on this Concerto No. 5, in E-flat major. Yet finely chiseled, subtly proportioned as was Mr. Gieseking's version of this music, it was never anaemic, never lacking in vitality. And what a wealth of beauty was yesterday revealed in a work played within the last two decades at no less than nine pairs at Symphony concerts.

By common consent Beethoven nodded when he wrote the finale of the "Emperor." This movement has not the greatness, the lofty utterance, of the other two. But yesterday, thanks to the art of Mr. Gieseking and no less to that of Dr. Koussevitzky, this discrepancy was for once not marked. A rhythm firm yet flexible, a marvelous command of nuance, a rare delicacy, fineness and precision; these things yesterday made this finale engrossing. Mr. Gieseking has always seemed an admirable pianist. Yesterday he had gained a new stature. From him had come, and again conductor and orchestra must be given their share of the credit, a performance to be treasured in the recollection, one to serve as a standard by which future performances may be gauged.

Needless to say, the audience of yesterday rewarded Mr. Gieseking with warm and long-continued applause, as it had already bestowed its favor upon Dr. Hanson, called to the stage by Dr. Koussevitzky when the performance of his Symphony had come to an end.

MUSIC

Nov 29 Boston Herald

SYMPHONY CONCERT

By PHILIP HALE

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Dr. Koussevitzky, conductor, gave its seventh concert of the season yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Wagner, overture to "The Flying Dutchman." Hanson, Symphony No. 2 Romantic (first performance, composed for the 50th anniversary of the Boston Symphony orchestra). Beethoven, Concerto for piano, No. 5 (Walter Gieseking, pianist). Ravel, Bolero.

As the overture Leonore No. 3 is to "Fidelio," so is the overture to "The Flying Dutchman" to the opera. The two overtures give the condensed and essential drama. Beethoven spares us the tiresome secondary love affair and the quartet in which four persons, each with an individual emotion, express them by singing the same tune. In Wagner's we are relieved of the avaricious father who is delighted at the thought of handing over his daughter to the mysterious stranger; nor does one have to hear the bleatings of the saphead lover. No wonder Senta preferred the Dutchman.

Wagner's overture is a stormy seascape. The Dutchman knew no calm seas. The music that typifies him is one of Wagner's happiest inventions. Poor Vanderdecken sings nothing so compelling, not even in his monologue. One hears enough of Senta's ballad in the overture; one is not tempted to laugh at the operatic spinning wheels that stick when they should revolve; one does not find Wagner trying to write with Italian melodiousness. The performance yesterday deserved heartier applause than that awarded it.

Dr. Hanson, director of the Eastman School of Music at Rochester, New York, is not so burdened by official duties, that he cannot indulge in the luxury of composing. His Nordic symphony was performed here in April last year, and we believe that chamber music by him has been heard here. As director of the school, he has aided young composers by bringing out their works in concerts, so that they can hear them and revise them if necessary. His Romantic Symphony has interesting pages, especially those that are purely lyrical. It is a pity that he is so enamored of one or two figures, not important in themselves, that he cannot bear to leave them. The abrupt contrasts between measures that border on the sentimental and those that are chiefly noticeable for their stentorian outbursts do not gain dramatically what they lose in logical continuity. It is when Dr. Hanson is gently romantic that he is effective. The "sturm und drang" measures seldom impress, nor in them is his instrumentation so rich a garment for the ideas. He has ideas of value, which is more than can be said of Respighi's Theme and Variations also composed for the orchestra's ubilee. Dr. Koussevitzky and the players did everything in their power to put the symphony in a favorable light.

Mr. Gieseking and the orchestra gave a memorable performance of the concerto. That the pianist's technical proficiency was fully displayed goes without saying; yet one cannot help alluding to his treatment of octave passages in the first movement—the crescendo and diminuendo here as in many runs; the quiet, unostentatious brilliance of it all; the delicate dynamic gradations. More than all this was the grasp of the aesthetic, emotional contents. If the concerto was grandly planned by the composer, it was grandly understood by the pianist, by his adjustment of the piano to the part given to the orchestra, by the prevailing spirit of the interpretation. At no time did the piano assert itself impertinently; it did not refuse to furnish a beautiful accompaniment; when it was called on to have its own say, what Beethoven gave it, was said eloquently. Seldom does one hear so perfect and engrossing ensembles, for Mr. Gieseking does not play, whoever the composer may be, for self glorification. No merchant traffics in his soul.

With the concerto and the impression of pure music the concert might well have ended. As it was, it was too long. Ravel's clever and amusing trick does not excite surprise and wonder by repetition, no matter how deftly the trick is performed. The judge which feared not God neither regarded man finally allowed a widow seeking vengeance to see him, saying within himself, "Lest by her continual coming she weary me." The judicial audience—we speak out of courtesy—is apparently not wearied by the continual coming of Ravel's theme which is said to be of Arabian origin, chiefly because those who hear it for the first time are agog to know what is coming next.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The orchestra will be in Washington, D. C., from Tuesday evening to Saturday afternoon, inclusive. The program of the concerts Dec. 12, 13 will be as follows: Mozart, Symphony in G minor; Stravinsky, Symphony of Psalms for orchestra with chorus (the Cecilia)—verses from Psalm 38 (in the Vulgate)—not 28 as Stravinsky has it on his title page—verses from Psalm 39—and the whole of Psalm 150. This symphony was composed for the jubilee; Stravinsky's Capriccio for orchestra with piano solo (Mr. Sanroma), and a repetition of Stravinsky's symphony.

CLIPPING FROM

71

Symphonic Afternoon, Brim-Full

Dr. Hanson's New Symphony, From Wagner to "Bolero," Memorable Concerto

Trans. Nov 29

THE THIRD of the symphonies with which commissioned composers have responded to the jubilee of the Boston Orchestra was played for the first time, yesterday, at Symphony Hall. It happened to be work of an American composer, Dr. Howard Hanson, director of the Eastman School of Music at Rochester. The circumstance does not signify, since it is the just and catholic policy of Dr. Koussevitzky to make no distinctions of nationality (Americans included', whether he is distributing commissions or choosing a program. Of the symphonies preceding Dr. Hansen's, one was Roussel's; the other Prokoffiev's. Both were short; while Dr. Hanson's kept to that same benignant measure. Undoubtedly, symphonic lengths, like those of Bruckner and Mahler—to say nothing of Strauss's later tone-poems — are out of fashion. There are even young image-breakers who prefer the Brahmsian four to the Beethovenian nine, because Johannes is usually more compact than Ludwig. Thanks to the modernists, brevity is now the symphonic word, as Stravinsky, Honegger and Hill—also of the commissioned—will subsequently testify.

Roussel and Prokoffiev followed another happy modernistic fashion. The matter and manner of both their symphonies was relatively light. Now, there is not a reason why a symphony should be necessarily weighty of content and portentous of speech, except that much German example and more German dogma affirm that so must it be. The eighteenth century, to which most musicians are harking back, held to the tolerant view. Let a symphony be what the composer chose for substance and surface, so long as it was musically unified and musically interesting. Roussel, last month, added lightness of design and content to many another merit. With Prokoffiev, not long ago, a kindred lightness soothed irritating repetitions. Lightness, like brevity, is again the symphonic fashion.

Seemingly Dr. Hanson would also be "in the movement." In a program-note he writes of his new symphony: "My aim was to create a work young in spirit, romantic in temperament, simple and direct in expression"—all of which implies a music light in conception and executon. But the hallowed leaven of Teutonic length, breadth and thickness has long worked within him. From it rose the matter and the manner of "Pan and The Priest" and the Nordic Symphony, his two pieces of large dimensions hitherto heard in Boston. In the Romantic Symphony, played on Friday, he has creditably discarded length; but cannot put by breadth and thickness. The big tone, of which a modern orchestra is capable, sorely tempts him. To this day he cannot resist it through sonorous measures in full harmony.

Then and there Dr. Hanson's music indeed "sounds," but it also runs thickly. There are pages in this new symphony, when the composer is straining toward heights and depths, that might have been written by some German of the second or the third rank, soused in the theories and practice of 1910. Yet the American knows and, on occasion, utilizes a better way—the cleanly cut, sharply charactered, "open-work" play of timbres and harmonies that is one of the modernist gains to music. By so much there is progress in the present and promise for the future. It is high time that Dr. Hanson renounced the outmoded symphonic tradition of the Germans; accepted frankly the modernist procedures, toward which certain pages of the Romantic Symphony incline. To some of us his most individual piece is still the String Quartet of 1923, not little of which was frankly modernist.

Otherwise this new symphony suffers under the shortcoming that pursues Americans equally as composers or executants of music—the lack of individual, and therefore distinctive, quality. The commissioned symphony of Roussel —"young master at sixty-three," as Mr. Gilman aptly phrased it—is his and no other's. Prokoffiev's Fourth Symphony, though it is secondary, not to say minor Prokoffiev, bears many of his earmarks. The lay ear found Respighi's commissioned Variations over-written and tedious; but to the professional listener they teemed with his characteristics, faults included. Among us Americans, Mr. Loeffler of the elder generation; Mr. Carpenter and Mr. Hill of the middle; Mr. Copland and Mr. Sessions of the younger, have individualized themselves. Among executants, who of us, following Mr. Spalding's career, has forgotten how long he worked to achieve an individual style as violinist?

Now, in the light of these examples, recall Dr. Hanson's symphony of yesterday. The basic musical thoughts—that is to say the germinating and principal motiv that pervades the whole music, the subordinate motivs outspringing from it or contrasting with it—are clear-spoken and engaging. The composer develops them with skill and a measure of interest to hearers. But do they, or the development, bear any stamp by which ear, mind and imagination recognize the thoughts, processes, moods and emotions of Howard Hanson composing and of no other music-maker? Rather, they are too close to the regular thing in the regular way — not imitative, to be sure, but none the less conventional; out, so to say, of the general—and not the particular—stock of music in our plenteous time.

Note again the implications of the title—a Romantic Symphony. Possibly the essence of romance is personal intensity of vision, imagination, emotion and creation; therewith an impinging strangeness, as of new worlds discovered, upon the intensified hearer. Of such are the impassioned first movements of Beethoven's greater symphonies; the finer or ampler tempered songs of Schubert; or, to descend to lesser men, the symphonies of Berlioz where they are not yet withered, or the tone-poems of Liszt, when something still remains under sound and fury. Does the listener feel this essence suffusing Dr. Hanson's Romantic Symphony, penetrating and illuding? More than half persuaded by the label, he believes he detects it; listens the more intently only to discover that it smacks of formula; that it lacks intensity and individuality. Better he says to himself the discordant whirl of Mr. Copland's forgotten and now discarded piano-concerto than this tame replica of a half-emotional, half-musical convention. All of which is not to discourage Dr. Hanson; but to bid him find himself as an individually imaginative and accomplishing composer. At thirty-four, there is still bonne chance.

Needless to say, Dr. Koussevitzky spared no pains in the performance of Dr. Hanson's symphony; while by this time from sheer instinct the orchestra answers to his will as to no conducting composer. As it seemed, he drew forth all that the music contained; clarified, animated, and would character it along the way. Dr. Hanson, indeed, might have repeated Monsieur Roussel's concise word —"parfait"—at the final hearing of his Symphony. . . . The conductor was less fortunate with his version of Wagner's overture to "The Flying Dutchman" with which the concert began. He overdid it, almost exactly as he overdid Beethoven's third "Leonora" overture, when he first laid it before Bostonian ears. Then, Dr. Koussevitzky would dramatize every curve, every contrast, every transition, almost each phrase and each modulation. Inevitably the listener heard the overture as so many intensified "bits" laid side by side, not in flow, sweep and ascendant climax. Soon Dr. Koussevitzky lessened this over-zeal; remembered that a dramatic overture is also a piece of unfolding, close-knit music; then attained the two-fold performance of the "Leonora" overture that we now hear, marvelling at the musical and the dramatic eloquence fused.

Gradually, no doubt, the conductor's version of the overture to "The Flying Dutchman" will undergo like transformation. There is no need to exhaust the art of conducting upon the Hollander's storm-tossed music at beginning and at return. Wagner, foreshadowing his mature self, gave it sufficient force. The hush, until there is scarcely audible sound, as it dwindles toward the first hint of Senta's devoted and redeeming presence, exceeds the musico-dramatic contrast. So onward through the overture, with more than enough "theater" and rather less than enough music. Until the final idealizing of Senta's theme, proclaiming release and salvation to the cursed and haunted Hollander. Then Dr. Koussevitzky, stilling the tempest and opening the heavens, goes hand in hand with Wagner himself.

There were amends in the conductor's repetition of Ravel's "Bolero." At his hands, more than ever before, the piece seemed the tour de force that it actually is rather than an exercise in instrumental technique, through willed repetitions, to rack the nerves of hearers. Faithfully, Dr. Koussevitzky accepted the composer's deliberate pace. More than usual he stilled the beginnings. Like an insidious force the motiv, the rhythm, the tune, spread from wind instrument to wind instrument, until group after group, choir upon choir, seized, enhanced, enriched. As hardly before, the listener heard that endless and changeless plucking of the lighter strings until it is their turn to take over and sharpen that ceaseless tune. As hardly before, conductor and orchestra drove crescendo over crescendo, each drawing tauter the suspense, until the flashing modulation into E major and the final outburst of cumulated musical sound. Call "Bolero" a feat, as it undoubtedly is; but there are feats that come close to genius. In this instance the genius of orchestral manipulation—instruments, groups, choirs, tonal detail and tonal mass. Nor does the effect upon hearers diminish. "Bolero" ended a long concert. To the end a "Friday audience" stayed.

Already, the climax had come in the performance of Beethoven's Concerto in E-flat with Mr. Gieseking as pianist, with conductor and orchestra no less than he in the vein. Together they played the piece symphonically. Now and again the piano was the predominant, outspeaking voice; yet from the frame and body of the whole; while constant was the interchange between it and the orchestra as mated or contrasted media for the musical thought, suggestion, emotion. From the beginning, as though it would gather and fuse the sources of the music, to the end in rhythmic brilliance and tonal power, the first movement swept forward loftily, superbly, as though for once this "Emperor Concerto" should deserve its name. Various as Beethoven were pianist and conductor, yet firmly they concentrated and cumulated the advance.

In the slow movement, the Gieseking who had been all for vigor began as one all for finesse; while the orchestra answered him with its suavest euphonies. Together they enlarged the melody to a serene and deeper-toned beauty that is complement to the first Allegro of power. Mr. Gieseking made the transition into the finale with conjuring fingers. The rest was the give-and-take of a virtuoso pianist and a virtuoso orchestra—musicians both—through Beethoven's gay riot of motivs and motion. . . . Since Dr. Muck's afternoon with Kreisler there has been no Beethoven in concerto-form to match yesterday's—not even when Heifetz was "assisting artist." H. T. P.

They Shall Not Creak

Footnote to the Chronicles of Symphony Hall

WITHIN recollection a mystery play, acted in Boston, was named "The Creaking Chair." In it, at proper moments, a chair creaked ominously. On the stage of Symphony Hall, through more years than the weeks over which the play ran, chairs have also creaked—annoyingly. They creaked because they were made of wood, with joiner-work that stirred unsympathetically under the movements of sitting orchestral players. The regular conductor and all but the most sensitive players gradually accustomed themselves to this minute obbligato. But when a guest-conductor led, or a composer put the orchestra through his own piece, the creaking often rasped his nerves and irritated his temper.

Hence the change to the chairs on view for the first time last Tuesday, discovered yesterday by the subscription audience of Friday afternoons. In shape and color they are more seemly to the observing eye; but that is a minor merit. The more essential virtues are two: First, at the small of their backs the players fit neatly into the new chairs. Second, for that reason and inasmuch as the chairs are made of jointless metal, there is not, and there cannot be, any creaking. With this amelioration of orchestral conditions—as the solemn historians may write, fifty years on—this slight footnote to the chronicle of Symphony Hall may end.

At a pair of Symphony Concerts in December, Dr. Koussevitzky, the orchestra and two assisting singers will repeat Mahler's "Song of the Earth," first heard at Symphony Hall two seasons ago, generally counted the composer's masterpiece.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
POST
NOV 30 1930

NOTABLE WEEK TO CELEBRATE HALF CENTURY

One of the greatest festivals of orchestral music ever offered in the United States, and an event without parallel in the musical history of Washington, will be given at Constitution Hall on Tuesday, Wednesday and Friday evenings at 8:30 o'clock and on Saturday afternoon at 3 o'clock of the current week, December 2, 3, 5 and 6, when the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitsky, conductor, celebrates the fiftieth anniversary of its founding with a mighty four-performance Beethoven festival.

Three great Beethoven concertos, three of the same composer's most famous overtures and five of his mightiest symphonies will be given by Dr. Koussevitzky and his orchestra during the week at hand, but what is of even greater moment is the fact that at three of the four performances, three world-famous instrumentalists—Myra Hess and Josef Hofmann, pianists, and Efrem Zimbalist, violinist—will appear as soloists. The fourth and final performance will be notable for its presentation of 200 voices with four additional soloists.

The program follows:

First performance—Tuesday evening, December 2, at 8:30 o'clock: Overture to Goethe's "Egmont," Opus 84. Concerto for pianoforte No. 4 in G major, Opus 58—Allegro moderato; Andante con moto; Rondo vivace: Myra Hess, soloist. Symphony No. 3 in E flat major, "Erocia," Opus 55—Allegro con brio; Marcia funebre; Adagio assai; Scherzo: Allegro vivace, trio; Finale: Allegro molto.

Second performance — Wednesday evening, December 3, at 8:30 o'clock: Overture to "Leonore," No. 3, Opus 72. Concerto for violin in D major, Opus 61—Allegro ma non troppo; Larghetto; Rondo, Efrem Zimbalist, soloist. Symphony No. 5 in C minor, Opus 67—Allegro con brio; Andante con moto; Allegro, trio; Allegro.

Third performance—Friday evening, December 5, at 8:30 o'clock: Overture to Collin's Tragedy, "Coriolanus," Opus 62; Concerto for pianoforte No. 5 in E flat major, Opus 73—Allegro; Adagio un pocomosso; Rondo: Allegro ma non troppo, Josef Hofmann, soloist. Symphony No. 7 in A major, Opus 92—Poco sostenuto, vivace; Allegretto; Presto, Assai meno presto: Tempo primo; Allegro con brio.

Fourth performance—Saturday afternoon, December 6, at 3 o'clock: Symphony No. 1 in C major, Opus 21—Adagio molto, allegro con brio; Andante cantabile con moto; Menuetto: Allegro molto e vivace, trio; Finale: Adagio, Allegro melto e vivace. Symphony No. 9 in D minor, with final chorus on Schiller's "Ode to Joy," Opus 125—Allegro, ma non troppo, un poco maestoso; Molto vivace, presto; Adagio molto e cantabile; Presto; Allegro assai; Presto; barytone recitative; quartet and chorus: allegro assai; Tenor solo and chorus: Allegro assai vivace alla marcia; chorus: Allegro assai; chorus: Andante maestoso, Adagio, ma non troppo, ma divote, Allegro energico, sempre ben marcato; quartet and chorus: Allegro ma non tanto: Prestissimo; soloists, Jeanette Vreeland, soprano; Nevade Van Der Veer, contralto; Dan Gridley, tenor; Fraser Gange, basso; chorus of 200 by National Capital Oratorio Society, Albert W. Harned, director.

FOUNDED 1900

FLORENCE FRENCH
EDITOR AND PUBLISHER

MUSICAL LEADER

E. F. SMITH
J. DEMERATH
F. M. WARD

TELEPHONE { 4839 HARRISON 5408
CABLE ADDRESS: MUSICLEAD CHICAGO

SUBSCRIPTION: $3.00 FOR YEAR
CANADIAN $4.00 FOR YEAR
FOREIGN $4.50 FOR YEAR

PUBLISHED EVERY THURSDAY

501 McCORMICK BUILDING
332 SO. MICHIGAN AVE.
CHICAGO.

DEC 1 1930

YOUR ATTENTION IS CALLED TO THE ATTACHED CLIPPING WHICH APPEARED IN LAST THURSDAY'S ISSUE OF THE MUSICAL LEADER.

New Russian Symphony Played

On Saturday afternoon, in addition to Glinka's Overture to "Russlan and Ludmilla" and Tchaikovsky's Fourth Symphony, The Boston Symphony played a new symphony by Nicolas Nabokov, a young Russian composer, living in Paris. Koussevitzky aroused great applause by his vital and dramatic interpretation of Tchaikovsky. The orchestra is in splendid shape and the tone is full and beautiful. The symphony by Nabokov is in three movements. It is short and romantic in character with moments of dramatic climax. Its form is concentrated, the last movement being very short in proportion to the rest. There is practically no development of the themes, although there are long melodic lines and well harmonized parts. Perhaps one might call the work ultra-modern in its form and in the fact that the young Russian has gone away completely from the recent cacophony which the public has come to expect of contemporaneous works.

Roussel Symphony Produced

The Boston Symphony Orchestra opened its forty-fifth season in New York, Nov. 20. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky conducted a program of contrasts consisting of Berlioz's "The Roman Carnival," Roussel's Symphony in G minor, opus 42, and Brahms' 2nd symphony, in D Major. The Roussel work was written for the fiftieth anniversary of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and had its first performance in Boston a few weeks ago with the composer present. Mr. Roussel who came to this country as the guest of Mrs. Elizabeth Sprague Coolidge for her Festival of Chamber Music in Chicago, was an officer in the French Navy and took up the study of music at the Schola Cantorum where he worked for nine years under the direction of Vincent D'Indy. His list of compositions is long and includes many works for orchestra, opera-ballet, vocal works, chamber music, songs, piano pieces, an impromptu for the harp and a work for guitar called "Segovia." The symphony is in four movements: Allegro vivo, Adagio, Vivace and Allegro con spirito. It is marked with splendid rhythmical vigor and is short and concentrated in form. Roussel has expressed himself in an individual fashion, yet favoring present day methods. While the first movement is full of interest and vitality the second movement shows a rich sense of emotional feeling and beauty. It is harmonically strong and effective. The scherzo movement starts most originally and entertainingly. He develops a banal waltz theme with clever technical embellishments. The finale abounds in rhythmical contrasts and entertaining figurations. The effect of the entire symphony is excellent and makes one desire to hear it again. Koussevitzky gave it a brilliant and sympathetic reading.

His interpretation of the Brahms Symphony was noble, broad, poetic, and satisfying.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
STAR
DEC 1 - 1930

Music and Musicians

Reviews and News of Capital's Programs.

Sacred Concert Given At St. Dominic's Church.

A SACRED concert of more than usual interest took place last night at St. Dominic's Church. Constantino Yon, celebrated organist of St. Ferrer Church, New York City, and a double male quartet were the guest soloists. The program included music that is notable in ecclesiastic music circles and was offered by the artists with considerable skill.

The acoustics in the church being particularly true, Mr. Yon had a chance to give the new organ—which was being dedicated—the widest possible range. Playing selections by Ravanello, P. Yon, Guilmant and Boes, Mr. Yon demonstrated not only the beauty of the recently installed organ, but his own technical proficiences in the matter of performance. Attaining the utmost in tone and harmony, the music swelled through the church with a mellow quality that is seldom heard outside of the fifty old cathedrals.

Assisting Mr. Yon were singers, most of whom are soloists at St. Ferrer Church, besides being members of various opera companies, and, hence, among the foremost singers in the land. Mr. Barbieri, for instance, who sang the "Populo Meus," by Palestrina most excellently, is a member of the La Scala Opera Co. of Milan, and Ivan Velikanuff is a member of the German Opera Co. and Arturo Imparato of the San Carlo Opera Co. Included also among the soloists were: Guiseppe Reschiglian, distinguished for his services at the Verona Opera Co. and the Philadelphia as well; Abcar Bovajian, Irving Alves, Alfredo Carniato and Frank ber—all of whom, in greater or lesser capacity, contributed much to the gala concert.

THE first of three concerts of the Georgetown music series will take place next Thursday night at Christ Church Parish Hall, the artists including: Helen Belt, violinist; Richard Lorleberg, cellist, and Adolf Torovsky, pianist. The program will include the Mendelssohn "Trio No. 1, Op. 49," selections for the piano by Cyril Scott, the Bach "Air," Chopin-Sarasate "Nocturne" and "Spanish Dance" by Rehfield. The concert is scheduled for 8:30 p.m.

DR. AND MRS. CHARLES B. KEEFER entertained at a musical tea at their home yesterday afternoon. Among the soloists who appeared were: Dan Thew Wright, jr.; Martha Waid, a quartet composed of Helen Bury, Frances Cole, H. S. Snyder and Robert Davidson, and Mrs. Keefer, who sang several selections herself. Eula Alexander and Mildred Kolb Stoltze were the accompanists.

WASHINGTONIANS should be more interested in the word that comes from the offices of the Chicago Opera Co. to the effect that tomorrow evening Emma Redell, local songstress, who has risen to well-nigh immortal heights, is to make her debut with the Windy City's famous opera company. Miss Redell will make her inaugural appearance in Wagner's "Tannhaeuser" as Elizabeth, in which role, it is said, she [illegible] Germany."

THE Union Station, tomorrow morning at a very early hour, will be alive with music cases, music and musicians, since, with the arrival of the "Federal" from Boston, two enormous carloads will be bringing hither the Boston Symphony Orchestra and its famous conductor, Serge Koussevitzky. Some time after, another important train will arrive bearing with it Myra Hess, the first of the soloists for the Beethoven Festival, which hangs out its initial banner tomorrow night. Incidentally, the libraries have reported that their supply of Beethoven data has become just about exhausted, due to eager Beethovenites who are said to be brushing up on all that they know—or don't know. At any rate, the city is alive with musical excitement, and Mrs. Wilson-Greene, the local manager of all this, is said to be anxiously trying to satisfy customers who insist that they must sit in the very same row that everybody else wants to sit in.

E. de S. M.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
HERALD
DEC 1 - 1930

MANY SUBSCRIBE TO BEETHOVEN FETE

Those who have subscribed to the forthcoming Beethoven Festival of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Constitution Hall on December 2, 3, 5 and 6 were announced by Mrs. Wilson-Greene, who is managing the affair locally, as follows:

Mrs. Herbert Hoover, Mrs. Anne Archbold, Mrs. F. A. Keep, Mrs. William Butterworth, Mrs. Adolf Miller, Miss Mabel Boardman, Mrs. Edwin B. Parker, Mrs. Frank S. Bright, Miss Alice Clapp, Mrs. J. B. Kendall, Mrs. Beale R. Howard, Mrs. Ross Thompson, Mrs. Lowell Fletcher Hobart, Mrs. William Crozier, Mrs. Thomas W. Phillips, jr., and Mrs. Hennen Jennings.

Mrs. Charles R. Shepard, Mrs. Franklin Ellis, Mrs. Patrick J. Hurley, Mrs. Henry Leonard, Mrs. George E. Hamilton, Mrs. George Thorpe, Justice Jennings Bailey, Admiral and Mrs. W. L. Capps, Mrs. Leander McCormack-Goodhart, Mrs. Ridgely Hunt, Mrs. T. H. B. McKnight, Mrs. Frank C. Baldwin, Mrs. David A. Reed, Mrs. F. W. Pleadwell, the Countee Szechenyi, Mrs. Stephen B. Elkins, Mrs. Tracy Dows, Mrs. Armistead Peter 3d, Mrs. Henry Flather, Mrs. Christian Heurich.

Mrs. Chester Bolton, Mrs. F. A. Delano, Mrs. William C. Eustis, Mrs. U. S. Grant 3d, Mrs. James Hogan, Miss A. Hegeman, Mrs. Demarest Lloyd, Mrs. Edward B. Meigs, Mrs. Eugene Meyer, Mr. and Mrs. Frank B. Noyes, Mrs. Lawrence Phipps, Mme. Roso, Mrs. Alexander Rogers, Mrs. Anson Phelps Stokes, Mrs. Charles Rhoads, Mrs. Lawrence Townsend, Mrs. F. C. Walcott, Mrs. Montgomery Blair, Mrs. Price Whitaker, and others.

* * *

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
TIMES
DEC 1 - 1930

Mrs. Hoover To Attend Concert

First Lady Heads List of Washington Women Subscribing to Boston Symphony Orchestra

Mrs. Hoover heads the list of notable Washington women who have subscribed to the Beethoven festival of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Constitution Hall this week.

The first concert will be held tomorrow afternoon and on Wednesday, Friday and Saturday.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
HERALD
DEC 1 - 1930

Arts Club to Honor Dr. Koussevitzky

The Arts Club of Washington will give a reception at its clubhouse, 2017 I St., on Wednesday afternoon from 3:30 to 5 o'clock in honor of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will give a series of four concerts in Washington this week in connection with the Beethoven Festival The reception is under the auspices of the hospitality committee of the club, of which Miss Marjorie Lowe is chairman.

FOUNDED 1900

FLORENCE FRENCH
EDITOR AND PUBLISHER

MUSICAL LEADER

E. F. SM
J. DEMEF
F. M. W

TELEPHONE { 4839 HARRISON { 5408
CABLE ADDRESS: MUSICLEAD CHICAGO

PUBLISHED EVERY THURSDAY

CHICAGO.

SUBSCRIPTION: $3.(
CANADIAN $4.0
FOREIGN $4.5(

501 MCCORMIC
332 SO. MICH

YOUR ATTENTION IS CALLED TO THE ATTACHED CLIPPING WHICH APPEARED II THURSDAY'S ISSUE OF THE MUSICAL LEADER.

New Russian Symphony Played

On Saturday afternoon, in addition to Glinka's Overture to "Russlan and Ludmilla" and Tchaikovsky's Fourth Symphony, The Boston Symphony played a new symphony by Nicolas Nabokov, a young Russian composer, living in Paris. Koussevitzky aroused great applause by his vital and dramatic interpretation of Tchaikovsky. The orchestra is in splendid shape and the tone is full and beautiful. The symphony by Nabokov is in three movements. It is short and romantic in character with moments of dramatic climax. Its form is concentrated, the last movement being very short in proportion to the rest. There is practically no development of the themes, although there are long melodic lines and well harmonized parts. Perhaps one might call the work ultra-modern in its form and in the fact that the young Russian has gone away completely from the recent cacophony which the public has come to expect of contemporaneous works.

FOUNDED 1900

FLORENCE FRENCH
EDITOR AND PUBLISHER

MUSICAL LEADER

E. F. SMITH
J. DEMERATH
F. M. WARD

TELEPHONE { 4839 HARRISON { 5408
CABLE ADDRESS: MUSICLEAD CHICAGO

PUBLISHED EVERY THURSDAY

CHICAGO.

SUBSCRIPTION: $3.00 FOR YEAR
CANADIAN $4.00 FOR YEAR
FOREIGN $4.50 FOR YEAR

501 MCCORMICK BUILDING
332 SO. MICHIGAN AVE.

YOUR ATTENTION IS CALLED TO THE ATTACHED CLIPPING WHICH APPEARED IN LAST THURSDAY'S ISSUE OF THE MUSICAL LEADER.

Roussel Symphony Produced

The Boston Symphony Orchestra opened its forty-fifth season in New York, Nov. 20. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky conducted a program of contrasts consisting of Berlioz's "The Roman Carnival," Roussel's Symphony in G minor, opus 42, and Brahms' 2nd symphony, in D Major. The Roussel work was written for the fiftieth anniversary of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and had its first performance in Boston a few weeks ago with the composer present. Mr. Roussel who came to this country as the guest of Mrs. Elizabeth Sprague Coolidge for her festival of Chamber Music in Chicago, was an officer in the French Navy and took up the study of music at the Schola Cantorum where he worked for nine years under the direction of Vincent D'Indy. His list of compositions is long and includes many works for orchestra, opera-ballet, vocal works, chamber music, songs, piano pieces, an impromptu for the harp and a work for guitar called "Segovia." The symphony is in four movements: Allegro vivo, Adagio, Vivace and Allegro con spirito. It is marked with splendid rhythmical vigor and is short and concentrated in form. Roussel has expressed himself in an individual fashion, yet favoring present day methods. While the first movement is full of interest and vitality, the second movement shows a rich sense of emotional beauty. It is harmonically strong and effective. The Vivace movement starts most originally and then suddenly develops a banal waltz theme with many bellishments. The finale about [illegible] trasts and entertaining figuration. The entire symphony is excellent and we want to hear it again. Koussevitzky gave it a most sympathetic reading.

His interpretation of [illegible] noble, broad, poetic, and

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
STAR
DEC 1 - 1930

Music and Musicians

Reviews and News of Capital's Programs.

Sacred Concert Given At St. Dominic's Church.

A SACRED concert of more than usual interest took place last night at St. Dominic's Church. Constantino Yon, celebrated organist of St. Ferrer Church, New York City, and a double male quartet were the guest soloists. The program included music that is notable in ecclesiastic music circles and was offered by the artists with considerable skill.

The acoustics in the church being particularly true, Mr. Yon had a chance to give the new organ—which was being dedicated—the widest possible range. Playing selections by Ravanello, P. Yon, Guilmant and Boes, Mr. Yon demonstrated not only the beauty of the recently installed organ, but his own technical proficiences in the matter of performance. Attaining the utmost in tone and harmony, the music swelled through the church with a mellow quality that is seldom heard outside of the very old cathedrals.

Assisting Mr. Yon were singers, most of whom are soloists at St. Ferrer Church, besides being members of various opera companies, and, hence, among the foremost singers in the land. Mr. Barbieri, for instance, who sang the "Populo Meus," by Palestrina most excellently, is a member of the La Scala Opera Co. of Milan, and Ivan Velikanuff is a member of the German Opera Co. and Arturo Imparato of the San Carlo Opera Co. Included also among the soloists were: Guiseppe Reschiglian, distinguished for his services at the Venice Opera Co. and the Philadelphia as well; Abcar Bovajian, Irving Alves, Alfredo Carniato and Frank Huber—all of whom, in greater or lesser capacity, contributed much to the gala concert.

THE first of three concerts of the Georgetown music series will take place next Thursday night at Christ Church Parish Hall, the artists including: Helen Belt, violinist; Richard Lorleberg, cellist, and Adolf Torovsky, pianist. The program will include the Mendelssohn "Trio No. 1, Op. 49," selections for the piano by Cyril Scott, the Bach "Air," Chopin-Sarasate "Nocturne" and "Spanish Dance," by Rehfield. The concert is scheduled for 8:30 p.m.

DR. AND MRS. CHARLES B. KEEFER entertained at a musical tea at their home yesterday afternoon. Among the soloists who appeared were: Dan Thew Wright, jr.; Martha Waid, a quartet composed of Helen Bury, Frances Cole, H. S. Snyder and Robert Davidson, and Mrs. Keefer, who sang several selections herself. Eula Alexander and Mildred Kolb Schulze were the accompanists.

WASHINGTONIANS should be more interested in the word that comes from the offices of the Chicago Opera Co. to the effect that tomorrow evening Emma Redell, local songstress, who has risen to well-nigh immortal heights, is to make her debut with the Windy City's famous opera company. Miss Redell will make her inaugural appearance in Wagner's "Tannhaeuser" as Elizabeth, in which role, it is said, she will [illegible] German [illegible] Ideal Wagner Singer of Germany."

THE Union Station, tomorrow morning at a very early hour, will be alive with music cases, music and musicians, since, with the arrival of the "Federal" from Boston, two enormous carloads will be bringing hither the Boston Symphony Orchestra and its famous conductor, Serge Koussevitszky. Some time after, another important train will arrive bearing with it Myra Hess, the first of the soloists for the Beethoven Festival, which hangs out its initial banner tomorrow night. Incidentally, the libraries have reported that their supply of Beethoven data has become just about exhausted, due to eager Beethovenites who are said to be brushing up on all that they know—or don't know. At any rate, the city is alive with musical excitement, and Mrs. Wilson-Greene, the local manager of all this, is said to be anxiously trying to satisfy customers who insist that they must sit in the very same row that everybody else wants to sit in.

E. de S. M.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
HERALD
DEC 1 - 1930

MANY SUBSCRIBE TO BEETHOVEN FETE

Those who have subscribed to the forthcoming Beethoven Festival of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Constitution Hall on December 2, 3, 5 and 6 were announced by Mrs. Wilson-Greene, who is managing the affair locally, as follows:

Mrs. Herbert Hoover, Mrs. Anne Archbold, Mrs. F. A. Keep, Mrs. William Butterworth, Mrs. Adolf Miller, Miss Mabel Boardman, Mrs. Edwin B. Parker, Mrs. Frank S. Bright, Miss Alice Clapp, Mrs. J. B. Kendall, Mrs. Beale R. Howard, Mrs. Ross Thompson, Mrs. Lowell Fletcher Hobart, Mrs. William Crozier, Mrs. Thomas W. Phillips, jr., and Mrs. Hennen Jennings.

Mrs. Charles R. Shepard, Mrs. Franklin Ellis, Mrs. Patrick J. Hurley, Mrs. Henry Leonard, Mrs. George E. Hamilton, Mrs. George Thorpe, Justice Jennings Bailey, Admiral and Mrs. W. L. Capps, Mrs. Leander McCormack-Goodhart, Mrs. Ridgely Hunt, Mrs. T. H. B. McKnight, Mrs. Frank C. Baldwin, Mrs. David A. Reed, Mrs. F. W. Pleadwell, the Countee Szechenyi, Mrs. Stephen B. Elkins, Mrs. Tracy Dows, Mrs. Armistead Peter 3d, Mrs. Henry Flather, Mrs. Christian Heurich.

Mrs. Chester Bolton, Mrs. F. A. Delano, Mrs. William C. Eustis, Mrs. U. S. Grant 3d, Mrs. James Hogan, Miss A. Hegeman, Mrs. Demarest Lloyd, Mrs. Edward B. Meigs, Mrs. Eugene Meyer, Mr. and Mrs. Frank B. Noyes, Mrs. Lawrence Phipps, Mme. Roso, Mrs. Alexander Rogers, Mrs. Anson Phelps Stokes, Mrs. Charles Rhoads, Mrs. Lawrence Townsend, Mrs. F. C. Walcott, Mrs. Montgomery Blair, Mrs. Price Whitaker, and others.

* * *

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
TIMES
DEC 1 - 1930

Mrs. Hoover To Attend Concert

First Lady Heads List of Washington Women Subscribing to Boston Symphony Orchestra

Mrs. Hoover heads the list of notable Washington women who have subscribed to the Beethoven festival of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Constitution Hall this week.

The first concert will be held tomorrow afternoon and on Wednesday, Friday and Saturday.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
HERALD
DEC 1 - 1930

Arts Club to Honor Dr. Koussevitzky

The Arts Club of Washington will give a reception at its clubhouse, 2017 I St., on Wednesday afternoon from 3:30 to 5 o'clock in honor of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will give a series of four concerts in Washington this week in connection with the Beethoven Festival The reception is under the auspices of the hospitality committee of the club, of which Miss Marjorie Lowe is chairman.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
STAR
DEC 2 - 1930

BEETHOVEN FETE TO OPEN TONIGHT

Boston Symphony Orchestra Arrives for Opening Concert of Program.

From Denver to Bath, Me., people are coming to Washington today for the opening of the Beethoven festival—probably the greatest music festival that this city has ever seen. Starting tonight, with a program given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Serge Koussevitzky, this gala week of music, which is dedicated to the fiftieth anniversary of Beethoven's death, will continue through until Saturday, other concerts being scheduled to take place Wednesday and Friday evenings and Saturday afternoon at Constitution Hall.

This morning two special cars arrived bringing the Boston orchestra with its 115 men and its staff of technicians. They scattered to various quarters during the day and assembled later at Constitution Hall for a final rehearsal. Tonight at 8:30 the initial concert gets under way.

Distinguished Artists.

Not since the Boston held its famous festival in 1927 has such a complete program of Beethoven been assembled at one time and in one city. The greatest interest has been aroused through all sections of the country.

Not only one of the most famous symphony orchestras, but the most distinguished artists have been assembled for this occasion. Josef Hofmann, Efrem Zimbalist and Myra Hess are to appear during the week as soloists. Miss Hess, who arrived in this city yesterday, will be the first guest artist on the program, playing a Beethoven concerto at tonight's concert. Efrem Zimbalist, world famous violinist, will play at Wednesday's concert and Josef Hofmann comes Friday to appear as guest artist with the Boston Symphony.

Local Chorus of 200 Voices.

Appropriately enough, a fitting climax to this great musical week will be the performance at Constitution Hall on Saturday afternoon of Beethoven's "Ninth Symphony"—which besides the orchestra and soloists, will include a local chorus of 200 voices. This chorus, which has been trained by Dr. Albert W. Harned of Washington, is composed of members of the National Capital Oratorio Association, and is one of the largest ever to be assembled in this city.

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will conduct all four concerts at Constitution Hall. The festival is under the local management of Mrs. Wilson-Greene.

ARTISTS IN BEETHOVEN FESTIVAL

Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and Myra Hess, pianist, who are appearing at Constitution Hall tonight.
—Drawn for The Star by Lydia Hess.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
NEWS
DEC 3 - 1930

MUSIC

A British woman plays Beethoven superbly and the Festival by the Boston Symphony has a brilliant start, with 'Eroica' for its pace-setter

BY RUTH HOWELL

WHEN this week is over, no one in Washington who goes to musical things will have the slightest doubt that Ludwig van Beethoven was one of the greatest symphonic composers that ever lived.

The festival of his music, played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra and three renowned soloists, began last night. And ensuing programs will have to be superb to be better.

For greatest symphony, "Eroica," was anticipated as the meat of this first concert. But the Fourth Concerto, preceding the symphony, and played by Myra Hess, the English pianist, probably is the most important thing in the audience's memory today. Miss Hess comprehended Beethoven in his most poetic mood and skillfull writing; and she made the audience understand what greatness, what subtlety, what marvelous working and reworking of themes, what imagination, Beethoven had.

Best Choice

No better pianist could have been chosen to play with the Boston Orchestra, or to play that particular concerto. She and the orchestra and the music were one in mood; and it was Miss Hess who set the example, and the orchestra, under Serge Koussevitzky, followed the sensitive lift of her eyebrows, and the ideal of beauty set by her skillful fingers.

She played with style and sweep, yet with the utmost control. No riproaring concerto for hers, but an intelligently brilliant one. Her tone was superb, her phrasing the most polished imaginable.

Not to belittle Koussevitzky, however. The brilliant leader guided his men wisely thru the subdued orchestral background of the concerto, and thru the delightful contrasts of the "Egmont" overture; and then led them out into the sunlight of "Eroica" where they showed dazzlingly. Always the music was pre-eminent.

Excellent Reading

One cannot describe a Beethoven symphony; but it can be said that Koussevitzky found the right amount of delicacy in the scherzo; the correct foreboding quality and often deep tragedy in the funeral march; the elegance and triumph in the first and last movements. The choirs of his orchestra performed perfectly, the rich horns following the leader's finest demands, and the basses beating out their undertone of catastrophe.

It is a noble symphony, too little heard in Washington.

The second festival concert is tonight. Efrem Zimbalist is solist in the violin concerto, and the Fifth Symphony will be played.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
TIMES
DEC 3 - 1930

BOSTON SYMPHONY IN BEETHOVEN TRIUMPH

An evening of Beethoven. More, an evening of Beethoven with the Boston Symphony Orchestra and Dr. Serge Koussevitzky conducting!

Such was the extatic treat in which musical Washington reveled last night at Constitution Hall, and it was the start of a Beethoven festival that will long be remembered.

It was three years ago at the Beethoven centenary that the Boston Symphony gained international reknown with the grandeur of its Beethoven programs.

And now, at the jubilee year of the orchestra, it has been possible to bring it to the Capital that Washingtonians may hear that music.

And no finer choice nor presentation could have been offered than that of last night. It seemed fitting that the "Egmont" Overture, without doubt one of Beethoven's masterpieces should serve as the introduction to the festival program.

For that overture carries with it the theme of triumph and the brilliant fanfare of full orchestra against crashing brass and antithisis of woodwinds seemed to pressage the triumphs to come.

The second number on the program was the one with the greatest appeal, for it brought Myra Hess, pianist, as soloist of the program. It was the Concherto for Pianoforte No. 4 in G Major.

Miss Hess gave a rendition that was a triumph in itself. Her power was tremendous and her technique superb. The movement itself is filled with sweet melodies and wild, freezied bits of exaultation, and the three movements blend into the most delightful concerto.

The well-known "Eroica" filled out the program, and while this is a long, and sometimes tedious symphony to hear, yet the orchestra under that magnetic baton of Dr. Koussevitzky gave a new reading, bringing out some undreamed of effects, especially in that magnificent Funeral March.

Tonight brings the second of the four programs on the Beethoven Festival, with Efrem Zimbalist as the soloist, playing the Concerto in D Major for Violin.

The "Lenore" Overture and the Symphony No. 5 in C Minor are the other numbers on tonight's program.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
HERALD
DEC 2 - 1930

Bostonians To Pay Honor To Beethoven

The Boston Symphony Orchestra and its noted conductor, Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, will give at Constitution Hall tonight, Wednesday and Friday evenings and Saturday afternoon, the long-heralded Beethoven festival, one of the special features of the orchestra's fiftieth birthday season. At the same time, it gives Washington a belated repetition of its celebrated Boston centenary festival of Beethoven music in 1927. Reservations have been received from as far away as Denver on the West Coast and from as far north as Bath, Me.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, composed of 115 men and staff of technicians, will reach Washington this morning at 7:50 o'clock on special cars attached to the Federal Express. They are assigned to quarters in various parts of the city and will assemble later in the day at Constitution Hall for a final rehearsal before the first concert.

Myra Hess, pianist, will be the soloist at the first performance this evening, playing Beethoven's fourth concerto for piano. On Wednesday evening, Efrem Zimbalist, the violinist, will be the soloist, playing with the orchestra the Beethoven violin concerto in D major. Josef Hofmann, pianist, will be the soloist at the third performance, on Friday evening, playing Beethoven's fifth pianoforte concerto, while at the final performance on Saturday afternoon, there will be four soloists and a chorus of 200 voices singing the final chorus from Schiller's "Ode to Joy" as a part of the Beethoven Ninth Symphony.

All four concerts will be conducted by Dr. Koussevitzky in person, while the chorus of 200 voices Saturday afternoon is drawn from the National Capital Oratorio Association, trained by Dr. Albert W. Harned. The Beethoven festival is under the local management of Mrs. Wilson-Greene.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
STAR
DEC 2 - 1930

The first secretary of the British embassy and Mrs. Shone entertained at dinner last evening in compliment to their house guest, Miss Myra Hess, the young British pianist, who will play with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the first concert of the Beethoven Festival this evening. Others in the company included the counselor of the British embassy, Mr. Ronald Ian Campbell; the first secretary of the Belgian embassy, Viscount de Lantsheere; Mrs. Lawrence Townsend and her god-daughter, Miss Natalie Mai Coe, who is her house guest, and Mr. and Mrs. Franklin H. Ellis.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
ROCHESTER, N. Y.
Democrat Chronicle
DEC 3 - 1930

Dr. Hanson's New Symphony Variously Impresses Music Critics of Boston Papers

In the comment written by Boston music critics on Howard Hanson's new symphony, played in that city last week by the Boston Symphony, there is consensus on only two points: First, the symphony is a distinct departure from Dr. Hanson's work previously heard; second, that the audience plainly liked the new symphony. The work received extensive comment, and only excerpts of the various opinion can be reprinted.

Philip Hale, dean of Boston critics, writes: "The Romantic Symphony has interesting pages, especially those which are purely lyrical. It is a pity he is so enamored of one or two figures, not important in themselves, that he cannot bear to leave them. The abrupt contrasts between measures that border on the sentimental and those that are chiefly noticeable for their stentorian outbursts do not gain dramatically what they lose in logical continuity. It is when Dr. Hanson is gently romantic that he is effective. The 'sturm ud drang' measures seldom impress. He has ideas of value, which is more than can be said for Respighi's Theme and Variations also composed for the orchestra's jubilee."

Boston Transcript

Something of the same opinion is indicated in the following excerpt from H. T. Parker's article in the Boston Transcript: "The big tone of which an orchestra is capable sorely tempts him. To this day he cannot resist it through sonorous measures in full harmony. Then and there Dr. Hanson's music 'sounds' but it also runs thickly. There are pages in this new symphony when the composer is straining toward heights and depths that might have been written by some German, soused in the theory and practice of 1910. Yet the American knows and on occasion uses a better way—the cleanly cut, sharply charactered, openwork play of timbres and harmonies that is one of the modernist gains to music. To some of us Dr. Hanson's most individual piece is still the string quartet of 1923."

Christian Science Monitor

Leslie M. Sloper, critic of Christian Science Monitor, who wrote in cordial praise of Dr. Hanson's "Nordic" Symphony when it was played by the Boston Symphony last season, is plainly surprised by this new work, and seems to question its frank and appealing return to obvious romanticism. He writes: "The composer employed as in his 'Nordic' symphony the cyclic form of Cesar Franck. Mottoes set forth in the first movement are developed with erudition. But when the composer called it romantic, he understated the case. Neither Byron nor Goethe nor Schumann nor Tschaikowsky was ever quite so romantic as this. Dr. Hanson has felt mildly the influence of modern harmonic idiom, but he has not here been touched by the detachment which is alleged to be the mark of his generation. There is nothing in this symphony to offend the most tender ear; nothing which might not have been written at any time in the last ninety years.

Boston Globe

The critic of the Boston Globe, signing his article P. R., writes: "The composer's aim in yesterday's symphony was, he tells us, 'to create a work young in spirit, romantic in temperament and simple and direct in expression.' Although one cannot honestly feel that Dr. Hanson quite succeeded in achieving his aim, but cannot but respect him for attempting, not what current Parisian musical fashion would dictate, but what he himself desired to do. One thought yesterday of Dvorak's 'New World' and Charpentier's 'Louise.' There was no direct imitation or reminiscence of either work, though reminiscences of other music occasionally obtruded themselves. But a Dvorak who had heard Stravinsky's rhythms and the dissonant harmonies now common property might have written such a work as this symphony. And it was probably the cloying sweetness of much of Dr. Hanson's dissonance that recalled Charpentier."

Boston Post

Warren Story Smith, critic of the Boston Post, comments on "the new Romantic Symphony from the agreeable and facile pen of Howard Hanson" as "Orotund and tuneful" and "well designed to appeal to hearers" but finds it "lacking in that indefinable yet precious quality known as style."

74

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
HERALD

DEC 3 - 1930

KOUSSEVITZKY WITH SYMPHONY ATTRACTS 3,000

Beethoven's Musical Fete Brings Lovers From as Far Away as Lower Mississippi

By STANLEY OLMSTED

It is said that for Washington's first Beethoven Festival many have journeyed here from as far away as Louisiana or Mississippi. With the Boston Symphony and Kappellmeister Serge Koussevitzky as protagonists, the opening concert drew a fine public to Constitution Hall last night—an audience socially and musically prepresentative to the point of saturation.

Ours is a city whose concert-goers like the classics. A warmth of expectancy might be noted, followed by that responsiveness which breathes easily nor is bewildered. Among these 3,000 or more people were hundreds manifestly enkindled in a fashion far other than when it's Schoenberg, or even Honneger or Respighi.

BEETHOVEN RULES

One touch of Beethoven makes all the music world akin, and here were many, many touches, to be followed by three more feasts from the one German great enough to share the enshrinement of Goethe with whom he was contemporary.

The peak of enthusiasm was reached after Miss Myra Hess had played the G major piano concerto, No. 4. She is a personable young woman who approaches her keyboard with relaxation. If her playing is dainty rather than crackling, it is yet far too musical ever to go cold. Her trills and passages are not those of d'Albert, with whom this work was a favorite when he used to electrify a piano-mad universe in the mauve decade. His "rondo vivace"—the third movement—was like whimsical firecrackers set popping in a dozen dynamics. But Miss Hess' cantilena caresses. She had to take five bows, demanded with stormy unanimity.

One major Beethoven opus, the "Eroica" Symphony, No. 3, came last on the program. Inspired, at least in its first movement, by the composer's admiration for Napoleon, his publishers made special directions that it always be played first. Otherwise the composer's purpose might fail of due effectiveness, with "an audience whose attention will be already wearied by preceding pieces."

GIGGLING DAYS

But those were days when a Paris gathering giggled at its unheard-of innovations, as people sometimes giggle at Stravinski today. Nobody's attention is strained any more; and here Koussevitzky could offer his best. It is said that in his own Paris they don't like his Beethoven, regarding him as a specialist in modernities. No lack of rapproachment, however, is discernable to Americans. Though neither in this "Eroica" nor in the opening Egmont overture last night, did he seem to reach his own keenest fusion with the work before him, he was faithful to a rigid classical spirit. Perhaps a shade too rigid, but that would remain a matter of taste. Often last night he seemed determined rather than joyful.

In the "Eroica's" "scherzo" nevertheless, he came into his own and here the zest was convincing and delicious. On the whole his beat kept to a metronomic precision that differed in the most baffling way from Toscanini's precision. It was something of an adventure to watch how far apart may be two men's nearly identical conceptions.

This festival is the fulfillment of a project long planned by Mrs. Wilson-Greene.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN

DEC 4 1930

PORTO RICAN TO BE CONCERT SOLOIST

Jesus Maria Sanroma, the Porto Rican pianist, will appear as soloist here with the Boston Symphony Orchestra when that body gives its second concert of the season in the Albee Theatre under the baton of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, Tuesday evening, Dec. 16. It will be the first time in a number of seasons that the Boston Symphony has brought here a guest artist as soloist.

Mr. Sanroma will play the piano solo in the second number on the program, Stravinsky's "Capriccio," scored for orchestra with piano in three movements. The concert will open with Nabokov's Symphony, while Tschaikowsky's Fourth Symphony in F-minor will follow the intermission.

Mr. Sanroma, who is only 27 years old, was born in Porto Rico of Catalonian parents, and it was the Porto Rican government which sent him to this country to complete his musical education. Graduated with honors from the New England Conservatory of Music, he studied for seven years more under Mme. Antoinette Szumowska. He went abroad last year to study with Cortot in Paris and with Schnabel in Berlin.

He has been soloist with the Boston Symphony on several occasions and was official pianist of the orchestra in the season of 1926-27. During that season he appeared in New York as soloist at the League of Composers' concert, at which Dr. Koussevitzky introduced Honegger's "Concertino."

In May he will be soloist with the University Glee Club of [illegible]

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
POST

DEC 4 - 1930

ZIMBALIST SHARES SYMPHONY GLORY

Second Night of Beethoven Festival Is Accorded High Praise.

ORCHESTRA IS PERFECT

Efrem Zimbalist, renowned violinist, the Boston Symphony Orchestra and Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, proved a trio of musical attractions last night which made the second performance of the Beethoven Festival even more notable than the opening concert on Tuesday night. The festival is being held at Constitution Hall under the local management of Mrs. Wilson-Greene and is part of the jubilee celebration of the fiftieth anniversary of the founding of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

At the start of this review it is well to state that the performance of Beethoven's masterpieces by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the inspired leadership of Dr. Koussevitzky is a reading of these scores with spirited loftiness, soulful expression and beauty of sound. It is easily seen that the orchestra has spent many hours in perfecting the Beethoven selections presented at the festival, which is making it a red-letter event in the history of Washington music.

The charming overture to "Leonore No. 3" was a fitting beginning of the evening's program. The nobility and poetry of the music were always in evidence and the entire overture was characterized by impeccable phrasing and rhythm.

Efrem Zimbalist, violinist, was in one of his happiest musical moods last night in the Violin Concerto in D Minor in which he played the solo portions. Every art of the violin was at the end of his bow and his skillful fingers. This violin concerto of Beethoven is one of music's classics and Zimbalist's reading of it on his incomparable violin, one of the finest instruments in the world, will not soon be forgotten by those privileged to hear it last night.

Mr. Zimbalist was obliged to return to the stage again to bow his acknowledgements of the tremendous ovations accorded him by a usually cold Washington audience.

The symphony of the evening was Beethoven Symphony No. 5, in C Minor, with its fateful theme, a composition often called, because of its internal construction, an Iliad of the Soul.

In four movements, naturally, the second movement "The Andante con moto in A. Flat," is a set of lovely variations on a ravishing theme. The Scherzo and trio which followed it in the allegro, or third movement, came as a certain relief from the beauty and nobility of the Andante.

The finale with the magnificence of the full ensemble, the power and variety, the full realization of every exquisite detail and the glorious conclusion evoked great applause from the audience.

There will be no program of the festival tonight but the third one will be given tomorrow night in Constitution Hall with Josef Hofmann, pianist, as the soloist. E. E P.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
NEWS

DEC 4 - 1930

MUSIC

Morning concerts at Mayflower begin with gentle but excellent singing by Mme. Clairbert and Richard Crooks; Fifth Symphony stirs in festival concert

BY RUTH HOWELL

* * *

Boston Symphony Orchestra

FURTHER testimony of the remarkable genius of Ludwig van Beethoven was given Washington music lovers last night as Serge Koussevitsky led the Boston Symphony orchestra to another triumph in the second concert of the Beethoven Festival series at Continental Hall.

And Efrem Zimbalist was a happy choice as soloist. His violin concerto in D major called for an ovation similar to that elicited by the brilliant playing of the piano concerto by Myra Hess at Tuesday's concert.

In the concerto, soloist and orchestra, perfectly co-ordinated, produced a work of musical art. The beauty of the tones the artist drew from his violin, particularly in the second movement, equalled anything heard here in a long time

Smoothly and without many pyrotechnics, Zimbalist unfolded the intricate passages and elaborate figures of the concerto. Koussevitsky gave him flawless accompaniment. The lively rondo that closes the concerto left his listeners in a glow. The demonstration that followed lasted several minutes.

The Fifth Symphony brought the evening to a musical climax. The rich contrast written into the first two movements was skillfully interpreted by the talented conductor. Then came the difficult but exciting scherzo.

Practically every section of the huge orchestra stood out at one time or another. The music rose and fell in ascending to the thrilling finale when the full orchestra swept thru the majestic proportions of the succeeding climaxes that left one breathless at the close.

Josef Hofmann will be the soloist and the Seventh Symphony the featured number at the third concert of the series to be given tomorrow night.

CHARTER HESLEP.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
HERALD

DEC 4 1930

* * *

CONSTITUTION HALL—
Beethoven Festival

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, is giving in Washington this week its fiftieth anniversary Beethoven Festival at Constitution Hall—the greatest festival of orchestral music ever given in this city. There remain but two performances, Friday evening and Saturday afternoon, at 8:30 and 3 o'clock, respectively. On Friday evening, Josef Hofmann, pianist, will be heard as soloist, playing Beethoven's Fifth pianoforte concerto in E flat, Opus 73, while the Overture to "Coriolanus," Opus 62, and Symphony No. 7 in A major, Opus 92, will also be given. On Saturday afternoon, the First and Ninth Beethoven symphonies will be given with a chorus of 200 voices from the National Capital Oratorio Society. The entire festival is under the lo-

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
STAR

DEC 4 - 1930

A reception to Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and Mme. Koussevitzky, was tendered by the Arts Club of Washington yesterday afternoon in its club rooms, under the auspices of the Hospitality Committee, Miss Marjorie Lowe, chairman. Among those who met the distinguished conductor were Mr. Frank Frost, Mr. and Mrs. Edward H. Droop, Mr. Otto Simon; Dr. and Mrs. H. B. Learned, Mr. Percy Lee Atherton, Miss Sylvia Lent, Dr. A. M. Harned, Mrs. Flora Magill Keefer, Mr. and Mrs. Charles Edward Russell, Mr. and Mrs. Kurt Hetzel, Mr. Henry S. Gregor, Mrs. Gertrude Lyons, Dr. Gilbert H. Grosvenor, Miss Mary Gildersleeve, Miss Mary Kerr, Miss Claire Seymour, Mrs. Greta von Bayer, Miss Elena de Sayn and many others prominent in musical activity in Washington.

much velvetiness of tone, especially in the "larghetto" movement, and a technical proficiency that, barring one or two untrue notes, defied criticism. After the first movement he was applauded vigorously, having with no apparent effort bridged the sea of difficulties that are in waiting most conspicuously during that part of the concerto. Again, toward the end, where an "ad lib" coda tests pretty much the skill of bow and fingers, Mr. Zimbalist fairly dazzled his audience by the speed and accuracy of his playing and brought his portion of the program to a close in splendid style.

Before and after him two of the most popular of the Beethoven compositions, the "Overture to Lenore" and the "Symphony No. 5 in C Minor, Op. 67," were played. The latter, which is an especial favorite, there being probably more that is familiar about it than any other two or three of the better known symphonies put together, proved to be easily the most effective number so far offered by the Bostonians. Although the "andante con moto" movement was carried along at a much slower pace than one is accustomed to, what followed made up for that deficiency—if it was one—Koussevitzky being at his very best in the louder and more exciting passages. In fact, the whole, in spite of the lethargy of one of its parts, seemed so very excellent that the audience was apparently loath to go home and would no doubt willingly have sat there and heard the whole thing over again.

Thus the great Beethoven fete goes on apace—the only fault one has to find with it being that it is half way over. No performance is scheduled for tonight, but Friday true Beethovenites should turn out in force, since besides the orchestra and Koussevitzky there will be Josef Hofmann to soothe the few remaining Beethoven hours. E. de S. M.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
TIMES

DEC 5 - 1930

Large Group Attend Reception Honoring Dr. Koussevitzky

A reception to Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and Mme. Koussevitzky, was held Wednesday by the Arts Club of Washington in its club rooms, under the auspices of the hospitality committee, Miss Marjorie Lowe, chairman. Among those who met the distinguished conductor were Frank Frost, Mr. and Mrs. Edward H. Droop, Otto Simon, Dr. and Mrs. H. B. Learned, Percy Lee Atherton, Miss Sylvia Lent, Dr. A. M. Harned, Mrs. Flora Magill Keefer, Mr. and Mrs. Charles Edward Russell, Mr. and Mrs. Kurt Hetzel, Henry S. Gregor, Mrs. Gertrude Lyons, Dr. Gilbert H. Grosvenor, Miss Mary Gildersleeve, Miss Mary Kerr, Miss Claire Seymour, Mrs. Greta von Bayer, Miss Elena de Sayn and many others, prominent in musical activity in Washington.

HERALD

DEC 5 1930

MUSIC THRILLS CROWD ON 2D FESTIVAL NIGHT

Zimbalist and Koussevitzky Studiously Avoid Personal Pyrotechnics in Program

By STANLEY OLMSTED

An even larger audience than on Tuesday evening was magnetized for attendance at the second instalment of the four-part Beethoven festival, Wednesday night.

Constitution Hall is an elastic interior, but its vacancies, if any, made no spots of conspicuous hiatus in the vast seating scheme. It must always be remembered that this auditorium has ever room for a few more. You may fill it with over 4,000 and still there will be several places left for late comers or deadheads.

PROGRAM ENGROSSING

The program was, on the whole, more engrossing than on the previous night. The overture to Beethoven's only opera, "Leonore," edited so restlessly by the master, is always an adventure for the listener, whatever may be the choice of formats. It gave its unique dramatic kick to the start of a continuation where everybody was attuned.

Zimbalist was violin soloist for the second number, a favorite of Kreisler's, the concerto in D major, opus 61. The artist subordinated himself to his task. You listened to the music rather than to Zimbalist. He is not of those who strive strenuously to limelight themselves in a masterwork embalmed by tradition. You heard the concerto and not an exigent ego.

IGNORES THE RAPS

As climax, the Fifth Symphony in C minor—was delivered with an equal immolation of Conductor Koussevitsky in the classic formula. Not once did he strive for individual "cleverness." The three raps on the door, its main theme, were ignored as of little consequence in the superstructure. Poe had not written "the Raven" when this favorite of H. L. Mencken's was composed, and Mr. Koussevitsky was not concerned with "suddenly there came a tapping as of someone gently rapping."

He perceives the Fifth Symphony as a pure abstraction with no concrete moments.

He was also less formally conscientious than on the festival's opening night. He seemed to be taking everything for granted, as did also the audience.

These Beethoven concerts are basic to musical underpinnings, and their result should be educational, in the highest degree, with the uninitiated, or with those whose initiation has been inattentive or superficial. Mrs. Wilson-Greene had a sound ideal when she conceived them and brought them about.

Beethoven Concert Given At Congressional Library

A Washington week dedicated to Beethoven was made richer by a supplementary illustration of the master's work at the Library of Congress, yesterday. In the Coolidge Auditorium, two string quartets, Opuses 18 (No. 2) and 132, and respectively in G major and A minor, were played by the Burgin String Quartet.

These chamber music sonatas were composed 25 years apart, the one in 1800, the other in 1825. Between their rendition, the distinguished lecturer, Dr. Philip Hale, threw light on many aspects of Beethoven in an analytical and biographical address.

The two works plainly were chosen to contrast an earlier conformity with the vaster sweep of the composer's imagination as he grew older and sadder, tormented, but never fettered, by his deafness. They dramatized the growth of a Promethean rebellion within him.

The concert filled in a Thursday which otherwise would have been left empty in a Beethoven Week. It was a courtesy to the Capital, from the Boston Symphony's board of trustees and from its director, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky. Richard Burgin, Robert Gunderson, first and second violins, with Jean Lefranc and Jean Bedetti, playing viola and violoncello, make up this quartet personnel.

74

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
HERALD

DEC 3 - 1930

KOUSSEVITZKY WITH SYMPHONY ATTRACTS 3,000

Beethoven's Musical Fete Brings Lovers From as Far Away as Lower Mississippi

By STANLEY OLMSTED

It is said that for Washington's first Beethoven Festival many have journeyed here from as far away as Louisiana or Mississippi. With the Boston Symphony and Kappellmeister Serge Koussevitzky as protagonists, the opening concert drew a fine public to Constitution Hall last night—an audience socially and musically prepresentative to the point of saturation.

Ours is a city whose concert-goers like the classics. A warmth of expectancy might be noted, followed by that responsiveness which breathes easily nor is bewildered. Among these 3,000 or more people were hundreds manifestly enkindled in a fashion far other than when it's Schoenberg, or even Honneger or Respighi.

BEETHOVEN RULES

One touch of Beethoven makes all the music world akin, and here were many, many touches, to be followed by three more feasts from the one German great enough to share the enshrinement of Goethe with whom he was contemporary.

The peak of enthusiasm was reached after Miss Myra Hess had played the G major piano concerto, No. 4. She is a personable young woman who approaches her keyboard with relaxation. If her playing is dainty rather than crackling, it is yet far too musical ever to go cold. Her trills and passages are not those of d'Albert, with whom this work was a favorite when he used to electrify a piano-mad universe in the mauve decade. His "rondo vivace"—the third movement—was like whimsical firecrackers set popping in a dozen dynamics. But Miss Hess' cantilena caresses. She had to take five bows, demanded with stormy unanimity.

One major Beethoven opus, the "Eroica" Symphony, No. 3, came last on the program. Inspired, at least in its first movement, by the composer's admiration for Napoleon, his publishers made special directions that it always be played first. Otherwise the composer's purpose might fail of due effectiveness, with "an audience whose attention will be already wearied by preceding pieces."

GIGGLING DAYS

But those were days when a Paris gathering giggled at its unheard-of innovations, as people sometimes giggle at Stravinski today. Nobody's attention is strained any more; and here Koussevitzky could offer his best. It is said that in his own Paris they don't like his Beethoven, regarding him as a specialist in modernities. No lack of rapproachment, however, is discernable to Americans. Though neither in this "Eroica" nor in the opening Egmont overture last night, did he seem to reach his own keenest fusion with the work before him, he was faithful to a rigid classical spirit. Perhaps a shade too rigid, but that would remain a matter of taste. Often last night he seemed determined rather than joyful.

In the "Eroica's" "scherzo" nevertheless, he came into his own and here the zest was convincing and delicious. On the whole his beat kept to a metronomic precision that differed in the most baffling way from Toscanini's precision. It was something of an adventure to watch how far apart may be two men's nearly identical conceptions.

This festival is the fulfillment of a project long planned by Mrs. Wilson-Greene.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN

DEC 4 - 1930

PORTO RICAN TO BE CONCERT SOLOIST

Jesus Maria Sanroma, the Porto Rican pianist, will appear as soloist here with the Boston Symphony Orchestra when that body gives its second concert of the season in the Albee Theatre under the baton of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, Tuesday evening, Dec. 16. It will be the first time in a number of seasons that the Boston Symphony has brought here a guest artist as soloist.

Mr. Sanroma will play the piano solo in the second number on the program, Stravinsky's "Capriccio," scored for orchestra with piano in three movements. The concert will open with Nabokov's Symphony, while Tschaikowsky's Fourth Symphony in F-minor will follow the intermission.

Mr. Sanroma, who is only 27 years old, was born in Porto Rico of Catalonian parents, and it was the Porto Rican government which sent him to this country to complete his musical education. Graduated with honors from the New England Conservatory of Music, he studied for seven years more under Mme. Antoinette Szumowska. He went abroad last year to study with Cortot in Paris and with Schnabel in Berlin.

He has been soloist with the Boston Symphony on several occasions and was official pianist of the orchestra in the season of 1926-27. During that season he appeared in New York as soloist at the League of Composers' concert, at which Dr. Koussevitzky introduced Honegger's "Concertino."

In May he will be soloist with the University Glee Club of [illegible]

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
POST

DEC 4 - 1930

ZIMBALIST SHARES SYMPHONY GLORY

Second Night of Beethoven Festival Is Accorded High Praise.

ORCHESTRA IS PERFECT

Efrem Zimbalist, renowned violinist, the Boston Symphony Orchestra and Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, proved a trio of musical attractions last night which made the second performance of the Beethoven Festival even more notable than the opening concert on Tuesday night. The festival is being held at Constitution Hall under the local management of Mrs. Wilson-Greene and is part of the jubilee celebration of the fiftieth anniversary of the founding of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

At the start of this review it is well to state that the performance of Beethoven's masterpieces by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the inspired leadership of Dr. Koussevitzky is a reading of these scores with spirited loftiness, soulful expression and beauty of sound. It is easily seen that the orchestra has spent many hours in perfecting the Beethoven selections presented at the festival, which is making it a red-letter event in the history of Washington music.

The charming overture to "Leonore No. 3" was a fitting beginning of the evening's program. The nobility and poetry of the music were always in evidence and the entire overture was characterized by impeccable phrasing and rhythm.

Efrem Zimbalist, violinist, was in one of his happiest musical moods last night in the Violin Concerto in D Minor in which he played the solo portions. Every art of the violin was at the end of his bow and his skillful fingers. This violin concerto of Beethoven is one of music's classics and Zimbalist's reading of it on his incomparable violin, one of the finest instruments in the world, will not soon be forgotten by those privileged to hear it last night.

Mr. Zimbalist was obliged to return to the stage again to bow his acknowledgements of the tremendous ovations accorded him by a usually cold Washington audience.

The symphony of the evening was Beethoven Symphony No. 5, in C. Minor, with its fateful theme, a composition often called, because of its internal construction, an Iliad of the Soul.

In four movements, naturally, the second movement "The Andante con moto in A. Flat," is a set of lovely variations on a ravishing theme. The Scherzo and trio which followed it in the allegro, or third movement, came as a certain relief from the beauty and nobility of the Andante.

The finale with the magnificence of the full ensemble, the power and variety, the full realization of every exquisite detail and the glorious conclusion evoked great applause from the audience.

There will be no program of the festival tonight but the third one will be given tomorrow night in Constitution Hall with Josef Hofmann, pianist, as the soloist. E. E P.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
NEWS

DEC 4 - 1930

The housewife who does her baking should remember, therefore, that the flour which she uses must essentially be of the highest quality and purity obtainable. When she has assured herself that she has purchased the finest flour she can buy then she need have no fear but that her products will be healthful and assets in the daily diet of her family.

Mo
g
h
s

Boston Symphony Orchestra

FURTHER testimony of the remarkable genius of Ludwig van Beethoven was given Washington music lovers last night as Serge Koussevitsky led the Boston Symphony orchestra to another triumph in the second concert of the Beethoven Festival series at Continental Hall.

And Efrem Zimbalist was a happy choice as soloist. His violin concerto in D major called for an ovation similar to that elicited by the brilliant playing of the piano concerto by Myra Hess at Tuesday's concert.

In the concerto, soloist and orchestra, perfectly co-ordinated, produced a work of musical art. The beauty of the tones the artist drew from his violin, particularly in the second movement, equalled anything heard here in a long time

Smoothly and without many pyrotechnics, Zimbalist unfolded the intricate passages and elaborate figures of the concerto. Koussevitsky gave him flawless accompaniment. The lively rondo that closes the concerto left his listeners in a glow. The demonstration that followed lasted several minutes.

The Fifth Symphony brought the evening to a musical climax. The rich contrast written into the first two movements was skillfully interpreted by the talented conductor. Then came the difficult but exciting scherzo.

Practically every section of the huge orchestra stood out at one time or another. The music rose and fell in ascending to the thrilling finale when the full orchestra swept thru the majestic proportions of the succeeding climaxes that left one breathless at the close.

Josef Hofmann will be the soloist and the Seventh Symphony the featured number at the third concert of the series to be given tomorrow night.

CHARTER HESLEP.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
HERALD

DEC 4 1930

* * *

CONSTITUTION HALL—
Beethoven Festival

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, is giving in Washington this week its fiftieth anniversary Beethoven Festival at Constitution Hall—the greatest festival of orchestral music ever given in this city. There remain but two performances, Friday evening and Saturday afternoon, at 8:30 and 3 o'clock, respectively. On Friday evening, Josef Hofmann, pianist, will be heard as soloist, playing Beethoven's Fifth pianoforte concerto in E flat, Opus 73, while the Overture to "Coriolanus," Opus 62, and Symphony No. 7 in A major, Opus 92, will also be given. On Saturday afternoon, the First and Ninth Beethoven symphonies will be given with a chorus of 200 voices from the National Capital Oratorio Society. The entire festival is under the lo-

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
STAR

DEC 4 - 1930

A reception to Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and Mme. Koussevitzky, was tendered by the Arts Club of Washington yesterday afternoon in its club rooms, under the auspices of the Hospitality Committee, Miss Marjorie Lowe, chairman. Among those who met the distinguished conductor were Mr. Frank Frost, Mr. and Mrs. Edward H. Droop, Mr. Otto Simon, Dr. and Mrs. H. B. Learned, Mr. Percy Lee Atherton, Miss Sylvia Lent, Dr. A. M. Harned, Mrs. Flora Magill Keefer, Mr. and Mrs. Charles Edward Russell, Mr. and Mrs. Kurt Hetzel, Mr. Henry S. Gregor, Mrs. Gertrude Lyons, Dr. Gilbert H. Grosvenor, Miss Mary Gildersleeve, Miss Mary Kerr, Miss Claire Seymour, Mrs. Greta von Bayer, Miss Elena de Sayn and many others prominent in musical activity in Washington.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
STAR

DEC 4 - 1930

Zimbalist Soloist At Beethoven Festival.

CONTINUING the high standard set the opening night of the Beethoven Festival, Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Constitution Hall conquered new fields last night and presented besides one of the most famous of violinists, Efrem Zimbalist, as soloist.

Mr. Zimbalist, a virtuoso who seems to become more popular in each successive visit to this city, played the "Concerto in D Major for Violin, Op. 61" with great ease, much velvetness of tone, especially in the "larghetto" movement, and a technical proficiency that, barring one or two untrue notes, defied criticism. After the first movement he was applauded vigorously, having with no apparent effort bridged the sea of difficulties that are in waiting most conspicuously during that part of the concerto. Again, toward the end, where an "ad lib" coda tests pretty much the skill of bow and fingers, Mr. Zimbalist fairly dazzled his audience by the speed and accuracy of his playing and brought his portion of the program to a close in splendid style.

Before and after him two of the most popular of the Beethoven compositions, the "Overture to Lenore" and the "Symphony No. 5 in C Minor, Op. 67," were played. The latter, which is an especial favorite, there being probably more that is familiar about it than any other two or three of the better known symphonies put together, proved to be easily the most effective number so far offered by the Bostonians. Although the "andante con moto" movement was carried along at a much slower pace than one is accustomed to, what followed made up for that deficiency—if it was one—Koussevitzky being at his very best in the louder and more exciting passages. In fact, the whole, in spite of the lethargy of one of its parts, seemed so very excellent that the audience was apparently loath to go home and would no doubt willingly have sat there and heard the whole thing over again.

Thus the great Beethoven fete goes on apace—the only fault one has to find with it being that it is half way over. No performance is scheduled for tonight, but Friday true Beethovenites should turn out in force, since besides the orchestra and Koussevitzky there will be Josef Hofmann to soothe the few remaining Beethoven hours. E. de S. M.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
TIMES

DEC 5 - 1930

Large Group Attend Reception Honoring Dr. Koussevitzky

A reception to Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and Mme. Koussevitzky, was held Wednesday by the Arts Club of Washington in its club rooms, under the auspices of the hospitality committee, Miss Marjorie Lowe, chairman. Among those who met the distinguished conductor were Frank Frost, Mr. and Mrs. Edward H. Droop, Otto Simon, Dr. and Mrs. H. B. Learned, Percy Lee Atherton, Miss Sylvia Lent, Dr. A. M. Harned, Mrs. Flora Magill Keefer, Mr. and Mrs. Charles Edward Russell, Mr. and Mrs. Kurt Hetzel, Henry S. Gregor, Mrs. Gertrude Lyons, Dr. Gilbert H. Grosvenor, Miss Mary Gildersleeve, Miss Mary Kerr, Miss Claire Seymour, Mrs. Greta von Bayer, Miss Elena de Sayn and many others, prominent in musical activity in Washington.

Beethoven Concert Given At Congressional Library

A Washington week dedicated to Beethoven was made richer by a supplementary illustration of the master's work at the Library of Congress, yesterday. In the Coolidge Auditorium, two string quartets, Opuses 18 (No. 2) and 132, and respectively in G major and A minor, were played by the Burgin String Quartet.

These chamber music sonatas were composed 25 years apart, the one in 1800, the other in 1825. Between their rendition, the distinguished lecturer, Dr. Philip Hale, threw light on many aspects of Beethoven in an analytical and biographical address.

The two works plainly were chosen to contrast an earlier conformity with the vaster sweep of the composer's imagination as he grew older and sadder, tormented, but never fettered, by his deafness. They dramatized the growth of a Promethean rebellion within him.

The concert filled in a Thursday which otherwise would have been left empty in a Beethoven Week. It was a courtesy to the Capital, from the Boston Symphony's board of trustees and from its director, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky. Richard Burgin, Robert Gunderson, first and second violins, with Jean Lefranc and Jean Bedetti, playing viola and violoncello, make up this quar[illegible] personnel.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HERALD

DEC 5 - 1930

MUSIC THRILLS CROWD ON 2D FESTIVAL NIGHT

Zimbalist and Koussevitzky Studiously Avoid Personal Pyrotechnics in Program

By STANLEY OLMSTED

An even larger audience than on Tuesday evening was magnetized for attendance at the second instalment of the four-part Beethoven festival, Wednesday night.

Constitution Hall is an elastic interior, but its vacancies, if any, made no spots of conspicuous hiatus in the vast seating scheme. It must always be remembered that this auditorium has ever room for a few more. You may fill it with over 4,000 and still there will be several places left for late comers or deadheads.

PROGRAM ENGROSSING

The program was, on the whole, more engrossing than on the previous night. The overture to Beethoven's only opera, "Leonore," edited so restlessly by the master, is always an adventure for the listener, whatever may be the choice of formats. It gave its unique dramatic kick to the start of a continuation where everybody was attuned.

Zimbalist was violin soloist for the second number, a favorite of Kreisler's, the concerto in D major, opus 61. The artist subordinated himself to his task. You listened to the music rather than to Zimbalist. He is not of those who strive strenuously to limelight themselves in a masterwork embalmed by tradition. You heard the concerto and not an exigent ego.

IGNORES THE RAPS

As climax, the Fifth Symphony in C minor—was delivered with an equal immolation of Conductor Koussevitsky in the classic formula. Not once did he strive for individual "cleverness." The three raps on the door, its main theme, were ignored as of little consequence in the super-structure. Poe had not written "the Raven" when this favorite of H. L. Mencken's was composed, and Mr. Koussevitsky was not concerned with "suddenly there came a tapping as of someone gently rapping."

He perceives the Fifth Symphony as a pure abstraction with no concrete moments.

He was also less formally conscientious than on the festival's opening night. He seemed to be taking everything for granted, as did also the audience.

These Beethoven concerts are basic to musical underpinnings, and their result should be educational, in the highest degree, with the uninitiated, or with those whose initiation has been inattentive or superficial. Mrs. Wilson-Greene had a sound ideal when she conceived them and brought them about.

74

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
HERALD

DEC 3 - 1930

KOUSSEVITZKY WITH SYMPHONY ATTRACTS 3,000

Beethoven's Musical Fete Brings Lovers From as Far Away as Lower Mississippi

By STANLEY OLMSTED

It is said that for Washington's first Beethoven Festival many have journeyed here from as far away as Louisiana or Mississippi. With the Boston Symphony and Kappellmeister Serge Koussevitzky as protagonists, the opening concert drew a fine public to Constitution Hall last night—an audience socially and musically prepresentative to the point of saturation.

Ours is a city whose concert-goers like the classics. A warmth of expectancy might be noted, followed by that responsiveness which breathes easily nor is bewildered. Among these 3,000 or more people were hundreds manifestly enkindled in a fashion far other than when it's Schoenberg, or even Honneger or Respighi.

BEETHOVEN RULES

One touch of Beethoven makes all the music world akin, and here were many, many touches, to be followed by three more feasts from the one German great enough to share the enshrinement of Goethe with whom he was contemporary.

The peak of enthusiasm was reached after Miss Myra Hess had played the G major piano concerto, No. 4. She is a personable young woman who approaches her keyboard with relaxation. If her playing is dainty rather than crackling, it is yet far too musical ever to go cold. Her trills and passages are not those of d'Albert, with whom this work was a favorite when he used to electrify a piano-mad universe in the mauve decade. His "rondo vivace"—the third movement—was like whimsical firecrackers set popping in a dozen dynamics. But Miss Hess' cantilena caresses. She had to take five bows, demanded with stormy unanimity.

One major Beethoven opus, the "Eroica" Symphony, No. 3, came last on the program. Inspired, at least in its first movement, by the composer's admiration for Napoleon, his publishers made special directions that it always be played first. Otherwise the composer's purpose might fail of due effectiveness, with "an audience whose attention will be already wearied by preceding pieces."

GIGGLING DAYS

But those were days when a Paris gathering giggled at its unheard-of innovations, as people sometimes giggle at Stravinski today. Nobody's attention is strained any more; and here Koussevitzky could offer his best. It is said that in his own Paris they don't like his Beethoven, regarding him as a specialist in modernities. No lack of rapproachment, however, is discernable to Americans. Though neither in this "Eroica" nor in the opening Egmont overture last night, did he seem to reach his own keenest fusion with the work before him, he was faithful to a rigid classical spirit. Perhaps a shade too rigid, but that would remain a matter of taste. Often last night he seemed determined rather than joyful.

In the "Eroica's" "scherzo" nevertheless, he came into his own and here the zest was convincing and delicious. On the whole his beat kept to a metronomic precision that differed in the most baffling way from Toscanini's precision. It was something of an adventure to watch how far apart may be two men's nearly identical conceptions.

This festival is the fulfillment of a project long planned by Mrs. Wilson-Greene.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN

DEC 4 1930

PORTO RICAN TO BE CONCERT SOLOIST

Jesus Maria Sanroma, the Porto Rican pianist, will appear as soloist here with the Boston Symphony Orchestra when that body gives its second concert of the season in the Albee Theatre under the baton of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, Tuesday evening, Dec. 16. It will be the first time in a number of seasons that the Boston Symphony has brought here a guest artist as soloist.

Mr. Sanroma will play the piano solo in the second number on the program, Stravinsky's "Capriccio," scored for orchestra with piano in three movements. The concert will open with Nabokov's Symphony, while Tschaikowsky's Fourth Symphony in F-minor will follow the intermission.

Mr. Sanroma, who is only 27 years old, was born in Porto Rico of Catalonian parents, and it was the Porto Rican government which sent him to this country to complete his musical education. Graduated with honors from the New England Conservatory of Music, he studied for seven years more under Mme. Antoinette Szumowska. He went abroad last year to study with Cortot in Paris and with Schnabel in Berlin.

He has been soloist with the Boston Symphony on several occasions and was official pianist of the orchestra in the season of 1926-27. During that season he appeared in New York as soloist at the League of Composers' concert, at which Dr. Koussevitzky introduced Honegger's "Concertino."

In May he will be soloist with the University Glee Club of [illegible]

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
POST

DEC 4 - 1930

ZIMBALIST SHARES SYMPHONY GLORY

Second Night of Beethoven Festival Is Accorded High Praise.

ORCHESTRA IS PERFECT

Efrem Zimbalist, renowned violinist, the Boston Symphony Orchestra and Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, proved a trio of musical attractions last night which made the second performance of the Beethoven Festival even more notable than the opening concert on Tuesday night. The festival is being held at Constitution Hall under the local management of Mrs. Wilson-Greene and is part of the jubilee celebration of the fiftieth anniversary of the founding of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

At the start of this review it is well to state that the performance of Beethoven's masterpieces by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the inspired leadership of Dr. Koussevitzky is a reading of these scores with spirited loftiness, soulful expression and beauty of sound. It is easily seen that the orchestra has spent many hours in perfecting the Beethoven selections presented at the festival, which is making it a red-letter event in the history of Washington music.

The charming overture to "Leonore No. 3" was a fitting beginning of the evening's program. The nobility and poetry of the music were always in evidence and the entire overture was characterized by impeccable phrasing and rhythm.

Efrem Zimbalist, violinist, was in one of his happiest musical moods last night in the Violin Concerto in D Minor in which he played the solo portions. Every art of the violin was at the end of his bow and his skillful fingers. This violin concerto of Beethoven is one of music's classics and Zimbalist's reading of it on his incomparable violin, one of the finest instruments in the world, will not soon be forgotten by those privileged to hear it last night.

Mr. Zimbalist was obliged to return to the stage again to bow his acknowledgements of the tremendous ovations accorded him by a usually cold Washington audience.

The symphony of the evening was Beethoven Symphony No. 5, in C. Minor, with its fateful theme, a composition often called, because of its internal construction, an Iliad of the Soul.

In four movements, naturally, the second movement "The Andante con moto in A. Flat," is a set of lovely variations on a ravishing theme. The Scherzo and trio which followed it in the allegro, or third movement, came as a certain relief from the beauty and nobility of the Andante.

The finale with the magnificence of the full ensemble, the power and variety, the full realization of every exquisite detail and the glorious conclusion evoked great applause from the audience.

There will be no program of the festival tonight but the third one will be given tomorrow night in Constitution Hall with Josef Hofmann, pianist, as the soloist. E. E P.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
NEWS

DEC 4 - 1930

The housewife who does her baking should remember, therefore, that the flour which she uses must essentially be of the highest quality and purity obtainable. When she has assured herself that she has purchased the finest flour she can buy then she need have no fear but that her products will be healthful and assets in the daily diet of her family.

Mo

Boston Symphony Orchestra

FURTHER testimony of the remarkable genius of Ludwig van Beethoven was given Washington music lovers last night as Serge Koussevitsky led the Boston Symphony orchestra to another triumph in the second concert of the Beethoven Festival series at Continental Hall.

And Efrem Zimbalist was a happy choice as soloist. His violin concerto in D major called for an ovation similar to that elicited by the brilliant playing of the piano concerto by Myra Hess at Tuesday's concert.

In the concerto, soloist and orchestra, perfectly co-ordinated, produced a work of musical art. The beauty of the tones the artist drew from his violin, particularly in the second movement, equalled anything heard here in a long time

Smoothly and without many pyrotechnics, Zimbalist unfolded the intricate passages and elaborate figures of the concerto. Koussevitsky gave him flawless accompaniment. The lively rondo that closes the concerto left his listeners in a glow. The demonstration that followed lasted several minutes.

The Fifth Symphony brought the evening to a musical climax. The rich contrast written into the first two movements was skillfully interpreted by the talented conductor. Then came the difficult but exciting scherzo.

Practically every section of the huge orchestra stood out at one time or another. The music rose and fell in ascending to the thrilling finale when the full orchestra swept thru the majestic proportions of the succeeding climaxes that left one breathless at the close.

Josef Hofmann will be the soloist and the Seventh Symphony the featured number at the third concert of the series to be given tomorrow night.

CHARTER HESLEP.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
HERALD

DEC 4 1930

* * *

CONSTITUTION HALL—
Beethoven Festival

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, conductor, is giving in Washington this week its fiftieth anniversary Beethoven Festival at Constitution Hall—the greatest festival of orchestral music ever given in this city. There remain but two performances, Friday evening and Saturday afternoon, at 8:30 and 3 o'clock, respectively. On Friday evening, Josef Hofmann, pianist, will be heard as soloist, playing Beethoven's Fifth pianoforte concerto in E flat, Opus 73, while the Overture to "Coriolanus," Opus 62, and Symphony No. 7 in A major, Opus 92, will also be given. On Saturday afternoon, the First and Ninth Beethoven symphonies will be given with a chorus of 200 voices from the National Capital Oratorio Society. The entire festival is under the local management of Mrs. Wilson-Greene.

[illegible] Washington [illegible]ternoon in its club [illegible], under the auspices of the Hospitality Committee, Miss Marjorie Lowe, chairman. Among those who met the distinguished conductor were Mr. Frank Frost, Mr. and Mrs. Edward H. Droop, Mr. Otto Simon; Dr. and Mrs. H. B. Learned, Mr. Percy Lee Atherton, Miss Sylvia Lent, Dr. A. M. Harned, Mrs. Flora Magill Keefer, Mr. and Mrs. Charles Edward Russell, Mr. and Mrs. Kurt Hetzel, Mr. Henry S. Gregor, Mrs. Gertrude Lyons, Dr. Gilbert H. Grosvenor, Miss Mary Gildersleeve, Miss Mary Kerr, Miss Claire Seymour, Mrs. Greta von Bayer, Miss Elena de Sayn and many others prominent in musical activity in Washington.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
STAR

DEC 4 - 1930

Zimbalist Soloist At Beethoven Festival.

CONTINUING the high standard set the opening night of the Beethoven Festival, Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Constitution Hall conquered new fields last night and presented besides one of the most famous of violinists, Efrem Zimbalist, as soloist.

Mr. Zimbalist, a virtuoso who seems to become more popular in each successive visit to this city, played the "Concerto in D Major for Violin, Op. 61" with great ease, much velvetness of tone, especially in the "larghetto" movement, and a technical proficiency that, barring one or two untrue notes, defied criticism. After the first movement he was applauded vigorously, having with no apparent effort bridged the sea of difficulties that are in waiting most conspicuously during that part of the concerto. Again, toward the end, where an "ad lib" coda tests pretty much the skill of bow and fingers, Mr. Zimbalist fairly dazzled his audience by the speed and accuracy of his playing and brought his portion of the program to a close in splendid style.

Before and after him two of the most popular of the Beethoven compositions, the "Overture to Lenore" and the "Symphony No. 5 in C Minor, Op. 67," were played. The latter, which is an especial favorite, there being probably more that is familiar about it than any other two or three of the better known symphonies put together, proved to be easily the most effective number so far offered by the Bostonians. Although the "andante con moto" movement was carried along at a much slower pace than one is accustomed to, what followed made up for that deficiency—if it was one—Koussevitzky being at his very best in the louder and more exciting passages. In fact, the whole, in spite of the lethargy of one of its parts, seemed so very excellent that the audience was apparently loath to go home and would no doubt willingly have sat there and heard the whole thing over again.

Thus the great Beethoven fete goes on apace—the only fault one has to find with it being that it is half way over. No performance is scheduled for tonight, but Friday true Beethovenites should turn out in force, since besides the orchestra and Koussevitzky there will be Josef Hofmann to soothe the few remaining Beethoven hours. E. de S. M.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
TIMES

[illegible]5 - 1930

Large Group Attend Reception Honoring Dr. Koussevitzky

A reception to Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and Mme. Koussevitzky, was held Wednesday by the Arts Club of Washington in its club rooms, under the auspices of the hospitality committee, Miss Marjorie Lowe, chairman. Among those who met the distinguished conductor were Frank Frost, Mr. and Mrs. Edward H. Droop, Otto Simon, Dr. and Mrs. H. B. Learned, Percy Lee Atherton, Miss Sylvia Lent, Dr. A. M. Harned, Mrs. Flora Magill Keefer, Mr. and Mrs. Charles Edward Russell, Mr. and Mrs. Kurt Hetzel, Henry S. Gregor, Mrs. Gertrude Lyons, Dr. Gilbert H. Grosvenor, Miss Mary Gildersleeve, Miss Mary Kerr, Miss Claire Seymour, Mrs. Greta von Bayer, Miss Elena de Sayn and many others, prominent in musical activity in Washington.

[illegible]
HERALD

DEC 5 - 1930

MUSIC THRILLS CROWD ON 2D FESTIVAL NIGHT

Zimbalist and Koussevitzky Studiously Avoid Personal Pyrotechnics in Program

By STANLEY OLMSTED

An even larger audience than on Tuesday evening was magnetized for attendance at the second instalment of the four-part Beethoven festival, Wednesday night.

Constitution Hall is an elastic interior, but its vacancies, if any, made no spots of conspicuous hiatus in the vast seating scheme. It must always be remembered that this auditorium has ever room for a few more. You may fill it with over 4,000 and still there will be several places left for late comers or deadheads.

PROGRAM ENGROSSING

The program was, on the whole, more engrossing than on the previous night. The overture to Beethoven's only opera, "Leonore," edited so restlessly by the master, is always an adventure for the listener, whatever may be the choice of formats. It gave its unique dramatic kick to the start of a continuation where everybody was attuned.

Zimbalist was violin soloist for the second number, a favorite of Kreisler's, the concerto in D major, opus 61. The artist subordinated himself to his task. You listened to the music rather than to Zimbalist. He is not of those who strive strenuously to limelight themselves in a masterwork embalmed by tradition. You heard the concerto and not an exigent ego.

IGNORES THE RAPS

As climax, the Fifth Symphony in C minor—was delivered with an equal immolation of Conductor Koussevitsky in the classic formula. Not once did he strive for individual "cleverness." The three raps on the door, its main theme, were ignored as of little consequence in the super-structure. Poe had not written "the Raven" when this favorite of H. L. Mencken's was composed, and Mr. Koussevitsky was not concerned with "suddenly there came a tapping as of someone gently rapping."

He perceives the Fifth Symphony as a pure abstraction with no concrete moments.

He was also less formally conscientious than on the festival's opening night. He seemed to be taking everything for granted, as did also the audience.

These Beethoven concerts are basic to musical underpinnings, and their result should be educational, in the highest degree, with the uninitiated, or with those whose initiation has been inattentive or superficial. Mrs. Wilson-Greene had a sound ideal when she conceived them and brought them about.

Beethoven Concert Given At Congressional Library

A Washington week dedicated to Beethoven was made richer by a supplementary illustration of the master's work at the Library of Congress, yesterday. In the Coolidge Auditorium, two string quartets, Opuses 18 (No. 2) and 132, and respectively in G major and A minor, were played by the Burgin String Quartet.

These chamber music sonatas were composed 25 years apart, the one in 1800, the other in 1825. Between their rendition, the distinguished lecturer, Dr. Philip Hale, threw light on many aspects of Beethoven in an analytical and biographical address.

The two works plainly were chosen to contrast an earlier conformity with the vaster sweep of the composer's imagination as he grew older and sadder, tormented, but never fettered, by his deafness. They dramatized the growth of a Promethean rebellion within him.

The concert filled in a Thursday which otherwise would have been left empty in a Beethoven Week. It was a courtesy to the Capital, from the Boston Symphony's board of trustees and from its director, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky. Richard Burgin, Robert Gunderson, first and second violins, with Jean Lefranc and Jean Bedetti, playing viola and violoncello, make up this quar[illegible] personnel.

74

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
HERALD

DEC 3 - 1930

KOUSSEVITZKY WITH SYMPHONY ATTRACTS 3,000

Beethoven's Musical Fete Brings Lovers From as Far Away as Lower Mississippi

By STANLEY OLMSTED

It is said that for Washington's first Beethoven Festival many have journeyed here from as far away as Louisiana or Mississippi. With the Boston Symphony and Kappellmeister Serge Koussevitzky as protagonists, the opening concert drew a fine public to Constitution Hall last night—an audience socially and musically prepresentative to the point of saturation.

Ours is a city whose concertgoers like the classics. A warmth of expectancy might be noted, followed by that responsiveness which breathes easily nor is bewildered. Among these 3,000 or more people were hundreds manifestly enkindled in a fashion far other than when it's Schoenberg, or even Honneger or Respighi.

BEETHOVEN RULES

One touch of Beethoven makes all the music world akin, and here were many, many touches, to be followed by three more feasts from the one German great enough to share the enshrinement of Goethe with whom he was contemporary.

The peak of enthusiasm was reached after Miss Myra Hess had played the G major piano concerto, No. 4. She is a personable young woman who approaches her keyboard with relaxation. If her playing is dainty rather than crackling, it is yet far too musical ever to go cold. Her trills and passages are not those of d'Albert, with whom this work was a favorite when he used to electrify a piano-mad universe in the mauve decade. His "rondo vivace"—the third movement—was like whimsical firecrackers set popping in a dozen dynamics. But Miss Hess' cantilena caresses. She had to take five bows, demanded with stormy unanimity.

One major Beethoven opus, the "Eroica" Symphony, No. 3, came last on the program. Inspired, at least in its first movement, by the composer's admiration for Napoleon, his publishers made special directions that it always be played first. Otherwise the composer's purpose might fail of due effectiveness, with "an audience whose attention will be already wearied by preceding pieces."

GIGGLING DAYS

But those were days when a Paris gathering giggled at its unheard-of innovations, as people sometimes giggle at Stravinski today. Nobody's attention is strained any more; and here Koussevitzky could offer his best. It is said that in his own Paris they don't like his Beethoven, regarding him as a specialist in modernities. No lack of rapproachment, however, is discernable to Americans. Though neither in this "Eroica" nor in the opening Egmont overture last night, did he seem to reach his own keenest fusion with the work before him, he was faithful to a rigid classical spirit. Perhaps a shade too rigid, but that would remain a matter of taste. Often last night he seemed determined rather than joyful.

In the "Eroica's" "scherzo" nevertheless, he came into his own and here the zest was convincing and delicious. On the whole his beat kept to a metronomic precision that differed in the most baffling way from Toscanini's precision. It was something of an adventure to watch how far apart may be two men's nearly identical conceptions.

This festival is the fulfillment of a project long planned by Mrs. Wilson-Greene.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN

DEC 4 - 1930

PORTO RICAN TO BE CONCERT SOLOIST

Jesus Maria Sanroma, the Porto Rican pianist, will appear as soloist here with the Boston Symphony Orchestra when that body gives its second concert of the season in the Albee Theatre under the baton of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, Tuesday evening, Dec. 16. It will be the first time in a number of seasons that the Boston Symphony has brought here a guest artist as soloist.

Mr. Sanroma will play the piano solo in the second number on the program, Stravinsky's "Capriccio," scored for orchestra with piano in three movements. The concert will open with Nabokov's Symphony, while Tschaikowsky's Fourth Symphony in F-minor will follow the intermission.

Mr. Sanroma, who is only 27 years old, was born in Porto Rico of Catalonian parents, and it was the Porto Rican government which sent him to this country to complete his musical education. Graduated with honors from the New England Conservatory of Music, he studied for seven years more under Mme. Antoinette Szumowska. He went abroad last year to study with Cortot in Paris and with Schnabel in Berlin.

He has been soloist with the Boston Symphony on several occasions and was official pianist of the orchestra in the season of 1926-27. During that season he appeared in New York as soloist at the League of Composers' concert, at which Dr. Koussevitzky introduced Honegger's "Concertino."

In May he will be soloist with the University Glee Club of Provide POST C.

DEC 4 - 1930

ZIMBALIST SHARES SYMPHONY GLORY

Second Night of Beethoven Festival Is Accorded High Praise.

ORCHESTRA IS PERFECT

Efrem Zimbalist, renowned violinist, the Boston Symphony Orchestra and Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, proved a trio of musical attractions last night which made the second performance of the Beethoven Festival even more notable than the opening concert on Tuesday night. The festival is being held at Constitution Hall under the local management of Mrs. Wilson-Greene and is part of the jubilee celebration of the fiftieth anniversary of the founding of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

At the start of this review it is well to state that the performance of Beethoven's masterpieces by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the inspired leadership of Dr. Koussevitzky is a reading of these scores with spirited loftiness, soulful expression and beauty of sound. It is easily seen that the orchestra has spent many hours in perfecting the Beethoven selections presented at the festival, which is making it a red-letter event in the history of Washington music.

The charming overture to "Leonore No. 3" was a fitting beginning of the evening's program. The nobility and poetry of the music were always in evidence and the entire overture was characterized by impeccable phrasing and rhythm.

Efrem Zimbalist, violinist, was in one of his happiest musical moods last night in the Violin Concerto in D Minor in which he played the solo portions. Every art of the violin was at the end of his bow and his skillful fingers. This violin concerto of Beethoven is one of music's classics and Zimbalist's reading of it on his incomparable violin, one of the finest instruments in the world, will not soon be forgotten by those privileged to hear it last night.

Mr. Zimbalist was obliged to return to the stage again to bow his acknowledgements of the tremendous ovations accorded him by a usually cold Washington audience.

The symphony of the evening was Beethoven Symphony No. 5, in C. Minor, with its fateful theme, a composition often called, because of its internal construction, an Iliad of the Soul.

In four movements, naturally, the second movement "The Andante con moto in A. Flat," is a set of lovely variations on a ravishing theme. The Scherzo and trio which followed it in the allegro, or third movement, came as a certain relief from the beauty and nobility of the Andante.

The finale with the magnificence of the full ensemble, the power and variety, the full realization of every exquisite detail and the glorious conclusion evoked great applause from the audience.

There will be no program of the festival tonight but the third one will be given tomorrow night in Constitution Hall with Josef Hofmann, pianist, as the soloist. E. E P.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
NEWS

DEC 4 - 1930

The housewife who does her baking should remember, therefore, that the flour which she uses must essentially be of the highest quality and purity obtainable. When she has assured herself that she has purchased the finest flour she can buy then she need have no fear but that her products will be healthful and assets in the daily diet of her family.

Boston Symphony Orchestra

FURTHER testimony of the remarkable genius of Ludwig van Beethoven was given Washington music lovers last night as Serge Koussevitsky led the Boston Symphony orchestra to another triumph in the second concert of the Beethoven Festival series at Continental Hall.

And Efrem Zimbalist was a happy choice as soloist. His violin concerto in D major called for an ovation similar to that elicited by the brilliant playing of the piano concerto by Myra Hess at Tuesday's concert.

In the concerto, soloist and orchestra, perfectly co-ordinated, produced a work of musical art. The beauty of the tones the artist drew from his violin, particularly in the second movement, equalled anything heard here in a long time

Smoothly and without many pyrotechnics, Zimbalist unfolded the intricate passages and elaborate figures of the concerto. Koussevitsky gave him flawless accompaniment. The lively rondo that closes the concerto left his listeners in a glow. The demonstration that followed lasted several minutes.

The Fifth Symphony brought the evening to a musical climax. The rich contrast written into the first two movements was skillfully interpreted by the talented conductor. Then came the difficult but exciting scherzo.

Practically every section of the huge orchestra stood out at one time or another. The music rose and fell in ascending to the thrilling finale when the full orchestra swept thru the majestic proportions of the succeeding climaxes that left one breathless at the close.

Josef Hofmann will be the soloist and the Seventh Symphony the featured number at the third concert of the series to be given tomorrow night.

CHARTER HESLEP.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
HERALD

DEC 4 1930

* * *

CONSTITUTION HALL—
Beethoven Festival

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, conductor, is giving in Washington this week its fiftieth anniversary Beethoven Festival at Constitution Hall—the greatest festival of orchestral music ever given in this city. There remain but two performances, Friday evening and Saturday afternoon, at 8:30 and 3 o'clock, respectively. On Friday evening, Josef Hofmann, pianist, will be heard as soloist, playing Beethoven's Fifth pianoforte concerto in E flat, Opus 73, while the Overture to "Coriolanus," Opus 62, and Symphony No. 7 in A major, Opus 92, will also be given. On Saturday afternoon, the First and Ninth Beethoven symphonies will be given with a chorus of 200 voices from the National Capital Oratorio Society. The entire festival is under the local management of Mrs. Wilson-Greene.

...ernoon in its club ... under the auspices of the Hospitality Committee, Miss Marjorie Lowe, chairman. Among those who met the distinguished conductor were Mr. Frank Frost, Mr. and Mrs. Edward H. Droop, Mr. Otto Simon; Dr. and Mrs. H. B. Learned, Mr. Percy Lee Atherton, Miss Sylvia Lent, Dr. A. M. Harned, Mrs. Flora Magill Keefer, Mr. and Mrs. Charles Edward Russell, Mr. and Mrs. Kurt Hetzel, Mr. Henry S. Gregor, Mrs. Gertrude Lyons, Dr. Gilbert H. Grosvenor, Miss Mary Gildersleeve, Miss Mary Kerr, Miss Claire Seymour, Mrs. Greta von Bayer, Miss Elena de Sayn and many others prominent in musical activity in Washington.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
STAR

DEC 4 - 1930

Zimbalist Soloist At Beethoven Festival.

CONTINUING the high standard set the opening night of the Beethoven Festival, Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Constitution Hall conquered new fields last night and presented besides one of the most famous of violinists, Efrem Zimbalist, as soloist.

Mr. Zimbalist, a virtuoso who seems to become more popular in each successive visit to this city, played the "Concerto in D Major for Violin, Op. 61" with great ease, much velvetness of tone, especially in the "larghetto" movement, and a technical proficiency that, barring one or two untrue notes, defied criticism. After the first movement he was applauded vigorously, having with no apparent effort bridged the sea of difficulties that are in waiting most conspicuously during that part of the concerto. Again, toward the end, where an "ad lib" coda tests pretty much the skill of bow and fingers, Mr. Zimbalist fairly dazzled his audience by the speed and accuracy of his playing and brought his portion of the program to a close in splendid style.

Before and after him two of the most popular of the Beethoven compositions, the "Overture to Lenore" and the "Symphony No. 5 in C Minor, Op. 67," were played. The latter, which is an especial favorite, there being probably more that is familiar about it than any other two or three of the better known symphonies put together, proved to be easily the most effective number so far offered by the Bostonians. Although the "andante con moto" movement was carried along at a much slower pace than one is accustomed to, what followed made up for that deficiency—if it was one—Koussevitzky being at his very best in the louder and more exciting passages. In fact, the whole, in spite of the lethargy of one of its parts, seemed so very excellent that the audience was apparently loath to go home and would no doubt willingly have sat there and heard the whole thing over again.

Thus the great Beethoven fete goes on apace—the only fault one has to find with it being that it is half way over. No performance is scheduled for tonight, but Friday true Beethovenites should turn out in force, since besides the orchestra and Koussevitzky there will be Josef Hofmann to soothe the few remaining Beethoven hours. E. de S. M.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
TIMES

DEC 5 - 1930

Large Group Attend Reception Honoring Dr. Koussevitzky

A reception to Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and Mme. Koussevitzky, was held Wednesday by the Arts Club of Washington in its club rooms, under the auspices of the hospitality committee, Miss Marjorie Lowe, chairman. Among those who met the distinguished conductor were Frank Frost, Mr. and Mrs. Edward H. Droop, Otto Simon, Dr. and Mrs. H. B. Learned, Percy Lee Atherton, Miss Sylvia Lent, Dr. A. M. Harned, Mrs. Flora Magill Keefer, Mr. and Mrs. Charles Edward Russell, Mr. and Mrs. Kurt Hetzel, Henry S. Gregor, Mrs. Gertrude Lyons, Dr. Gilbert H. Grosvenor, Miss Mary Gildersleeve, Miss Mary Kerr, Miss Claire Seymour, Mrs. Greta von Bayer, Miss Elena de Sayn and many others, prominent in musical activity in Washington.

HERALD

DEC 5 - 1930

MUSIC THRILLS CROWD ON 2D FESTIVAL NIGHT

Zimbalist and Koussevitzky Studiously Avoid Personal Pyrotechnics in Program

By STANLEY OLMSTED

An even larger audience than on Tuesday evening was magnetized for attendance at the second instalment of the four-part Beethoven festival, Wednesday night.

Constitution Hall is an elastic interior, but its vacancies, if any, made no spots of conspicuous hiatus in the vast seating scheme. It must always be remembered that this auditorium has ever room for a few more. You may fill it with over 4,000 and still there will be several places left for late comers or deadheads.

PROGRAM ENGROSSING

The program was, on the whole, more engrossing than on the previous night. The overture to Beethoven's only opera, "Leonore," edited so restlessly by the master, is always an adventure for the listener, whatever may be the choice of formats. It gave its unique dramatic kick to the start of a continuation where everybody was attuned.

Zimbalist was violin soloist for the second number, a favorite of Kreisler's, the concerto in D major, opus 61. The artist subordinated himself to his task. You listened to the music rather than to Zimbalist. He is not of those who strive strenuously to limelight themselves in a masterwork embalmed by tradition. You heard the concerto and not an exigent ego.

IGNORES THE RAPS

As climax, the Fifth Symphony in C minor—was delivered with an equal immolation of Conductor Koussevitsky in the classic formula. Not once did he strive for individual "cleverness." The three raps on the door, its main theme, were ignored as of little consequence in the superstructure. Poe had not written "the Raven" when this favorite of H. L. Mencken's was composed, and Mr. Koussevitsky was not concerned with "suddenly there came a tapping as of someone gently rapping."

He perceives the Fifth Symphony as a pure abstraction with no concrete moments.

He was also less formally conscientious than on the festival's opening night. He seemed to be taking everything for granted, as did also the audience.

These Beethoven concerts are basic to musical underpinnings, and their result should be educational, in the highest degree with the uninitiated, or with those whose initiation has been inattentive or superficial. Mrs. Wilson-Greene had a sound ideal when she conceived them and brought them about.

Beethoven Concert Given At Congressional Library

A Washington week dedicated to Beethoven was made richer by a supplementary illustration of the master's work at the Library of Congress, yesterday. In the Coolidge Auditorium, two string quartets, Opuses 18 (No. 2) and 132, and respectively in G major and A minor, were played by the Burgin String Quartet.

These chamber music sonatas were composed 25 years apart, the one in 1800, the other in 1825. Between their rendition, the distinguished lecturer, Dr. Philip Hale, threw light on many aspects of Beethoven in an analytical and biographical address.

The two works plainly were chosen to contrast an earlier conformity with the vaster sweep of the composer's imagination as he grew older and sadder, tormented, but never fettered, by his deafness. They dramatized the growth of a Promethean rebellion within him.

The concert filled in a Thursday which otherwise would have been left empty in a Beethoven Week. It was a courtesy to the Capital, from the Boston Symphony's board of trustees and from its director, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky. Richard Burgin, Robert Gunderson, first and second violins, with Jean Lefranc and Jean Bedetti, playing viola and violoncello, make up this quartet personnel.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
STAR
DEC 5 - 1930

Music and Musicians

Reviews and News of Capital's Programs.

Philip Hale and Quartet At Library of Congress.

THANKS to the board of trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, a most entertaining and stimulating interlude in the week's Beethoven festivities was offered yesterday afternoon at the Library of Congress. Philip Hale, noted Boston critic and authority on the Beethoven saga, delighted an audience that was much larger than the convenience of the hall warranted, part of it sitting out in the lobby and applauding the veteran critic and the Burgin String Quartet enthusiastically.

This quartet, which is part of the Boston orchestra, composed of Richard Burgin, Robert Gunderson, Jean Lefranc and Jean Bedetti, played the Beethoven "String Quartet in G Major, Op. 18, No. 2," and the "String Quartet in A Minor, Op. 132," with obvious devotion and for the most part pleasing results. Overtopped a trifle by the first violin, the performance on the whole was keen and well co-ordinated, the rather long movements of the second composition retaining their dignity and charm at all times.

Mr. Hale began by saying, "I am not going to lecture. I am not going to give an address. I am simply going to talk to you informally about a man called Beethoven." And with that he launched into a sprightly and invigorating "talk." Admitting the great composer to be a genius in the realms of music, Mr Hale yet "debunked" him thoroughly as a man. He said he was a very ordinary "mortal," far from the saint that many biographers had made him. Calling him "a bit of a pagan," religiously, and emphasizing G. B. Shaw's remark about him to the effect that "he had the manners of a bisobliging steam roller," Mr. Hale made Beethoven seem very human, indeed.

Incidentally, before the program began, applause drifted through the hall, and Koussevitzky was seen trying to get to his seat before any further demonstrations of approval ran their fiery courses. E. de S. M.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
TIMES
DEC 6 - 1930

HOFMANN AS SOLOIST WITH SYMPHONY

With two magnificent symphonies, the great First and the even greater Ninth, the Beethoven Festival of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will come to an end this afternoon in Constitution Hall.

Rarely, if ever, has Washington had such a musical treat as this presented by the outstanding Boston Orchestra and its dynamic conductor, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky.

And musical Washington has responded nobly to this opportunity to hear the Beethoven Festival that won international fame in 1927 when it was first presented during the Beethoven centennial. Large audiences and enthusiastic audiences have attended each of the concerts, and have gone away heaping praise on the orchestra, the conductor and the soloists.

Last night the soloist was Josef Hofmann, that wizard of the piano, and he gave that exquisite concerto No. 5 in E Flat Major. A brilliant composition. Hofmann, ever the brilliant pianist, gave a thrilling rendition that won him rounds of applause.

The orchestra presented Symphony No. 7, one of the most vivid of the great composer, rising to great heights of beauty. The rather heavy overture to Coriolanus opened the program and served well to bring out the contrasted beauty of the other two numbers.

A chorus of 200 voices will sing the choral concluding today's symphony.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
LAWRENCE, MASS
TRIBUNE
NOV 5 - 1930

...itsky, ...y or- ...foot ...tional ...ap- ...has brought down on himself the wrath of safety experts who see in this habit not only a personal menace, but a dangerous example to other less distinguished pedestrians. The famous musician, according to the article, paying no attention to traffic signals, strides across the busiest streets, stopping the onrush of automobiles with much the same gesture that he uses to get a pianissimo from his bandsmen. The governor's committee on street and highway safety points out that more than 400 pedestrians are killed by automobiles in Massachusetts each year and that pedestrians comprise more than half of all motor victims in the state.

* * * * * * *

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
STAR
DEC 6 - 1930

Music and

Reviews and News o...

Hofmann Soloist At Beethoven Festival.

Whether due to the benefits of a day's siesta, or to the inspired weavings of Koussevitzky's baton over the orchestra, or to the vastly friendly audience which seemed to fill every nook and cranny of the horseshoe gallery regions, the Beethoven festival took on a new spurt of enthusiasm last night, and ran its course with flying colors.

Josef Hofmann.

There was not only a certain saltiness apparent at the first quiver of the maestro's wand, but Beethoven himself seemed to be at his best, flinging notes, chords, harmonies into the attentive ears of his admirers with his mightiest inspiration. For the "Coriolanus" overture is an enticing bit, the "Concerto for Pianoforte No. 5 in E Flat Major, Op. 73," is one of the grandest of full-voiced mediums for the piano, and the "Symphony No. 7 in A Major" has so much that is familiarly soothing about it, and so much that is bright and exciting, that the combination is fairly and literally unbeatable.

There was, besides, present Josef Hofmann. That in itself brought forth applause that rocked the great building to its foundations and forced the great master of the keys to bow and smile and bow and smile, until, even if he would, he couldn't have ...

THIS CLIPPING FROM TH...
PAWTUCKET, R. I.
TIMES

Symphony Orchestra to Give Its Second Concert on Dec. 16

Music of old and modern Russia will provide the music for the second concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra to be given in the Albee Theatre, Providence, on Tuesday evening, Dec. 16. On that occasion Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will first perform in Providence two notable scores recently composed, the "Symphonic Lyrique" of Nicolas Nabokov, and the "Capriccio" for piano and orchestra, by Igor Stravinsky. Nabokov is a young Russian now living in Paris, who has attracted a great deal of attention in Europe in the last few seasons, more particularly by this symphony. Dr. Koussevitzky, performing it in Boston and New York, has introduced it to America.

One of Stravinsky's latest scores is his "Capriccio" for piano and orchestra, which likewise will have its first American performance when this orchestra gives its concerts in Boston next Friday and Saturday. In the "Capriccio" the solo part will be taken by Jesus Maria Sanroma, both in Boston and Providence. This young pianist of rising fame has made a particular name for himself in modern music.

The closing piece will be Tchaikovsky's "Symphony No. 4" in F-minor, which is considered one of the most brilliant achievements of the Russian conductor.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
HERALD
DEC 6 - 1930

HOFMANN TOPS THIRD CONCERT OF BEETHOVEN

Koussevitzky and His Players, Warmed by Familiarity of Environment, Are Supreme

By STANLEY OLMSTED

Symphony orchestras, and their conductors, offer their greatest when warmed by familiarity of environment. One hears, for example, how the Boston Symphony, satisfying as it may seem to listeners when on tour, glows in its home city until "road" performances go pale by comparison.

Proving this claim, three concerts of the Beethoven Festival, have offered vivid testimony. At the first of them Koussevitzky and his men were substantial veterans, so much on their mettle you lost the feel of eagerness. On the second evening there was some manifest easing up; some elusive crescendo of vitality. Last night, third instalment of the four, at Constitution Hall, a thousand reserve forces were let loose; sprayed as scintillantly as spark showers from soaring roman candles.

AN AUDIENCE

Koussevitzky went electric with his players. It was a Koussevitzky reincarnated; translated, if you will.

Everybody who'd been present on the earlier occasions seemed to be on hand again, with fresh recruits swelling the throng by perhaps a thousand more. This was what even Paderewski might call an audience!

You caught the resilience at first lifting of the baton for the "Coriolanus" overture. You relaxed in your chair with beatific uplift. These players and their leader had been all right before. Now, though, they were really off! It was like champagne after the sauterne vintage.

Then came Josef Hofmann, detached as usual, to the point of preoccupied unconcern. His usual manner of readiness to deliver a piano job, as a minor item, unimportant amid graver matters. It is all such an old story to him. He's been doing it, before all the world including these good folks, since he was 7 or 8. Jupiter, accustomed to Olympus, no doubt dangled his thunderbolts, in some such fashion, in two absent-minded hands.

PLAYED "EMPEROR"

He played the king of all Beethovinian concertos, so automatically termed the "Emperor." Another concerto had been steadily announced. The Herald music critic, four weeks past, had been just as obstinately saying it ought to be the "Emperor," MUST be the Emperor, with Hofmann playing! Let the new ones come, take their bravos, and go. There is only one Hofmann; only one living virtuoso, who so mentally transcends his instrument he seems, at times, wellnigh to pity it.

If to his unapproachable mastery that thrill of the "personal" might be added—that gusto of emotional adventure which must have been Liszt's and Rubenstein's and is Paderewski's today—he would efface every existing legend of keyboard magic.

He does not do so. D'Albert, in the 90's, was not the unperturbed conqueror that little Hofmann long has been. And d'Albert entertained you better with this work (played by him in every city in the world) though he awed you less, gave you less of your own inferiority complex.

When the Seventh Symphony, in A major, capped the program's climax, Koussevitzky, leapingly enkindled by the "solo" he had just accompanied, became a Mercury, with two wings to either heel. No more ebullient and electrial reading of this perhaps loveliest of Beethoven's masterpieces, challenges the memory.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
NEWS
DEC 6 - 1930

Beethoven's 7th Delights Crowd

An Orchestra, an Audience and a Conductor Go Merrymaking

BY RUTH HOWELL

THE rollicking rhythms and memorably beautiful melodies of Beethoven's jolliest symphony, the Seventh, kept the Boston Symphony Orchestra busy last night in the third concert of the festival and sent the largest audience yet into an uproar of applause after each of the movements. In fact, after the finale, the audience stood and clapped and shouted and would not go home until Koussevitzky, smiling and wiping perspiration from his rosy face, had returned to the stage five times to bow.

The Seventh Symphony has never been so much fun as it was last night. From the dancing tune of the first movement, the stealthy theme and the beer-garden, stein-swing chorus of the second, thru the flying tempos of the last two, the orchestra dashed, the audience theoretically on its heels like a mob of breathless merrymakers trying to keep up with the band.

In the last movement, Koussevitzky got tired of swinging his arms now and then, and just stood there, letting the orchestra play. Then he would jump in and guide the players thru passages where the cellos fairly tread on the heels of the fiddles in picking up themes, and the horns had to fill in gaps here and there.

He played the finale with unbelievable speed and arrived safely at the end without disaster. It was a beautiful performance of a symphony that has more singing music in it than any other, except Brahms'.

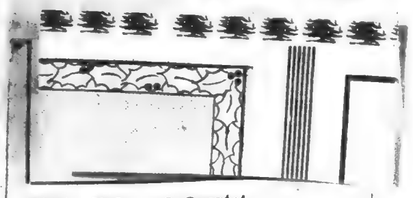
The orchestra shone too in the piano concerto, with Josef Hofmann as soloist. Unlike the performance Tuesday, it outshone the soloist. Much was the fault of the music for piano, technical and full of finger exercises rather than charm of theme. Hoffmann played it well but his tone was not beautiful. Was this the same piano that Myra Hess played on Tuesday?

The overture to "Coriolanus" serious and somber, was read magnificently, the best of the overtures in the festival.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
STAR
DEC 6 - 1930

The Minister of Switzerland and Mme. Peter were among those in the distinguished audience to hear the fourth of the series of concerts in the Beethoven festival given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Serge Koussevitsky conductor, in Constitution Hall. The symphony arranged four appearances with famous soloists, Josef Hofmann, pianist, playing last evening. The last performance will be given this afternoon at 3 o'clock, when the great "Ninth Symphony," with chorus, will be presented. Among others in the audience were the Speaker of the House and Mrs. Longworth, Representative and Mrs. J. Charles Linthicum, Representative and Mrs. Sol Bloom, Miss Vera Bloom, the secretary of the British embassy and Mrs. Shone, Assistant Secretary of State and Mrs. William R. Castle, Mrs. William Howard Taft, Mrs. Stephen B. Elkins, Col. and Mrs. U. S. Grant, 3d, and their daughter, Miss Julia Dent Grant; Mrs. Thomas F. Walsh and her guest, Mrs. Thomas Riley Marshall; Mr. and Mrs. Frank B. Noyes and their son-in-law and daughter, Mr. and Mrs. Willmott Lewis; the Rev. Dr. and Mrs. Robert Johnston, Mr. and Mrs. George Hewitt Myers, Mr. and Mrs. Adolph Caspar Miller, the former Attorney General and Mrs. George W. Wickersham, Mrs. Robert Lansing, Mrs. Lawrence Townsend, Miss Mabel Boardman, Mr. and Mrs. George Bowie Chipman, Mrs. John Hays Hammond, the Rev. Dr. and Mrs. George Fiske Dudley, Canon Anson Phelps Stokes and his daughter, Miss Olivia Phelps Stokes; the Rev. Dr. F. Ward Denys, Mr. and Mrs. Edward H. Droop, Mr. and Mrs. David Meade Lea, Mrs. Medorem Crawford, Miss Dalores Crawford, Mr. and Mrs. Walter Bruce Howe, Judge John Barton Payne, Mr. Charles Moore, Miss Laura Harlan, Mr. and Mrs. David St. Pierre Gaillard, Mr. and Mrs. Carl A. Droop, Mr. and Mrs. Christian Heurich and Mrs. William Kearny Carr.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
STAR
DEC 5 - 1930



Philip Hale and Quartet At Library of Congress.

THANKS to the board of trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, a most entertaining and stimulating interlude in the week's Beethoven festivities was offered yesterday afternoon at the Library of Congress. Philip Hale, noted Boston critic and authority on the Beethoven saga, delighted an audience that was much larger than the convenience of the hall warranted, part of it sitting out in the lobby and applauding the veteran critic and the Burgin String Quartet enthusiastically.

This quartet, which is part of the Boston orchestra, composed of Richard Burgin, Robert Gunderson, Jean Lefranc and Jean Bedetti, played the Beethoven "String Quartet in G Major, Op. 18, No. 2," and the "String Quartet in A Minor, Op. 132," with obvious devotion and for the most part pleasing results. Overtopped a trifle by the first violin, the performance on the whole was keen and well co-ordinated, the rather long movements of the second composition retaining their dignity and charm at all times.

Mr. Hale began by saying, "I am not going to lecture. I am not going to give an address. I am simply going to talk to you informally about a man called Beethoven." And with that he launched into a sprightly and invigorating "talk." Admitting the great composer to be a genius in the realms of music, Mr Hale yet "debunked" him thoroughly as a man. He said he was a very ordinary "mortal," far from the saint that many biographers had made him. Calling him "a bit of a pagan," religiously, and emphasizing G. B. Shaw's remark about him to the effect that "he had the manners of a bisobliging steam roller," Mr. Hale made Beethoven seem very human, indeed.

Incidentally, before the program began, applause drifted through the hall, and Koussevitzky was seen trying to get to his seat before any further demonstrations of approval ran their fiery courses. E. de S. M.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
TIMES
DEC 5 - 1930

HOFMANN AS SOLOIST WITH SYMPHONY

With two magnificent symphonies, the great First and the even greater Ninth, the Beethoven Festival of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will come to an end this afternoon in Constitution Hall.

Rarely, if ever, has Washington had such a musical treat as this presented by the outstanding Boston Orchestra and its dynamic conductor, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky.

And musical Washington has responded nobly to this opportunity to hear the Beethoven Festival that won international fame in 1927 when it was first presented during the Beethoven centennial. Large audiences and enthusiastic audiences have attended each of the concerts, and have gone away heaping praise on the orchestra, the conductor and the soloists.

Last night the soloist was Josef Hofmann, that wizard of the piano, and he gave that exquisite concerto No. 5 in E Flat Major. A brilliant composition. Hofmann, ever the brilliant pianist, gave a thrilling rendition that won him rounds of applause.

The orchestra presented Symphony No. 7, one of the most vivid of the great composer, rising to great heights of beauty. The rather heavy overture to Coriolanus opened the program and served well to bring out the contrasted beauty of the other two numbers.

A chorus of 200 voices will sing the choral concluding today's symphony.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
LAWRENCE, MASS.
TRIBUNE
NOV 5 - 1930

Sergei Alexandrovitch Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, whose disregard when on foot for traffic lights was given national prominence recently in a sketch appearing in the magazine Time, has brought down on himself the wrath of safety experts who see in this habit not only a personal menace, but a dangerous example to other less distinguished pedestrians. The famous musician, according to the article, paying no attention to traffic signals, strides across the busiest streets, stopping the onrush of automobiles with much the same gesture that he uses to get a pianissimo from his bandsmen. The governor's committee on street and highway safety points out that more than 400 pedestrians are killed by automobiles in Massachusetts each year and that pedestrians comprise more than half of all motor victims in the state.

* * * * * * *

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
STAR

Music and

Reviews and News o

Hofmann Soloist At Beethoven Festival.

Whether due to the benefits of a day's siesta, or to the inspired weavings of Koussevitzky's baton over the orchestra, or to the vastly friendly audience which seemed to fill every nook and cranny of the horseshoe gallery regions, the Beethoven festival took on a new spurt of enthusiasm last night, and ran its course with flying colors.

Josef Hofmann.

There was not only a certain saltiness apparent at the first quiver of the maestro's wand, but Beethoven himself seemed to be at his best, flinging notes, chords, harmonies into the attentive ears of his admirers with his mightiest inspiration. For the "Coriolanus" overture is an enticing bit, the "Concerto for Pianoforte No. 5 in E Flat Major, Op. 73," is one of the grandest of full-voiced mediums for the piano, and the "Symphony No. 7 in A Major" has so much that is familiarly soothing about it, and so much that is bright and exciting, that the combination is fairly and literally unbeatable.

There was, besides, present Josef Hofmann. That in itself brought forth applause that rocked the great building to its foundations, and forced the great master of the keys to bow and smile and bow and smile, until, even if he would, he couldn't have any more. Mr. Hofmann's playing of the "Concerto" was not only an interpretation that was technically solid, but it had grandeur and at the same time finesse, and if—as has been rumored—this composition has been done more justice to before—to the eyes of the layman, last night's rendition was not only satisfactory but superb. Mr. Hofmann did his share of work with zealous skill and co-ordinated himself with the orchestra so that at no time was there the slightest difference of opinion between them. He seemed, in fact, the ideal soloist, since even in the echoing scale-like progressions, he was never either a second ahead or a second behind, waiting for Koussevitzky to say the word and then plunging in with an exactness that was most enviable and becoming in a great artist.

There was, however, no letdown after Mr. Hoffmann's number. The Boston Orchestra, as fresh, if not fresher, than ever, took hold of the "Seventh Symphony" and shook the very life out of it, subduing itself in the noble and distinctly touching "allegretto" movement to pay melodic tribute to one of the loveliest of Beethoven's themes, and then finishing with an alacrity that tumbled the audience home in the best of humors.

Just why, it would be hard to say, but for some reason this concert was by far the best of them, and leads one to regret more and more that this afternoon is the last time one will have a chance to say such a thing again. E. de S. M.

ANNOUNCEMENT was of the special events in the Y. W. C. A. schedule for the coming week, the most significant is the invitation extended by the industrial committee

Y. W. C. A. Pawtucket

At the business meeting held dur ing the evening the members voted to send a check to the Pawtucke Lodge, B. P. O. Elks to assist them in the Christmas charity work.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
HERALD
DEC 6 - 1930

HOFMANN TOPS THIRD CONCERT OF BEETHOVEN

Koussevitzky and His Players, Warmed by Familiarity of Environment, Are Supreme

By STANLEY OLMSTED

Symphony orchestras, and their conductors, offer their greatest when warmed by familiarity of environment. One hears, for example, how the Boston Symphony, satisfying as ~~it may seem~~ to listeners when on tour, glows in its home city until "road" performances go pale by comparison.

Proving this claim, three concerts of the Beethoven Festival, have offered vivid testimony. At the first of them Koussevitzky and his men were substantial veterans, so much on their mettle you lost the feel of eagerness. On the second evening there was some manifest easing up; some elusive crescendo of vitality. Last night, third instalment of the four, at Constitution Hall, a thousand reserve forces were let loose; sprayed as scintillantly as spark showers from soaring roman candles.

AN AUDIENCE

Koussevitzky went electric with his players. It was a Koussevitzky reincarnated; translated, if you will.

Everybody who'd been present on the earlier occasions seemed to be on hand again, with fresh recruits swelling the throng by perhaps a thousand more. This was what even Paderewski might call an audience!

You caught the resilience at first lifting of the baton for the "Coriolanus" overture. You relaxed in your chair with beatific uplift. These players and their leader had been all right before. Now, though, they were really off! It was like champagne after the sauterne vintage.

Then came Josef Hofmann, detached as usual, to the point of preoccupied unconcern. His usual manner of readiness to deliver a piano job, as a minor item, unimportant amid graver matters. It is all such an old story to him. He's been doing it, before all the world including these good folks, since he was 7 or 8. Jupiter, accustomed to Olympus, no doubt dangled his thunderbolts, in some such fashion, in two absent-minded hands.

PLAYED "EMPEROR"

He played the king of all Beethovinian concertos, so automatically termed the "Emperor." Another concerto had been steadily announced. The Herald music critic, four weeks past, had been just as obstinately saying it ought to be the "Emperor," MUST be the Emperor, with Hofmann playing! Let the new ones come, take their bravos, and go. There is only one Hofmann; only one living virtuoso, who so mentally transcends his instrument he seems, at times, wellnigh to pity it.

If to his unapproachable mastery that thrill of the "personal" might be added—that gusto of emotional adventure which must have been Liszt's and Rubenstein's and is Paderewski's today—he would efface every existing legend of keyboard magic.

He does not do so. D'Albert, in the 90's, was not the unperturbed conqueror that little Hofmann long has been. And d'Albert entertained you better with this work (played by him in every city in the world) though he awed you less, gave you less of your own inferiority complex.

When the Seventh Symphony, in A major, capped the program's climax, Koussevitzky, leapingly enkindled by the "solo" he had just accompanied, became a Mercury, with two wings to either heel. No more ebullient and electrial reading of this perhaps loveliest of Beethoven's masterpieces, challenges the memory.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
NEWS
DEC 6 - 1930

Beethoven's 7th Delights Crowd

An Orchestra, an Audience and a Conductor Go Merrymaking

BY RUTH HOWELL

THE rollicking rhythms and memorably beautiful melodies of Beethoven's jolliest symphony, the Seventh, kept the Boston Symphony Orchestra busy last night in the third concert of the festival and sent the largest audience yet into an uproar of applause after each of the movements. In fact, after the finale, the audience stood and clapped and shouted and would not go home until Koussevitzky, smiling and wiping perspiration from his rosy face, had returned to the stage five times to bow.

The Seventh Symphony has never been so much fun as it was last night. From the dancing tune of the first movement, the stealthy theme and the beer-garden, stein-swing chorus of the second, thru the flying tempos of the last two, the orchestra dashed, the audience theoretically on its heels like a mob of breathless merrymakers trying to keep up with the band.

In the last movement, Koussevitzky got tired of swinging his arms now and then, and just stood there, letting the orchestra play. Then he would jump in and guide the players thru passages where the cellos fairly tread on the heels of the fiddles in picking up themes, and the horns had to fill in gaps here and there.

He played the finale with unbelievable speed and arrived safely at the end without disaster. It was a beautiful performance of a symphony that has more singing music in it than any other, except Brahms'.

The orchestra shone too in the piano concerto, with Josef Hofmann as soloist. Unlike the performance Tuesday, it outshone the soloist. Much was the fault of the music for piano, technical and full of finger exercises rather than charm of theme. Hoffmann played it well but his tone was not beautiful. Was this the same piano that Myra Hess played on Tuesday?

The overture to "Coriolanus" serious and somber, was read magnificently, the best of the overtures in the festival.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
STAR
DEC 6 - 1930

The Minister of Switzerland and Mme. Peter were among those in the distinguished audience to hear the fourth of the series of concerts in the Beethoven festival given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Serge Koussevitsky conductor, in Constitution Hall. The symphony arranged four appearances with famous soloists, Josef Hofmann, pianist, playing last evening. The last performance will be given this afternoon at 3 o'clock, when the great "Ninth Symphony," with chorus, will be presented. Among others in the audience were the Speaker of the House and Mrs. Longworth, Representative and Mrs. J. Charles Linthicum, Representative and Mrs. Sol Bloom, Miss Vera Bloom, the secretary of the British embassy and Mrs. Shone, Assistant Secretary of State and Mrs. William R. Castle, Mrs. William Howard Taft, Mrs. Stephen B. Elkins, Col. and Mrs. U. S. Grant, 3d, and their daughter, Miss Julia Dent Grant; Mrs. Thomas F. Walsh and her guest, Mrs. Thomas Riley Marshall; Mr. and Mrs. Frank B. Noyes and their son-in-law and daughter, Mr. and Mrs. Willmott Lewis; the Rev. Dr. and Mrs. Robert Johnston, Mr. and Mrs. George Hewitt Myers, Mr. and Mrs. Adolph Caspar Miller, the former Attorney General and Mrs. George W. Wickersham, Mrs. Robert Lansing, Mrs. Lawrence Townsend, Miss Mabel Boardman, Mr. and Mrs. George Bowie Chipman, Mrs. John Hays Hammond, the Rev. Dr. and Mrs. George Fiske Dudley, Canon Anson Phelps Stokes and his daughter, Miss Olivia Phelps Stokes; the Rev. Dr. F. Ward Denys, Mr. and Mrs. Edward H. Droop, Mr. and Mrs. David Meade Lea, Mrs. Medorem Crawford, Miss Dalores Crawford, Mr. and Mrs. Walter Bruce Howe, Judge John Barton Payne, Mr. Charles Moore, Miss Laura Harlan, Mr. and Mrs. David St. Pierre Gaillard, Mr. and Mrs. Carl A. Droop, Mr. and Mrs. Christian Heurich and Mrs. William Kearny Carr.

76

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
NEWS
DEC 6 - 1930

Music Affords A

By RUTH HOWELL

THERE are things about this past week's music that some folks will never forget—nor want to.

First, right off the bat, there was that triumphant little smile that Myra Hess gave Koussevitzky when she had finished a particularly slick phrase or scale in the Beethoven Concerto which she played with the Boston Symphony Tuesday night—[illegible] said: "Did you hear that? Now try to beat it with your orchestra." And Koussevitzky's answering smile, full of pride that his orchestra should be the setting for such a pianistic jewel, seemed to say: "No, it can't be done."

And the toss of Myra Hess' head when she had handed a particularly brilliant phrase over to the orchestra for restatement; and the lift of her eyebrows as she warned the conductor to get his men ready because she was likely to be a little independent about the ending of a run or the suddenness of a crashing chord.

And the seven times she was called back to the stage after the concerto—a real ovation in Washington. And just outside the stage door, where only those sitting on the side could see, Koussevitzky's enthusiastic gestures of approval to Miss Hess. You could see how he felt—and everyone felt the same way.

Conductor's Manner

AND folks won't forget the handsome Bostonian's way of leading—quiet, unobtrusive, but detailed in his commands to his orchestra. Like Mengelberg, only more so, he leads with his face. His mouth goes "Bong-bong-bong" for the drummers; he almost blows the horns and trombones for the players; and he fairly plucks the strings for the cellists in quiet staccato passages.

He leads his orchestra, and you hear the result, but you don't see him get it. Once last year, he practically played a chord for the orchestra—in the now famous and popular Bolero which he introduced here. No other leader has ever pounced on that surprising chord that changes the key, toward the end, with such suddenness and such effect. Koussevitzky literally "hauled off" and landed on it himself. Which one thing more than anything else, makes his reading of the Ravel novelty superior to others, and makes his record the best recording by far. Others let that moment go by almost unnoticed in their steady climb to the end of the crazy piece; but Koussevitzky seizes it and waves it aloft.

* * *

Honor Guest

DR. KOUSSEVITZKY was guest of honor at a tea at the Arts Club Wednesday afternoon, presided over by the picturesque Marjorie Lowe, looking like Lucrezia Borgia in a period gown that deserved two more periods and an exclamation point.

Koussevitzky is a charming person, not nearly so tall as he looks when conducting, but just as handsome. He stood with a cup of tea in his hand but couldn't manage to get much of it drunk, for the folks coming to greet him. Toward the end of the afternoon, you saw him and Frank Frost, who gave his support and enthusiasm so completely last year for our seemingly ill-fated National Symphony, talking together earnestly and having a great time. You wondered what they were cooking up, and hoped it was an orchestra.

* * *

Atmosphere

AND you won't forget the atmosphere in the lobbies at Constitution Hall, during the intermissions of these evening orchestral concerts. We almost have the promenade of the Metropolitan Opera House. Little groups gather, the place buzzes with conversation you see everybody you know.

* * *

A lot of folks got fooled at the first Morning Musical. They never dreamed it would start on time. And great lines of handsomely dressed ladies, many of whom probably liked Handel, missed Richard Crooks' first group of songs by the long winded post-Bachian composer.

Folks like to go to concerts at the Mayflower. Oscar Seagle's concert was packed, and the two piano recital by the Misses Sutro tomorrow night, is proving a drawing card.

By the way, the Misses Sutro, who play there tomorrow night, and Henri Smidt Gregor, who played sonatas so beautifully with Emanuel [illegible]lin a couple of weeks ago, are all [illegible]duates of the same conservator[illegible]

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN
DEC 6 - 1930

SYMPHONY TO GIVE RUSSIAN PROGRAM

An all-Russian program will be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its second Providence concert of this season at the Albee Theatre on Tuesday evening, Dec. 16.

Two of the scores to be presented by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will have their first Providence performance. They are the Symphonie Lyrique of Nicholas Nabokov, a young Russian composer now living in Paris who has attracted attention in Europe in the last few seasons, and the Caprialo for piano and orchestra by Igor Stravinsky. The Capriccio is to have its first American performance in Boston next week. The piano solo both here and in Boston will be played by Jesus Maria Sanroma, a Porto Rican pianist. The closing piece will be Tchaikowsky's Symphony No. 4 in F-minor.

A free lecture on the symphony program will be given at the Providence Public Library on Sunday afternoon, Dec. 14, by Dr. W. Louis Chapman, music critic of the Providence Journal and Evening Bulletin. The lecture is sponsored by the Monday Morning Musical Club.

MINNEAPOLIS, MINN.
JOURNAL
DEC 7 - 1930

Roussel Opus Gets Hearing

Boston Orchestra Plays New Symphony by Frenchman

In the first New York concert of the season given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra recently, Mr. Koussewitzky introduced a new symphony by Albert Roussel, in G minor, a work recently composed for the fiftieth anniversary of said orchestra.

Olin Downes, the New York Times critic, reviews in the following manner:

"It is cyclic in form, a central theme serving as the basis for metamorphoses in the four different movements, thus binding the movements together in the fashion practiced especially by Fesar Franck and by Vincent d'Indy, in former years Mr. Roussel's teacher. The style is contemporaneous, "polyharmonic" and "polytonal" devices being employed when the logic of the musical thought justifies combinations of chords and combinations of keys. But this is neither far-fetched nor affected with Roussel. There is no question of his sincerity and virility.

"Whether this intention is realized in a very thoughtfully written work is another matter. On first acquaintance the most impressive pages in the score are those which occur with the peroration of the fugue in the slow movement. There, by virtue of contrapuntal developments, Roussel hits upon some effective tonal combinations and a very sonorous climax, a climax followed by more sensuous music, perhaps incongrous in point of style with what has preceded, and savoring more of the romantic nineteenth than the linear twentieth century in mood.

"But elsewhere there is the impression of paucity of thought, of ideas not in themselves very fruit-[illegible]

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
HERALD
DEC 7 - 1930

CABINET CALLING engaged the interest of society on Wednesday and on Friday came the first entertainment for this season at the Congressional Club—a reception with the ladies of the Cabinet group as the special guests.

Shining lights of the musical and literary world have contributed importantly to the interest of the week's activities. For Efrem Zimbalist, soloist with the Boston Symphony at one of its Beethoven festival concerts, and Mme. Zimbalist—the lovely Alma Gluck—Mrs. James F. Curtis gave a delightful reception on Wednesday evening. This followed a small dinner, at which Mrs. Louis Spears (Mary Borden, writer of a half-dozen brilliant novels,) was a guest.

For Myra Hess, brilliant young British pianist, soloist with the Boston Symphony at another concert of the series, Mr. and Mrs. Terence Shone, of the British embassy, gave a dinner. And Richard Crooks and Mlle. Clare Clairbert shared honors, and Mrs. Lawrence Townsend's luncheon following her first concert of the season, at which they presented the program.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
DEC 7 1930

SYMPHONY BRINGS NEW MUSIC AND SOLOIST

The Boston Symphony program to be presented a week from Tuesday night will be an unusually novel one, including as it does, two new works and a soloist. It is not Dr. Koussevitzky's custom to have soloists but one of the new compositions he is introducing requires one.

It is a Capriccio for orchestra and piano, one of the most recent scores by Igor Stravinsky, and is due for its first American performance in Boston this week. Jesus Maria Sanroma will play the piano part and, incidentally, make his second appearance of the season before Providence concertgoers, with a third to come. Last month he played with the Sinfonietta at Alumnae Hall and has been engaged by the University Glee Club for its final concert along in May.

Dr. Koussevitzky's second new offering will be a symphony by Nicolas Nabokov, a young Russian composer, who has attracted wide attention in Europe for his ballet, "Ode," and particularly for the symphony to be heard here. It was originally titled "Symphonie Lyrique." Dr. Koussevitzky played it at his opening New York concerts as well as in Boston. With these two new ones and Tschaikowski's Fourth Symphony, considered among the most brilliant of Koussevitzky's achievements, the program is an all-Russian affair. The details follow:

Symphony, Nabokov, Allegro, Largo, Allegro; Capriccio for Orchestra With Piano Solo, Stravinsky, Presto, Andante rapsodico, Allegro capriccioso, ma tempo giusto; piano solo, Jesus Maria Sanroma. Symphony No. 4 in F-minor, opus 36, Andante sostenuto, moderato con anima (in movimento di valse); Andantino in modo di canzona, Scherzo, pizzicato ostinato; Finals, Allegro con fuoco.

Next Sunday afternoon at the Providence Public Library, Dr. W. Louis Chapman will give the second of his lectures on the symphony programs, sponsored by the Monday Morning Musical Club and free to the public.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
STAR
DEC 7 - 1930

Distinguished Audience At Last Beethoven Concert

Mrs. Hurley, wife of the Secretary of War, and her young daughter, Patricia, were among those who attended the final concert yesterday afternoon of the Beethoven festival, given in Constitution Hall by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitsky, conductor.

Among others who attended yesterday's concert, at which the great Ninth Symphony, with chorus, was given, were the Ambassador of Cuba and Senora de Ferrara, Mrs. Charles Evans Hughes, wife of the Chief Justice; Countess Szechenyi, wife of the Minister of Hungary; the Speaker of the House, Mr. Longworth; Mrs. Robert Low Bacon, Mrs. Sol Bloom, Miss Vera Bloom, Mrs. Stephen B. Elkins, Mrs. U. S. Grant, 3d, and her daughters, Miss Edith Grant and Miss Clara Grant; Mrs. Tracy Dows, Canon Anson Phelps Stokes and Miss Olivia Phelps Stokes, Mrs. Lawrence Townsend, Mr. and Mrs. Wilmott Lewis, Mr. and Mrs. David Meade Lea, Mrs. Carl A. Droop, Rev. Dr. and Mrs. Charles Wood, Rev. F. Ward Denys, Mrs. Adolph Caspar Miller, Mr. and Mrs. Clarence Aspinwall, Miss Mabel Boardman and Mr. Samuel M. Pilson.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
DEC 7 1930

BOSTON SYMPHONY WILL GIVE RUSSIAN PROGRAM

Second Concert of Season Scheduled for Dec. 16 at Albee.

An all-Russian program will be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its second Providence concert of this season at the Albee Theatre on Tuesday evening, Dec. 16.

Two of the scores to be presented by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will have their first Providence performance. They are the Symphonie Lyrique of Nicholas Nabokov, a young Russian composer now living in Paris who has attracted attention in Europe in the last few seasons, and the Caprialo for piano and orchestra by Igor Stravinsky. The Capriccio is to have its first American performance in Boston next week. The piano solo both here and in Boston will be played by Jesus Maria Sanroma, a Porto Rican pianist. The closing piece will be Tchaikowsky's Symphony No. 4 in F-minor.

A free lecture on the symphony program will be given at the Providence Public Library on Sunday afternoon, Dec. 14, by Dr. W. Louis Chapman, music critic of the Providence Journal and Evening Bulletin. The lecture is sponsored by the Monday Morning Musical Club.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
HERALD
DEC 7 - 1930

FESTIVAL ENDS WITH ACCLAIM OF BIG CROWD

Beethoven's Ninth Symphony Wins Praise of Audience; Soloists Get Much Applause

By STANLEY OLMSTED

Joy, thou spark from flame immortal,
Daughter of Elysium!
Drunk with fire, O heav'n-born goddess,
We invade thy halidom!

So runs Schiller's "Ode to Joy," which enthused poor Beethoven, stone-deaf and nearing his end, to strive to soar, like Icarus, into the very heart of the blazing sun, as he penned his Ninth Symphony.

You know how the original lilts along—Freude, schoene Goetterfunken, Tochterraus Elysium! etc. The translation is by "the late" Henry G. Chapman. No living poet is likely to make a fresh stab at English with the ode. By the taste of today, Schiller's megaphonic super-trumpet lacked restraint. It could no more get into Harriet Monroe's verse magazine than a Tintoretto or a da Vinci could get into a Corcoran biennial show!

QUARTETTE PRAISED

Sold out at last to its final seat, a mammoth Constitution Hall strove to out-shout Schiller, plus Beethoven, when the Ninth Symphony made a last-act curtain for the four-day festival brought locally to pass by Mrs. Wilson-Greene. Koussevitzky's biggest moment came when his moments here, for the time being, were over.

Banners waved, figuratively. There was the all the wild alarum of pomp and circumstance. The Boston symphonic helmsman wouldn't stand for it alone. Perhaps it was too much to digest without an appetizer. He brought forward his half-feminine choral quartet. They had been more or less submerged by some two or three hundred choral shouters of joy, in a key so high only a deaf man would have dared ever to imagine it. Also they had had to be soloists in but briefest snatches. Just a little phrase, here and there, and chorus and orchestra clamors them down in the Ninth Symphony. It clambers also all over them. Their bits are like first buddings of little coral atolls in the Pacific.

BUY NOW
Sales Sing Success

By the hand he drew forth Jeanette Vreeland, soprano. Taller and fairer than a Daniel-French Victory on a pillar, she embodied the "daughter of Elysium" alluded to in the context, trailing pale-green draperies, very decollete. She in turn drew forth Nevada Van Der Veer, contralto; Dan Gridley, tenor, and Fraser Gange, basso, in a linked chain.

HALL IS PACKED

Packed Constitution Hall shouted anew! It was all but a coda, in character, to Beethoven's mightiest chanting, as the dusk of his day presaged night.

The first symphony of his muse, in C major (which began the concert), was chosen no doubt for measuring unit, giving the scale of his last one, as naturalists sometimes place a pollywog by a pachyderm in a museum. This is Beethoven when still young, and at his imitative smallest. The very authenticity of its authorship once was questioned. It might just as easily have been Mozart, ridding himself of another of those dozens of cheerful little immortal symphonies before lunch.

INFORMATION OBSCURED

76

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
NEWS
DEC 6 - 1930

Music Affords A

By RUTH HOWELL

THERE are things about this past week's music that some folks will never forget—nor want to.

First, right off the bat, there was that triumphant little smile that Myra Hess gave Koussevitzky when she had finished a particularly slick phrase or scale in the Beethoven Concerto which she played with the Boston Symphony Tuesday night—[illegible] said: "Did you hear that? Now try to beat it with your orchestra." And Koussevitzky's answering smile, full of pride that his orchestra should be the setting for such a pianistic jewel, seemed to say: "No, it can't be done."

And the toss of Myra Hess' head when she had handed a particularly brilliant phrase over to the orchestra for restatement; and the lift of her eyebrows as she warned the conductor to get his men ready because she was likely to be a little independent about the ending of a run or the suddenness of a crashing chord.

And the seven times she was called back to the stage after the concerto—a real ovation in Washington. And just outside the stage door, where only those sitting on the side could see, Koussevitzky's enthusiastic gestures of approval to Miss Hess. You could see how he felt—and everyone felt the same way.

Conductor's Manner

AND folks won't forget the handsome Bostonian's way of leading—quiet, unobtrusive, but detailed in his commands to his orchestra. Like Mengelberg, only more so, he leads with his face. His mouth goes "Bong-bong-bong" for the drummers; he almost blows the horns and trombones for the players; and he fairly plucks the strings for the cellists in quiet staccato passages.

He leads his orchestra, and you hear the result, but you don't see him get it. Once last year, he practically played a chord for the orchestra—in the now famous and popular Bolero which he introduced here. No other leader has ever pounced on that surprising chord that changes the key, toward the end, with such suddenness and such effect. Koussevitzky literally "hauled off" and landed on it himself. Which one thing more than anything else, makes his reading of the Ravel novelty superior to others, and makes his record the best recording by far. Others let that moment go by almost unnoticed in their steady climb to the end of the crazy piece; but Koussevitzky seizes it and waves it aloft.

* * *

Honor Guest

DR. KOUSSEVITZKY was guest of honor at a tea at the Arts Club Wednesday afternoon, presided over by the picturesque Marjorie Lowe, looking like Lucrezia Borgia in a period gown that deserved two more periods and an exclamation point.

Koussevitzky is a charming person, not nearly so tall as he looks when conducting, but just as handsome. He stood with a cup of tea in his hand but couldn't manage to get much of it drunk, for the folks coming to greet him. Toward the end of the afternoon, you saw him and Frank Frost, who gave his support and enthusiasm so completely last year for our seemingly ill-fated National Symphony, talking together earnestly and having a great time. You wondered what they were cooking up, and hoped it was an orchestra.

* * *

Atmosphere

AND you won't forget the atmosphere in the lobbies at Constitution Hall, during the intermissions of these evening orchestral concerts. We almost have the promenade of the Metropolitan Opera House. Little groups gather, the place buzzes with conversation you see everybody you know.

* * *

A lot of folks got fooled at the first Morning Musical. They never dreamed it would start on time. And great lines of handsomely dressed ladies, many of whom probably liked Handel, missed Richard Crooks' first group of songs by the long winded post-Bachian composer.

Folks like to go to concerts at the Mayflower. Oscar Seagle's concert was packed, and the two piano recital by the Misses Sutro tomorrow night, is proving a drawing card.

By the way, the Misses Sutro, who play there tomorrow night, and Henri Smidt Gregor, who played sonatas so beautifully with Emanuel Zetlin a couple of weeks ago, are all [illegible] graduates of the same conservatory [illegible] they p[illegible]

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN
DEC 6 - 1930

SYMPHONY TO GIVE RUSSIAN PROGRAM

An all-Russian program will be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its second Providence concert of this season at the Albee Theatre on Tuesday evening, Dec. 16.

Two of the scores to be presented by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will have their first Providence performance. They are the Symphonie Lyrique of Nicholas Nabokov, a young Russian composer now living in Paris who has attracted attention in Europe in the last few seasons, and the Caprialo for piano and orchestra by Igor Stravinsky. The Capriccio is to have its first American performance in Boston next week. The piano solo both here and in Boston will be played by Jesus Maria Sanroma, a Porto Rican pianist. The closing piece will be Tchaikowsky's Symphony No. 4 in F-minor.

A free lecture on the symphony program will be given at the Providence Public Library on Sunday afternoon, Dec. 14, by Dr. W. Louis Chapman, music critic of the Providence Journal and Evening Bulletin. The lecture is sponsored by the Monday Morning Musical Club.

MINNEAPOLIS, MINN.
JOURNAL
DEC 7 - 1930

Roussel Opus Gets Hearing

Boston Orchestra Plays New Symphony by Frenchman

In the first New York concert of the season given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra recently, Mr. Koussewitzky introduced a new symphony by Albert Roussel, in G minor, a work recently composed for the fiftieth anniversary of said orchestra.

Olin Downes, the New York Times critic, reviews in the following manner:

"It is cyclic in form, a central theme serving as the basis for metamorphoses in the four different movements, thus binding the movements together in the fashion practiced especially by Fesar Franck and by Vincent d'Indy, in former years Mr. Roussel's teacher. The style is contemporaneous, "polyharmonic" and "polytonal" devices being employed when the logic of the musical thought justifies combinations of chords and combinations of keys. But this is neither far-fetched nor affected with Roussel. There is no question of his sincerity and virility.

"Whether this intention is realized in a very thoughtfully written work is another matter. On first acquaintance the most impressive pages in the score are those which occur with the peroration of the fugue in the slow movement. There, by virtue of contrapuntal developments, Roussel hits upon some effective tonal combinations and a very sonorous climax, a climax followed by more sensuous music, perhaps incongrous in point of style with what has preceded, and savoring more of the romantic nineteenth than the linear twentieth century in mood.

"But elsewhere there is the impression of paucity of thought, of ideas not in themselves very fruitful. More than one composer, admittedly, has developed undistinguished ideas in an imposing manner, but when this occurs it does so because there is an accumulation of musical material occasioned by the stimulus of the composer's creative nature. There is not the sensation of organic growth in the work heard last night."

Lawrence Gilman, on the whole more favorably disposed toward the same work, writes in the Herald-Tribune about in summing up:

"The point is that Roussel, in this music, adds something to the common store—something definitely individualized, a personal way of fusing and arranging elements, an unmistakable particularity of flavor and of pattern. The score has wit, craft, beauty. One is aware of a civilized and distinguished mind at work be[illegible] tones— a mind urbane, cri[illegible] challenging; a Bost[illegible] adult one [illegible] a company of [illegible] at luncheon Thursday afternoon at her home in Wyoming Avenue, in compliment to her house guest, Miss Katharine Carl, of Peking, China.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
DEC 7 1930

SYMPHONY BRINGS NEW MUSIC AND SOLOIST

The Boston Symphony program to be presented a week from Tuesday night will be an unusually novel one, including as it does, two new works and a soloist. It is not Dr. Koussevitzky's custom to have soloists but one of the new compositions he is introducing requires one.

It is a Capriccio for orchestra and piano, one of the most recent scores by Igor Stravinsky, and is due for its first American performance in Boston this week. Jesus Maria Sanroma will play the piano part and, incidentally, make his second appearance of the season before Providence concertgoers, with a third to come. Last month he played with the Sinfonietta at Alumnae Hall and has been engaged by the University Glee Club for its final concert along in May.

Dr. Koussevitzky's second new offering will be a symphony by Nicolas Nabokov, a young Russian composer, who has attracted wide attention in Europe for his ballet, "Ode," and particularly for the symphony to be heard here. It was originally titled "Symphonie Lyrique." Dr. Koussevitzky played it at his opening New York concerts as well as in Boston. With these two new ones and Tschaikowski's Fourth Symphony, considered among the most brilliant of Koussevitzky's achievements, the program is an all-Russian affair. The details follow:

Symphony, Nabokov, Allegro, Largo, Allegro; Capriccio for Orchestra With Piano Solo, Stravinsky, Presto, Andante rapsodico, Allegro capriccioso, ma tempo giusto; piano solo, Jesus Maria Sanroma. Symphony No. 4 in F-minor, opus 36, Andante sostenuto, moderato con anima (in movimento di valse); Andantino in modo di canzona, Scherzo, pizzicato ostinato; Finals, Allegro con fuoco.

Next Sunday afternoon at the Providence Public Library, Dr. W. Louis Chapman will give the second of his lectures on the symphony programs, sponsored by the Monday Morning Musical Club and free to the public.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
STAR
DEC 7 1930

Distinguished Audience At Last Beethoven Concert

Mrs. Hurley, wife of the Secretary of War, and her young daughter, Patricia, were among those who attended the final concert yesterday afternoon of the Beethoven festival, given in Constitution Hall by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitsky, conductor.

Among others who attended yesterday's concert, at which the great Ninth Symphony, with chorus, was given, were the Ambassador of Cuba and Senora de Ferrara, Mrs. Charles Evans Hughes, wife of the Chief Justice; Countess Szechenyi, wife of the Minister of Hungary; the Speaker of the House, Mr. Longworth; Mrs. Robert Low Bacon, Mrs. Sol Bloom, Miss Vera Bloom, Mrs. Stephen B. Elkins, Mrs. U. S. Grant, 3d, and her daughters, Miss Edith Grant and Miss Clara Grant; Mrs. Tracy Dows, Canon Anson Phelps Stokes and Miss Olivia Phelps Stokes, Mrs. Lawrence Townsend, Mr. and Mrs. Wilmott Lewis, Mr. and Mrs. David Meade Lea, Mrs. Carl A. Droop, Rev. Dr. and Mrs. Charles Wood, Rev. F. Ward Denys, Mrs. Adolph Caspar Miller, Mr. and Mrs. Clarence Aspinwall, Miss Mabel Boardman and Mr. Samuel M. Pilson.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
DEC 7 1930

BOSTON SYMPHONY WILL GIVE RUSSIAN PROGRAM

Second Concert of Season Scheduled for Dec. 16 at Albee.

An all-Russian program will be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its second Providence concert of this season at the Albee Theatre on Tuesday evening, Dec. 16.

Two of the scores to be presented by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will have their first Providence performance. They are the Symphonie Lyrique of Nicholas Nabokov, a young Russian composer now living in Paris who has attracted attention in Europe in the last few seasons, and the Caprialo for piano and orchestra by Igor Stravinsky. The Capriccio is to have its first American performance in Boston next week. The piano solo both here and in Boston will be played by Jesus Maria Sanroma, a Porto Rican pianist. The closing piece will be Tchaikowsky's Symphony No. 4 in F-minor.

A free lecture on the symphony program will be given at the Providence Public Library on Sunday afternoon, Dec. 14, by Dr. W. Louis Chapman, music critic of the Providence Journal and Evening Bulletin. The lecture is sponsored by the Monday Morning Musical Club.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
HERALD
DEC 7 - 1930

FESTIVAL ENDS WITH ACCLAIM OF BIG CROWD

Beethoven's Ninth Symphony Wins Praise of Audience; Soloists Get Much Applause

By STANLEY OLMSTED

Joy, thou spark from flame immortal,
Daughter of Elysium!
Drunk with fire, O heav'n-born goddess,
We invade thy halidom!

So runs Schiller's "Ode to Joy," which enthused poor Beethoven, stone-deaf and nearing his end, to strive to soar, like Icarus, into the very heart of the blazing sun, as he penned his Ninth Symphony.

You know how the original lilts along—Freude, schoene Goetterfunken, Tochterraus Elysium! etc. The translation is by "the late" Henry G. Chapman. No living poet is likely to make a fresh stab at English with the ode. By the taste of today, Schiller's megaphonic super-trumpet lacked restraint. It could no more get into Harriet Monroe's verse magazine than a Tintoretto or a da Vinci could get into a Corcoran biennial show!

QUARTETTE PRAISED

Sold out at last to its final seat, a mammoth Constitution Hall strove to out-shout Schiller, plus Beethoven, when the Ninth Symphony made a last-act curtain for the four-day festival brought locally to pass by Mrs. Wilson-Greene. Koussevitzky's biggest moment came when his moments here, for the time being, were over.

Banners waved, figuratively. There was the all the wild alarum of pomp and circumstance. The Boston symphonic helmsman wouldn't stand for it alone. Perhaps it was too much to digest without an appetizer. He brought forward his half-feminine choral quartet. They had been more or less submerged by some two or three hundred choral shouters of joy, in a key so high only a deaf man would have dared ever to imagine it. Also they had had to be soloists in but briefest snatches. Just a little phrase, here and there, and chorus and orchestra clamors them down in the Ninth Symphony. It clambers also all over them. Their bits are like first buddings of little coral atolls in the Pacific.

BUY NOW
Sales Sing Success

By the hand he drew forth Jeanette Vreeland, soprano. Taller and fairer than a Daniel-French Victory on a pillar, she embodied the "daughter of Elysium" alluded to in the context, trailing pale-green draperies, very decollete. She in turn drew forth Nevada Van Der Veer, contralto; Dan Gridley, tenor, and Fraser Gange, basso, in a linked chain.

HALL IS PACKED

Packed Constitution Hall shouted anew! It was all but a coda, in character, to Beethoven's mightiest chanting, as the dusk of his day presaged night.

The first symphony of his muse, in C major (which began the concert), was chosen no doubt for measuring unit, giving the scale of his last one, as naturalists sometimes place a pollywog by a pachyderm in a museum. This is Beethoven when still young, and at his imitative smallest. The very authenticity of its authorship once was questioned. It might just as easily have been Mozart, ridding himself of another of those dozens of cheerful little immortal symphonies before lunch.

EVE. STAR DEC. 2

BEETHOVEN FETE TO OPEN TONIGHT

Boston Symphony Orchestra Arrives for Opening Concert of Program.

From Denver to Bath, Me., people are coming to Washington today for the opening of the Beethoven festival—probably the greatest music festival that this city has ever seen. Starting tonight, with a program given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Serge Koussevitzky, this gala week of music, which is dedicated to the fiftieth anniversary of Beethoven's death, will continue through until Saturday, other concerts being scheduled to take place Wednesday and Friday evenings and Saturday afternoon at Constitution Hall.

This morning two special cars arrived bringing the Boston orchestra with its 115 men and its staff of technicians. They scattered to various quarters during the day and assembled later at Constitution Hall for a final rehearsal. Tonight at 8:30 the initial concert gets under way.

Distinguished Artists.

Not since the Boston held its famous festival in 1927 has such a complete program of Beethoven been assembled at one time and in one city. The greatest interest has been aroused through all sections of the country.

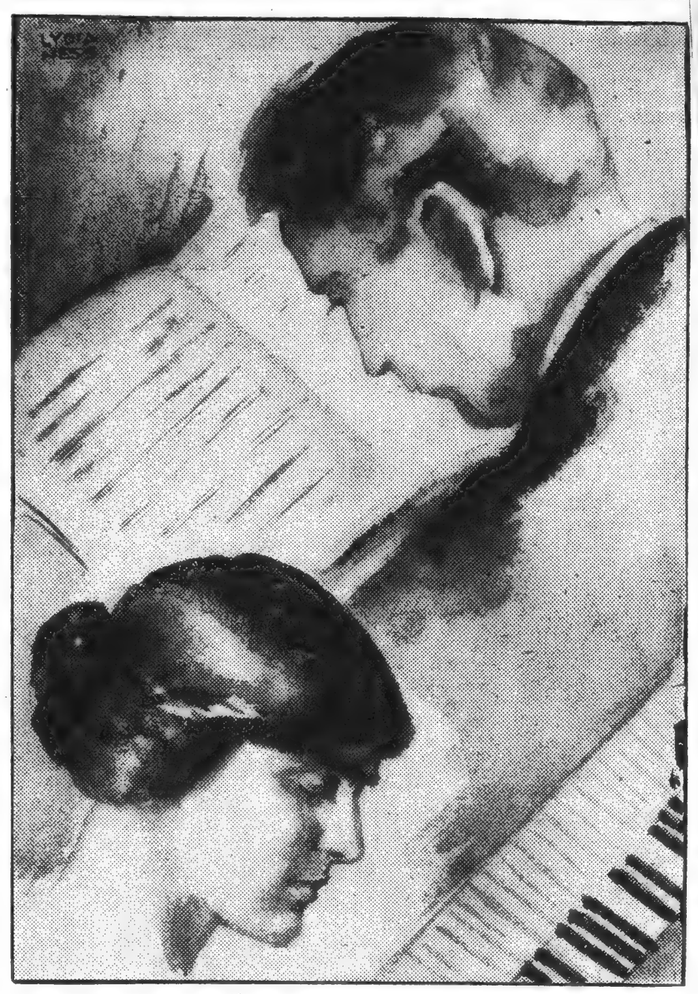
Not only one of the most famous symphony orchestras, but the most distinguished artists have been assembled for this occasion. Josef Hofmann, Efrem Zimbalist and Myra Hess are to appear during the week as soloists. Miss Hess, who arrived in this city yesterday, will be the first guest artist on the program playing a Beethoven concerto at tonight's concert. Efrem Zimbalist, world- famous violinist, will play at ...day's concert and Josef Hofmann ...riday to appear as guest artist Boston Symphony.

Chorus of 200 Voices.

...ely enough, a fitting climax musical week will be the ...t Constitution Hall on ...noon of Beethoven's ...—which besides the ...ists, will include a ... voices. This chorus, ...ined by Dr. Albert ...ington, is composed of members of the National Capital Oratorio Association, and is one of the largest ever to be assembled in this city.

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will conduct all four concerts at Constitution Hall. The festival is under the local management of Mrs. Wilson-Greene.

ARTISTS IN BEETHOVEN FESTIVAL



Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and Myra Hess, pianist, who are appearing at Constitution Hall tonight.

—Drawn for The Star by Lydia Hess.

Firm on Full Time.

NEW YORK, December 2 (AP).—The Wheeling Steel Corporation has resumed operations in full at its Creek Mill plant, which has been working half-time for 10 weeks.

WASH. POST 16 DEC. 7

BEETHOVEN'S WORK STIR HUGE AUDIENC

Festival Closes in Triump for Boston Symphony, Soloists and Chorus.

IMMORTAL NINTH GIVE

The Beethoven Festival by t... Boston Symphony Orchestra in Con... stitution Hall yesterday ended in ... blaze of musical glory with an out... standing presentation of that mas... ter's immortal Ninth Symphony, 20... singers of the National Capit... Oratorio Association, Albert W. Har... ned, director, providing the chor... feature.

Four soloists, Jeannette Vreelan... soprano; Nevada Van Der Veer, con... tralto; Dan Gridley, tenor, and Fraze... Gange, bass, were heard in the mag... nificent finale with which Beethove... crowned this most pretentious of al... his symphonies.

Every seat in the house was sol... when the performance began at ... p. m. Hundreds of students i... Washington schools and colleges wer... present at this program of the festi... val, which had been arranged fo... their special benefit and to promote ... musical interest in Washington by ... Mrs. Wilson Greene, the impresario, ... under whose management in the Na... tional Capital the festival has been ... given.

Conducted by Koussevitzky.

The conductor of the afternoon was, of course, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky who, despite his prodigious labors in leading four great festival programs this week, was in a vigorous mood yesterday. The Symphony Orchestra played both the Ninth Symphony and the shorter Symphony No. 1 in C major, which preceded it, with perfect ensemble tone, evident enthusiasm and quick response to the inspired baton of its leader.

The Symphony No. 1 in C major proved to be possessed of many beauties, especially in the third movement when the menuetto was an exquisite gem of orchestral playing. All its delicate phrases were woven by Dr. Koussevitzky into a musical pattern of intricate loveliness. The other movements of the symphony were adequately handled.

After the intermission the big moment of the entire festival arrived: the playing of the unique Ninth Symphony, undoubtedly Beethoven's symphonic masterpiece.

Audience Is Enthralled.

The audience sat enthralled as the orchestra proceeded on its melodic way, the first movement, the allegro, majestic in its music of the spheres timed to the rhythm of ectasy. Then came the delicious scherzo of the second movement, admirably done, the individual voices of the orchestra each telling the story in its own beautiful way, and then the poetic adagio, leading movement by movement and measure by measure to the finale.

The audience thrilled with civic pride when Dr. Koussevitzky, at the conclusion of the symphony, presented the soloists who had given such good account of themselves and shared with them and the mammoth chorus the tremendous series of ovations which marked the close of the presentation.

The chorus showed a well-trained, finely developed ensemble tone and sang with ardor and interest, portraying how much good material vocally speaking has been assembled in the National Capital Oratorio Association singers.

Deserves Much Credit.

Dr. Harned, their leader, deserves much credit for his share in preparing them to assist the Boston Symphony Orchestra in its laudable endeavor to bring the best of Beethoven to Washington as part of their celebration of their jubilee year.

The thanks of the music-loving public are due to the Boston Symphony Orchestra, its dynamic director, Dr. Koussevitzky, and Mrs. Wilson Greene, the local impresario, for this week of festival music, which will remain memorable in the Capital City for some time to come.

A hearty welcome awaits the Boston Symphony Orchestra and its conductor when it comes again to Washington.

E. E. P.

DEC. 6

THE EVENING ST...

Music and Musicians

Reviews and News ...Capital's Programs.

Hofmann Soloist At Beethoven Festival.

Whether due to the benefits of a day's siesta, or to the inspired weavings of Koussevitzky's baton over the orchestra, or to the vastly friendly audience which seemed to fill every nook and cranny of the horseshoe gallery regions, the Beethoven festival took on a new spurt of enthusiasm last night, and ran its course with flying colors.

Josef Hofmann.

There was not only a certain saltiness apparent at the first quiver of the maestro's wand, but Beethoven himself seemed to be at his best, flinging notes, chords, harmonies into the attentive ears of his admirers with his mightiest inspiration. For the "Coriolanus" overture is an enticing bit, the "Concerto for Pianoforte No. 5 in E Flat Major, Op. 73," is one of the grandest of full-voiced mediums for the piano, and the "Symphony No. 7 in A Major" has so much that is familiarly soothing about it, and so much that is bright and exciting, that the combination is fairly and literally unbeatable.

There was, besides, present Josef Hofmann. That in itself brought forth applause that rocked the great building to its foundations and forced the great master of the keys to bow and smile and bow and smile, until, even if he would, he couldn't have any more. Mr. Hofmann's playing of the "Concerto" was not only an interpretation that was technically solid, but it had grandeur and at the same time finesse, and if—as has been rumored—this composition has been done more justice to before—to the eyes of the layman, last night's rendition was not only satisfactory but superb. Mr. Hofmann did his share of work with zealous skill and co-ordinated himself with the orchestra so that at no time was there the slightest difference of opinion between them. He seemed, in fact, the ideal soloist, since even in the echoing scale-like progressions, he was never either a second ahead or a second behind, waiting for Koussevitzky to say the word and then plunging in with an exactness that was most enviable and becoming in a great artist.

There was, however, no letdown after Mr. Hoffmann's number. The Boston Orchestra, as fresh, if not fresher, than ever, took hold of the "Seventh Symphony" and shook the very life out of it, subduing itself in the noble and distinctly touching "allegretto" movement to pay melodic tribute to one of the loveliest of Beethoven's themes, and then finishing with an alacrity that tumbled the audience home in the best of humors.

Just why, it would be hard to say, but for some reason this concert was by far the best of them, and leads one to regret more and more that this afternoon is the last time one will have a chance to say such a thing again.

E. de S. M.

THE EVENING STAR, WASHINGTON, D. C., FRIDAY, DECEMBER 5, 1930.

Music and Musicians

Reviews and News of Capital's Programs.

Philip Hale and Quartet At Library of Congress.

THANKS to the board of trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, a most entertaining and stimulating interlude in the week's Beethoven festivities was offered yesterday afternoon at the Library of Congress. Philip Hale, noted Boston critic and authority on the Beethoven saga, delighted an audience that was much larger than the convenience of the hall warranted, part of it sitting out in the lobby and applauding the veteran critic and the Burgin String Quartet enthusiastically.

This quartet, which is part of the Boston orchestra, composed of Richard Burgin, Robert Gunderson, Jean Lefranc and Jean Bedetti, played the Beethoven "String Quartet in G Major, Op. 18, No. 2," and the "String Quartet in A Minor, Op. 132," with obvious devotion and for the most part pleasing results. Overtopped a trifle by the first violin, the performance on the whole was keen and well co-ordinated, the rather long movements of the second composition retaining their dignity and charm at all times.

Mr. Hale began by saying, "I am not going to lecture. I am not going to give an address. I am simply going to talk to you informally about a man called Beethoven." And with that he launched into a sprightly and invigorating "talk." Admitting the great composer to be a genius in the realms of music, Mr. Hale yet "debunked" him thoroughly as a man. He said he was a very ordinary "mortal," far from the saint that many biographers had made him. Calling him "a bit of a pagan," religiously, and emphasizing G. B. Shaw's remark about him to the effect that "he had the manners of a bisobliging steam roller," Mr. Hale made Beethoven seem very human, indeed.

Incidentally, before the program began, applause drifted through the hall, and Koussevitzky was seen trying to get to his seat before any further demonstrations of approval ran their fiery courses.

E. de S. M.

Georgetown Music Series Has Inaugural Program.

OFFERING a program of enjoyable and familiar selections, three artists well known in Washington music circles, Adolf Torovsky, pianist; Helen Belt, violinist, and Richard Lorleberg, cellist, last night inaugurated the concert season of

EVE. STAR DEC. 2

BEETHOVEN FETE TO OPEN TONIGHT

Boston Symphony Orchestra Arrives for Opening Concert of Program.

From Denver to Bath, Me., people are coming to Washington today for the opening of the Beethoven festival—probably the greatest music festival that this city has ever seen. Starting tonight, with a program given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Serge Koussevitzky, this gala week of music, which is dedicated to the fiftieth anniversary of Beethoven's death, will continue through until Saturday, other concerts being scheduled to take place Wednesday and Friday evenings and Saturday afternoon at Constitution Hall.

This morning two special cars arrived bringing the Boston orchestra with its 115 men and its staff of technicians. They scattered to various quarters during the day and assembled later at Constitution Hall for a final rehearsal. Tonight at 8:30 the initial concert gets under way.

Distinguished Artists.

Not since the Boston held its famous festival in 1927 has such a complete program of Beethoven been assembled at one time and in one city. The greatest interest has been aroused through all sections of the country.

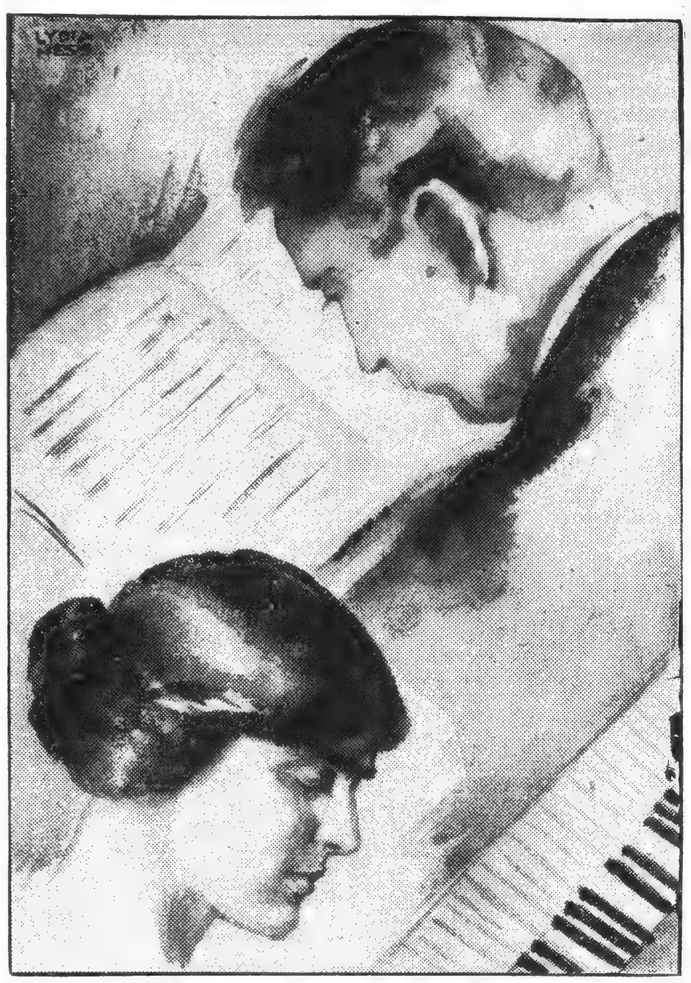
Not only one of the most famous symphony orchestras, but the most distinguished artists have been assembled for this occasion. Josef Hofmann, Efrem Zimbalist and Myra Hess are to appear during the week as soloists. Miss Hess, who arrived in this city yesterday, will be the first guest artist on the program playing a Beethoven concerto at tonight's concert. Efrem Zimbalist, world- famous violinist, will play at w[illegible]day's concert and Josef Hofmann [illegible]riday to appear as guest artist Boston Symphony.

Chorus of 200 Voices.

[illegible]ely enough, a fitting climax musical week will be the [illegible]t Constitution Hall on [illegible]noon of Beethoven's [illegible]"—which besides the [illegible]ists, will include a [illegible] voices. This chorus. [illegible]ined by Dr. Albert [illegible]ington, is composed of members of the National Capital Oratorio Association, and is one of the largest ever to be assembled in this city.

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will conduct all four concerts at Constitution Hall. The festival is under the local management of Mrs. Wilson-Greene.

ARTISTS IN BEETHOVEN FESTIVAL



Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and Myra Hess, pianist, who are appearing at Constitution Hall tonight.

—Drawn for The Star by Lydia Hess.

Firm on Full Time.

NEW YORK, December 2 (AP).—The Wheeling Steel Corporation has resumed operations in full at its Creek Mill plant, which has been working half-time for 10 weeks.

Music and Musicians

Reviews and News of Capital's Programs.

Philip Hale and Quartet At Library of Congress.

THANKS to the board of trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, a most entertaining and stimulating interlude in the week's Beethoven festivities was offered yesterday afternoon at the Library of Congress. Philip Hale, noted Boston critic and authority on the Beethoven saga, delighted an audience that was much larger than the convenience of the hall warranted, part of it sitting out in the lobby and applauding the veteran critic and the Burgin String Quartet enthusiastically.

This quartet, which is part of the Boston orchestra, composed of Richard Burgin, Robert Gunderson, Jean Lefranc and Jean Bedetti, played the Beethoven "String Quartet in G Major, Op. 18, No. 2," and the "String Quartet in A Minor, Op. 132," with obvious devotion and for the most part pleasing results. Overtopped a trifle by the first violin, the performance on the whole was keen and well co-ordinated, the rather long movements of the second composition retaining their dignity and charm at all times.

Mr. Hale began by saying, "I am not going to lecture. I am not going to give an address. I am simply going to talk to you informally about a man called Beethoven." And with that he launched into a sprightly and invigorating "talk." Admitting the great composer to be a genius in the realms of music, Mr. Hale yet "debunked" him thoroughly as a man. He said he was a very ordinary "mortal," far from the saint that many biographers had made him. Calling him "a bit of a pagan," religiously, and emphasizing G. B. Shaw's remark about him to the effect that "he had the manners of a bisobliging steam roller," Mr. Hale made Beethoven seem very human, indeed.

Incidentally, before the program began, applause drifted through the hall, and Koussevitzky was seen trying to get to his seat before any further demonstrations of approval ran their fiery courses. E. de S. M.

Georgetown Music Series Has Inaugural Program.

OFFERING a program of enjoyable and familiar selections, three artists well known in Washington music circles, Adolf Torovsky, pianist; Helen Belt, violinist, and Richard Lorleberg, cellist, last night inaugurated the concert season of

WASH. POST 16 DEC. 7

BEETHOVEN'S WORKS STIR HUGE AUDIENCE

Festival Closes in Triumph for Boston Symphony, Soloists and Chorus.

IMMORTAL NINTH GIVEN

The Beethoven Festival by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Constitution Hall yesterday ended in a blaze of musical glory with an outstanding presentation of that master's immortal Ninth Symphony, 200 singers of the National Capital Oratorio Association, Albert W. Harned, director, providing the choral feature.

Four soloists, Jeannette Vreeland, soprano; Nevada Van Der Veer, contralto; Dan Gridley, tenor, and Frazer Gange, bass, were heard in the magnificent finale with which Beethoven crowned this most pretentious of all his symphonies.

Every seat in the house was sold when the performance began at 3 p. m. Hundreds of students in Washington schools and colleges were present at this program of the festival, which had been arranged for their special benefit and to promote musical interest in Washington by Mrs. Wilson Greene, the impresario, under whose management in the National Capital the festival has been given.

Conducted by Koussevitzky.

The conductor of the afternoon was, of course, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky who, despite his prodigious labors in leading four great festival programs this week, was in a vigorous mood yesterday. The Symphony Orchestra played both the Ninth Symphony and the shorter Symphony No. 1 in C major, which preceded it, with perfect ensemble tone, evident enthusiasm and quick response to the inspired baton of its leader.

The Symphony No. 1 in C major proved to be possessed of many beauties, especially in the third movement when the menuetto was an exquisite gem of orchestral playing. All its delicate phrases were woven by Dr. Koussevitzky into a musical pattern of intricate loveliness. The other movements of the symphony were adequately handled.

After the intermission the big moment of the entire festival arrived: the playing of the unique Ninth Symphony, undoubtedly Beethoven's symphonic masterpiece.

Audience Is Enthralled.

The audience sat enthralled as the orchestra proceeded on its melodic way, the first movement, the allegro, majestic in its music of the spheres timed to the rhythm of ectasy. Then came the delicious scherzo of the second movement, admirably done, the individual voices of the orchestra each telling the story in its own beautiful way, and then the poetic adagio, leading movement by movement and measure by measure to the finale.

The audience thrilled with civic pride when Dr. Koussevitzky, at the conclusion of the symphony, presented the soloists who had given such good account of themselves and shared with them and the mammoth chorus the tremendous series of ovations which marked the close of the presentation.

The chorus showed a well-trained, finely developed ensemble tone and sang with ardor and interest, portraying how much good material vocally speaking has been assembled in the National Capital Oratorio Association singers.

Deserves Much Credit.

Dr. Harned, their leader, deserves much credit for his share in preparing them to assist the Boston Symphony Orchestra in its laudable endeavor to bring the best of Beethoven to Washington as part of their celebration of their jubilee year.

The thanks of the music-loving public are due to the Boston Symphony Orchestra, its dynamic director, Dr. Koussevitzky, and Mrs. Wilson Greene, the local impresario, for this week of festival music, which will remain memorable in the Capital City for some time to come.

A hearty welcome awaits the Boston Symphony Orchestra and its conductor when it comes again to Washington. E. E. P.

DEC. 6

THE EVENING ST

Music and Musicians

Reviews and News Capital's Programs.

ann Soloist eethoven Festival.

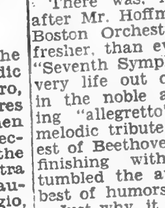
hether due to the benefits of a s siesta, or to the inspired weav- of Koussevitzky's baton over orchestra, or to the vastly friendly audience which seemed to fill every nook and cranny of the horseshoe gallery regions, the Beethoven festival took on a new spurt of enthusiasm last night, and ran its course with flying colors.



osef Hofmann.

There was not only a certain saltiness apparent at the first quiver of the maestro's wand, but thoven himself seemed to be at best, flinging notes, chords, harnies into the attentive ears of admirers with his mightiest in- ation. For the "Coriolanus" rture is an enticing bit, the "Con- to for Pianoforte No. 5 in E Flat jor, Op. 73," is one of the ndest of full-voiced mediums for e piano, and the "Symphony No. in A Major" has so much that is miliarly soothing about it, and so uch that is bright and exciting, at the combination is fairly and terally unbeatable.

There was, besides, present, Josef Hofmann. That in itself brought forth applause that rocked the great building to its foundations and forced the great master of the keys to bow and smile and bow and smile, until, even if he would, he couldn't have any more. Mr. Hofmann's playing of the "Concerto" was not only an interpretation that was technically solid, but it had grandeur and at the same time finesse, and if—as has been rumored—this composition has been done more justice to before—to the eyes of the layman, last night's rendition was not only satisfactory but superb. Mr. Hofmann did his share of work with zealous skill and co-ordinated himself with the orchestra so that at no time was there the slightest difference of opinion between them. He seemed, in fact, the ideal soloist, since even in the echoing scale-like progressions, he was never either a second ahead or a second behind, waiting for Koussevitzky to say the word and then plunging in with an exactness that was most enviable and becoming in a great artist.

There was, however, no letdown after Mr. Hoffmann's number. The Boston Orchestra, as fresh, if not fresher, than ever, took hold of the "Seventh Symphony" and shook the very life out of it, subduing itself in the noble and distinctly touching "allegretto" movement to pay melodic tribute to one of the loveliest of Beethoven's themes, and then finishing with an alacrity that tumbled the audience home in the best of humors.

Just why, it would be hard to say, but for some reason this concert was by far the best of them, and leads one to regret more and more that this afternoon is the last time one will have a chance to say such a thing again. E. de S. M.

many moons. Occasionally, some hardy soul evolves something a bit out of the ordinary, such as the Hammond invention, demonstrated in Boston and other cities a few years ago, which contained a shutter, similar to the sound-box in the organ. With this contrivance, it was possible to play a chord with the box closed, and then, by opening the shutter, produce the effect of tone increasing in volume after its inception — something hitherto impossible on the piano. As the inability to increase the volume of a note or chord without striking it again has always been considered a handicap in piano playing, one might have supposed that musicians would hail this invention with glee; but there has appeared to be no particular demand that piano makers develop and add this feature to their future instruments. Evidently since Beethoven, Brahms, Chopin, and Liszt, could be adequately performed on the existing piano, why worry over new effects that would be used only in the works of living, and therefore inferior (?) composers?

This season, we are being offered another invention, and it will be interesting to see whether the Pianists' Union (intangible, but a strictly closed shop, nevertheless) will take any serious notice of it.

The new piano is known as the Bechstein-Moor. It is made by the house of Bechstein, according to the invention of Emanuel Moor, and it is being used on tour by the inventor's wife, Winifred Christie, a pianist who has been heard many times at the standard piano.

The feature of the new Bechstein is a second keyboard, like a second manual on an organ. The upper manual is an octave higher than the main rank, and there is a pedal by which this upper manual may be coupled to the lower. There will be nothing new about this to an organist, of course, but to the pianist accustomed to the limitations of ten fingers on one keyboard, the possibilities are fascinating. Embellishments in the higher register can be played on the upper manual without taking the hand far from position; counter-melodies that would ordinarily cause the two hands to conflict can be kept separate if, as the Herald reviewer wrote, "one hand takes the high road and one takes the low road"; by coupling the two manuals, one can play rapid octaves with a single scale; and harmonically the gain is greatest of all, since the doubling in the octave makes it possible for one player to approach the richness and fullness of a four-hand arrangement.

These various possibilities were shown in the recital recently given by Miss Christie in Symphony Hall, where a good-sized audience listened with evident interest — some persons even crowding up on the stage afterward to see the construction of the new piano. Unfortunately, the owners whisked it away before "a good look could be had by all."

Miss Christie's program contained no music later than Schumann and Franck, but it would be equally interesting to hear what might be done on this promising instrument with more modern music. Imagine, for instance, George Copeland arranging some of his atmospheric Debussy and delectable Spanish repertoire for the double keyboard — or George Gershwin tossing delightful rhythmic arabesques around some of his lilting melodies. That would be something to write home about, what?

We see that these inviting pianos are on sale in various cities throughout the country — alas, not in Boston (Why is that?) — and that they cost from $3,000 up. Why don't they make one at a price within the reach of some people who could play it? Mr. Gershwin excepted; for what are a few thousands to the Rhapsodist in Blue?

Even if this new piano is not taken up by pianists in general — the price is certainly a barrier at present, though doubtless a way would be found to make instruments at a more reasonable figure — it should be invaluable in broadcasting studios where the piano is a vital feature of the small orchestra. In fact, wherever a piano is relied on to "fill in" and otherwise augment the effect of a limited instrumentation, the increased richness of the Bechstein-Moor would be a musical gold mine.

Will it, however, prove to be another disastrous labor-saving device, succeeding merely in putting one pianist in every two-piano team out of business? Fortunately, no one has yet perfected a device by which one man can play two muted trumpets!

Phonograph Review
November, 1930, Vol. V. No. 2

Koussevitsky — the "Pathetique"

TCHAIKOWSKY: Symphony No. 6 ("Pathètique") played by the BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA under the direction of SERGE KOUSSEVITSKY. VICTOR Masterpiece Set M-85 (5 D12s, Alb., $10.00).

Every great conductor has certain works in his repertoire that are distinctly his own métier, for the interpretation of which he has a decided flair whether by temperament, nationality or application. These have in the performance a remarkable sense of rightness and unquestioned authority.

It was my great pleasure to hear Serge Koussevitsky the first time that he conducted the Pathètique in this country. I felt at the time that here was the true Tchaikowsky for the first time just as I had always hated to believe in other performances that the composer could be such a dull and maudlin sentimentalist. It is still within the reach of fact that he might have easily been depressed and sad at the time he wrote the work, but any idea that he sought death, a theory brought forth by one of his famous pupils, has long been disaproved.

It seems that he must have had a much greater motive in mind than that of the purely personal. Certainly judging from his letters to the Grand Duke Constantine, in which he anticipated favor for his latest composition and surprise for the use of an adagio as a final movement, he was rather more content than usual. In reality he had written a masterpiece, which when re-created in the light in which he wrote it was to remain as an eternal monument to Russia and his genius. Even if the subjective quality of the music is entirely disproved it still remains by far the most emotionally stirring of all his works. I feel that his loss of Madame von Meck's patronage and epistolary companionship must have caused him much less sorrow than resentment, far from enough real pain to be the inspiration of such a work.

It is in the mood of greatness, then, an autumnal brilliance of a passing heroism, that the present performance is cast. The melodies sing and are done, passionate sorrow gives way to the caressing allegro con grazia, on to the trio with Death beating the drum, impelled by ironic despair. The conductor never languishes over the music, many of the rhythms are taken faster than one has ever heard them. The march-scherzo rolls up an impulse that at its climax sweeps the hearer away. Conservative Bostons applaud as a spontaneous tribute to the feelings stirred and stimulated. You will do the same! The bitter hopelessness of the last movement bites deeper than over before. There is a feeling that eternity will never heal the wound, that life will drag on in endless tragedy. Even the mordant beauty of the music itself leaves but momentary solace. Russia, perhaps, twisted and tattered by rebellion and revolution, but an embittered composer, never!

It is not for me to praise anew the glories of a renewed Boston orchestra. From his first appearance here there was genius in Koussevitsky. He has constantly gained in all of the virtues that go to make a well-rounded conductor. Today I may even say that he is incomparable. Too seldom the gramophone has caught the interpretations of the finest efforts of a conductor. With this performance the over-played Sixth Symphony once more emerges as it really is, one of the great masterpieces of symphonic expression.

RICHARDSON BROWN

BEING a prima-donna conductor is no sinecure. You must have plenty of "it", or you won't please the greater part of the audience, and then the other people will say you are just a good showman. You must make your interpretations different enough from other conductors so that the fans can say you make the old works take on new life, and then your critics will say you distort the composers' ideas to exploit your own ego.

But the latest criticism of a conductor came from a little girl at a concert who saw the orchestra come in and take their places; then, as customary, the conductor. The reverential stillness was broken by her small voice — "Mamma, that man's late again."

FROM BOSTON

By CHARLES REPPER

IF there is anyone still in doubt about the artistic possibilities of the motion picture, he should lose no opportunity to see The Adventures of Prince Achmed, the "Oriental Film Fantasy in Silhouette", created by the German artist, Lotte Reiniger, and set to music by Wolfgang Zeller.

In fact no one, whatever his opinion of films, should miss this remarkably beautiful and imaginative picture. It was given its first Boston showing (released by the University Film Foundation of Cambridge, Mass.) on Nov. 3rd in Symphony Hall, for the benefit of a local charity, with the usual charitable system of charging $5.00 for the best seats. In spite of this, the hall was well filled. It was pleasing to learn that another performance would soon be given at prices within the reach of the average patron of theatres and movies; for this picture well deserves more extended showing, and the public should be given a chance to see it.

The charm of these pictures cannot be conveyed in cold type; one must see for oneself the fascinating scenes in Oriental courts, with suggestions of old Chinese and Persian paintings, the delicacy of the landscapes and draperies, the fascination of the figures and their groupings. To look at these drawings as "stills", one after the other, would be a delight, but when it is considered that they have motion, the talent of the artist rises to genius.

Special music to accompany the pictures was composed by Wolfgang Zeller. It was played at this performance by an orchestra of thirty members of the Boston Symphony.

The score was interesting, and of course well played, but at a "first performance" of this kind, the fascination of the pictures tended to relegate any music to second place in the attention, and another hearing would be necessary to the making of any intelligent comment on it. Here was a golden chance, at any rate, for those who have been crying for the return of orchestras to motion picture houses, thoroughly to enjoy themselves; for there was not merely a band of living players in the "pit" (or where the "pit" would be in Symphony Hall, if there were one), but their performance was of a quality to be compared only with that of the very few first-rank orchestras that have ever been offered to the motion-picture public.

Before leaving the subject of this picture, let us quote a sentence, in confirmation of our own opinion concerning it, from a review by the Herald's regular critic of photoplays who said, "For fantastic charm and truly remarkable artistry, it is doubtful whether the screen has yet produced anything to compare with The Adventures of Prince Achmed." So if you see it announced anywhere within walking or motoring distance, don't fail to see it — and we trust you will also have the pleasure of hearing the musical score in its original form.

❦

A VERY unusual and distinctive concert was that given in Jordan Hall this month in honor of Georges Longy, whose death in France, last March, was a great loss to his many friends and admirers. Boston's musical world lost him five years ago, when he resigned from the Symphony Orchestra and retired to France to spend the rest of his life in the congenial surroundings of his native land. Internationally famous, classed among the greatest players of the oboe, he was one of the stars of the Boston Orchestra, and an outstanding figure in the city, where he was conductor of several orchestras and ensemble groups, many of which he had organized. He was also the founder of the music school that bears his name, and which continues under the direction of his disciples.

The program at the memorial concert consisted of seven short numbers, some of them brief compositions, some of them single movements from quartets or sonatas. The composers represented were: Debussy, Loeffler, Respighi, Pizzetti, Ravel, Chausson, and Franck. The list of musicians who paid tribute to Mr. Longy by taking part in the concert is too long to give completely, but among these were: The Burgin, the American, and the Durrell String Quartets; some forty members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra; Adolfo Betti; Archibald T. Davison; Heinrich Gebhard; Carmela Ippolito; Walter Piston; Rulon Robison; Carlos Salzedo; Marie Sundelius; Georges Miquelle (son-in-law of Mr. Longy); and Renée Longy-Miquelle (daughter of the distinguished musician). An interesting address, given by Olin Downes, now music critic of the New York Times, but formerly of the Boston Post, and for many years a friend of Mr. Longy and supporter of his work, was also part of the program. It was a beautiful and impressive concert, highly appreciated by a large audience that included about "everybody" in the musical community, especially those who had been in contact with Mr. Longy and who held his memory in respect and affection.

❦

CHANGES and improvements in either the notation of music or the mechanism or form of the instruments for playing it, as a rule come about very slowly. Musicians must be more conservative than other people; at least they seem so when one is struggling with awkward clefs and transpositions in orchestral notation that could be done away with in short order if musicians only had half the initiative and enterprise of even the average commercial manufacturer. If engineers and business men were like musicians, we should doubtless still be using kerosene lamps instead of electric bulbs, quill pens instead of typewriters, and velocipedes instead of motor cars.

So far, composers have been the only ones with any daring, and they have made what progress they could with the instruments and notation at hand; but instruments remain much as they were, except for refinement of detail, and to make the sun to stand still seems no more difficult than to induce the musical world to weed out needless complexities of notation in order to help both composer and performer by removing some quite unnecessary sources of brain-fag and nerve-strain.

Jazz, being the music of the non-conformists, has, within a limited field, brought about some experimentation in the construction of the instruments that happen to be important in the production of the special jazz effects. Thus banjos, mandolins, and guitars, have been crossed and re-crossed, so that in any instrument shop you may now see specimens with the stringing of one, the head of another, and perhaps the body of a third. What one calls these hybrids, is a question — possibly Guibanjolins, or something like that. Anyway, the movement seems all to the good, because out of the experimentation of these musical Burbanks may come something new and of permanent worth.

If musicians as a whole are conservative, however, the priests of classical music are the most conservative of the lot, and so it is not surprising to find that no radical change has been made in the piano for

H. H. SAVAGE & SONS
Established 1863
166 Hanover Street, Boston, Mass.
We Sell or Rent
Band and Orchestra Instruments of all kinds
Stock includes full line
SAXOPHONES
New and Second Hand
High Grade New and Used
TRUMPETS
Victor and Atwater Kent Radios
Repairing done on all kinds of instruments
MAIL ORDERS RECEIVE PROMPT ATTENTION

C. C. Birchard & CO.
221 COLUMBUS AVENUE BOSTON
ORCHESTRAL WORKS by the master composers of today.
THE COMMUNITY ORCHESTRA BOOK. 100 Favorite Pieces. Every conductor should have it.
THE BIRCHARD BAND BOOK, 55 standard numbers always in demand.
CHARLES REPPER Dance Pictures for Orchestra.
A. WALTER KRAMER Transcriptions for String Orchestra and Treasure Tunes for Violin.
TRAINING COURSES for orchestra and band by L. M. and E. B. Gordon.
SEND FOR CATALOGUE

Music Supervisors! Ask for
The B. F. WOOD MUSIC CO. SERIES for ORCHESTRA
Edited by
FRANCIS FINDLAY
Supt. of Public School Music, New England Conservatory of Music
Issued with complete instrumentation and FULL SCORE for Conductor's use and study. Details of instrumentation and list of numbers already issued gladly sent to any interested person.
Small Orchestra, 75c. Full Orchestra, $1.00 Score, $1.85
THE B. F. WOOD MUSIC CO.
88 St. Stephen St., Boston
84 Newman St., Oxford St., London W 1

Let us do your
Music Printing and Engraving
We revise MSS. (when desired), engrave music plates, design titles, secure copyright and print any size edition of Music or Books (by any process). Get our prices first. Write today.
WHITE-SMITH MUSIC PUBLISHING CO.
40-44 Winchester St., Boston, Mass.

The
Cundy-Bettoney Co.
Station 30, Boston, Mass.
Publishers of Music for
SAXOPHONE, CLARINET, CORNET, FLUTE and PICCOLO
Methods, Solos, Duets, Studies, etc.
BAND AND ORCHESTRA MUSIC
Send for Catalogs

many moons. Occasionally, some hardy soul evolves something a bit out of the ordinary, such as the Hammond invention, demonstrated in Boston and other cities a few years ago, which contained a shutter, similar to the sound-box in the organ. With this contrivance, it was possible to play a chord with the box closed, and then, by opening the shutter, produce the effect of tone increasing in volume after its inception — something hitherto impossible on the piano. As the inability to increase the volume of a note or chord without striking it again has always been considered a handicap in piano playing, one might have supposed that musicians would hail this invention with glee; but there has appeared to be no particular demand that piano makers develop and add this feature to their future instruments. Evidently since Beethoven, Brahms, Chopin, and Liszt, could be adequately performed on the existing piano, why worry over new effects that would be used only in the works of living, and therefore inferior (?) composers?

This season, we are being offered another invention, and it will be interesting to see whether the Pianists' Union (intangible, but a strictly closed shop, nevertheless) will take any serious notice of it.

The new piano is known as the Bechstein-Moor. It is made by the house of Bechstein, according to the invention of Emanuel Moor, and it is being used on tour by the inventor's wife, Winifred Christie, a pianist who has been heard many times at the standard piano.

The feature of the new Bechstein is a second keyboard, like a second manual on an organ. The upper manual is an octave higher than the main rank, and there is a pedal by which this upper manual may be coupled to the lower. There will be nothing new about this to an organist, of course, but to the pianist accustomed to the limitations of ten fingers on one keyboard, the possibilities are fascinating. Embellishments in the higher register can be played on the upper manual without taking the hand far from position; counter-melodies that would ordinarily cause the two hands to conflict can be kept separate if, as the Herald reviewer wrote, "one hand takes the high road and one takes the low road"; by coupling the two manuals, one can play rapid octaves with a single scale; and harmonically the gain is greatest of all, since the doubling in the octave makes it possible for one player to approach the richness and fullness of a four-hand arrangement.

These various possibilities were shown in the recital recently given by Miss Christie in Symphony Hall, where a good-sized audience listened with evident interest — some persons even crowding up on the stage afterward to see the construction of the new piano. Unfortunately, the owners whisked it away before "a good look could be had by all."

Miss Christie's program contained no music later than Schumann and Franck, but it would be equally interesting to hear what might be done on this promising instrument with more modern music. Imagine, for instance, George Copeland arranging some of his atmospheric Debussy and delectable Spanish repertoire for the double keyboard — or George Gershwin tossing delightful rhythmic arabesques around some of his lilting melodies. That would be something to write home about, what?

We see that these inviting pianos are on sale in various cities throughout the country — alas, not in Boston (Why is that?) — and that they cost from $3,000 up. Why don't they make one at a price within the reach of some people who could play it? Mr. Gershwin excepted; for what are a few thousands to the Rhapsodist in Blue?

Even if this new piano is not taken up by pianists in general — the price is certainly a barrier at present, though doubtless a way would be found to make instruments at a more reasonable figure — it shou invaluable in broadcasting studios the piano is a vital feature of the orchestra. In fact, wherever a piano lied on to "fill in" and otherwise aug the effect of a limited instrumentatio increased richness of the Bechstein- would be a musical gold mine.

Will it, however, prove to be another astrous labor-saving device, succee merely in putting one pianist in every piano team out of business? Fortuna

Ph
Novem
Ko

TCHAIKO
the BOSTO
SERGE KOUS
Alb., $10.00).

Every gre that are dist which he ha tionality o remarkable se

It was my first time tha
I felt at the
the first time performance maudlin senti that he migh time he wrote a theory brou been disprov

It seems tha mind than tha his letters to ticipated favo
the use of an more content t piece, which w it was to rema genius. Even tirely disproved stirring of all b
Meck's patron caused him enough real pai

It is in the m of a passing he
The melodies a to the caressing beating the drum never languish taken faster th
scherzo rolls
hearer away.
tribute to the the same! T bites deeper th
ity will never tragedy. Even but momentary

contained in the architect's instructions, he would make but a sorry job of it. In considering the study of an instrument, let us substitute for the builder's raw materials the different exercises in a Method, such as scales, various forms of slurring and articulation, single, double, and triple tonguing, characteristic studies, and all forms of etudes devised to train the lips, the muscles of the lips, wind control, and endurance. No more than the builder can build properly without referring to his blue prints, can a student practise these exercises properly without reading the text that accompanies them, corresponds to the builder's blue prints, and tells how the thing shall be done. A student should always study thoroughly the text of a cornet method, and if this procedure is properly adhered to, he is bound to progress. When in doubt, he should ask questions, not from a person who plays the piano, violin, or drum, but from some other cornet player of authority who has made his mark in the musical world.

I should like to quote just one observation fro whe thin this writ in i his his for I sh be a

Are Musicians Peo

By L. G. del CASTILLO

[The morals of keys—the morals of artists—the amatory restlessness of movie stars—the soft-heartedness of theatre musicians—the pet antipathy of a child wonder—the tactlessness (to Del) on the part of George W. Chadwick: these are the things of which this article is composed.]

FROM a perusal of a late New Yorker, and, if rumor can be trusted, all New Yorkers are late, both at theatres and at night clubs, this is beginning to get as involved as Henry James, however, I don't care, the more involved the better, that is, as long as I am writing at space rates, it appears, to gradually work back toward the beginning of the sentence, that the play by Arthur Schnitzler called Reigen, which is to say, "Round Dance", the title having to do with the going-around-in-circles form of the action, has been, according to the New Yorker previously mentioned, involved — Oh, phooey! Let's start all over again.

Moral and Immoral Keys

It seems that Schnitzler's play Reigen has been in considerable difficulty with the censors, both in book form and as acted. At its premier in Berlin a few years ago, the incidental music became the subject of attack as well as the play itself, and therein lies the story. The matter came up in court, and the music was finally absolved from charges of immorality and corruption, mainly because it was in E-flat. The court held that E-flat was "an especially gloomy and heavy key which has no power to define immorality, if music can ever do that." This, mind you, in the face of the court's compatriot Wagner, who could make music do anything and did, though not necessarily in the key of E-flat.

There has long been professional agitation over the color, so-called, of different keys, in that some are more brilliant than others. Flat keys are generally supposed to be more subdued than sharp keys, which I suppose would make the key of D-flat much duller than that of C-sharp. E is a so-called brilliant key, and F is more subdued. Of course these are the major keys. No minor key is going to be very cheerful, even though its relative major should be one of the very hotsy-totsy depraved roués of keys; the blackest sheep of the relatives, in truth. The New Yorker suggests that Drink to Me Only With Thine Eyes is in E-flat, so it can't be so bad. I don't know myself that that makes it so good, and anyway "Drink To Me" is only in E-flat provided that a contralto sings it!

So far as the morals of music are concerned, it is more likely that the temperament of the composer is of a lot more consequence than the key. The chances are that any good composer who had been prolific in composition could be proved to have composed in practically every key there was. I say good composer, because the hack composer generally sticks to conservative keys like F- and G-major, partly with an eye on his customers, and partly because his musical mentality works that way. An ingrowing feller like Chopin, on the other hand, loves to set himself musical exercises in incredible numbers of sharps or flats, and to wallow in an orgy of accidentals. And, in his case, whatever the key, there will then be a certain substratum of pale-lavender boudoir sentiment, which can be found to be peeping through even such virile music as the Polonaises and Etudes.

But if Chopin writes boudoir music, Haydn and Mendelssohn balance the scale with an orthodox chaste primness. And if Stravinsky leads the muse into an emotional frenzy that blasts the Ten Commandments to their foundations, Sir Edward Elgar is on hand to countercheck its waywardness with a stern British uprightness, the soul of conservative morality in every joint and strophe. Music escapes no more than anything else from the deadening uniformity of the cross section. For musicians are people, little as some of them might seem to be, and there are good ones and bad ones from other standpoints than those of musicianship and technic.

Artists Often 99 44/100% Pure

It might not be amiss, while on the subject, to emphasize that all artists are not morally rotten. This now thoroughly exploded idea started its exit and gradual decease along with the passing of Queen Victoria. It was originally given weight by various economic absurdities (such as that artists as a class could not earn an honest living), and social idiocies (such as that artists need be unconventional in order to express themselves freely, and that the development of artistic ability creates a vacuum in other more important, if less spectacular, functions of the brain). The average musician, then as well as now, could not be distinguished from other members of the "body domestick" except for an instrument in the offing, or a slightly seedy look — rather more

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
POST

DEC 7 - 1930

BEETHOVEN'S WORKS STIR HUGE AUDIENCE

Festival Closes in Triumph for Boston Symphony, Soloists and Chorus.

IMMORTAL NINTH GIVEN

The Beethoven Festival by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Constitution Hall yesterday ended in a blaze of musical glory with an outstanding presentation of that master's immortal Ninth Symphony, 200 singers of the National Capital Oratorio Association, Albert W. Harned, director, providing the choral feature.

Four soloists, Jeannette Vreeland, soprano; Nevada Van Der Veer, contralto; Dan Gridley, tenor, and Frazer Gange, bass, were heard in the magnificent finale with which Beethoven crowned this most pretentious of all his symphonies.

Every seat in the house was sold when the performance began at 3 p. m. Hundreds of students in Washington schools and colleges were present at this program of the festival, which had been arranged for their special benefit and to promote musical interest in Washington by Mrs. Wilson Greene, the impresario, under whose management in the National Capital the festival has been given.

Conducted by Koussevitzky.

The conductor of the afternoon was, of course, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, who, despite his prodigious labors in leading four great festival programs this week, was in a vigorous mood yesterday. The Symphony Orchestra played both the Ninth Symphony and the shorter Symphony No. 1 in C major, which preceded it, with perfect ensemble tone, evident enthusiasm and quick response to the inspired baton of its leader.

The Symphony No. 1 in C major proved to be possessed of many beauties, especially in the third movement when the menuetto was an exquisite gem of orchestral playing. All its delicate phrases were woven by Dr. Koussevitzky into a musical pattern of intricate loveliness. The other movements of the symphony were adequately handled.

After the intermission the big moment of the entire festival arrived: the playing of the unique Ninth Symphony, undoubtedly Beethoven's symphonic masterpiece.

Audience Is Enthralled.

The audience sat enthralled as the orchestra proceeded on its melodic way, the first movement, the allegro, majestic in its music of the spheres timed to the rhythm of ecstasy. Then came the delicious scherzo of the second movement, admirably done, the individual voices of the orchestra each telling the story in its own beautiful way, and then the poetic adagio, leading movement by movement and measure by measure to the finale.

The audience thrilled with civic pride when Dr. Koussevitzky, at the conclusion of the symphony, presented the soloists who had given such good account of themselves and shared with them and the mammoth chorus the tremendous series of ovations which marked the close of the presentation.

The chorus showed a well-trained, finely developed ensemble tone and sang with ardor and interest, portraying how much good material vocally speaking has been assembled in the National Capital Oratorio Association singers.

Deserves Much Credit.

Dr. Harned, their leader, deserves much credit for his share in preparing them to assist the Boston Symphony Orchestra in its laudable endeavor to bring the best of Beethoven to Washington as part of their celebration of their jubilee year.

The thanks of the music-loving public are due to the Boston Symphony Orchestra, its dynamic director, Dr. Koussevitzky, and Mrs. Wilson Greene, the local impresario, for this week of festival music, which will remain memorable in the Capital City for some time to come.

A hearty welcome awaits the Boston Symphony Orchestra and its conductor when it comes again to Washington.

E. E. P.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TIMES

DEC 7 - 1930

A FRENCH MUSIC CRITIC HEARS AMERICAN ORCHESTRAS

Henry Prunieres, the French music correspondent of THE TIMES, upon his return to Paris has written his impressions of our leading American orchestras. They are reflections of a practical and impartial observation of the principal Eastern and mid-Western symphonic organizations of the United States.

By HENRY PRUNIERES.

PARIS, Nov. 19, 1930.

I WILL not be guilty of the pretension of forming for myself a definite judgment on America after three weeks of travel across the United States, nor do I intend to imitate the example of a certain Frenchman of letters who, after a hardly longer sojourn, thought himself capable of writing a book stigmatizing the customs of the new continent.

I had heard the New York Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra under Arturo Toscanini in Paris last season, and I had communicated my enthusiasm at that time to the readers of THE TIMES. Secretly, I had mistrusted my impressions just a bit. I had known Toscanini a long time. He is a magician. Just as the most mediocre opera will seem to you a masterpiece, if it is his wish, in the same degree is it in his power to transfigure the interpreters. I have heard at La Scala some operatic productions of amazing perfection in spite of second-grade singers and a rather commonplace orchestra. This, then, is the triumph of Toscanini, that he knows how to make the most even of the deficiencies of the interpreters. Under his baton the New York orchestra had seemed splendid to me, but perhaps this might have been a mirage.

Now that I have heard this same orchestra without Toscanini, I no longer doubt that in itself it is beautiful. To make any sort of comparison between an organization of this standard and the orchestras of Paris, or indeed with the best in Europe, is out of the question. I am quite sure that if the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra, which is the best in Europe, in my opinion, were to visit America, it would be adjudged as being in the fifth or sixth rank, certainly below that of the Chicago Symphony Orchestra, which seems to me to be inferior to those in Boston, Philadelphia and New York.

* * *

No doubt this is caused by the fact that the various European orchestras are made up of personnels which follow too strictly purely nationalistic lines. The Germans excel on brass instruments and the clarinets. The quartets of their orchestras, composed of musicians who individually do not have a very fine tone, produce a fine effect, thanks to the admirable discipline which obtains there. The French possess incomparable woodwinds, and the Italians are distinguished by their mastery of wind instrument playing in general, while the Russians, Poles, Czechs and Hungarians surpass in the string sections.

The great American orchestras are essentially cosmopolitan in character. They bring to their midst the best musicians of the world and employ instruments of the highest quality. The French orchestras are to be found wanting in the quality of their brasses, especially in horns and trombones. They have remarkable trumpets in C, but they lack the noble and powerful sonority of the German trumpets. This is a question of instrumental manufacture rather than one of professional skill in playing. Ravel himself inclines to this point of view. Interviewed on this matter, he became enthusiastic about the trumpets in the Boston Orchestra, played, so he said, by Germans. As a matter of fact, the principal trumpet players are French, playing partly upon French and partly upon instruments of German manufacture.

It is exactly this employment of the best musicians in Europe which makes for their unheard-of perfection in Boston, New York and Philadelphia. The Slavs dominate the strings, the French and Italians the woods, the Germans the brasses, and so on. Among these are to be found a limited number of excellent American executants; the whole forms an ensemble incomparable from the tonal point of view. The Chicago Orchestra is of a slightly different sort. It sounds more like a German orchestra, but I do not know any in Central Europe which is better.

American orchestras have, in addition, the advantage of numbers. They boast of 110 to 125 men, whereas in Europe an organization of more than eighty-four is rare. This permits effects of a fullness and mellowness in dynamics impossible to an orchestra of fewer personnel. Finally, like the German orchestras, they are superior to the French from the point of view of discipline and rehearsal. It should not be thought that French musicians cannot submit to hard work and discipline. There are thirty-eight Frenchmen in the Boston Orchestra. In the United States, however, musicians are well paid and gain a generous livelihood. They are not preoccupied with material considerations and think only of their work.—(? Ed.)

* * *

In Paris, musicians play in the symphony orchestras because of their idealism and for the love of their profession, but receive ridiculous salaries. Usually belonging to rival associations, they have no fixed fees, and share slender profits during the season.

Some of them, with rehearsals and playing publicly four times a week for six months, earn a sum equivalent to that earned by a second violin in a single month in the United States. Under these conditions they are forced to give lessons and to play wherever they can. They give the least possible time to rehearsals and come to the performances fatigued. How can one be surprised at the results? As for myself, I do not believe that any better results could be secured from such maltreated musicians in any other country.

If Paris, instead of eight orchestras giving thirteen concerts weekly, possessed but two orchestras, I am sure that these would be the best in Europe, and in matter of tone would approach most nearly the great American orchestras; always with the proviso that they were conducted by good directors. Though such seed may be rare in our soil, we have at our disposal a Pierre Monteux, an Albert Wolff, and, among the younger men of the future, a Vladimir Golschmann, the last French, despite his Russian name.

